The principal proofs of those who contend here for a supernatural and miraculous power are, 1. The essential difference which there is between any thing sensible, gross, and corporeal, and a being purely intellectual. 2. The disproportion between the remedy and the disease. Bodily illnesses are ordinarily cured either by applying remedies correspondent to the nature of the disease, or by evacuating and taking away the humours that occasion the complaint, or by bringing the blood and humours into a right order again; which is to be effected various ways, either by acting directly upon the humours, and taking away the cause of the disorder, or by restoring tranquillity and cheerfulness to the mind, as the content and satisfaction of this necessarily influences, and has an effect upon, the blood and humours, and settles them in a just and due equilibrium: or the indisposition may be an atrophy, weakness, and faintness, and then it is helped or removed by raising the spirits, and repairing, by good and wholesome nourishment, the blood and exhausted humours.

But in the case before us, none of these means could take place. Sara had no bodily illness that one knows of; the business to be done was to drive away the evil spirit which molested her, without doing her any harm, but would not suffer any to approach her with impure dispositions. Now the burning of the fish's entrails could not act upon the body of the demon, because he was purely spiritual, nor on his spirit, because the smoke was wholly material; besides, the same remedy, when applied to other persons in the like malady, appears to be insignificant; neither fumigations, perfumes, good or evil smells, have ever been able to drive away devils from any determinate place or person. If exorcisms are sometimes accompanied with burning of brimstone and other things, of a quick and strong scent, it sufficiently appears, from divers circumstances, that one is not to ascribe the effect which attends them to the power of the effluvia, but to the efficacy of the prayers which accompany them. In short, if the smoke from the burnt entrails had a natural and sufficient efficacy to chase away the evil spirit, to what purpose were Tobias and Sara's prayers, and their remarkable continence? Why does Raphael say to Tobias, that the evil demon has no power but against those that abandon themselves to their impure and brutal lusts? Does a natural remedy depend upon the virtuous or evil dispositions of those that apply it?

Amidst this variety of sentiments we think we may venture to affirm: 1. That the smoke of the liver could have no direct or physical effect upon Asmodeus. 2. That it operated only on the senses of Tobias and Sara, and possibly might serve to suppress in them carnal and sensual inclinations, and contribute to their continence and chastity; effects which naturalists ascribe to some plants, juices, and odours. This virtuous disposition having disarmed the fiend, and put it out of his power to execute his malice against Tobias, as he did against the seven others, he retired to the upper Egypt for the same evil designs, filled with confusion and vexation at his disappointment; especially observing that this pious couple joined prayers, watching, and humiliation, to temperance and chastity, and that for three nights successively. 3. The angel Raphael, without doubt, contributed greatly to Tobias's conquest over Asmodeus, not only in discovering to him the remedy we have mentioned, and acquainting him how good and true Israelites should enter upon, and behave in the marriage-state, but by his presence more especially, and invincible power, which he could not resist. The Scripture sufficiently intimates, that he had the greatest share in the victory, when it says, that Raphael bound Asmodeus, and sent him away into the uttermost parts of Egypt, which cannot be ascribed either to the smoke from the entrails of the fish, nor even to Tobias's wise conduct or prayers. So that the miracle of Sara's deliverance from her malady consisted chiefly in these three particulars: 1. In the discovery of so singular and extraordinary a remedy as we have mentioned. 2. In laying open the cause which gave the evil spirit power to kill those who approached Sara, and pointing out the means to render his malice impotent and ineffectual. Lastly, In the supernatural assistance which Raphael invisibly gave Tobias on the occasion, and sending away the demon a great way off, in a manner never heard of before.

The only thing which remains at present to be examined is, the manner, cause, and the place of the confinement of Asmodeus. The Scripture, without being more explicit, says, that Raphael seized the demon and sent him into the deserts of the upper Egypt. The Greek adds, that Raphael chained him there. The Hebrew says, that Asmodeus, smelling the smoke of the burnt liver, fled into the upper Egypt. But neither the one nor the other makes mention of the angel's seizing him, as the Vulgate does; which insinuates, that it was done even in Raguel's house, and from thence conducted him to the deserts of Thebais, as to a prison. But however it happened, it is certain we ought not to understand the account in a literal and strict sense. For how can an evil spirit be chained, or confined to a determinate place, or how is it possible to seize him, and bring him as it were prisoner to a dungeon? We must, therefore, understand the word bound, here, as in other passages of Scripture, where the devil is spoken of almost in the same terms: for instance, our Saviour says, No man can enter into a strong man's house and spoil his goods, except he will first bind the strong man. (Mark iii. 27.) And in the Apocalypse, the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, is laid hold on by an angel, and bound for a thousand years, (xx. 2.) St. Peter, speaking of the fall of the apostate angels, says, that God cast them down into hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment: (2 Pet. ii. 4.) and St. Jude, That the angels which kept not their first estate are reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day, (ver. 6.) None of these expressions were ever understood of a real confinement, or material chains, to bind, fasten, or keep prisoners those unclean spirits, but of a superior force, which continued them in their torments, and stopped the violent effects of their fury and malice.

St. Austin, explaining the manner how evil spirits may be bound or loosed, says, that these terms signify no more, when applied to these enemies of mankind, than that they have liberty or permission to do mischief, or have not the liberty to hurt. The devil's place at present is in hell, as he does not deceive the world now, as formerly, by idolatry. Since the gospel of Jesus Christ hath been preached through the whole world, our Saviour has bound the strong man, entered into his house, taken away the arms wherein he trusted, and spoiled his goods. Raphael, with respect to Asmodeus, was as a mighty conqueror, who disposes of his captive at his pleasure, lays him in chains, or sends him into banishment where he pleases. That archangel, by the command of God, ordered him to flee away; he signified to him, that the power hitherto indulged him was revoked, of hurting those that approached near to Sara. In this sense we are to understand binding Asmodeus, as he could not act without God's will and permission; as soon as that permission ceased or was recalled, he then might properly be said to be bound, or confined from doing farther mischief. St. Austin very well compares him to a great mastiff, tied up and chained, who growls angrily, and shews an inclination to bite, but can hurt none but those who are so imprudent as to come too near him. (Ser. 197.)

But how can the evil spirit be properly said to be confined to a determinate place? Is it not equally a contradiction to say that a spirit is confined, as to say that he is bound or in chains? Neither the one nor the other of these can belong to, or be inflicted on, a being purely spiritual. But it is easy to solve this difficulty from the principles just laid down; if the evil spirit was bound when God suspended or revoked the power he had given him, it is equally clear that the same spirit is confined or shut up, when God sets certain bounds to the exercise of his power, whether it be with regard to times, or places, or things, or persons. Thus Asmodeus attending upon, and being attached to, the person of Sara, and not having any power but against those that came to her with evil and impure dispositions, was confined to the place where Sara lived. He could not exert his malice any where else, nor upon any other than those that were given up to him. He was sent away from thence into the deserts of the upper Egypt, not to be confined or locked up there, as in a fixed place, or certain limited bounds of space, like a prisoner, but to execute his power within a certain district assigned him, or rather to continue there without any at all, as that part was desert, wild, and uninhabited. So that to be confined to or shut up in a place, with respect to an evil spirit, means only his power to do mischief, and to execute his wicked intentions, within the extent of such a place: as, when God permits any person to be tempted, the tempter's power is limited to that person, and to the place where he is.

It is only God that commands the evil spirits, and has a right to fix the places and times when and where they may exert their power. He alone can set bounds to their malice, and stop its mischievous effects when he judges proper. It is true, indeed, that both angels and men have sometimes made use of the same power in confining evil spirits, and stopping the progress of their rage and violence; but neither angels nor men could effect this by any proper power of their own, they acted only by the appointment of God, and in his name. It was thus Raphael subdued Asmodeus; it was thus Michael the archangel stopped the attempt of the devil to carry away the body of Moses. (Jude, ver. 9.) He used no other arms, no other reprimand, than the Lord rebuke thee. It was thus holy martyrs and confessors of old, and our exorcists at this day,* control evil spirits, and limit the extent of their power. All was done in the name and by the power of Jesus Christ.

Not so the magicians, who boast of their power over evil spirits, that they can at pleasure stop their operations, and keep them, as they pretend, chained up and confined, some in a circle or chamber, and others in their places. One cannot say that magicians act in the name of God, and make use of his authority over evil spirits; much less that they act against the permission of God, and in spite of him; for who can resist his will? we cannot help thinking, therefore, either that this pretended power of magicians over evil spirits, is purely chimerical and imaginary; or that God, by a secret but most terrible judgment, permits for a time, that those miserable and wicked persons, who have deserted his service, should become slaves of the devil, who wretchedly deceives them by an appearance of submission, which he obsequiously pays to them, whilst in truth he tyrannizes over them, and treats them worse than the most abject and miserable slaves. It is not impossible but that the devil may exercise such a sort of authority over his subjects, as to command them to execute the will of such wicked magicians, as have given themselves over to him. But however this be, neither religion nor good sense will permit us to ascribe either to the devil himself, or any of his subalterns, much less to magicians, an absolute and independent authority. All the motions, power, and force of the devil, are dependent upon, and subject to, the Father and Sovereign of all spirits, who rules and governs them by his infinite power and incomprehensible wisdom.

The place where Asmodeus was banished to, was the desert of the upper Egypt; a soil dry, sandy, uncultivated, and almost entirely uninhabited; as it never rains there, and the overflowings of the Nile cannot reach it, by reason of the mountains and its high situation, it must of course be barren. St. Jerome intimates, that it abounds with serpents and venomous creatures. This frightful desert would for ever have continued in abhorrence and oblivion, if it had not been visited, and as it were consecrated, by a great number of religious hermits, who by their abode have made it venerable and famous, and have changed the honour and barrenness of it into a delicious paradise; a place particularly favoured, and where Jesus Christ displays the greatest and most sensible effects of his grace and power. The devil, who had established as it were his empire here, being drove from other parts by the virtue of the cross, found himself here vanquished and subdued, by the penance and austerities of these anchorets. This was the field of battle where St. Anthony, Pacomius, Macharius, Paphnucius, and many others, so often engaged with and overcame the devil, whose fury and obstinacy were so weakened, that he could only maintain the fort where he had intrenched and fortified himself.*

The Scripture does not mention for how long time Asmodeus continued bound in the upper Egypt, but we may be assured that he remained so all the time of Tobias and Sara's life, since it is before remarked of this remedy, that the evil spirit, once drove away by the power of it, never returns again to the person. One cannot say but after their time God might permit him to exert his malice and evil arts afresh against other persons, but this is a secret which God has not been pleased to make any discovery of. It is to be observed, that Jesus Christ, in his gospel, intimates, that the Jews believed, that the unclean spirit, when gone out of a man, walketh through dry places, and seeking rest there for a time, and finding none, returns into the house from whence he came out; (Matt. xii. 33, 34.) i. e. to take possession again of that unhappy person, whom he before dwelt in. Thus the evil spirit that haunted king Saul, returned upon him at intervals, after it had been drove away by the harmony of David's harp. The LXX. describing the sad estate to which Babylon would be reduced after its fall, say, that sirens shall lie there, and devils dance there, and centaurs shall dwell there. (Isa. xiii. 21, 22.)

A late writer mentions strange and prodigious things of a serpent in the upper Egypt; one cannot help thinking almost that there was something supernatural in it. This serpent frequented a grot or cave of a mountain, over against the village of Saata, about a hundred leagues from

* In the apostolic age, and the next following, the power of exorcising, or casting out devils, was a miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost, given to many Christians in common. The particular order of exorcists was first settled in the church, upon the withdrawing of that extraordinary and miraculous power, probably about the latter end of the third century. (Bingham's Antiq. tom. ii.) It does not appear by any good or certain authority, that after that time they really did reject demons, either out of infants, or demoniacs. But under that pretence, many counterfeit miracles have been obtruded on the credulous. Erasmus has wittily exposed the pretence to this power, in his Spectrum, or Exorcismus. In the Roman Ritual we have the form of exorcising expressly set down, called Exorcismus obsessorum, which Calmet probably refers to; viz. "Exorcizo te, immundissime Spiritus, omnia incursio Adversarii, omne Phantasma, omnis Legio, in nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi, eradicare, et effugere ab hoc Plasmate Dei. Ipse tibi imperat, qui te de supernis cœlorum in inferiora terræ præcepit. Ipse tibi imperat qui mari, ventis, et tempestatibus imperavit. Audi ergo et time, Satana, inimice fidei, hostis generis humani, mortis adductor, vitæ raptor, justitiæ declinator, malorum radix, fomes vitiorum, seductor hominum, &c. Recede, et da locum Spiritui Sancto per hoc Signum Crucis Christi Domini nostri."

* The Egyptian hermits were doubtless very extraordinary persons, and of great sanctity, as appears from the account given of them by Jerome, Athanasius, Sozomen, Cassian, Sulpitius Severus, Du Pin, and others; but that they cured all diseases, delivered those that were possessed, had personal conflicts themselves with the devil, attacking them sometimes in a brutal form, at other times tempting them in a beautiful and pleasing one, and came off more than conquerors over that grand and subtle adversary: these, and many other as surprising things, which are recorded of them, we may suspend our belief of, till it is certain that miracles continued in the church in the third and fourth century. Calmet seems to have singled out these as the principal devotees, and probably because they were the institutors of the monastic life.

Grand Cairo, upon the western border of the Nile; he hurt nobody, one might touch him, fondle him, kill him, cut him in pieces, and carry him several days' journey from thence, and yet after all this he would appear again in the cavern alive and well. It seemed to make a distinction between persons; some it would go before, fondle them, and wrap its folds about them; others it would flee away from and shun. In short, if what is said to be true, we cannot help acknowledging something miraculous in the creature. Some have thought that it might possibly be the demon Asmodeus, whose abode we mentioned to be in these parts. One could wish it could be certainly known how long it is since it first appeared there, for the ancients say nothing of it. Or possibly the whole may be only invention, to embellish the travels, and to entertain and amuse credulous readers. (Lucas's Voyage into the Levant, tom. i. cap. 9. 14.)

As I have already pointed out some errors of the Romanists, couched in this Dissertation, it may not be amiss, at the conclusion of it, to take notice, that in the old Roman Missal, and also in the Missal of Sarum, there is a proper mass of Raphael the archangel, with the following rubric, by way of preface to it, grounded plainly on this history:—

The following office of Raphael the archangel, may be celebrated for pilgrims or travellers; that as he conducted and brought back (in his journey) Tobias safe and sound, so he would bring back those for whom the mass is said. It may also be said for all sick people, and such as are possessed with the devil; because he is a medicinal angel, who restored sight to Tobias, and dispossessed a devil out of Sara, his son's wife.

Then the following prayer to God:—

O God, who didst direct blessed Raphael the archangel, to go before thy servant Tobias, hastening in his journey, and gavest him to be his keeper, amidst the varieties and dangers of this life and way; grant, we beseech thee, that we may be protected by his aid, so that both we may shun the dangers of this present life, and may be able to come to the joys of heaven, through our Lord, &c.

Then a prayer to S. Raphael himself:—

I entreat thee also, do thou assist me, O excellent prince Raphael, thou best physician of soul and body; and thou that didst presently enlighten the bodily eyes of Tobias by curing them, do thou also enlighten my spiritual and carnal eyes, and do not cease by thy heavenly prayer to cut off all the darkness of my heart and body. (Hor. Sec. us. Sarum. f. 92.)

THE

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. THE book of the words of Tobit.] Βίβλος τῶν λόγων. Λόγος often stands for thing; thus Sophocles, τοῖς κυρίοις πάντα χρὴ δηλοῦν λόγον. The Hebrew word דבר, signifies promiscuously a word and a thing, and is rendered both by ῥῆμα and λόγος. See Exod. viii. 12. 1 Kings xiv. 19. Eccles. i. 1. Mark i. 45. Luke i. 37. ii. 15. ῥῆμα τοῦτο γεγονὸς, i. e. this thing was done. The margin rightly renders λόγων here by acts. The Hebrew versions, and Syriac, and the Alexandrian MS. differ in the following genealogy; the Vulgate wholly omits it. Our translators follow the Rom. and Complut. editions.

Ver. 2. Who in the time of Enemessar king of the Assyrians, was led captive, &c.] The first book of Chronicles v. 26. tells us, that God stirred up Pul and Tiglath-Pileser, kings of Assyria, against the impious Israelites, and that the latter carried them away from beyond Jordan, and sent them into the countries of Halah, Habor, and Hara, and to the river Gozan. And this book adds, that the tribe of Nephthali, of which Tobit was, being carried away by Enemessar, who is the same with Shalmaneser, as the margin has it, was placed in the province of Media, and himself at Nineveh. It is plain from hence, that there was a double invasion, and a double captivity of the Israelites. Of this second captivity we must necessarily understand this place, which was thirty years after that by Tiglath-Pileser. In the time of this last translation, Tobit was carried away captive with many others, being then, as is supposed, about forty-four years old, with his wife and young Tobias, A. M. 3283. before Christ 721 years, or thereabouts.

That city which is called properly Nephthali in Galilee.] Properly, Κυδίως. Where is there such a Greek word so used? All other translations have it as a proper name, Cydios, or some such-like. The Alexandrian MS. has Κυδίων, which Grabe alters for Κυρίως. Calmet thinks the reading might be Καδίως. This is thought to be the same with that which was otherwise called Kadesh-Nephthali, and so the margin explains it. This being the principal city in the tribe of Nephthali, in the more early times, for brevity's sake, was called Nephthali. It was not only a Levitical city, but also one of the three cities of refuge on the west of Jordan. It is the opinion of the learned, founded on Isa. ix. 1—3. compared with Matt. iv. 14. that as the land of Galilee, or of Zebulun and Nephthali, had the misfortune to be first in that calamity, which befel their nation by the Assyrians, so, in recompence of that misery which they suffered above the rest of their brethren, they had the first and chiefest share of the presence and conversation of the Messiah; which the prophet Isaiah comforts them with accordingly, and we see actually fulfilled in the gospel. In like manner it may be presumed, and from many passages in this book (see chap. xiii. xiv.) it seems probable, that to Tobit, and others of the faithful Israelites, was vouchsafed in their captivity a distant prospect of this glorious appearing, and of the happy state of the church under it.

Ver. 3. I Tobit have walked all the days of my life in the way of truth and justice, and I did many alms-deeds to my brethren, and my nation, who came with me to Nineveh, into the land of the Assyrians.] Tobit here in person relates his own history; and so the other versions, the Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, and the ancient Latin, all read in the first person; the Vulgate only differs, which from hence to the end of the third chapter, runs in the third person. One may observe that Tobit's misfortunes never induce him to leave the way of virtue; but his charity to his brethren under the same captivity, is most extraordinary and amiable. Human prudence proceeds upon maxims very different; it is natural for a captive, at a distance from his country, and reduced in his circumstances, to manage and reserve the little remainder to subsist himself and family, and to think that giving to others may be the way to bring poverty upon himself; but Tobit's faith judged otherwise, and had a respect unto the recompence of the reward. St. Ambrose's character of him is very just: "He bore with humble patience absence from his own country, and the loss of his goods occasioned by it, and was more sensibly affected with the afflictions of his brethren than his own; he regarded not as his private property what he had hitherto acquired, but distributed it to the necessities of his fellow-captives, esteeming only what he himself suffered as his due, and the just punishment of his sins. He was every where and in all things submissive to the will of God, without listening to the motions of self-love, or the suggestions of partial and corrupt nature." (In Tob. cap. 1. tom. i.)

Ver. 5. Now all the tribes which together revolted, and the house of my father Nephthali, sacrificed unto the heifer Baal.] For distinction's sake, Baal had particular titles and different rites of worship; here Baal the heifer is specified, to point out to us what Baal is meant, viz. the heifer, or calf of Beth-el, or rather Dan, which was near to the tribe of Nephthali. The margin renders, to the power of Baal, as if the reading was, τῆς Βάαλ τῇ δυνάμει. Spencer and some other learned men contend, that the true reading here is, τῷ Βάαλ, τῇ Δυνάμει, to Baal, the strength, or the power, which is probably the sense of the other marginal reading, viz. the god Baal, and is countenanced by many copies, and may seem confirmed from Hos. x. 5. and Mark xiv. 62. where the right hand of Power means, the right hand of the Power, or of God, the all-powerful. And it is observable, that Aquila, in his version, renders Eli, Eli, which in the LXX. is ὁ Θεός μου, ὁ Θεός μου, (Psal. xxii. 1.) by ἰσχυρέ μου, ἰσχυρέ μου. That God is called the Strength, the Rock, &c. is indeed evident from many passages in Scripture; (see Exod. xv. 11. Deut. xxxii. 37.) but then such a title does not belong, nor was usually given, to false gods or idols, who are always styled vanities, because of their nothingness and impotence. Nor is it probable that Tobit, when he is condemning image-worship, should honour its object with a title of such pre-eminence and distinction. The true reading seems rather that which is followed in our version, τῷ Βάαλ τῇ δαμάλει, i. e. to the idol or image of Baal, with the form or resemblance of a heifer. And so Jer. ii. 29. Hos. xiii. 1. where the LXX. render τῷ Βάαλ, the Chaldee adds image or idol. It remains only to inquire, why Baal is here expressed in the feminine gender; besides the common one, the learned Selden assigns these two particular reasons: 1. That Baal was ἀρσενόθηλυς, male and female; like the Egyptian Isis, the Syrian Astarte, and others of those images, which antiquity worshipped, who were indifferently gods or goddesses among those nations who adopted their figures. (Plut. de Isid. Aruob. adv. Gent. lib. iii. Tertull. Apol. i. 13.) 2. The Egyptians, and other idolatrous nations that worshipped beasts, preferred, according to Herodotus, fœminas boves, before other animals, and hence such as described their worship, styled them δαμάλεις, or Juvencas. (De Diis Syris, Syntag. 1.) To these I shall subjoin a third reason, countenanced by Bochart and our Fuller, (Miscell. Sacr. lib. ii. cap. 7.) that when Josephus, or the LXX. or St. Paul, (Rom. xi. 4.) speak of Baal in the feminine gender, it is by way of ridicule and contempt. The like may be observed of the calves of Dan and Beth-el, which, by the inspired writers, (2 Kings x. 29. Hos. x. 5.) are styled αἱ δαμάλεις, not that they were always of that sex, but by way of contempt, and to expose them the more; like that of Virgil,

"O vere Phrygiæ, neque enim Phryges"— (Æn. ix.)

Ver. 6. But I alone went often to Jerusalem at the feasts, as it was ordained unto all the people of Israel by an everlasting decree.] As the whole body of the people complied with that idolatry which Jeroboam set up and authorized as the national religion, except a small remnant of the faithful in Israel, which bowed not their knees unto Baal; so it is greatly to the honour of Tobit, that, amidst the great number of his own tribe, which together revolted, he kept himself undefiled, and free from the general offence; especially as he was young, and might easily have been led away by the power of example. For it is a proof of an uncommon degree of virtue to live untainted in the midst of surrounding wickedness, and to preserve the purity of innocence in the time of a general corruption. But when it is here said, that Tobit alone kept himself from idolatry, and went to the regular and appointed place of worship at Jerusalem, at the usual and stated feasts, it is not to be taken so strictly and exclusively, as if he alone had been thus remarkably religious, or was the only happy one that had escaped the pollution; for the contrary appears from v. 13. where Ananias and Jonathas are mentioned as accompanying him to Jerusalem, and making their offerings together at the temple of the habitation of the Most High. This expression, therefore, is to be understood like that concerning Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 14.

Having the first-fruits and tenths of increase, with that which was first shorn; and them gave I at the altar, to the priests, the children of Aaron. Ver. 7. The first tenth part of all increase I gave to the sons of Aaron, who ministered at Jerusalem: another tenth part I sold away, and went, and spent it every year at Jerusalem. Ver. 8. And the third I gave unto them to whom it was meet.] In these verses we have the regular method and order for bringing unto God, or his ministers the priests, those things which were to be offered to him, to the payment of which the Jews were strictly obliged; as, the ἀπαρχὴ, or the oblation, that was made out of the fruits of the earth, particularly corn; as also the firstlings, and tenths of their flocks, and of the wool of their sheep, which were paid in kind to the priests themselves at the temple: then the first tithe, called here the first tenth part of all increase, viz. of wine, oil, figs, and other fruits of the earth; this was given unto the Levites, and was always paid in kind. But the learned differ whether it was always brought up to Jerusalem, as some assert, or paid unto the Levites in the several cities of tillage, as others conclude from Neh. x. 37. The decima prima or first tithe being paid, the husbandman paid out of that which remained the second tithe, the δευτεροδεκάδη, or the second tenth part, as it is here called; this they might either pay in kind, or by way of commutation give the worth of it, which Tobit seems to have done; this, whether in kind or in money, was brought up to Jerusalem, and the possessors made a kind of love-feast therewith, unto which were invited the priests and Levites. The third tithe, or, as it may be rendered, the tithe of the third year, was called the poor man's tithe; this the possessor carried not to Jerusalem, but spent it at home within his own gates upon the Levites, the fatherless, the widow, and the poor. (Deut. xiv. 28. xxvi. 12, 13.) Hence these sorts of tithes were called πτωχοδεκάδαι. So that the first and second tithes were paid by the husbandman, the first, second, fourth, and fifth years after the sabbatical year; but upon the third and sixth years only the first tithe was paid to the Levites, and the second was spent or distributed at home, and given unto them to whom it was meet; i. e. to widows, orphans, and strangers, as Munster's copy has it; or for the repairs of the house of God, as that of Fagius. St. Chrysostom, speaking of the liberal maintenance of the Levites among the Jews, has a fine reflection on the occasion: "Observe (says he), how much the Jews gave to their priests and Levites—as, first-fruits, tenths, then tenths again, then other tenths, yet no man at that time envied them, or said they had or ate too much." (Epist. ad Philip.)

Ver. 10. And when we were carried away captives to Nineveh, all my brethren, and those that were of my kindred, did eat of the bread of the gentiles. Ver. 11. But I kept myself from eating.] Many of them that were carried away by Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmaneser, and Esar-haddon, still retained the true worship of God, and observed, in a strange land, the ordinances appointed by the law, and fell not into the idolatrous usages and impieties of the heathens, among whom they were dispersed. It is certain, from the instances of Daniel and his associates, Eleazar, the Maccabees, and others, (Dan. i. 8. Judith xii. 2, 3.) that the Jews, from the time of their captivity, when they could not avoid conversing with the gentiles, were careful to abstain, not only from things really sacrificed to idols, but from most things that came out of gentile hands; because there was a presumption, that a part of most kinds, by way of first-fruits, had been offered to idols; the rest being by those first-fruits esteemed polluted, as dedicated likewise to the idol. It appears, therefore, that they forbore, from such an apprehension, all meats and drinks that came from the gentiles, or to eat promiscuously with them. In particular the Jews tell us, that Nehemiah, being cupbearer to the king, was dispensed with from tasting or drinking the wine of the gentiles. The like is recorded here of Tobit, who, though by his office of purveyor he was obliged to provide corn, and all necessaries for the king's use, yet kept clear of all defilement, as Joseph did upon a like occasion in Egypt. (Gen. xliii. 32.) "The example of Tobit's resolution and constancy in this particular, makes one to reflect with tears (say Messieurs of Port-Royal) upon the weakness of Adam, who, being perfectly free, and the general use of the creatures indulged him, yet could not refrain from tasting that single fruit which God had forbidden him: whilst Tobit, a captive, deprived of all his possessions, in the midst of idolaters, and even living among Jews, who scrupled not occasionally to eat things forbidden by their law, preserved his innocence by a religious abstinence." (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 12. Because I remembered God with all my heart.] Our version manifestly refers to the foregoing verse, and assigns his great regard to God, as the reason for Tobit's not eating forbidden meats; and indeed this sense is a very just one, as the ceremonial law was strict in this respect, and had its sanction from God, and was the rule for every Jew's conduct. But there is another sense of the place, supported by good authority, that because of his great piety, God gave him favour in the sight of king Shalmaneser, referring to the following verse. And thus the Vulgate understands it, quoniam memor fuit Domini in toto corde suo, Deus dedit illi gratiam in conspectu Salmanassar regis. And Fagius's Hebrew copy is to the same effect. The like is mentioned of Daniel, i. 9. But μορφὴ, in the following verse, may signify also an engaging mien, something in his looks and gestures that gave the king a liking to him.

Ver. 14. I went into Media, and left in trust with Gabael, the brother of Gabrias, at Rages a city of Media, ten talents of silver.] The Vulgate intimates, that Tobit lent this sum to Gabael, and took his note of hand for it; but the Greek and Hebrew versions import, that he only lodged it with him, and took a note of its being in his possession. And indeed this seems most probable, as it is here said, that he committed such a sum to his trust; and ix. 5. that Gabael brought out the money in bags sealed up, upon Raphael's producing the hand-writing. It may seem strange that Tobit, knowing Gabael to be poor, should lodge such a considerable sum of money with him as ten talents; but it is probable that he chose to deposit it at Rages in his hands, rather than have it with him at Nineveh, where it might be in some danger; or possibly he might permit him to traffic with it upon a promissory note to return it when able; it being the noblest instance of charity thus to befriend persons reduced.

Ten talents of silver.] If one was sure of the original language, whether Hebrew or Chaldee, this book was wrote in, it would greatly help to solve many difficulties. Thus, for instance, if the Hebrew word for talent ככר was supposed to be in the original, it would not necessarily bear the sense of τάλαντον in Greek, but might only signify the largest piece of silver which was in use as money in those days. And thus I would expound ככר כסף talentum argenti, 2 Kings v. 23. begged of Naaman by Gehazi. It might be, I think, more properly rendered massa, or frustum argenti, for so ככר signifies in its first sense, than a talent: unless it be reasonable to believe, that Gehazi would ask in his master's name, for the entertainment of two young visitants, between three and four hundred pounds of our money, or that Naaman would load him with between seven and eight hundred pounds of silver in specie. But if Tobit was wrote originally in Greek, we must then necessarily expound this place of a talent properly so called, the least of which amounted to a great sum. Bishop Cumberland computes a Hebrew talent of silver, at 353*l.* 11*s.* 10½*d.* of our money; consequently, ten such talents amount to 3535*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* But then possibly this passage is not to be understood of the Hebrew, but only of the Greek or Attic talent, which was but half the value. And as it was nearly the same with the Babylonian talent, as the learned say, it might be nearly the same with that in use in Assyria and Media too; and this will reduce the sum to one-half of the former, viz. to 1767*l.* 19*s.* 4½*d.* of our money, which was precisely the worth of one of the Attic lesser talents. For when nothing is added to specify talentum, say the antiquaries, then the common or lesser Attic talent is always meant, consisting of six thousand drachmas of silver. If this therefore be understood of the lesser Attic talent, the sum will not seem so improbable, especially as Tobit had been the king's purveyor.

Ver. 15. When Enemessar was dead, Sennacherib his son reigned in his stead, whose estate was troubled that I could not go into Media.] From the time of Pul, or Tiglath-Pileser, the Medes continued in subjection to the Assyrians, but under Sennacherib, the Assyrian monarchy fell into decay, either by his imprudence or ill fortune, or a mixture of both. The Medes taking advantage, it is likely, of his long and distant absence, or perhaps upon the news of the sudden and general destruction of his army, revolted, and were never after reduced in like manner to the Assyrian yoke, though Esar-haddon in the course of his reign seems to have been both a valorous and fortunate prince, as well as ambitious of enlarging the empire. These are the troubles which prevented Tobit from going into Media, according to his custom, or intention. But the Greek, καὶ αἱ ὁδοὶ αὐτοῦ ἠκατέστησαν, will perhaps admit of another rendering; viz. And the ways or passes αὐτοῦ thither were troubled, infested, or dangerous, so that there was no getting safely into Media. Munster's Hebrew copy strongly confirms this interpretation, Et clauderentur propter bella itinera in Media, ut non potui venire in terram Medorum. The margin offers a third reading, but it carries not so determinate a meaning as either of the former.

Ver. 16. And in the time of Enemessar.] Fagius's Hebrew copy, the Greek, and Syriac, agree with our version, but the Vulgate and Munster both omit these words. And indeed it may seem a little preposterous, after the relation of Enemessar's death, and Sennacherib's succeeding, and the account of his kingdom being disturbed with civil commotions, to resume the account of Enemessar. Calmet is expressly of opinion, that what follows here of Tobit's charity regards the times after Enemessar, who had some compassion for the Israelites, when there were not so many public instances of distress; but Sennacherib treated them with the utmost cruelty and rigour, which gave Tobit many opportunities to shew his zeal, and exercise his charity towards his distressed brethren.

Ver. 18. If the king Sennacherib had slain any when he was come and fled from Judea, for in his wrath he killed many, &c.] Sennacherib, after his return to Nineveh, being inflamed with rage for his great misfortune, in having lost in one night a hundred fourscore and five thousand of his men, by the angel of the Lord smiting them, as if he would revenge himself of this accident upon his subjects, and particularly his captives, grew thenceforth very cruel and tyrannical in his government; especially towards the Jews, numbers of whom he caused every day to be slain and cast into the streets, in defiance of all decency and the common rights of humanity.

I buried them privily . . .] St. Ambrose, speaking of this charitable action of Tobit's, says, "that there is not a more excellent duty than to do good to them that cannot repay, and to rescue the partner of our nature from the violence of the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field." (Lib. de Tob.) It was always held an act of justice and mercy to bury the dead; of justice, that earth may be restored to earth, the first mother; of mercy, that bodies might not be exposed to savage violence. To want the honour of burial, was among the ancients held one of the greatest punishments that could be inflicted; and with this Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, is threatened, Jer. xxii. 19. The disconsolate mother of Euryalus, in the poet, is not so much grieved for the murder of her son, as that he should be left a prey to the birds and beasts. (Æn. lib. ix.) And Mezentius, in the same writer, does not desire Æneas to spare his life, but earnestly entreats him to give him burial. (Æn. lib. x.) Turnus earnestly entreats for the same favour from Æneas. (Æn. lib. xii.) The right of sepulture hath been by all nations reckoned so sacred, that the violation thereof hath been counted sacrilege; and how just a thing it is to bury the dead, is intimated by the Latins, when they call the funeral duties, justa exequiarum, or justa funebria.

Ver. 21. And there passed not five-and-fifty days, before two of his sons killed him.] Many copies read πεντήκοντα, or fifty only, from Sennacherib's return to Nineveh. Usher says, after forty-five days, ad A. M. 3294. the time in which he places this history. This latter account is confirmed also by the Vulgate. As to Sennacherib's murder by two of his own children, the following is given by many learned men, and occurs also in Munster's Hebrew copy, as the reason and excuse for so wicked and barbarous a parricide; viz. that Sennacherib demanding of some about him what might be the reason that the God of heaven so favoured the Jewish nation, as he had found by sad experience, he was informed that Abraham, from whom they descended, sacrificed unto him his only son, which made him so favourable ever after to his progeny: upon this he resolved to sacrifice to him two of his sons, to gain his favour and protection; which Sharezar and Adramelech hearing of, prevented their own death by his, and fled into Armenia, or the mountains of Ararath, and his third son reigned in his stead. Calmet says this story is fabulous, and deserves little attention.

Sarchedonus his son reigned in his stead, who appointed over his father's accounts, and over all his affairs, Achiacharus my brother's son . . .] The margin has Esar-haddon. He is called Ἀσορδὰν by the LXX. a name near akin to Assaradin, by which he is styled in Ptolemy's Canon; as also Sargon, by Isaiah, xx. 1. and the same person with Asnapper, Ezra iv. 10. Ἀνειρδωνὸς and Σαχερδονὸς, as different copies have them, are judged by Usher to be both mistakes. Some copies, instead of τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ, have τῆς βασιλείας αὐτοῦ, which seems preferable. The meaning seems only to be, That he was διοικητὴς καὶ ἐκλογιστὴς, as follows in the next verse, the latter part of which can hardly be excused from tautology.

In this chapter there are several commendable qualities to be observed in Tobit. 1. That when all the tribes revolted to idolatry and ate forbidden meat, he was careful to go up to Jerusalem to worship the true God, in the place set apart by God himself. 2. That he did this when he was young, and the example of the generality of his countrymen urged him to the contrary. 3. That he, out of a religious regard to God's appointment, observed the stated anniversary feasts and holy times of the Jewish church, as the Passover, Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles. 4. He was exact in paying the several tithes and oblations to the priests, and others who were authorized to receive them. 5. His dutiful regard to his parents' instructions is very observable in all matters of moment. 6. His great charity to those of his own kindred and nation, in feeding and clothing, and even burying them himself, at the hazard of his own life and safety, finishes and perfects his character.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. A GOOD dinner was prepared me, in the which I sat down to eat.] Ἀνέπεσα τοῦ φαγεῖν. Syr. Cumque accubuissem ad edendum; and Junius, Accumbens ad edendum. From this, and part of ver. 4. which the Vulgate renders, Statimque exsiliens de accubitu suo, we may conjecture, that in Tobit's time the posture of lying at meals prevailed: that custom we know was common in the east; and after that the Jews had acquaintance and dealings with the Babylonians, Persians, and Syrians, little or no mention is made of sitting at meals. (See note on Judith xii. 15.)

Ver. 2. And when I saw abundance of meat, I said to my son, Go, and bring what poor man soever thou shalt find out of our brethren, who is mindful of the Lord, and, lo, I tarry for thee . . .] Thus 1 Esd. ix. 51. Go then, and eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send part to them that have nothing, for this day is holy unto the Lord. And Eccl. ix. 16. the wise man's advice is to the same purpose, Let just men eat and drink with thee. Agreeably to what our Saviour says, When thou makest a feast call the poor. (Luke xiv. 13.) Plutarch gives this extraordinary character of Cymon the Athenian, ἀνελάμβανε τοὺς πένητας, δεῖπνον καθ' ἡμέραν τῷ δεομένῳ παρέχων, in Vit. Pericl. which is confirmed by Lactantius, "Egentibus stipem dedit, et pauperes invitavit." (Lib. vi. 9.) And every good man, says he in another place, should do so, "Justi et sapientis viri domus non illustribus debet patere, sed humilibus et abjectis." (Lib. vi. 12.) Charity sets all persons, both rich and poor, upon an equal footing, acknowledging the same God as the common parent and father of all. This influenced Tobit's conduct on the occasion; and on the same generous principle and noble motive were the agapæ, or love-feasts, among the primitive Christians founded, in which the rich fed and relieved the poor. One sees from this example of Tobit, that the Jews observed certain festival-days, especially those of most note and distinction, which were recommended to them either by some temporal or spiritual mercy, and accounted them holy; Festi dies Domini, the Vulgate calls them. Secondly, That on these they had set feasts and entertainments, and fared better than at other times, and this in compliance with the appointment of the law, which on certain occasions ordered these religious repasts. (Exod. xii.) Thirdly, That on these solemn anniversary days, it was the constant custom to invite the poor and orphans, widows and strangers, or, if hindered, to send portions to them.

Ver. 3. One of our nation is strangled, and is cast out in the market-place.] It seems from this instance, as if the Israelites were evil-treated, and escaped little better in the time of Esar-haddon than in the former reign. Josephus mentions the like barbarity, as practised by the zealots on their countrymen; and all that the friends of the deceased could dare to do, was now and then in the dark to cast a little dust with their hands upon the bodies that were exposed. (De Bell. Jud. lib. iv.) No wonder that such an instance of cruelty affected young Tobias, who possessed his father's tenderness of spirit. It is a sight indeed shocking to human nature, and not only affronts man but God himself, in whose image man is made. Homer informs us how angry Jupiter and Apollo were with Achilles, for abusing and neglecting to bury the body of Hector; that Achilles, by such an act of inhumanity, had lost all mercy and modesty.

——— Ἔλεων μὲν ἀπώλεσεν οὐδέ οἱ αἰδώς.

The very heathens counted this the greatest calamity, and such as hindered the deceased from entering into a state of happiness: hence probably it was that Patroclus, in the same poet, does so earnestly solicit the same stern hero to bury him. The like earnest suit does Palinurus in Virgil put up to Æneas for the same favour. Horace brings in a dead corpse, promising a reward from Jupiter to him that should cast some earth upon it; but if he should refuse to do this good work of humanity, that no sacrifice should be able to expiate the crime. And because want of burial was counted one of the greatest disgraces and punishments that could be inflicted on the dead, hence self-murderers were debarred the privilege of interment. (See St. Austin de Cura pro mortuis gerenda, and Spelman de Sepultura, 2 Esd. ii. 23.)

Ver. 4. Then before I had tasted any meat, I start up, and took him into a room until the going down of the sun. Ver. 5. Then I returned and washed myself, and ate my meat in heaviness.] "He rose immediately upon his son's relation (says St. Ambrose) from the entertainment to which he had invited many Israelites, the children of his people; his piety would not permit him to feed and refresh his own body as long as the corpse of a deceased countryman and brother lay publicly exposed and unburied. Non putabat pium, ut ipse cibum sumeret, cum in publico corpus jaceret exanime." (Lib. de Tobia.) It has been matter of inquiry, especially among the commentators, whether Tobit himself removed the dead body, and whether he carried it to his own house or to one in the neighbourhood. His readiness indeed to do such an act of kindness appears from i. 18. But if Tobit was really the person that took up the dead corpse, though he might use the ceremony of washing himself before he returned to meat, as is here affirmed of him, yet how could he escape notwithstanding being legally polluted by the touch, or forget what is mentioned Numb. xix. 11. that he that toucheth a dead body, shall be unclean seven days? It has therefore been thought more reasonable to suppose, both on account of the pollution attending such an act, and from the consideration of his own safety, which would have been endangered hereby, that he did not in person do this, but ordered the dead body to be removed out of sight by others; or if he did do this, says Calmet, we must suppose that he ate his meat at his return separate, and by himself; and perhaps by eating his bread in heaviness, the text may seem to intimate his being thus lonely and apart. And for the like reasons they have concluded that it was carried to another's, and not his own house. Our version indeed leaves it at large, but the Roman and some other Greek copies expressly read εἰς τι οἴκημα, in domum quandam, as Junius renders.

Ver. 6. Remembering that prophecy of Amos, as he said, Your feasts shall be turned into mourning, and all your mirth into lamentation. Therefore I wept.] Amos prophesied under the reign of Oziah king of Judah, and Jeroboam king of Israel, about fourscore years before the event here mentioned. It appears from hence, that Tobit read the Scriptures with great attention, and that he occasionally applied what he read. Amos in the place referred to either foretells the misery of the captivity, in which Tobit and his countrymen were involved under the Assyrians, which Tobit then saw and bewailed the accomplishment of; or he accommodates the words of the prophet to their present unhappy state and circumstances, when, instead of celebrating their feasts with joy and gladness, as usual in their own country, they groaned under the yoke and tyranny of their oppressors, being denied even the innocent liberty and commendable right of burying their murdered countrymen, without manifestly incurring the danger of their lives. A spirit full of tenderness and sympathy like Tobit's, could not be insensible at such a melancholy juncture; the reflection on his own danger, and the continual injuries his brethren were exposed to, called forth his tears; but more especially was he grieved, when he considered the sins and idolatry which had provoked God to deliver his chosen into captivity, and to inflict such heavy judgments upon them.

Ver. 7. After the going down of the sun, I went and made a grave, and buried him. Ver. 8. But my neighbours mocked me, and said, This man is not yet afraid to be put to death for this matter; who fled away, and, yet, lo, he burieth the dead again.] To let a corpse lie exposed, putrefying in the face of the sun, seemed so inhuman, that Tobit chose rather to hazard his own life, than to endure such an offensive spectacle; and for this the angel commends him, (xii. 12.) and no wonder that he thought himself concerned to render the last kind office to an unfortunate strangled brother, when even the high-priest among the Jews, though he was not to be present in person at the funeral, yet if by chance he found a dead corpse, was obliged to bury it himself. The primitive Christians were remarkable for the like pious zeal; no danger or threatenings could affright them from doing this charitable office to their deceased brethren, especially such who died martyrs for the faith. The Roman clergy, in an epistle to them of Carthage, (Epist. 2. int. Epist. Cypr.) reckon it as one of the greatest instances of charity, above that of relieving the poor, or ministering to the sick; and that fidelity in this matter would be highly acceptable to God, and rewarded by him: Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, speaking of the plague that reigned there, commends the Christians for carrying out their dead brethren, which they cheerfully did, notwithstanding the great danger that attended it. St. Ambrose's sentiments on this occasion are very fine and moving; "Si viventes operire nudos præcipimur, quanto magis debemus operire defunctorum corpora? Si viantes ad longiora deducere solemus, quanto magis in illam æternam domum profectos, unde jam non revertentur? nihil hoc officio præstantius, ei conferre, qui tibi jam non potuit reddere, vindicare a volatilibus, vindicare a bestiis consortem naturæ. Feræ hanc humanitatem defunctis corporibus dedisse produntur; homines negabunt?" (Cap. 1, 2.)

Ver. 9. The same night also I returned from the burial, and slept by the wall of my court-yard, being polluted.] St. Ambrose says, that he slept "in cubiculo suo," in his chamber; but it seems most probable, from the accident which is related afterward, that he reposed himself in the court-yard by the wall of the house, not through fatigue, as if sleep had overtaken him just at the entrance of his house, nor on account of the excessive heat, as the ancient Italic version has it, but, as our version intimates, on account of his pollution from the dead body which he had just buried. Munster's Hebrew copy says, that Tobit had prepared a bath to purify himself withal, not being able to employ the means prescribed in the law, which he intended to make use of the next day, and so would pass the night till that time out of his house, as every thing or person that touched one thus defiled was made impure thereby.

Ver. 10. And I knew not that there were sparrows in the wall, and mine eyes being open, the sparrows muted warm dung into mine eyes, and a whiteness came in mine eyes, and I went to the physicians, but they helped me not.] I think we need not ask here with the commentators whether Tobit slept with his eyes open or shut, since the text says expressly his eyes were open, and his face uncovered. The author of the Synopsis, attributed to Athanasius, mentions that usually ὡς εἰωθεν, Tobit slept with his eyes open, as some people are known to do, particularly such as walk in their sleep. If Tobit's eyes were open, either naturally or by accident at this time, it is easy then to comprehend, says Calmet, how the dung of swallows might occasion the accident here mentioned; for the excrement of these birds, according to some naturalists, (Pliny, lib. xi. cap. 37. Gesner, Hist. Anim. lib. iii.) is extremely hot and acrimonious, and may cause blindness by falling in the eye, and occasioning an inflammation there; and though the secret seems not to have been known to the Assyrian physicians, as they are here called, yet later times have found out a successful method to remove this obstacle of vision, by the dexterity of couching. As to the remedy which Raphael employed to restore Tobit's sight, which this place prepares us for, we will consider whether it could naturally produce such an effect when we come to that chapter.

Moreover Achiacharus did nourish me, until I went into Elymais.] The commentators are divided, whether this is to be understood of father or son; if it respects either, most probably Tobit himself is meant, as he continues to speak in the first person. The sense is, That Achiachar took care of Tobit under this infirmity, till he (Achiachar) went into Elymais, whither he seems to have gone when he was in disgrace, and deprived of his place and dignity, (ch. xiv.) It appears from some parts of this history, (ch. xi. xiv.) that Tobit continued at Nineveh till his death: the true reading, therefore, I presume to be ἐπορεύθη, which Drusius and Gro-tius both prefer, and Junius renders accordingly, Achikar vero aluit me, donec profectus esset in Elymaida. There seems to be the like mistake in the LXX. Psal. vi. 7. where ἐπαλαιώθην should be rather ἐπαλαιώθη, to answer to the Hebrew.

Ver. 11. And my wife Anna did take women's works to do.] Tobit was at this time extremely poor, and maintained by his nephew Achiachar. It may seem surprising that Tobit, who before had lived in good condition, should fall so soon into a state of poverty: but it may be observed of this holy man, that he did much alms, and was continually employed in some instance or other of charity, till Sennacherib deprived him of the place and employment which he had in the court of Shalmaneser: the ten talents left in trust with Gabael he could not recover, not being able to go into Media through the troubles of the times; he had been at considerable expense too for advice and help under the misfortune of blindness, and had doubtless suffered great loss and injury for his care in burying the dead, by a severe persecution on that account. All these joined together; viz. his having lost his employment, bestowing much alms, suffering great oppression and loss, and the expenses incurred for the recovery of his sight, were such drawbacks, as will sufficiently explain the alteration in Tobit's circumstances; and hence we may account for his wife taking in work, and being necessitated to seek out an employment for her livelihood and subsistence.

Ver. 14. She replied upon me, Where are thine alms, and thy righteous deeds? Behold, thou and all thy works are known.] Tobit, who adhered strictly to justice, and whose maxim was, do uprightly all thy life long, and follow not the ways of unrighteousness, (iv. 5.) thinking such a present as a kid not usual, above the common wages, suspected that the distressed circumstances they were in put her upon stealing it, and reproached her accordingly with it. Upon this she upbraids him with his tenderness of conscience, and the little good it had done him. "You need indeed reproach me, behold your disgrace is known to every body; the charities which you have exercised all your life long profit you nothing, they have not kept you from blindness, which deprives you of all comfort. You had fine hopes that living so piously you could not fail to be prosperous and happy, and that serving God he would most certainly repay thee, (iv. 14.) But where are your alms and righteous deeds now, that they stand you in no stead? Have they kept blindness or adversity from you? Have not your excessive and indiscreet charities brought us to the distressed condition we are now in?" Fagius and Munster thus expound, and Cyprian comprises all, when he says, "Ubi sunt justitiæ tuæ? Ecce quæ pateris." (De Mortal.) This reproach from his wife, and raillery upon his religious disposition, who might rather have been expected sweetly to have administered consolation to him under his misfortunes; this taunting behaviour to him, from one so nearly allied to him, was almost as insupportable to him as his blindness. It reminds one of that of Job's friends, or rather of his wife's behaviour to him under his affliction; Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Curse God, and die, (ii. 9.) as our version briefly has it; but in that of the LXX. we see her outrageous temper more at large. The Vulgate here uses this very comparison, Hanc tentationem ideo permisit Deus evenire illi, ut posteris daret exemplum patientiæ ejus, sicut et sancti Job. St. Austin thus draws the parallel, reflecting upon the different conduct of this couple: "How miserable is his condition thought who wants the blessing of sight! When such a sad spectacle appears, censorious and ill-natured persons presently say, He has committed some great crime, and God was angry and displeased with him. In this sort of strain Tobit's wife insulted her husband; the good man exclaims upon the subject of the kid, from a conceived jealousy of its being stolen; his wife replies upon him with great warmth, And what is all your righteous dealing come to? How blind was the woman, and how enlightened her husband! The one enjoyed the outward benefit of the sun, and the other the inward light of justice and the blessed fruits of the Spirit; and can there be any doubt which of these illuminations to prefer?"

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. THEN I being grieved, did weep, and in sorrow prayed, saying—Punish me not for my sins and ignorances.] The foregoing chapter concluded with Tobit's wife's taunts, proceeding, no doubt, from his suspecting her honesty, which will in some measure plead her excuse. In this we have a farther instance of his good disposition, and particular sweetness of temper; he does not return railing for railing, but silently, and, as it should seem from the latter end of ver. 17. in some retired place from the house, he pours forth his complaints to God, of the great injustice done him, but confesses at the same time, in the spirit of humility, that his sins had deserved a worse treatment. Sins and ignorances are here synonymous, and so the oriental versions generally render them; and thus also ἀγνόημα is used often by the Hellenistic writers. (See Numb. xii. 11. Judith v. 20. Ecclus. xxiii. 2, 3. 1 Esd. viii. 77. 1 Macc. xiii. 39. Heb. ix. 7.)

Ver. 5. And now thy judgments are many and true, deal with me according to my sins.] How is this consistent with ver. 3. where it is said, Punish me not for my sins and ignorances? there seems some omission or mistake here, probably the negative particle is wanting; the Vulgate takes no notice of this sentence: Fagius's Hebrew copy has quite a contrary sense, Nec facias nobis juxta iniquitates nostras, et iniquitates patrum nostrorum; and Munster's, Ne quæso retribuas mihi juxta iniquitates meas, &c. the Geneva version affords a new sense, and a good one, And now thou hast many and just causes to do with me according to my sins. Our translation, I think, hath wrongly followed the Complut. in reading ποίησον, whereas Alex. Ald. Vat. Syr. and the older Latin versions, read ποιῆσαι, and so the sense and translation will be plain, and more agreeable. Grotius thinks the true reading may be, ἐξ ἐμὲ ποίησον, tolle me de rebus humanis; but as this sense follows in the next verse immediately, it seems not agreeable to this place.

Ver. 6. Command my spirit to be taken from me, that I may be dissolved, and become earth; for it is profitable for me to die, rather than to live.] The Vulgate omits what follows, and finishes the verse here. Tobit begs of God, the sovereign Disposer of life and death, to set him free from the prison of the body: and in this sense of dying, or departing out of this life, we find ἀπολύω frequently used in Scripture and profane authors. (See ver. 13. and Luke ii. 29.) The term dissolution, confirms the distinction of the soul from the body, the latter returning to earth, and the former continuing in a state of separation, even in hades, or the everlasting place, domus statuta omni viventi, as Fagius expounds here. There is nothing more common even in Scripture, than for the saints, under great tribulation, to express a tædium, or loathing of life. Holy Job, grieved with the unjust reproaches of his friends, the insults of his wife, and various assaults from Satan, in the bitterness of his soul cries out, My soul chooseth strangling, and death rather than my life. I loathe it; I would not live always, (vii. 15, 16.) When the prophet Elijah was persecuted by wicked Jezebel, he asks it of God as a favour, that he might die, It is enough now, O Lord, take away my life: (1 Kings xix. 4.) and St. Paul, that through trouble he was pressed out of measure, above strength: ut tæderet eum vitæ, says the Vulgate. It is therefore not at all surprising, that Tobit, under the misfortune of poverty and blindness, insulted and reflected on by his wife and friends for the good deeds of his past life, should desire to die, and thereby be freed from the unjust scandal cast upon him; but it is observable, that he introduces this request to God with submission to his will, who knew best what was most for his advantage.

Ver. 7. In Ecbatane, a city of Media.] The Vulgate and the old English translations have here Rages, a city of Media, contrary to vii. 1. If Sara lived at Rages, then Gabael and Sara would have been in the same city, nor would there have been any occasion to have gone from Ecbatane thither, as is mentioned ix. 2. As certain therefore as Raphael went to Rages, so certain also is it that Sara did not live there.

Ver. 8. Asmodeus the evil spirit.] Some will have it, that Asmodeus is so called from the place which he chiefly haunted, a regno Medorum, ubi dominabatur, and to be the same with the prince of Persia, Dan. x. 13. (Jerom. in loc. et Cassian. in Collat.) but more probably this is a Hebrew name, signifying a destroyer, evil spirits delighting in mischief, and leading them that worship them into perdition; hence almost all plagues, ordinary and extraordinary, were attributed to them. And it is worth observing, that the names of the devil and evil spirits in Scripture, have all a relation to the mischief they do, or occasion; thus Lev. xvii. 7. they are called שעירם, frightful, or, as others render, lustful as goats; Deut. xxxii. 17. שדים, destroyers, as here; שטן, an adversary, Job i. 6.; διάβολος, a calumniator, Matt. iv. 8.; ἐχθρὸς, an enemy, Matt. xiii. 39.; ἀνθρωποκτόνος, John viii. 44.; ἀντίδικος, 1 Pet. viii.; Ἀβαδδὼν, or Ἀπολλύων, Rev. ix. 11. the destroyer: the same according to some with Apollo, the famous god of the heathens, whose image accordingly is represented with arrows in its hands, prepared for slaughter and destruction; and, lastly, κατήγορος, an accuser, Rev. xii. 10. According to the notion of the Hebrews, there were also evil angels or genii, whereof some presided over one vice, and some over another, insomuch that there are demons of avarice, demons of pride, and demons of impurity, each endeavouring to ensnare persons with a complexional temptation. The Vulgate insinuates, that the seven husbands who met with their fate the very day of their marriage, were killed by the demon Asmodeus, because lust was their chief motive; for thus Raphael, according to that version, (vi. 17, 18.) explains that accident, Ostendam tibi quibus prævalere potest dæmonium; hi namque qui conjugium ita suscipiunt, ut Deum a se et a sua mente excludant, et suæ libidini ita vacent, sicut equus et mulus, quibus non est intellectus, habet dæmonium potestatem super eos. Grotius supposes, that the pretended Asmodeus here, was only some ill quality attending Sara's body, which had proved mortal to her other husbands; but that Tobias, by using such fumigations as were prescribed in that case, not only preserved himself from the fate of the rest, but cured his wife likewise of a malady that was unknown to physic, and therefore ascribed (as the custom of the Jews was, Luke xi. 14. Matt. ix. 32. with every distemper they could not cure) to the operation of the devil. Hence, or on account of this bodily infirmity, he conjectures, she is reproached in the words following by her father's maids, as ἀποπνίγουσα τοὺς ἄνδρας. (See Dissertation.)

Thou hast had already seven husbands, neither wast thou named after any of them.] All of them being killed by the evil spirit before the consummation of marriage. It may perhaps seem surprising, that Sara should have such a succession of suitors, when matching with her was by experience found so very dangerous: the reason that induced them was probably her beauty, or portion of inheritance, or pretended nearness of relation. And what seems to have hastened their fate was, either their immoderate lust, void of all fear of God, or religious sense of the matrimonial institution, or the illegality of their claim. A learned writer indeed thinks, that the Jews allude to this history of Sara, when they speak of seven brethren that had all been married to one wife, Mark xii. 20. (See Whist. Auth. Rec. vol. ii.) But this seems a fanciful conceit, as in this history no mention is made or intimation given of any such near relation; and from that in the gospels it may, I think, be gathered, that each of the husbands cohabited with the woman at least for a time, which does not suit this account in Tobit: and in reality Sara had eight husbands, including Tobias, whereas seven only are mentioned in the gospels, and then the woman, surviving all of them, died also, which does not seem clear of Sara, especially as Tobias died in such an advanced age, as a hundred and seven-and-twenty years old, (xiv. 14.)

Ver. 9. Wherefore dost thou beat us for them? If they be dead, go thy ways after them.] All the Greek copies place the interrogation as our version does, pointing the passage thus, τί ἡμᾶς μαστιγοῖς περὶ αὐτῶν; εἰ ἀπέθανον, βάδιζε μετ' αὐτῶν. But Junius conjectures it ought to be placed in this manner, τί ἡμᾶς μαστιγοῖς περὶ αὐτῶν εἰ ἀπέθανον; i. e. Why by your blows do you revenge upon us the death of your husbands? And indeed the versions both of Fagius and Munster confirm this latter construction.

Ver. 10. When she heard these things she was very sorrowful, so that she thought to have strangled herself.] Ἐλυπήθη σφόδρα ὥστε ἀπάγξασθαι. Our version manifestly implies, that she had actually thoughts of strangling herself. But though it is certain that grief does sometimes put persons upon desperate courses, yet that any such rash resolution was entered into here, as to design actually to make away with herself, does not appear, but rather the contrary; for the history informs us, that she not only suppressed such a thought, but condemned such a fact, as what would bring great reproach to her family, being the ordinary and common punishment of great malefactors. On her father's account too, whose death it would probably occasion or hasten, she rejects such an intention; and, lastly, one who appears so religious and well-disposed, cannot be suspected of any such wicked design as self-murder, which would be inconsistent with her general character, and the resignation which she expresses to the will of God. Others therefore think that the words, ἐλυπήθη σφόδρα ὥστε ἀπάγξασθαι, do not mean any premeditated design of strangling herself, but that she was so concerned at the reflections cast on her, and grieved so extremely, as to fall into so deep a melancholy, as to be in a manner suffocated and strangled as it were by it, according to that of Ovid, "Strangulat inclusus dolor." The consequence of which unhappy state of mind was, her wishing herself dead. (See Hammond on Matt. xxvii.) And thus the words, ἀπήγξατο καὶ ἀπέθανε, 2 Sam. xvii. 23. may not improperly be understood; for Ahithophel, according to the sense of the most learned rabbins, did not hang himself, but was stifled with grief. And so, where St. Matthew, speaking of the death of Judas, xxvii. 5. says, ἀπελθὼν ἀπήγξατο, very judicious interpreters expound it, of his being suffocated by grief, by a disease called ἀγχόνη, when a man in a violent fit of spleen or melancholy is strangled, and sometimes bursts with it; which, according to St. Peter's exposition, Acts i. 18. seems to have been Judas's case.

Ver. 11. Then she prayed towards the window.] i. e. Of the upper room or oratory, which opened towards Jerusalem. Munster's Hebrew copy has, She prayed before the Lord; i. e. towards his sanctuary at Jerusalem. The Vulgate is more explicit, Perrexit in superius cubiculum domûs suæ, et tribus diebus, et tribus noctibus non manducavit neque bibit, sed in lacrymis persistens deprecabatur Deum, ut ab isto improperio liberaret eam.

Ver. 12. And now, O Lord, I set mine eyes and my face towards thee, and say, Take me out of the earth.] Εἶπον ἀπολῦσαί με ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς. Our version is not very accurate here, it would be better rendered imperatively, And now, O Lord, command or speak, εἶπον, that I may be taken from the earth, and hear no more reproaches, like ἐπίταξον ἐπιβλέψαι ἐπ' ἐμὲ, ver. 15. (see also viii. 7.) The old Latin version accordingly has, Jube me jam dimitti. The Syriac, indeed, countenances the other rendering; and it may seem to have some support from Isa. xxxviii. 10, 11. With respect to the manner of expression here, and other places of the apocryphal writings, it may be pertinent to observe, that what in pure Greek would be very singular, becomes just and natural, considered either as the translation of Chaldee or Hebrew, or as the writing of a Hebrew author used to Hebrew tautology, and to that most peculiar mood, hiphil.

Ver. 13. That I may hear no more the reproach.] Terentius Christianus introduces Sara thus lamenting and expostulating:—

"Nam quid tandem est, quod in hac vita diutius
Esse velim, aut cur non malim extemplo abolerier?
Quoquo vorsum foras prospicio, passim irrideor
Misera, ac conspuor ab omnibus. Imo, quod est longe crudelius, Cuncti me ut portentum execrantur, horrent ut veneficam.
Quin et diris ut parricidam devovent . . . et nomen commutant mihi,
Pro Sara appellantes Zaram: videlicet parricidii
Facinus exprobrantes." (In Tob. act. i.)

Ver. 14. Thou knowest, Lord, that I am pure from all sin with man.] The Vulgate is more full and explicit, Tu scis, Domine, quia nunquam concupivi virum, et mundam servavi animam meam ab omni concupiscentia. Nunquam cum ludentibus miscui me, neque cum his qui in levitate ambulant, participem me præbui. Ἁμάρτημα here relates to the sin or offence against chastity in particular, and thus many interpreters understand ἁμαρτωλὸς, Luke vii. 37. (See also John viii. 11.) And in this impure sense peccare is used by the Latins, especially the poets.

Ver. 15. Neither any near kinsman, nor any son of his alive, to whom I may keep myself for a wife.] i. e. Her father had no son to inherit his substance, nor any near kinsman or relation, neither brother, nor brother's son, to whom, as the law required, she might dispose of herself in marriage. Agreeably to this the writer of Judith's history says, that her husband was not only of the same tribe, but of the same family also. For the women of Israel, who had no brothers of the same blood, were enjoined by the law of Moses to marry the next of kin. As appears particularly in the case of the daughters of Zelophehad, (Numb. xxxvi.) who were confined not only to the same tribe of their father, but also to the very family of that tribe: and the reason there given is, that the inheritance of the father should not pass unto strangers. A wise provision, not only for preserving the tribes, but the several families likewise entire.

Ver. 16. So the prayers of them both were heard before the majesty of the great God.] See Titus ii. 13. where there is the like expression. Some copies have only τοῦ μεγάλου, which seems an omission. In the Alexandrian MS. Ῥαφαὴλ is wrongly joined to it, which proper name ought to begin the next verse, as in our translation. It may be asked, how what is here said, that the prayers of them both were heard before God, can be true? for both of them prayed to God, if it was his good pleasure, that he would remove them from a world where they saw religion reviled and innocence oppressed; and yet one of these lived to a very advanced age, and the other probably very long with Tobias, as it appears in the sequel of the history. To this it may be answered, that it is true that both of them were heard; not that they obtained precisely the very particular they asked, but God, at their request, granted what was more for their benefit: he did not indeed take life from them, but he made it more easy and agreeable. Or thus, that, as they were entirely resigned to the will and determination of God, their prayers were so effectually heard, that his good pleasure accomplished in them what was most for his own glory. This example, as the Port-Royal comment well observes, affords excellent matter of instruction, assuring us, "that if we pray as Tobit and Sara did, with a spirit of humility and submission, our prayers shall not be rejected; and, though perhaps we may not be answered at the time or in the manner we expected and wished for, we shall in another way, that may be more advantageous and better for us, and more agreeable to what he designs us for. And thus it is observable it happens often in life, that one prays to God for health, another for sight, a third for hearing, without obtaining their particular request; and yet, if their prayer is with faith and a pious resignation, it may truly be affirmed, that their prayers are heard of God, who, foreseeing some danger or misapplication of those faculties, that the blessing of health will be abused, or sight an inlet to temptations and final ruin, exchanges the object of their wishes for a better, and, instead of granting what would prove matter of offence to them, bestows on them, in a manner wholly spiritual, what his wisdom sees best and most convenient for their everlasting interest." (In loc.)

Ver. 17. And Raphael was sent to heal them both.] The introducing Raphael, a name no where mentioned in Scripture, as the ministering angel for the purposes here mentioned, has been objected against this history. But this deserves little attention; for, 1. This name may as inoffensively be used as Gabriel and Michael are by the sacred penmen. 2. As part of Raphael's commission was to heal Tobit's blindness, the name of this angel was particularly proper to be used, as being expressive of the business itself; for Raphael signifies one that healeth from God, and in Munster's version he is called princeps et præses sanitatum. When God would cure any sick person, says St. Jerome, he sends the archangel Raphael, one of the seven spirits before his throne, to accomplish the cure; Ille minister curationis, Deus autor sanitatis; hoc videlicet nominis interpretatione significante, quod in Deo sit medicina vera. (Dan. viii.) Some will have the angel that went down at certain seasons to move the waters of the pool, (John v. 4.) for the cure of the distempered, to be Raphael. And in allusion to this history of Tobit, probably, says Calmet, he is invoked as the patron of the sick and guide of the traveller. 3. Such an exalted spirit was proper to be opposed to and to subdue the evil fiend Asmodeus, which will in some measure satisfy the inquiry, why such a distinguished angel was introduced here.

And Sara, the daughter of Raguel, came down from her upper chamber.] Where probably she had been praying: and so Fagius expounds it, Sara descendit e cœnaculo, in quo oraverat. It seems to have been customary among the devout persons of the Jewish nation, of both sexes, to set apart some upper room for their oratories, where they might attend the business of prayer without noise or disturbance. (See Dan. vi. 10. Acts i. 16.) Or this might be a sort of gynæceum, where she sat at work; for it was the custom of the early times to assign the uppermost rooms to the women, that they might be farther removed from interruption in their employment: accordingly Penelope in the Odyssey mounts up into a garret, and there sits to her business. So Priam had chambers for the ladies of his court, under the roof of his palace. (Il. vi.) Munster's Hebrew copy and the Syriac begin the next chapter with this verse.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 3. My son, despise not thy mother, but honour her all the days of thy life.] The son of Sirach presses the same duty very strongly, and by a variety of reasons asserts the reverence due to parents. (Ecclus. iii.) With respect to the mother, whose authority is generally less regarded, he urges filial obedience, from the consideration here insisted on; viz. the sorrows of the mother in the time of gestation, and the dangers attending her bringing forth, (vii. 27, 28.) The advice which Tobit in this chapter gives his son, when he presumed death was approaching, and that God had heard his petition to be removed from the miseries of life, which he enters upon preferably to the settling his worldly affairs, has always been esteemed an excellent abridgment of moral duties. The precepts are very plain and obvious, and require only sincerity and a good disposition to apply them. St. Austin, reflecting upon the fine instruction given to Tobias by his father, cries out, " O lux quam videbat Tobias, cum clausis oculis istis filium docebat viam vitæ, et ei præibat pede caritatis nunquam errans." (Confess. lib. x. cap. 34.)

When she is dead, bury her by me in one grave.] The ancient patriarchs expressed the same care and concern in this particular of interment. Abraham purchased the cave of Mach-pelah for the burying-place of Sarah, (Gen. xxiii. 19.) and was afterward deposited in the same himself, (xxv. 10.) Isaac and Jacob with their wives were buried there also, (xlix. 31.) By this officious care providing, that such as were intimate and loving in their lives, in their deaths should not be divided, but that a kind of friendship should be continued in death, and the conjugal society as it were made perpetual and indissoluble: thus Apuleius, " Unita sepultura marito perpetuam conjugem reddidere." (Lib. viii.) And the following is a most memorable instance of conjugal tenderness and union, which Valerius Maximus relates of M. Plautius: " Funerata uxore Orestilla, atque in rogum imposita, inter officium ungendi et osculandi, stricto ferro incubuit. Quem amici, sicut erat, togatum et calceatum corpori conjugis junxerunt, ac deinde subjectis facibus, utrumque una cremaverunt. Quorum ibi factum sepulcrum Tarenti etiamnum conspicitur, quod vocatur τῶν φιλούντων." (Lib. iv. cap. 3.) Anciently it was esteemed a mark of ignominy, as well as a misfortune, not to be buried among one's ancestors: that the kings of Judah when they died were buried in the sepulchre of their fathers, is a circumstance scarce ever omitted in the relation of their deaths; and indeed this inclination of lying by, and mingling with kindred dust, prevails almost among all people: so that the following decree of pope Leo to enforce this, which seems even a dictate of nature itself, appears the more strange; " Nos instituta majorum patrum considerantes, statuimus unumquemque in sepulcro suorum majorum jacere, ut patriarcharum exitus docet." (Titul. de Sepult.) From the like union of affection dear friends often coveted one common mausoleum; and the regard which one good man bare to another we may suppose induced the prophet to speak to his sons, saying, When I am dead, then bury me in the sepulchre wherein the man of God is buried, lay my bones beside his bones. (1 Kings xiii. 31.)

Ver. 6. If thou deal truly, thy doings shall prosperously succeed to thee, and to all them that live justly.] This whole verse is omitted in the Vulgate. Munster and Fagius's Hebrew copy take no notice of the last sentence, nor does St. Cyprian, who recites all the foregoing part; and indeed it seems improperly inserted here, as one sees no reason why Tobias's personal honesty and righteousness should succeed prosperously to all others that live justly. But, however, the observation will be found true in the general, applied to all others that deal fairly and uprightly.

Ver. 7. Give alms of thy substance; and, when thou givest alms, let not thine eye be envious, neither turn thy face from any poor, and the face of God shall not be turned away from thee.] This is agreeable to that of Solomon, Prov. xii. 13. Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, and not be heard; which may mean, that both God and man shall be deaf to his petition when he cries for relief in the day of necessity. See also James ii. 13. where the apostle says, He shall have justice without mercy, who hath shewed no mercy. By an envious eye we are to understand a niggardly and covetous one. (See Ecclus. xiv. 10. xxxv. 10, 11.) The Port-Royal comment restrains the charity here enjoined to men's own proper goods, to that which truly and lawfully belongs to them; for alms founded upon spoil, and given from another's substance, is not charity, but theft and robbery, and will be so far from procuring the favour of God or his blessing, that a sacrifice of goods unjustly gotten will rather provoke his resentment and call down his judgments. And, indeed, if we consider the context, and compare this with the two foregoing verses, this exposition of the place will not appear forced or unnatural.

Ver. 8. If thou hast abundance, give alms accordingly: if thou have but a little, be not afraid to give according to that little.] Our charity to others ought to rise in proportion to what we have received ourselves from the hand of God, who, if he gives much, it is with an intent that men may in return bestow the more. Not to give plenteously, i. e. in proportion as a man is able, is frustrating the designs of God's providence, who will treat such of the rich as public robbers who look upon that to be their own which they were intrusted with for the benefit of others; injuring by such niggardly behaviour as many poor persons as they were able to relieve. If we take in the whole verse, the advice then is of very great extent, and one may affirm that nobody is exempt: in what state or condition soever he be, it is impossible but that he must have something or other to bestow, either money, or victuals, or clothes; or, if all these be wanting, attendance, or some bodily help and service, may be administered; or, however, advice and kind and tender expressions to such as are in affliction will not be unacceptable, as one testifies thereby a sympathizing and humane temper, which soothes and engages the distressed, and is a relief next to alms.

Ver. 9. For thou layest up a good treasure for thyself against the day of necessity.] i. e. God will reward the charitable person with temporal blessings, or guard him against necessity, or provide for him under it. David pronounces the same blessedness on him; (Psal. xli. 1.) Blessed is he that considereth the poor and needy, the Lord will deliver him in the time of trouble, the Lord will preserve him, and keep him alive, and he shall be blessed upon earth: the Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing, and make all his bed in his sickness. And Solomon confirms the same truth, He that giveth to the poor shall not want. (Prov. xxviii. 27.) The phrase θέμα ἀγαθὸν θησαυρίζειν, very much resembles that of St. Paul on the like occasion, ἀποθησαυρίζειν θεμέλιον καλὸν εἰς τὸ μέλλον, 1 Tim. vi. 19. where a very learned writer observes, that θεμέλιον in the rabbinical dialect signifies a bond or obligation, whereby such as lend are secured to receive their own again; and that the apostle's meaning in that place is, That those who exercise works of charity and beneficence, do provide themselves as it were of a bill or bond, upon which they may sue and plead for a reward, and a suitable return of their kindness. (Mede's Works, lib. i. disc. 22.) The like may be said of θέμα here used. And accordingly the Hebrew copy set forth by Fagius, renders it by a word which signifies depositum, or a pledge.

Ver. 10. Alms do deliver from death, and suffer not to come into darkness.] i.e. Charity, through the blessing of God, often proves the means and occasion of long life, as seems to be more fully expressed, xii. 9. Or it may mean, that it is effectual for the procuring of God's mercy and favour in the day or manner of one's death; that it shall make the good and beneficent man's exit easy, and his death comfortable; according to that observation of St. Jerome, "Nunquam memini me legisse mala morte mortuum, qui libenter opera caritatis exercuit." (Ad Nepot.) Or, lastly, that charity wipes away sins, and delivers from death the consequence of them. (See Dan. iv. 27. Ecclus. iii. 30. 1 Pet. iv. 8.) St. Austin has a fine reflection upon the other part of the verse: "Tobit had the misfortune to be blind, and yet he shewed his son the way of truth. He who had lost his bodily eyes, could say to his son, He that does alms, shall not come into darkness. Being deprived of outward light, he yet found himself in a condition to direct others how to walk. There is therefore another illumination than that of sense, which enlightens the soul of the good man. He feared not any such reply from his son: My father, have not you been careful to give alms, and yet you are blind? Is it possible that alms should deliver from darkness, when you, who have been a cheerful giver, are oppressed with it? Tobit might very consistently say what he did; he knew what light he was then speaking of to his son, and what he saw and perceived was spiritually discerned. The eyes of understanding were his support and comfort, and for the outward help which he received from his son, he returned a better guidance. Filius patri porrigebat manum ut ambularet super terram, et pater filio, ut habitaret in cœlo." (August. de verb. Dom. Serm. 18.)

Ver. 12. Remember that our fathers from the beginning, even that they all married wives of their own kindred, and were blessed in their children, and their seed shall inherit the land.] May not the falsity from hence appear of that vulgar notion, that relations who marry never thrive? and may it not be farther observed, that the whole Jewish nation (whose riches are even become proverbial) descends from Isaac and Rebecca, who were related in the same degree?

Ver. 13. And in lewdness is decay, and great want; for lewdness is the mother of famine.] This is undoubtedly a very true observation, and confirmed by the unhappy experience of persons addicted to it. But ἀχρεότης, the term here used, I apprehend, is an unusual word for lewdness; it signifies rather unprofitableness, or idleness, and to this the observation will equally correspond.

Ver. 15. Neither let drunkenness go with thee in thy journey.] Fagius's Hebrew copy has, Neque cum temulento consuetudinem habeas in omnibus viis tuis. And Junius, by a Hebraism, understands מדה to signify vir ebrietatis; according to which the sense is, Keep not company at any time with such as are addicted to drunkenness: or may we not suppose, as the expression in the Greek is ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ σου, that Tobit had the particular journey in his eye he was going to send his son upon, and that the thirst arising from travelling, especially in a warm climate, being a strong temptation to drink plentifully, he might caution his son against any excess? The Vulgate omits this precept relating to sobriety.

Ver. 17. Pour out thy bread on the burial of the just.]

The Jews had not only banquets upon account, or in honour of, the dead, but even over their dead: so that we may distinguish their funeral entertainments into two sorts, domestic, or such as were kept in the house of the deceased, for the refreshment of the melancholy relations and friends there present, which were more or less public and expensive, according to the quality of the deceased; (see Joseph. lib. xvii. Antiq. Jud. cap. 8. and de Bell. Jud. cap. 1. Jer. xvi. 5. 7. in the LXX.) and, secondly, sepulchral entertainments, or such as were carried to the very sepulchre of the deceased, and there either consumed or distributed and carried away by the poor. (Meursius de Funer. cap. 35.) The exhortation of Tobit here to his son to pour out his bread, ἐπὶ τὸν τάφον τῶν δικαίων, alludes to this latter custom (an ancient one among the heathens), and shews, that it was of some antiquity among the Jews. Villalpandus, referring to this passage, says, "Sat patet moris fuisse, ut in ipsis sepulcris mortuorum epulæ ponerentur," in Ezek. xxiv. 17. The words ἐπὶ τὸν τάφον imply something particular to be done upon the tomb itself, and not barely something to be expended at the burial of the just, as if the ἐπιτάφιος ἐστίασις in general was only enjoined. We cannot have a more ample testimony of this custom, than what we meet with Ecclus. xxx. 18. Delicates poured out upon a mouth shut up, are as messes of meat set upon a grave. Where the son of Sirach manifestly alludes to this ceremony of feasting at or upon the graves of the deceased; a comparison, which he would not have used to have explained his meaning, had not the custom been well known and established. (See note in loc. and Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. tom. ii. p. 1145.) The distinction which Eustathius makes upon that verse of Homer—αὐτὰρ ὁ τοῖσι τάφον μενοεικέα δαῖνυ, (Il. Ψ.) makes much for our purpose, where he distinguishes between the entertainment on the tomb, calling it τάφον, from the name of the sepulchre, and that after the burying, which he calls περίδειπνον. We have express mention of the περίδειπνον νεκροῦ, or the funeral feast, in the Epistle of Jeremy, v. 32. The primitive Christians, many of whose customs it is well known were derived from the Jews, expressed thus their pious regard to their saints and martyrs, by pouring wine upon their tombs, and celebrating the funeral or sepulchral feast over them; but these at length degenerating into dissoluteness and debauchery, St. Ambrose found it necessary to forbid them in the churches of Milan, as did St. Austin in those of Africa. They obtained also among the Romans; but the same abuse probably induced Numa to give strict orders that no one should honour the dead by pouring wine upon their tombs. Estius and Tirinus upon the place remark, and Bellarmine abuses it to the same purpose, that Tobit had not recommended to his son such a practice, if he had not thought that this work of mercy regarded, and in some sort affected, the just persons themselves; i. e. that it would procure some ease and refreshment to the souls of the deceased; and from hence they infer the advantage and necessity of those solemn masses and oblations, which the Romish church offers for the repose of the soul. To this it may be answered, 1. That by these sepulchral feasts no oblation was intended to be made to God, but only a decent honour shewn thereby to the memory of the righteous. 2. That no mention is here made of any prayers or intercessions for the dead. 3. That what is here enjoined was to comfort, by a seasonable entertainment, the distressed relations and friends of the person deceased, and was purely for the benefit of the living. 4. That the heathens, from whom this rite was borrowed, and who entertained a notion that the ghosts of the deceased were regaled with this sensible repast, yet extended it not so far, as to the purging of the soul thereby, or affecting the condition of it in its separate state.

Ver. 19. For every nation hath not counsel.] No nation, i. e. no part of mankind, mere mankind, independently of God, hath counsel or wisdom enough to effect any scheme of importance, or establish any business of consequence: which is a sufficient reason for all private persons or communities to trust in the Lord Jehovah, and to depend upon him for direction and assistance. The context warrants this interpretation. Munster's Hebrew copy has, Quoniam non est in potestate hominis ullum consilium, sed solum in manibus Dei; and Fagius, Quoniam non est sapientia, neque prudentia, neque consilium contra Dominum. Calmet also takes it in the same sense, Mettez en Dieu votre confiance, et desperez en lui; il fera reussir tous vos desseins; parce qu'il n'y a ni sagesse, ni prudence, ni conseil contre le Seigneur.

Ver. 20. And now I signify this to thee, that I committed ten talents to Gabael, the son of Gabias.] Chap. i. 14. he is called his brother. The Hebrew versions give no light here, as Munster has brother in both places, and Fagius, son. St. Ambrose admires the conduct of Tobit, and his remarkable disinterestedness with respect to this money. "He was poor and in want, and yet, regarding less his own than others' necessity, he thought not of recalling a very considerable sum which he had lent, and which would have been of great service to him in the condition he was in: nor did he resolve to call it in, till he imagined himself near death, and then he thought it but a piece of justice due to his family to inquire after it, that his son should not be deprived of a sum which lawfully belonged to him, Non tam cupiens commodatum reposcere, quam sollicitus ne fraudaret hæredem." (Ambr. in Tob. cap. 2. tom. ii.) The same writer takes occasion, from this example of Tobit, to reflect on "the prodigious difference between his conduct and that of those who are so wedded to their interests, that they are glad of an opportunity to take advantage of a brother's necessity to enrich themselves, under the pretence of doing them a kindness, and on that account exact large and unlawful interest: whilst the generous and open-hearted Tobit, unmindful of the necessity he found himself in, and of the regard which he owed to his family, hasted not to demand this money, nor require any thing more than the bare principal, though it had been lent a long time; even from Tobias's infancy," as the Vulgate here adds. (Ibid.) There is also another useful inference, which may be drawn from this place, viz. that though Tobit seems from ver. 1. to have sent for his son on purpose to communicate to him the affair of the money lent, yet it is observable, that he rather chooses to begin his seemingly farewell charge, by laying down rules for his moral conduct, and his instruction in righteousness, which indeed is the substance of it, before he opens to him the business of the talents in Media; as if in those early times he had known the Divine precept, given by him who fulfilled all righteousness, Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you. (Matt. vi. 33.)

Ver. 21. Thou hast much wealth, if thou fear God.] This sentiment is so exalted, that, as the Port-Royal comment observes, one would think that it was spoken by some Christian father to his son, in the times of the gospel. It is not unlike that of St. Paul, Godliness with contentment is great gain. Tobit had lost his sight, was a captive, and reduced to low circumstances; and yet, in the full assurance of faith, from the good treasure of his heart, he pronounces this encouraging maxim to all others in the like distressed circumstances, Thou hast much wealth, if thou fear God. God will either return with usury to a persecuted and afflicted servant, what he may at any time have lost, especially for the sake of his truth, and bless his latter end, as he did that of Job, with the greater flow of prosperity; or having proved his soul by a great trial of afflictions, reserve for him a treasure in the heavens, with which temporal goods are not worthy to be compared. St. Austin, full of admiration of Tobit's devout behaviour in a state of poverty, says, "Quam laudabilis sit Sanctus Tobias, scriptura docemur, cujus devotionem nec captivitas minuit, nec oculorum amissio, quominus Deo benediceret, persuasit. Neque, exhausta substantia, a via justitiæ et veritatis avertit. Necessitas enim probat justum. In egestate æquitatem servare, vera et perfecta justitia est. Unde enim quorundam devotio minuitur, inde augmentum facit laude dignus Tobias." (Quæst. 119.) How happy would the case of the poor be, if, like Tobit, they had ever this excellent maxim in their minds, which he here gives in charge to his son! It may not be amiss to observe, and place in one view, the several admirable precepts given by a religious father to his son in this chapter: 1. To remember God, and to praise him devoutly for his blessings. 2. To pay a reverence and regard to parents, for the kindness received from them. 3. To shew charity to the poor. 4. To avoid fornication and every species of lewdness. 5. To abhor all pride. 6. To be just towards all, and in particular to give the labourer his hire. 7. To honour good and just men, and to pay a respect to their memory by a decent funeral. 8. To ask counsel of the wise, and follow it. 9. To trust in God's goodness, even in the midst of poverty.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 3. SEEK thee a man which may go with thee, whilst I yet live.] Besides that of our version, there are other renderings of this sentence, according to the pointing of the Greek. The Vulgate has, Ut, dum adhuc vivo, recipias pecuniam. Fagius's Hebrew copy, Fortasse redibitis, me adhuc vivente. And the Greek and Syriac, Dabo ei mercedem dum vivo. The Vulgate properly enough inserts fidelem here, Inquire tibi aliquem fidelem virum, qui eat tecum; i. e. Inquire for somebody of trust and probity to go with you: for every idle person or vagrant was not proper to be sent on such an errand, or joined in a commission of receiving such a sum of money. (See ver. 8.)

Ver. 4. He found Raphael that was an angel. Ver. 5. But he knew not.] i. e. He knew him not to be such, having assumed a human form, of no mean or common appearance, but, as the Vulgate adds, having an air of majesty and greatness, which he looked upon as his natural mien, and not as the reflection of a heavenly glory, as he found it afterward to be. That good angels are appointed by God to be the guardians of particular men, and in execution of this their office, do frequently assume human shapes, to guide them in their journeys, and to deliver them from all dangers, is a doctrine as ancient as the patriarch Jacob's time, embraced by Christians, and believed by the wisest heathens. (Gen. xlviii. 16. Psal. xxxiii. 8. Matt. viii. 10. Acts xii. 15. Hes. Oper. et Die. lib. i. Plato, de Leg. lib. x.) Hence Mercury was fabled to be the messenger of the gods and guide of the way; and as such was said to have wings on his arms and his feet. A learned writer observes, that this story of Tobias and the angel has a wonderful relation and a great conformity, both in the ideas and the style, with Mercury's descending in the shape of a young man, and conducting Priam in his journey to the pavilion of Achilles, Il. Ω. where their conversation on the way is described. And the example of Homer, so long before Tobit, proves, that this opinion of God's sending his angels to the aid of man was very common, and much spread among the pagans in those former times, as will appear to any one that consults their theology. (Dacier's note, in loc. cit.) The part which the angel acts in this history is attended with some difficulties, and has been made a principal objection to the authority of the book; for though it be true, that angels have sometimes actually assumed the form or appearance of men, upon some extraordinary or high errand from God to man, yet this has been in appearance only: our Saviour himself seems to say as much; for when, upon his entering into the room where his disciples were assembled, and the doors shut, they were terrified, and thought they saw a spirit, he puts the proof of its being really himself, and no mere appearance, that a spirit has not flesh and bones, as they might actually feel and experience him to have. But it may be thought incredible, that Tobias should so long travel, and eat and lodge, with an immaterial form or appearance, and after so many occasions as must unavoidably offer for sensible touch, not only to himself, but in the family of Raguel, &c. no discovery should be made, nor so much as any suspicion raised of the thing. In answer to all which, it may, I presume, be very justly replied, first, with regard to the angel's appearing at all in this transaction, that it was an occasion vindice digna Deo; for whether we consider the greatness of Tobit's virtues, who was probably the most illustrious instance of piety and charity amongst the whole ten captive tribes, or the loss of his fortunes first, and his eyes after, and so the greatness of his sufferings also; if we attend farther to the particular situation of himself and his countrymen, which required uncommon supports to keep up their spirits, and maintain a proper dependance and hopes in God, it could be no ways unworthy God's wise and good providence in such circumstances, to send a messenger from heaven, and to make this a sensible example, that he had neither cast off his people, nor would at any time be wanting in the care of good men under their afflictions. As to the other part of the difficulty, which arises from an immaterial being conversing and cohabiting under a corporeal appearance only, without any discovery, or so much as suspicion, that it was not a real body, we answer, that the angel's skill and address, ever awake to his business, and not subject to such absence and inadvertencies as ourselves, would easily prevent or divert the occasions of discovery. And if, as we have a right, we farther include God's extraordinary providence here, all the difficulty is at once removed.

Ver. 9. So he called him, and he came in, and they saluted one another. Ver. 10. Then Tobit said unto him, Brother, shew me of what tribe and family thou art.] The Vulgate is fuller and more explicit as to the salutation, Dixit, gaudium tibi sit semper. Et ait Tobias, Quale gaudium mihi erit, qui in tenebris sedeo, et lumen cœli non video. Cui ait juvenis, Forti animo esto; in proximo est, ut a Deo cureris: preparing the reader for the accomplishment of this, chap. xi. The term brother is not to be taken strictly; the Jews called all those of their own tribe or nation brethren: Tobit, who uses this appellation in several places of this chapter, speaks to Raphael according to his human appearance, as one of the brethren.

Ver. 11. Dost thou seek for a tribe or family, or a hired man to go with thy son?] i. e. Why dost thou trouble thyself about my tribe or family? content thyself, without any farther inquiry, that thou hast got a good guide for thy son, ad votum tuum mercenarium, according to Munster's Hebrew copy. Of what service will it be, in the intended journey, to know my family? Dost thou want the family, or a hireling only, that is well acquainted with the way, to conduct thy son? And thus the Port-Royal comment explains it, Est-ce la famille du mercenaire, qui doit conduire vôtre fils, ou le mercenaire lui-même que vous cherchez? There is, however, more in this question than may seem at first hearing; it is not merely a question of curiosity, natural to old men, but Tobias being young and inexperienced, the intention of the good old man, his father, was, by this inquiry, to get all the intelligence and assurance he could possibly of the condition and credit of one, to whom he was about to entrust a son, whom he had been all along careful to bring up in the fear of the Lord, and with an abhorrence of evil company: and when Tobit asks Raphael of what family he was, it was in effect only to demand who and what he was himself; for from the good or evil disposition of the stock, or heads of the family, may with great probability be inferred the temper and manners of the children and dependants; as we form a judgment from the tree itself what fruit may be expected from it. Terentius Christianus expresses this conference more clearly:

> " Tob. Amabo, hospes,
> Cujas es? aut quibus parentibus, quæso,
> Prognatus? Raph. Quorsum id percontare? Nil refert
> Ad id quod agimus nunc. Tob. Ne id mihi, precor, frater,
> Succenseas, quòd curiosius stirpem
> Tuam expiscari non erubuerim. Scis quàm
> Non sit tutum cuiquam, hoc rerum statu, quicquam
> Committere ignoto: et curæ est mihi gnatus."

Ver. 12. I am Azarias, the son of Ananias the Great, and of thy brethren.] i. e. An Israelite. See vii. 3. where he makes himself to be of the tribe of Nephthali. Many Greek copies read here very corruptly, ἐγὼ τὸ γένος Ἀζαρίου καὶ Ἀνανίου τοῦ μεγάλου; but the reading followed by our version is confirmed by vi. 8. vii. 8. ix. 2. It may be more material to inquire, how Raphael is Azarias, and with what propriety or truth he styles himself so? To this objection several answers may be given:—1. That angels having no proper name, but what is derived from the office and ministry they are employed about, and Azarias, according to the Hebrew signification, meaning a helper from God; this name may agree very well to the angel Raphael, who was sent for this very purpose to be instrumental in curing Tobit's blindness, and to be a guide and assistant to Tobias in his journey, and therefore very prudently concealed his quality of an angel, that he might more conveniently execute his commission. The giving of proper names to persons derived from some accident, quality, or office, belonging to them, was very ancient, and customary among the Hebrews. There are many instances of this kind in Scripture, particularly Gen. xxx. where the names given to Jacob's children are very observable and expressive, if considered in this view. Secondly, As the angel had assumed the form and person of Azarias, he may be supposed to speak according to his appearance only; as the author of the first book of Samuel saith, That Samuel spake to Saul, seeking his counsel by the witch of Endor, because the person that appeared was in Samuel's habit, and the witch, or at least king Saul, did repute him to be so. In like manner this angel, personating Azarias, for a time bare his name: or thus, as the picture is usually called by the person it represents, and he who in the tragedy acts the part of Cyrus, does for that time go under his name, so Raphael, personating Azarias in the form and appearance of a young man, was in that capacity to act and speak as if he had been such. Thirdly, The following instance may likewise serve to illustrate this, viz. When Joseph was sent after his brethren to Sichem, and had lost his way, there met him a person, (Gen. xxxvii. 15, 16.) that directed him where to find them, which the Targum of Jonathan on the place pronounces to be the angel Gabriel. As this concealed angel had the appearance of a man, and is indeed so called in that text, and under that form was assisting in directing the way, we may hence perhaps conceive, how the same person here should be the angel Raphael and yet Azarias also.

Ver. 13. My brother, thou art of a good stock.] It may seem surprising, that Tobit, hearing the name of Ananias the Great, did not think proper to inquire how it happened, that Azarias, the son of so considerable a person, was so reduced in his circumstances, and to such a state of meanness, as to be obliged to get a poor livelihood, by occasionally hiring himself. To say nothing of the vicissitude of fortune, which God has placed in his own power, it may be sufficient to answer, That in a time of captivity, such as was that of the Israelites at present, all distinction of families is lost, or however not considered, the greatest and most considerable are confounded with the meanest; as they are carried away promiscuously from their country, so they are equally stripped of their possessions and fortunes, and condemned by the merciless victor to the same instances of hardship and servility.

Ver. 14. Wilt thou a drachm a day.] It appears by the gospel of St. Matthew, that a Hebrew drachm was the fourth part of a shekel, i. e. ninepence of our money; for there, xvii. 24. the tribute-money, annually paid to the temple by every Jew, which was half a shekel, is called δίδραχμον (i. e. the two drachm piece); and therefore, if a half shekel contained two drachms, a drachm must have been the quarter of a shekel, or ninepence, as every shekel weighed about three shillings of our money. If we suppose this Greek version of Tobit to be made from the Chaldee by some Alexandrian Jew, then, as every Alexandrian drachm contained two Hebrew drachms, one drachm of Alexandria will be of our money eighteen-pence.

Ver. 16. Go thou with this man, and God, which dwelleth in heaven, prosper your journey, and the angel of God keep you company.] As indeed he did, according to the representation of this history, though Tobit in faith spoke this. This pious wish, no less than Raphael's example and presence, shews us the opinion of the Jews at least, that God has given his angels the charge of mankind, and that he makes use of their ministry to conduct them through this life, in the midst of the many dangers that accompany them. Our Saviour intimates such a tutelar care with respect to little children in particular, Matt. xviii. 10. But it does not from hence follow, that the angels have such a knowledge of human affairs, or power over them, as that prayers should be offered up to them, or their intercession with God should be requested, or that any reliance should be had on their merits, as the popish expositors on this book would infer; for however highly favoured, still they are but servants of God, and his ministering spirits, and have neither omniscience, nor omnipresence, nor any attribute to make them fit objects to be addressed to in a manner which is incommunicable to the Divinity. Tobit's affectionate charge here greatly resembles Abraham's commission to his servant, Gen. xxiv. 40. upon his sending him to fetch a wife for his son Isaac; The Lord, before whom I walk, will send his angel with thee, and prosper thy way; and thou shalt take a wife for my son of my kindred, and of my father's house. In this particular also of a wife the resemblance holds; for though Raphael had nothing in commission relating to Sara, yet he happily crowned his journey by concluding a match for his master's son, who sent him in quest of money only.

So they went forth, and the young man's dog with them.] This clause is wanting here, both in Munster's Hebrew copy and in the Vulgate. The latter, indeed, inserts it, vi. 1. It is most probable that the dog went with them, as it is mentioned in all the Greek copies, the Syriac, and Fagius's Hebrew, as going and returning with them, xi. 4. This circumstance of the dog, though of no great moment, is neither absurd nor unusual, as it is according to the simplicity of ancient times. But it may be the more necessary not to pass over this incident of the dog without some farther remark, since no less a critic than Mr. Pope has passed some raillery upon it. As he very ingeniously entertains himself and his friend (see letter to Mr. Cromwell), in satirizing some of the follies and failings of men, by setting forth the contrary virtues and good qualities of dogs; in the flow of his wit he observes, with relation to the book of Tobit, that there was no manner of reason to take notice of the dog, but the humanity of the author. Now, to call the introducing the dog an instance of the author's humanity, is certainly a very odd conceit; so odd, that it seems plain we are to consider it as a hasty stroke of fancy, not the result of Mr. Pope's judgment; indeed, were he serious, there is as little truth as candour in this censure. Tobias was to take a long journey into a strange country, and to bring a large sum of money back with him, attended only with one other person, who, though an angel, was not discovered by him to be such; and does not the reason of the thing speak itself, that the dog was thought a proper guard under these circumstances, and therefore taken by Tobias, Comesque viæ dominique satelles? Pliny thinks it worth his while to remark this use of dogs, and gives an instance of a master preserved in his journey from thieves by his dog. (Nat. Hist. lib. viii. cap. 40.) And this we apprehend is sufficient to shew, that the mentioning the dog at the entering upon their journey was not impertinent. As to the significancy of introducing him again at their return, there is no reason why we should admire such a circumstance as natural and beautiful in Homer, and yet low and trifling in our author. Take the two passages together: "Tunc præcucurrit canis qui simul fuerat in via, et quasi nuncius adveniens, blandimento suæ caudæ gaudebat:"

Δὴ τότε γ' ὡς ἐνόησεν Ὀδυσσέα ἐγγὺς ἐόντα,
Οὐρῇ μέν ῥ' ὅγ' ἔσῃνε. (Odyss. P.)

It would indeed argue great want of taste to put these two cases quite upon a parallel: Ulysses was in disguise, and entirely unknown to every human creature; yet the sagacity of this animal at once discovers him under all the changes that twenty years' absence and fatigues, together with all that art and design could contribute farther to his concealment, had brought upon him. This is a very beautiful and striking circumstance in the poet, and though we find nothing in the historian to correspond with it, yet there remains likeness sufficient to secure him from ridicule. To which we may add, that, after the eagerness and impatience of the parent for the return of her son, we are affected with a very sensible pleasure to see it removed at once, and changed into joy by the appearance of that faithful guard, which, upon his master's approaching home, ever naturally hastens to be the harbinger of it. It may not be amiss to observe, that the passage quoted above from the Vulgate, receives great confirmation from the Syriac version, which makes Anna see the dog first, before she saw her son, (xi. 6.) upon which she flies to Tobit, to tell him they were coming. Nor does the Greek disagree with this; for it says, not that she saw Tobias himself, but προσενόησεν αὐτὸν ἐρχόμενον, i. e. knew it, or perceived it by some token, to wit, this of the dog. We should not have dwelt so long upon a circumstance seemingly so trifling, nor have been induced to have taken so much notice of it, had not this circumstance been represented as if the dog was introduced into the history foolishly, and without any sort of reason for it.

Ver. 17. Is he not the staff of our hand, in going in and out before us?] This is a Hebraism. We meet with the like phrase, Numb. xxvii. 17. The sense here is, Is he not the staff of our age, in managing our affairs, and taking care for us? And thus the Geneva version, Is he not the staff of our hand to minister unto us? And so Junius, Nonne scipio manus nostræ est, res nostras agens arbitratu nostro? Fagius's Hebrew copy has, Promus et condus est domus nostræ; i. e. He is the proveditor or steward of our family; and the Vulgate, Baculum senectutis nostræ. Terentius Christianus well expresses the sense of this and the following verse:—

——— "Multæ simul
Concurrunt suspiciones, quæ meum animum diversum trahunt:
Viæ crepidines periculosæ, adolescentis parum
Circumspecti imperitia: tum hospes, cujus fidei creditus est,
Ignotus —— saltem spectatæ fidei viro
Commisisset, cum ipsi salute filii pecunia
Prior esset. O insaturabilem habendi sitim!
Quasi non multo satius fuisset, paululum
Perdere pecuniæ, quam filium, unicam Nostræ senectutis requiem, vitæ subire periculum."
(In Tob. act. iii.)

Ver. 18. Be not greedy to add money to money.] Ἀργύριον τῷ ἀργυρίῳ μὴ φθάσαι. The sense of the English version is clear and easy, but the Greek is not so intelligible. The meaning of the different translators in their several expressions, probably may all be brought nearly into one sentiment. Let not money be added, margin; i. e. Let not the value of it be enhanced above what it is. Would to God we had not laid money upon money, Geneva; viz. we had not doubted the price of it in our estimation. Nanquam fuisset ipsa pecunia pro qua misisti eum, Vulgate; I wish there had not been any such money; or, that money should never have been the consideration of sending away thy son. Utinam argentum huic argento non antecessisset, Junius; I wish the desire of money hath not overprized this money in Media. Argentum ad argentum non perveniat, Syriac; The silver or money there loses its value, if my son's life is to be the price of it. As it is generally agreed that Tobit was wrote originally in Hebrew or Chaldee, it may perhaps contribute towards understanding this passage, to inquire what word it probably was that is here translated by φθάνω. As to the two Hebrew copies of Fagius and Munster, they are comparatively modern things, and depart too widely from the more authentic versions, to give us any assistance here. There are two Hebrew words, and, as far as I find, those only, which in the LXX. are thus translated, if they may be thought to reach the point. The first is נגע, in hiphil, pertingere fecit, adduxit; in this sense, ἀργύριον τῷ ἀργυρίῳ φθάσαι, is to add money to money. The other word, which they translate by φθάνα, is אמץ, in hithp. roboravit, and, by a common Hebraism, to hasten a thing, or to do it with all one's might. (1 Kings xii. 18.) In any of these senses, and supposing either of these words to have been the original one in this passage, the meaning clearly is, to hasten or accumulate money on money. They are both Chaldee words likewise, and bear a meaning perfectly suitable to what we have deduced from the Hebrew ones. It will be proper likewise to consider the Greek word itself, which will be found not incapable of the same meaning. Φθάνω, amongst its other significations, is, by Stephens, Budæus, &c. explained, Voti compos esse, propositi summam attingere, and so may be interpreted here, to get money to money. There remains, however, still a difficulty, which is, to account for the construction, and fill up the sense, for to what shalt we refer φθάσαι? Grotius, to make out his own meaning, would have ἔδει, or something equivalent, to be understood, which would also answer as well to complete ours, without any such liberty as altering the text: but possibly there may not be occasion even for this here; may not γένοιτο, in the second clause of the verse, be referred or extended to the first also? ἀργύριον τῷ ἀργυρίῳ μὴ φθάσαι γένοιτο, let it not be our business to get money to money, but let the money be περίψημα τοῦ παιδίου, i. e. either ἕνεκα τοῦ παιδίου, as filth and dirt for the sake of our child; let us lose it rather to save him: so Galat. vi. 17. στίγματα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, are not the marks properly of the Lord Jesus, but the wounds and marks suffered, ἕνεκα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, for his sake: or else we may suppose περίψημα to refer to those propitiatory sacrifices among the heathens, when, in the time of any great calamity, some vile wretches were sacrificed for the purgation and atonement of the whole people; and such sacrifices were περικαθάρματα, περιψήματα: and the sacrifical form was, as Suidas tells us, upon such occasions, Be thou our περίψημα: in this view the meaning of our passage is, Let us sacrifice our money to the welfare of our son.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 2. A FISH leaped out of the river, and would have devoured him.] According to Bochart, it was the silurus; this some call the sheat-fish, and which, as described by Ray, "Ad octo et amplius cubitos longitudine excrescit, pondere 150 libras superat, rictus oris amplissimus, estque piscis admodum vorax." Johnston says farther of it, calling it glanis, another name for the silurus, that "Non minoribus duntaxat pisciculis ventrem implet, sed et in majores, immo homines grassatur," and gives instances of human limbs found in the belly of this fish. Again, Tobias's fish was eatable; so is the silurus, and is in some places esteemed, "Pinguis, bonique saporis." Bochart gives the same account from the ancients, and goes on with the parallel,—Was Tobias's fish found in the Tigris? Pausanias, in like manner, makes the glanis or silurus to be an inhabitant of the Euphrates, from whence the excursion into the Tigris is easy, as those two rivers join: and Diodorus expressly tells us, that fish of the belluine kind are found in the Tigris, especially about the dog-days. He proceeds farther to shew from Galen, and other writers, that the liver of the silurus was in great fame for the cure of suffusions and dimness of sight; and, from some Greek and Arabic authors, that even its smell was effectual in expelling demons; but possibly this very history of Tobit might originally give occasion to these notions. If it should be objected that the silurus is a fish of a very smooth and slippery skin, destitute of scales, and therefore not to be supposed to be held by the bare hands of Tobias, it is sufficient to answer, that the head is disproportionably big to its body, and the gills vast and open, so as to offer easy and firm hold; there is, therefore, in the Latin version, where Tobias is ordered prehendere branchiam, very great propriety, from the singular form and structure of this fish. But whether the eating this fish, as mentioned ver. 5. is quite agreeable to Lev. xi. 10. is a difficulty that hath not been fully considered. Against the callionymus, which the greater part of the interpreters suppose to be the fish here meant, from the sanative virtue said to be in it by Pliny and other naturalists, there lies this very material objection, That it is a fish of so small a size as is utterly inconsistent with the story. "Longitudine est (says the most accurate Mr. Ray, with whom Johnston agrees), dodrantali, rarius pedali," and therefore can never be supposed to attack, much less able to devour, a man.

Ver. 7. Touching the heart and the liver, if a devil or an evil spirit trouble any, we must make a smoke thereof before the man or the woman, and the party shall be no more vexed.] Those who are of opinion that demons were invested with certain material forms, wherein they snuffed up the perfumes and feasted themselves upon the odours of the incense and sacrifices that were offered to them, have an easy way of solving this difficulty, by supposing that the smell of the burnt heart and liver of the fish was offensive to Asmodeus. The Chaldeans, among whom the book of Tobit was wrote, and the Israelites, for whose use and instruction it was wrote, might both be of this opinion, that demons, as not absolutely divested of all matter, were capable of some sensations and impressions that belonged to corporeal substances; and therefore, in accommodation to the vulgar idea and prejudice of the people, the author of this history might express himself as though the expulsion of this evil spirit was effected by a natural cause, the smoke of the fish, even though at the same time he sufficiently intimates, that it was through the merciful help of God, obtained by prayer, that it came to pass, (ver. 17.) But if this demon was incorporeal (and this is the supposition which generally prevails), we may safely conclude, that the smoke of the fish's entrails could have no direct nor physical effect upon him; that his fleeing away, therefore, was occasioned by a supernatural power, in the exercise of which this angel appointed to attend Tobias was the principal instrument, and that he ordered the fumigation as a sign only when the evil spirit, by his superior power, should be chased away. Others have been disposed to consider Asmodeus not as any real demon, but only as expressive of the great power of lust, and that the fumigation in no other sense drove away that evil spirit, than as its virtue contributed to check and suppress such an extravagant and brutal passion as was predominant in her other husbands, the efficacy of which (ver. 7) is said to be so powerful and general, as that it would cure τινὰ, any other person tempted in the like irregular manner. But, allowing this fumigation to have some physical effect, like other fœtid medicines, yet it would, I conceive, be more proper to consider this as a lower and secondary instrument only in the cure, as prayer and abstinence are, in the history itself, set forth as the principal means by which so powerful an effect was produced. And this seems to be a more likely way to hinder the return of Asmodeus, i. e. of any base lust again, than the power of natural fumigation, which has not escaped censure, as having some appearance of magic.

Ver. 8. The gall is good to anoint a man that hath whiteness in his eyes, and he shall be healed.] Whether the gall of this or any other fish has such a natural virtue to restore sight, naturalists can best determine. Pliny, indeed, speaking of the callionymus, mentions something like this:— "Fel cicatrices sanat, et oculorum carnem superfluam consumit." (Lib. xxxii. cap. 4. 7.) But I have before shewed (see note on ver. 2.) that this is not the fish here mentioned. It seems best in this case, likewise, not to rest the cure in the mere natural liniment, but to understand the outward application as somewhat similar to our Saviour's spreading clay upon the eyes of the man that was born blind, and ordering him to wash in the pool of Siloam, not as the cause, but as the proof, of the cure. It was the power of God in both instances; and Tobit, sensible of this, returns devout thanks to God accordingly, xi. 14, 15.

Ver. 12. I know that Raguel cannot marry her to another, according to the law of Moses, but he shall be guilty of death.] According to the precept in the Mosaical law, Numb. xxvii. 8. a woman ought to marry her nearest kinsman, who, having no brother, succeeded to the inheritance of her father; but the penalty of death, mentioned in our version, the Syriac and Greek text, seems very particular, and is not to be met with any where in the law, either as denounced against the father, who would not give his daughter to his nearest kinsman, or against the nearest kinsman himself, if he would not espouse her. The Geneva version, which qualifies the expression, is therefore preferable: I know that Raguel cannot marry her to another according to the law of Moses, else he should deserve death. But I think the words ἢ ὀφειλήσει θάνατον may be better rendered, ἢ, or (if he does) that other to whom he gives her, ὀφειλήσει, will be obnoxious to death, or in great danger to be slain by the power of Asmodeus. For it has been thought not very unlikely, that the true reason why the seven husbands were given up to be slain by the wicked demon, was because they unjustly claimed the right of marriage to this heiress; the attempt to lie with whom was a sort of attempt to ravish a virgin already betrothed, and belonging to another by their law; and by the slaughter of these, Providence preserved her pure and unspotted for her rightful and legal husband, Tobias. (See Whist. Auth. Records, vol. ii.) Nor is the sense which Terentius Christianus gives of this passage to be despised:

> "Non denegabit, sat scio: nec si velit
> Maxime, jure poterit: nam præter jus tuum
> Nil postulas; tibi enim debetur: utpote
> Qui ei cognatione ac genere proximus
> Es. Nec eam, contra præceptum Mosaicum,
> Alienigenæ nuptum locabit conjugi,
> Nisi crimen capitale velit incurrere."

The Vulgate and Hebrew copies wholly omit the threatening clause, and indeed the sense is as complete without it.

Ver. 14. For a wicked spirit loveth her, which hurteth nobody but those which come unto her.] Calmet observes, that this demon, being incorporeal, could not possibly love Sara on account of her youth or beauty, or any bodily accomplishment; much less did he respect, as he was an unclean and impure spirit, her chastity and virtue. Tobias, therefore, must be understood to speak here according to popular prejudice and opinion. The vulgar supposed demons to be corporeal, and to be enamoured, like mortals, with the love of women; hence it became a notion that Asmodeus, through a motive of jealousy, killed those that went in unto Sara. The Vulgate and Hebrew copies only mention the bare fact, but the Greek and Syriac assign love, or rather brutal lust, as the cause of this cruelty. The rabbins and latter Jews, it is certain, supposed that evil spirits were enamoured of handsome women, from misunderstanding perhaps Gen. vi. 2. And there are many authors that pretend evil spirits are not only capable of, but often indulge and satisfy, a criminal passion with women; and particularly that the demons called incubi and succubi carry on shameful and abominable intrigues with both sexes. Stories of this sort are not wanting even in writers of good note and authority. (See August. de Civit. Dei, lib. xv. cap. 23. and S. Bern. lib. ii. cap. 6.) But the opinion that demons and angels are corporeal, though countenanced by the Platonists, Origen, and others of the fathers, is now generally exploded. And if one examines the accounts in history which mention such an unnatural commerce of demons with mortals, male or female, it is generally represented as transacted during sleep, and therefore is to be looked upon rather as the effect of the disordered imagination of such persons, than any sensible or corporeal act of any real demon. Had Raphael himself said this, That the demon had slain the seven husbands through his own love for Sara, it had been a difficulty indeed; but, as it was Tobias only, he might do it according to the received opinion of his countrymen. We may therefore here justly call this an error of Tobias, but it is no reflection on the history.

Ver. 17. And the devil shall smell it, and flee away, and never come again any more: but when thou shalt come to him, rise up both of you, and pray to God which is merciful.] This account of driving away the demon by fumigation, reminds one of what Josephus mentions, de Bell. Jud. lib. viii. cap. 2. that one Eleazar, before Vespasian and a great number of persons, freed several, who were possessed with evil spirits, from the power of them, by putting to their nose a certain ring, having a specific root under it, which quickly expelled the demon out of their bodies, so as never to return again; and that this method of cure was at that time successfully made use of against evil spirits: if this relation is to be depended on, it shews the power of smell upon evil genii, and the effect here ascribed to fumigation may from thence receive some countenance. But I do not build much upon this narrative, which carries in it the appearance of magic; much less can I pursuade myself to run the parallel between ejecting the demon here by the ashes of the perfume, and those undoubted miracles recorded in the Old and New Testament, Numb. xxi. 9. Josh. vi. 20. 2 Kings ii. 21. iv. 41. Matt. ix. 20. John ix. 6, 7. Acts v. 15. xix. 12. with which the popish expositors, out of an implicit regard to authority, and a zeal for their canon, have presumed to compare it. Without straining the point so far, the history itself seems to afford light enough to account for the supposed miracle, without recourse to, or any way relying upon, the virtue of the burnt entrails; for as prayer to, and faith in God was, according to the angel's direction, to accompany the use of the outward means, to which, according to the Vulgate, was added matrimonial continence for a season likewise; these have that known and sovereign virtue in them, as to supersede the necessity of any less powerful means. Especially if this demon was like that which went not out but by prayer and fasting, Matt. xvii. 21. This rich and holy perfume was an incense more precious and available with God than any secret of nature, or invention of art. Joint prayers, from persons so well-disposed, had, as it were, the efficacy of an evening sacrifice.

Fear not, for she is appointed unto thee from the beginning.] i. e. She belongs to thee according to the constitution of the law; or is thine by Divine appointment and designation. Ἑτοιμάζειν is taken in this sense to signify what is ordered by Divine appointment, Matt. xx. 23. xxv. 34. 1 Cor. ii. 9. Heb. xi. 16.

And thou shalt preserve her.] i. e. By maintaining, protecting, and defending her; and be a saviour to her, as the term is used on the like occasion, Eph. v. 23. Munster's Hebrew copy is more explicit, Et per manum tuam dominus liberabit eam de manu dæmonis; see xii. 3. where Sara is mentioned as made whole, or freed from that plague of the possession of the demon; and, iii. 17. where Raphael is mentioned as sent to heal Sara, by giving her for a wife to Tobias.

I suppose that she shall bear thee children.] He might express himself thus doubtfully, either as the man Azarias, whose appearance he assumed, or in his own person, as the angel Raphael. For angels too, though called intelligences, however desirous they may be to look into, are certainly ignorant of things future, (see 2 Esd. iv. 52.) unless God is pleased to reveal them to them, or commissions them to declare them to others. As when the angel foretells unto Zechariah the birth of a son, he mentions his authority and commission, I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God, and am sent to speak unto thee, and to shew thee these glad tidings. (Luke i. 19.) Calmet renders, J'espere qu'elle vous donnera des enfans.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 3. To whom they said, We are of the sons of Nephthalim, which are captives in Nineveh.] This passage, which has been too hastily misrepresented by some writers, as containing a notorious falsehood, (see Raynold's Præl. tom. i. Præl. 46.) is capable of being very consistently explained; for it does not appear from the text, that the angel gave this answer rather than Tobias; secondly, as Raphael assumed the person of Azarias, it might very properly be spoken in both their names, as Ananias, from whom Azarias descended, was of that tribe, (v. 12, 13.) The like answer will account for the angel's saying, that he was of the captivity of Nineveh; for so Azarias, whom he personated, really was.

Ver. 7. When he heard that Tobit was blind, he was sorrowful and wept. Ver. 8. And likewise Edna his wife, and Sara his daughter, wept.] Tobit's blindness only is mentioned here as the cause of this great concern; the Vulgate and Munster's Hebrew copy omit the occasion. It is probable that the tears which Raguel, his wife, and daughter, shed, had a mixture of joy as well as sorrow, arising from the eclaircissement or first discovery of Tobias to be their near relation; the former, from the agreeable reflection, that they had now with them the only son of a father, whom the ties of nature and birth had endeared to them; and the latter, from a sense of their sad captivity, which had kept persons so nearly related so long at a distance from one another. And the additional circumstance of Tobit's blindness, which must greatly add to his affliction, must in proportion also increase their concern.

Ver. 10. For it is meet that thou shouldest marry my daughter, nevertheless I will declare unto thee the truth.] Καθήκει σοι παιδίον μου λαβεῖν. In this and the three following verses, the terms used with respect to the marriage-ceremony are both proper and usual on the occasion. Παιδίον λαβεῖν is the same with παραλαβεῖν, Matt. i. 20. which is the technical term for taking one to wife, and so it is used, Deut. xx. 7. and hath respect and relation to διδόναι, which belongs to the father of the spouse, (see ver. 11. 13.) because he, after the example of God in Paradise, (Gen. ii. 22.) delivers her into the bridegroom's own hands, who was called petitor, or the suitor. St. Ambrose commends the great openness and frankness of Raguel in dealing so ingenuously with Tobias, in a matter of such consequence, whilst others, upon a like occasion, are equally as careful to conceal an objection. "Being a just man (says he), he chose rather that his daughter should continue unmarried, than to expose a husband to imminent danger for her sake. Though he was greatly importuned to give her in marriage, yet neither his parental tenderness, nor the great inclination which he must be supposed to have to settle his only child well, could prevail on him to conceal an accident from her lover, which he could not but imagine must contribute to break the match; however, he chose rather sincerely to declare to him the whole truth, than to appear to have an intention to deceive him by concealing the matter. Quam breviter absolvit omnes quæstiones philosophorum, dum nec filiæ vitia celanda arbitratus est! How has he decided at once, in a compendious manner, all the disputes of moralists and philosophers on this head! with great gravity they can debate the question, and are at some loss to determine it, whether a person intending to sell a house, or any moveables, ought himself to discover the faults and imperfections of them; but this good man thought he could not in conscience conceal that which he knew would be an objection to his daughter, even from him who was at that time making court to her, but advises him for his own sake to lay all thoughts of her aside, and to be easy and satisfied without her." (Ambros. lib. iii. Offic. cap. 14.)

Ver. 12. Take her from henceforth according to the manner, and the merciful God give you good success in all things.] As God was the first institutor of marriage, and joined our first parents in that holy state, so he still presides over it, and all marriages ought to be concluded in his fear, and with a petition for his blessing on the undertaking. Thus Abraham comforts himself with relation to his son's marriage, that the Lord God of heaven would send his angel to choose a wife for his son Isaac. (Gen. xxiv. 7.) And his servant, who was sent on that important commission, prays unto the Lord God, to send him good speed that day, and to shew kindness unto his master Abraham, in a particular that so nearly concerned his welfare. (See Prov. xix. 14. Ecclus. xxvi. 3.) Betrothing among the Jews was commonly performed about six months or a year before the wedding: but as Tobias's marriage was agreed on, and consummated on the spot, it may be asked, how Sara's parents came to comply so soon, as to give their daughter to Tobias the very same day that he arrived; the reasons probably were,—1. Her parents' desire of having her well married, and their hopes of seeing issue from her. 2. The circumstances and condition of her spouse. 3. His near relation, and legal right to her. 4. Raphael's importunity and persuasion. Some questions may also pertinently be asked concerning Tobias, as, why he married on a journey, at a distance from and without the knowledge or consent of his parents: such a procedure seems not agreeable to the opinion which one entertains of his piety, and rather an instance of want of duty, and a proper deference to them; for is there any affair more important, or wherein children are more obliged to consult their parents, and to receive their directions and advice, than in the great concern of marriage? To this it may be replied, that Tobias knew perfectly the intentions of his father on this head; that good old man had recommended to him before his journey to take a wife of his own tribe and family, (iv. 12, 13.) And it is observable, that Raphael reminds him (vi. 15.) of the instruction which his father gave him, to marry a wife of his own kindred: and, indeed, the law itself was sufficiently clear in this matter; for had he been indifferent, or so particular as to have refused what the known custom of the law required, Raguel could have compelled him to it, or obliged him to have renounced the right which he claimed of succession to his inheritance. Nor do we find that Tobit was at all surprised or troubled when his son, returning from his journey, brought with him a wife. After this it will be almost needless to inquire, whether Tobias was not guilty of some rashness and imprudence, in being so eager after a match, as solemnly to resolve neither to eat nor drink till it was concluded, which his intended father-in-law had kindly warned him against, and apprized him sufficiently of the danger attending it. But, besides the reason before given, that the nearness of the relation required this from him, Raphael assured Tobias that he had provided a remedy, effectually to secure him against the like accident, and to prevent his sharing the others' fate.

Ver. 13. Then he called his daughter, and he took her by the hand, and gave her to be wife to Tobias.] In the Vulgate it is, Raguel, the father of the bride, took her by the right hand, and joining it to Tobias's right hand, said, May the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, be with you, and unite you by the sacred ties of marriage, and fill you both with his blessings. To this custom of giving away the bride by the hands of the father, or some relation or friend, St. Paul seems to allude, 2 Cor. xi. 2. and the Psalmist, Psal. xlv. 13. The reason of this, says a very judicious writer, was, "that in ancient times all women, which had not husbands or fathers to govern them, had tutors, without whose concurrence and authority there was no act which they did warrantable, and for this cause they were in marriage delivered unto their husbands by others. Which custom retained, hath still this use, that it puts women in mind of their duty, whereto the very imbecility of their sex doth bind them, viz. to be always guided and directed by others." (Hooker's Eccles. Pol. b. v.) Whether this, or whatever be the cause of this custom, it is certainly most decent, that a woman, whose chiefest ornament is modesty, should rather be led or presented by the hand of another, than offer herself forwardly before the congregation to any one in marriage; and therefore the discretion of our church is herein much to be admired, which enjoins it to be asked, Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?

Ver. 14. And called Edna his wife, and took paper, and did write an instrument, of covenants, and sealed it.] Here we have a contract between Tobias and Sara, drawn up, not by a public notary, as was generally usual, but by Raguel the woman's father. We may farther observe, that before the writing this contract, there was a formal giving of the woman unto her husband by her own father; and that a particular and express form of words was used upon the delivery of her. It appears from hence, that a contract and marriage were anciently all one in effect, and the like may be gathered from the law, Deut. xxii. 24. where an espoused woman is called a wife, and if she be convicted of unchastity, is reputed as an adulteress, worthy of death. By which it is manifest, that a contract de præsenti differeth not in substance from a marriage, though for decency's sake solemn ceremonies are required by positive laws. The Jews usually drew up the contract of matrimony, and agreed about the dowry before the wedding; after that they read this contract or deed over, and lodged it in the hands of the bride's relations, and then they put the ring upon her finger: but in Tobias's marriage things were ordered otherwise, for Raguel immediately consents to give him his daughter, and at the same time joins their hands; then he calls for paper, writes down the contract, and hath it signed by two witnesses, according to the Hebrew, after which the feast began. All this is pretty different from the custom of modern Jews, though they look upon Tobias's wedding, and the ceremonies attending it, as a pattern of the happiest and most regular marriage. "One cannot but admire (say Messieurs of Port-Royal) the simplicity of those early times. Raguel gives his daughter in marriage to Tobias, and troubles not himself about settlements or covenants as they are here called, till the ceremony was over. Such openness and confidence is scarce to be found in the present times, and would be thought little less than carelessness. But it ought, however, to remind all those, who enter upon the like holy state, sincerely to renounce all sort of disguise and overreaching in an affair, where integrity, candour, and disinterestedness, are its best and principal security." (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 16. Raguel called his wife Edna, and said unto her, Sister, &c.] See v. 20. This term is only a word of tenderness and endearment, used by husbands to their wives. Tobias, in the next chapter, ver. 4. 7. calls Sara by the same name after he had married her. (See also x. 12.) An instance of this we have in Solomon's Song, chap. iv. where the words, my sister, my spouse, come three times together in four verses. And hence, if solutions were wanting, we may justify Abraham calling his wife Sarah, sister, (Gen. xii. 13.) which some free-thinkers have endeavoured to expose as an equivocation. For as sister is a name of tenderness, love, and affection, it was very properly applied to his wife; but indeed Sarah was so near a relation, as to have a natural right to be so called, being, as Abraham acknowledges, his half-sister, the daughter of his father, but not the daughter of his mother. (Gen. xx. 12.)

Prepare another chamber, and bring her in thither.] i. e. Into another bedchamber, different from that where Sara lay before, in which her seven former husbands were killed. This thought was just, and the exchange proper, as the very room inspired horror.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 2. AND took the ashes of the perfumes, and put the heart and the liver of the fish thereupon, and made a smoke therewith.] This story of driving away the demon by the ashes of the perfumes, possibly took its rise from the account of the smoke of Aaron's incense, staying the destroying angel from the surviving Israelites, superstitiously depraved. Some footsteps of this mystery the Hebrews seem to retain, when they say, that all hurtful and destroying spirits will flee away at the odour of the incense of sweet spices. Tobias here literally follows Raphael's directions, vi. 16. but perhaps the meaning principally may be, that Tobias, by the direction of the angel, offered the incense of prayer, or put up fervent prayers to God to drive away this fiend. Munster expressly understands it in this spiritual sense, Per illam suffumigationem designatur oratio, quæ instar vaporis cœlos penetrat. And then he concludes, Virtute ergo orationis Tobiæ et Saræ, fugatus est Asmodæus, et non efficacia aliqua odoris corporalis. (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 3. He fled into the utmost parts of Egypt.] i. e. Into the deserts of the upper Egypt, for so Pliny and other writers describe them. That deserts and solitary places were the dwelling and resort of unclean spirits, the canonical Scriptures inform us. Thus the demoniac, Luke viii. 29. is said to abide in no house, but to be driven of the devil into the wilderness: and thither was our Saviour led, as being the devil's residence, to be tempted by him. (Matt. iv. 1.) And accordingly the unclean spirit is described, Matt. xii. 43. as walking through dry or uninhabited places, seeking rest and finding none. See Baruch iv. 35. and Rev. xviii. 2. where Babylon the great city, when turned into a wilderness, is said to be, the dungeon of every foul spirit, and a cage of every impure and ill-boding bird, or rather the abode or residence of them; for φυλακὴ here has the sense of κατοικητήριον, and so it is often used by the Hellenistic writers. But the prophet's description of the same desolation, (Isa. xiii. 21.) is still more strong, for in it shall dwell, not wild beasts merely, as our version, nor Fauni and Silvani only, as Castalio renders, but, according to the LXX. Δαιμόνια ἐκεῖ ὀρχήσονται, καὶ ὀνοκένταυροι ἐκεῖ κατοικήσουσι.

And the angel bound him.] Not bodily with any visible chain, as the words seem to imply, and as is the custom among men, but by a superior power and command which he had received over him, he confined him to that desert part of Egypt he took shelter in, and where indeed he could do least mischief: for demons being incorporeal, and not having parts or members like men, act on each other in a manner wholly spiritual and invisible. The angel Raphael, indeed, appeared to the sight as with a human body, but it was only an assumed or borrowed appearance, and useless as to all natural functions; and therefore it was not by any bodily power or force of his own, nor by the efficacy of natural means, that he drove away Asmodeus, but he acted in this matter as one pure spirit acts on another, and, by the mighty and unseen power of him who commissioned him, he chained or confined the impure spirit to the place and in the manner it was appointed him, that he should do no more hurt, at least in the house of Tobias and Sara. Something like this we read in Scripture, Rev. xx. 1—3. that the angel which came down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand, laid hold on the dragon, which is the devil, and bound him for a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him. But it may be asked, to what purpose then was the burning of the heart and liver of the fish? or why was it enjoined, if there was no efficacy in them, or God has not given to some natural things a secret and wonderful power, opposite to that which the devil occasionally makes use of to the mischief of men? To this it may be answered, first, in general, That the angel Raphael did not want any spells or natural means to subdue this demon; for the least of the angels, when invested with God's authority, and acting by his commission, is able to vanquish the power of the devil, and to overthrow his wicked machinations. Secondly, There are the following particular reasons for the outward use of these means; viz. that is was very proper that Raphael should conceal, under the appearance of a mere natural remedy, the supernatural power he had received from his Divine Master, that it might not be discovered who he really was, till he had completed and finished the whole service for which he was sent: it was also necessary, that Tobias, by burning the entrails, should give some proof of his belief of what Raphael assured him, and of his compliance with the direction given by him. And, lastly, The burning of the entrails might be designed, and therefore enjoined, as a sign only when the evil spirit, by his superior power, should be chased away.

Ver. 6. Thou hast said, It is not good that man should be alone, let us make unto him an aid like unto himself.] Ποιήσωμεν αὐτῷ βοηθὸν ὅμοιον αὐτῷ; one that should be as his second self, like him in nature; one in whom he might see himself reflected, as it were, and revived. The Greek writer of this history follows here the LXX. which has in the place referred to, Gen. ii. 18. Βοηθὸν κατ' αὐτὸν, adjutorem secundum eum, a help-meet for him, or one suited to his wants and inclinations, one agreeable to and fit for him, by a similitude of temper and manners: or it may be rendered, An aid from himself, one taken from his own rib, for so Eve was formed. And this way of formation was designed probably to intimate that close love and reciprocal affection, which ought to be between man and wife. I shall only observe the agreement between the account here and that in the LXX. that the manner of expression in both is plural, ποιήσωμεν, as if there was a consultation about the formation of his second self also, as at the first creation of man; which the Vulgate likewise retains.

Ver. 7. And now, O Lord, I take not this my sister for lust, but uprightly; therefore mercifully ordain, that we may become aged together.] Ἐπίταξον ἐλεῆσαί με, καὶ ταύτῃ συνκαταγηράσαι: the construction is somewhat singular, like that iii. 15. (see note.) Grotius thinks the true reading to be, Ἐπίταξον ἐλεήσας με ταύτῃ συνκαταγηράσαι, omitting καὶ, which I think, being emphatical here, might be better continued; i. e. In mercy grant that even with her, who hath buried so many husbands, and whom an evil spirit pursues to the destruction of all her lovers, I may grow old, and escape the common fate of the others. According to the Vulgate, Sara puts up this prayer, and that version puts into her mouth the very same, iii. 14. Virum cum timore tuo, non cum libidine mea, consensi suscipere. Calmet admires the delicacy of this sentiment in a young man and a Jew, one educated amongst a gross and carnal people; and proposes it to the consideration and imitation of all that enter upon the conjugal state, as does St. Austin, de Doctr. Christ. cap. 10.

Ver. 9. Raguel arose, and went and made a grave, Ver. 10. saying, I fear lest he also be dead.] When Raguel gives his daughter to Tobias, almost immediately after his arrival, and consents so suddenly to the marriage, the Vulgate observes, that it seemed as if God had influenced his heart to listen to the proposal of Raphael, a stranger to him, whom he considered only as a man. It was such a strong persuasion that made him say, that he doubted not but his prayers and tears were accepted before God for the removal of the disgrace which lay upon his family, and that the arrival of Tobias was by the appointment of Providence to espouse Sara his nearest kinswoman, and therefore of right belonging to him: Non dubito quin Deus preces et lacrymas meas in conspectu suo admiserit, et credo quoniam ideo fecit vos venire ad me, ut ista conjungeretur cognationi suæ secundum legem Mosis; but it appears from the account here, that Raguel's faith and confidence in this match, and in what Raphael assured him for his encouragement, was but faint, or was shaken afterward; for had not the apprehension been strong in him, that the same fate which befel the others would happen to Tobias in the same manner, he would never have given such hasty orders to his servants to rise at cock-crowing, according to the Vulgate, to dig a grave for his interment. Though had he considered that the present marriage was made in the fear of the Lord, and founded upon legal right and equity, and that the former husbands were probably killed by the evil spirit, either because they unjustly claimed the right of marriage with this heiress, or that lust was their principal motive, he needed not to have had such foreboding apprehensions about the event of it, or provided for a funeral before it happened.

Ver. 19. And he kept the wedding-feast fourteen days.] Rejoicings at the Jewish weddings were esteemed so absolutely necessary, that the husband could not any ways be excused from them, but was obliged to have them for at least seven days; and even the sabbath-day itself, according to Calmet, was accounted no hinderance to the feastings and entertainments usual on such occasions. From many passages in Scripture it appears, that the time of the marriage-feast was usually seven days. Fulfil her week, was Laban's injunction to Jacob, Gen. xxix. 27. (See Judg. xiv. 10. 12. Tobit xi. 19.) "Septem dies ad convivium et septem ad luctum," was a proverb among the Jews; Lamy says the feast was for eight days together, and of the third day of such a feast he understands those words of St. John, ii. 1. on the third day there was a marriage, &c. which he says should be translated, on the third day of the marriage which was in Cana; and that this probably was the reason why, upon the coming of our Lord and his apostles, they wanted wine. (Introd. to Scrip. vol. i. p. 317.) It is to be observed, that though the time was usually limited to a week, yet parents of the espoused were at liberty to make the continuance of the wedding-feast last as long as they thought fit. They could not shorten the days, as the Jewish doctors say, but they might considerably lengthen them. (See Buxtorf. Syn. Jud. cap. 35. Selden's Uxor Heb. lib. ii.) But Raguel, from the satisfaction of his son-in-law's escape from the power and evil intentions of Asmodeus, doubles the usual number, or keeps the nuptial-feast fourteen days; though, as she was a widow, it ought to have continued no longer than three days, according to the rabbins. The Vulgate mentions an invitation given on the occasion to all friends and neighbours, and sets down some particulars of the entertainment, Uxori suæ dixit ut instrueret convivium . . . duas quoque pingues vaccas, et quatuor arietes occidi fecit, et parari epulas omnibus vicinis suis, cunctisque amicis.

Ver. 20. For before the days of the marriage were finished, Raguel had said unto him by an oath, that he should not depart till the fourteen days of the marriage were expired.] According to the sense that at first hearing offers itself, it seems as if Raguel had said to Tobias, before the time was expired, that he should not depart before the time was expired. This is too insipid to be the meaning; for if Raguel said this at all, he must of course be supposed to say it before the time was expired. Calmet seems aware of this objection, and makes the sense to be, That before the end of the seven days, the usual time allowed for such rejoicings, (Gen. xxix. 27. Judg. xiv. 12.) Raguel had solemnly insisted upon his stay with them a longer time, full fourteen days. It is uncertain from the Greek, whether Raguel swore that Tobias should not go, using this expression, ἐνόρκως μὴ ἐξελθεῖν αὐτὸν, or whether he obliged Tobias, ἐνόρκως, by an oath, to assure him, that he would not go. In the Hebrew, Raguel swears; according to the Vulgate he makes Tobias swear; but that it was Raguel, appears very plainly from ix. 3. x. 7.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 2. AND go to Rages of Media to Gabael.] According to the Vulgate, Sara, with whom they now were, lived at Rages, Sara filia Raguelis in Rages civitate Medorum. (iii. 7.) How, therefore, does Tobias ask Raphael to go to Rages? I answer, That this is either a mistake, or all the country or province about Ecbatane was called Rages; and accordingly, where our translation has Rages, a city of Media, (i. 14.) the marginal reading is, in the land or country of Media; and the Geneva version has expressly in the text, in the land of Media; or Gabael might live in the city particularly called by that name, answering to the great or county town of one of our shires. But the truth is, Raguel lived at Ecbatane, (iii. 7. vii. 1.) which was at a distance from Rages, (vi. 9. vii. 1.) and Raphael and Gabael are represented as returning from a journey to Raguel's house, ver. 2. 6. As to the objection which is founded on the Vulgate rendering, iii. 7. it is to be observed, that the Greek has there, ἐν Εκβατάνοις τῆς Μηδίας; as also our version. (See note on iii. 7.)

Ver. 5. So Raphael went out and lodged with Gabael, and gave him the hand-writing, who brought forth bags which were sealed up, and gave them to him.] Tobias, seeing himself pressed by Raguel his father-in-law, to stay with him fourteen days, was unwilling to refuse him, on account of the handsome manner in which he had been received and entertained by him, and especially his new relation to him; but as it was absolutely necessary to send to Gabael, and to exhibit to him the note or hand-writing, in order to receive the money, the fear he had of disobliging his own parents, if he deferred his return too long, and his desire of testifying his grateful acknowledgments to his father-in-law, by continuing with him the time requested, made him contrive a method to satisfy at once both these obligations. He applies to, and prevails upon, Raphael, the holy companion of his journey, of whose wisdom, affection, and fidelity, he had had sufficient experience, to undertake the management of this commission himself, and to set forward without him, but sufficiently authorized to receive this money, which he speedily and happily accomplishes. The Vulgate adds, that Tobias's regard for Raphael was so great and extraordinary, for having conducted him through the journey so successfully, and brought about a match so advantageous to him, and for delivering him from the jaws of the voracious fish, and the fury and malice of the demon Asmodeus, that he professed to him, that if he was for the future to be his slave in return, he could not sufficiently repay the obligations. It has been a matter of much inquiry among the commentators, whether this money was deposited and lodged only with Gabael at Rages, as a place possibly of greater security at that time, as the Greek and Hebrew copies mention, or was really lent to him, probably to traffic with occasionally, as the Vulgate represents it; be this as it will, Gabael shewed himself an honest and punctual man, by returning the ten talents instantly on a proper demand; and Tobit proved himself no less a good man, as St. Ambrose observes, by asking only the principal, without any consideration for the greatness of the sum, or the length of the time.

Ver. 6. And Tobias blessed his wife.] Various are the senses given of this passage; Uxorem suam gravidam fecit, says Badwell, and the Geneva version expressly has, Tobias begat his wife with child. Grotius conjectures, from the authority of St. Jerome, that the reading of the Greek formerly was, καὶ εὐλόγησε (Ῥαγυὴλ) Τωβίαν, καὶ τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, i. e. abeuntibus bene precatus est; but it does not appear that they were then setting forward, the fourteen days were not yet near expired. His blessing them on their departure follows after, (x. 11.) Junius's rendering, inserted in the margin, seems more probable, Benedixit Gabahel Tobiæ et uxori ejus: That Gabael, at his arrival with Raphael, wished Tobias and his wife all possible joy and happiness in their new condition. Fagius's Hebrew has, Ad quorum adventum adhuc magis benedictus fuit Tobias cum Sara uxore sua, That upon the coming of these guests to the wedding, Tobias and Sara were more pleased and happy. Calmet, lastly, makes the sense to be, That Tobias blessed, or was the cause of blessing and happiness to his wife, by the advantage which he received from this marriage, particularly his freeing her from the tyranny of the evil demon, and taking away the reproach which before had attended her; instead whereof it would now be said, as a common form of benediction at future weddings, to the bride, "May you be as happy as was Sara, the wife of Tobias."

CHAP. X.

Ver. 5. NOW I care for nothing my son, since I have let thee go.] Οὐ μέλει μοι τέκνον, ὅτι ἀφῆκά σε. It is generally agreed that the reading of the Greek here is corrupt. Various conjectures have been proposed for restoring the true one, ὡς μέλει μοι, and οἳ μέλει μοι. The last seems preferable, as being confirmed by Fagius's Hebrew copy, the Syriac, Vulgate, and Junius's version, all of which render to this effect; Eheu! Pœnitet me, fili, quod dimiserim te. And thus Coverdale, Woe is me, my son: O what ailed us to send thee away into a strange country? To this great concern of his wife, occasioned by his long absence and an apprehension of his death, Tobit calmly and tenderly replies, that he would not have her be so discouraged and dejected; he was persuaded, through a strong faith and trust in God, that her son was safe; that the person he had entrusted him with might be depended upon for his care; and that some unforeseen accident on Gabael's part, and not any misfortune, had occasioned this delay. One cannot but admire the exemplary patience of Tobit on all occasions; who, though poor, blind, old, and almost childless in every sense, yet never desponds, or charges God foolishly.

Ver. 10. Then Raguel arose, and gave him Sara his wife, and half his goods, servants, and cattle, and money.] The dowry which the Jewish brides brought to their husbands, which was different according to the circumstances of their parents, was called by the rabbins nedunia. As Sara was an only child, and disposed of in marriage according to her parents' wishes, and agreeably to the appointment and determination of the Mosaical law, Raguel gives her half his substance in present, and engages to bestow the remainder at his death, (viii. 21.) Amongst the goods mentioned here as given to Tobias are, σώματα, or servants, for so such as were altogether at the beck and will of their lords were called both by Jews and heathens. The sale of the captive Jews, by Nicanor, is called ἀγορασμὸς Ἰουδαίων σωμάτων· 2 Macc. viii. 11. so all the servants of the men of Shechem are expressed by πάντα τὰ σώματα αὐτῶν, Gen. xxxiv. 29. (See also Apoc. xviii. 13.) Munster's version enumerates the particulars of her fortune, viz. Famulos et ancillas, oves et boves, asinos et camelos, vestimenta linea et purpurea, vasa argentea et aurea.

Ver. 12. And he said to his daughter, Honour thy father and thy mother-in-law, which are now thy parents.] Sara was shortly to leave her abode with her natural parents, and by marriage to be placed, as the civilians term it, extra familiam; this precept therefore was very properly and affectionately inculcated, as the duty of honour and reverence did not cease, but was transferred, or rather divided. "How happy (says the Port-Royal comment) is a family when the sentiments of love are reciprocal; where those in the family, whereunto the bride enters, treat her with the affection due to a daughter, and the daughter-in-law in like manner regards them as her parents, and behaves in the same respectful and dutiful manner towards them! where such an undissembled fondness reigns, there is great reason, doubtless, to bless and pronounce happiness to a union, which affection, as well as the ties of relation, has so closely joined: but as it too often happens, that relations so united in time discover different views, and act by separate motives, springing either from jealousy or interest, there is the less reason to be surprised at seeing so many heart-burnings and differences in families, and so little of true love between persons who look upon each other with distrust, instead of shewing that tenderness which a mother ought to have for a daughter, and a daughter for a mother." (Com. in loc.) After this injunction to Sara to honour her new adopted parents, the Vulgate adds, that she was directed and instructed farther, Diligere maritum, regere familiam, gubernare domum, et seipsam irreprehensibilem exhibere. Duties of the utmost importance in the conjugal state, the observance of which comprises and finishes the character of a good and accomplished wife. The direction is not unlike that of St. Paul, 1 Tim. v.

Edna also said to Tobias, The Lord of heaven restore thee, my dear brother.] i. e. Grant thee a prosperous journey, (see xi. 1.) and a safe return. And thus Calmet expounds, Que le Seigneur vous fasse heureusement arriver chez vous, which I presume is the sense of Munster's version, Mi fili, Dominus cœlorum conducat te in pace. Junius's rendering is obscure and indeterminate, Constituat te Dominus cœli. It may perhaps seem strange and unusual that Edna should call her son-in-law, brother: but this is to be considered only as an appellation of tenderness. (See more instances in note on vii. 16.)

I commit my daughter unto thee of special trust, wherefore do not entreat her evil.] Edna, the mother of Sara, consenting to part with her to Tobias, and that she should accompany him home to his house, gives him a strict charge to take great care of her, as of some important and valuable treasure committed to his trust, and to give her no occasion of uneasiness, or of complaint against him. Fagius's version adds a very moving and substantial reason for this request, nam in locum peregrinum, ubi hospita erit, ipsa proficiscitur; and that upon saying this, Sauciatum quodammodo fuit cor ejus intra eam. St. Paul has enjoined the like, where he orders husbands to love their wives, and be not bitter against them. (Col. iii. 19.) For the sorrow which bad husbands occasion their wives though ill treatment, renders them the more inexcusable in the sight of God, as the weakness of their sex calls rather for protection, and obliges them according to St. Peter, to render honour and esteem to them. (1 Pet. iii. 7.) This they have in charge, not only from the parent, who gives them away, but from God himself, whose ordinance and institution marriage is, and as he has made it an emblem of that Divine love and union which he bears to his church, will avenge all harshness and injustice, that is at any time offered in violation of it. The Alexandrian and most copies conclude this chapter with the verse succeeding, which our translation, following the Roman or Complut. makes the beginning of the next.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 3. LET us haste before thy wife, and prepare the house.] As Tobias's parents were uneasy at his long stay, and did not expect that a wife would accompany him in his return, it was seasonable advice of Raphael's, that they should go before, as well to satisfy his father and mother, and to free them from their anxious solicitude about him, as to prepare the house to the best advantage, and dispose all things for the reception of the bride, and the lodging and accommodating so many servants and cattle as came along with him, and were part of her dowry. The Vulgate makes Tobias to arrive seven days before his wife; Ingressa est etiam post septem dies Sara uxor filii ejus, et omnis familia sana, et pecora, et cameli, et pecunia multa uxoris, sed et illa pecunia quam receperat a Gabelo. The Greek takes no notice of this, but intimates rather her arrival on the same day. It seems as if there was no foundation for such a surmise; Tobias now bringing his wife home as a bride, would never be so uncomplaisant and unkind, as to leave her on the road for so long a time as seven days only to servants, and with such a great charge of money with them. It is more probable that Sara, though she did not make such haste as her husband, through the impatience of seeing his parents, and acquainting them with his success and happy change of condition, may be supposed to have done, as being fatigued with so long a journey, and unaccustomed to travel, at least so far, and hindered too by the long train of servants and cattle accompanying her, and therefore obliged often to stop and refresh herself,—notwithstanding these remoras, I say, it is more probable that she arrived happily on the evening of the same day. When it is said in our version, that they went on their way till they drew near unto Nineveh, the meaning may be, that they all went together, till they approached so near that place, as to be within a day's, or a few hours' journey of it, and that then Tobias and Raphael, seeing them so far safe, and as it were in their own neighbourhood, set forward to give notice of and prepare for their coming.

Ver. 5. Anna set looking about towards the way for her son.] Vulgate, Anna sedebat secus viam quotidie in supercilio montis. (See x. 7.) This shews her great eagerness and impatience, which is well expressed by περιβλεπομένη, and προσενόησεν, which follows, implies more than εἶδεν, viz. her seeing him at a distance, and knowing him, "vidit a longe et illico agnovit;" for as love is said to be blind upon occasion, so it is quick-sighted, ὀξυδερκὴς, in espying and discovering the beloved object. This is finely represented in the parable of the prodigal son, where the father is described as seeing him, when he was yet a great way off, and upon his approach falling on his neck, and kissing him. (Luke xv. 20.) As his mother expresses the like tenderness to Tobias, ver. 9. Horace feelingly describes the uneasiness arising from the absence of a favourite child, when he says,

"Ut mater juvenem, quem Notus invido
Flatu Carpathii trans maris æquora
Cunctantem spatio longius annuo
Dulci distinet a domo,
Votis ominibusque hunc et precibus vocat,
Curvo nec faciem littore dimovet."
(Carm. lib. iv. Od. 5.)

And it is very observable, that a learned annotator on the passage illustrates this by the very instance of Tobias and his mother. (Desprez. in loc.)

Ver. 10. Tobit also went forth towards the door, and stumbled: but his son ran unto him, Ver. 11. And took hold of his father, and he strake off the gall on his father's eyes.] Tobit's hurrying out, or, as the Vulgate has it, running to meet his son upon notice of his arrival, or probably hearing his voice, and in his haste forgetting his blindness, and stumbling at the threshold; and Tobias's running to him, not merely to pay his duty to him, but to catch hold of him to prevent his falling, and to support him while he embraced him, are circumstances extremely natural: his impatience likewise for his father's cure, whose blessing he had just received, and instantly putting the gall on his eyes, from a confidence in what Raphael assured him of its sovereign efficacy, without asking or staying for his leave, and postponing the relation of his journey and the success attending it, to administer to the help of a blind and aged father, are uncommon instances of filial tenderness.

Ver. 13. And the whiteness pilled away from the corners of his eyes; and when he saw his son, he fell upon his neck.] See Acts ix. 18. where St. Luke, the beloved physician, speaking of Saul's recovering his sight, says, that, upon Ananias's putting his hands upon him, immediately there fell from his eyes, as it had been scales, and he received sight forthwith. The Vulgate is very particular in the description of this cure: Sustinuit quasi dimidiam fere horam, et cœpit albugo ex oculis ejus, quasi membrana ovi, egredi; quam apprehendens Tobias traxit ab oculis ejus, et statim visum recepit. It is a matter of dispute, whether Tobit recovered his sight by the natural effect of the medicine, or by a miracle. Many assert the cure to be purely natural. It does not appear that Tobit's eyes were hurt inwardly, or that the pupil or optic nerve was damaged, or the humours any way altered: the accident is supposed to consist in a white speck, pearl, or film, that was formed on the cornea, or the outward coat of the eye (through an inflammation arising from the dung of swallows, which is of a hot and caustic quality), which hindering the rays of light from falling on the retina, suspended the use of that organ. Now the gall of some fishes being very good, say they, against distempers in the eyes, and especially to remove whiteness or pearls in them, in the opinion of many naturalists and physicians, there is no necessity to have recourse to a miracle to account for this cure, as the gall of this might have that virtue: indeed there is an objection as to the time, it being scarcely possible that the gall of any fish should naturally produce such an effect in about half an hour, the time assigned by the Vulgate. But if we consider that the prescription was communicated by the angel Raphael, who taught Tobias the virtue of the remedy, and the method of applying it, unknown, perhaps, before; if it be not miraculous on that account, it may at least intimate, that some supernatural power or blessing went along with the use of the natural means, and principally effected the cure; as the mere washing in the pool did not of itself cure the impotent, but the angel that attended and first troubled the waters. (John v. 4.) There is an instance of as great a cure, and mentioned to be founded on this of Tobit's, recorded by Gregory of Tours, concerning his own father: "Florentius redivivo calore captatus est, accenditur febris, intumescunt pedes, dolor pessimus intorquet: perendinata pestis hominem contriverat, jam pene conclamatus jacebat. Interea puer (filius Gregorius Turon.) vidit iterum in somno personam, sese, utrumne librum Tobiæ cognitum haberet, interrogantem. Respondit, Nequaquam. Qui ait, Noveris hunc fuisse cæcum, atque per filium ex jecore piscis, angelo comitante, curatum. Tu ergo fac similiter, et salvabitur genitor tuus. Hæc ille matri retulit, quæ confestim pueros ad amnem direxit: piscis capitur, quæ de extis jussa fuerant, prunis imponuntur; non fefellit virum eventus, ut enim primo fumus odoris in naribus patris reflavit, protinus omnis ille tumor, dolorque recessit." (De Gloria Confess. cap. 40.) If this has the appearance of the marvellous in it, yet doubtless the relation of a son, and of such a son, concerning his own father, deserves some credit; and as it is grounded manifestly on the history of Tobit, it is no small testimony of the reality and worth of it. And perhaps his design, as well as that of the writer of Tobit, might be to advance the belief of angelic visions and communications with good and holy men.

Ver. 18. And Achiacharus, and Nasbas his brother's son came.] Ὁ ἐξάδελφος αὐτοῦ. Drusius thinks the true reading is, οἱ ἐξάδελφοι αὐτοῦ, from the authority, I presume, of the Vulgate, which has venerunt Achior et Nabath consobrini Tobiæ. Grotius's conjecture seems preferable, ὁ καὶ Νασβᾶς, i. e. he who was called also Nasbas; for it was not unusual for a person to have two names, especially in a time of captivity. It is certain that Achiacharus was ἐξάδελφος αὐτοῦ, Tobit's brother's son, i. e. his brother Anael's son, i. 21. and it appears from the singular number here being used, that only one person is spoken of. Junius is of the same opinion, as the margin acquaints us.

Ver. 19. And Tobias's wedding was kept seven days with great joy.] It is improperly here called γάμος, which was celebrated at Raguel's house fourteen days, (viii. 19.) This rather refers to the τὰ ἐπαύλια, or, as the Latins term it, repotia, an entertainment made at the bride's return, or bringing home. It is no wonder that the wedding was kept with uncommon joy, considering the advantage arising to Tobias by marrying such an heiress, and the many concurring agreeable circumstances which fell out at this time—as, his son's safe return, his receiving the ten talents by him, and, which was of greater consequence, and more acceptable to him, the recovery of his sight at his age, after being deprived of it eight years, (xiv. 2.) As weddings were attended with extraordinary demonstrations of joy, the Hebrew word, which signifies a wedding, is sometimes rendered by the LXX. δοχὴ, a banquet, (Gen. xxvi. 30. Esth. i. 3. v. 4. 8. 12. 14.) sometimes a feast, and once χαρὰ, joy itself. (Esth. ix. 17.) And in the gospel the partaking of the marriage-feast, or supper, is called entering into the joy of the Lord. The wedding-house was called Beth-Hillula, the house of praise, and the marriage-song, Hillalim, praises. And so Psal. lxxviii. 63. the words, Their maidens were not given to marriage, are by the Chaldee paraphrase rendered, are not celebrated with epithalamiums, and by Aquila, οὐχ ὑμνήθησαν.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 3. FOR he hath brought me again to thee in safety, and made whole my wife, and brought me the money, and likewise healed thee.] The Vulgate reckons up seven good offices which Raphael brought to pass:—1. Carrying Tobias into Media, and reconducting him safely. 2. Providing him with a good and virtuous wife. 3. Chasing away the evil spirit Asmodeus, and preventing his hurting Tobias. 4. Occasioning great joy to the parents on both sides. 5. Delivering Tobias from the jaws of the great voracious fish. 6. Restoring sight to Tobit. 7. Instructing Tobias by wise counsels, and enriching him with things spiritual. The extraordinary care which the angel Raphael took of the person under his guidance and direction, is generally understood as a figure of the invisible care which the angels take of good men, and as a pattern of the zeal and diligence wherewith the ministers of God ought to watch over the souls committed to their charge.

Ver. 5. So he called the angel, and he said unto him, Take half of all that ye have brought, and go away in safety. Ver. 6. Then he took them both apart, and said unto them, Bless God, and praise him for the things which he hath done unto you in the sight of all that live.] Tobit would have acted like a just man in paying only the wages at first agreed on, viz. a drachm or two drachms a day; but as Tobias was thoroughly convinced that he could not do too much to recompense the services done him by Raphael, he moves his father for a much greater allowance; and he could not certainly testify his acknowledgment in a more generous manner, than in offering him the half of what they had brought back, and he had been chiefly instrumental in procuring, and to divide the inheritance with him like a brother. After this great offer made him, both by father and son, he immediately takes the opportunity privately to make himself known to them, and to acquaint them that he had no occasion for any part of their substance; that he was pleased with this proof of their gratitude, and the sense they had of the great mercies shewed them, but that the acknowledgment and praise were due only to that great God which sent him, who hath power over unclean spirits, can give sight to the blind, and bring about the great purposes of his will by means seemingly the most unlikely and improbable.

Ver. 7. It is good to keep close the secrets of a king; but it is honourable to reveal the works of God.] The counsels of princes should be inviolable and impenetrable, and the secrets of the soul locked up both in themselves and ministers; without this caution their enemies will have a great advantage against them, and the wisest and best-concerted schemes will fail of success. Where the great affairs which pass in the cabinets of princes are suffered to transpire, and get abroad through weakness or treachery, in vain does the politician lay schemes, or the general receive orders; foreign courts soon get the intelligence, and the design proves abortive. The emperor Tiberius, being asked why he was so reserved and cautious in consulting with friends in matters of importance relating to the state, wisely answered,—"That a prince's mind should be known to none, or but a very few; for the generality of persons consulted with had not the gift of secrecy, and could not refrain talking of what was under agitation, whereby a prince was disappointed of his aims, and his counsels frustrated." (Dio in Tiber.) Nor was Metellus's answer to an inquisitive friend less to be admired: "I would burn my very shirt, if I thought it was privy to what passed in my breast." (Pliny, cap. 61. de Viris illustr.) But the works of God, the more they are made manifest and revealed, the more they promote his honour and glory. Neither the malice, power, nor evil designs, of men can frustrate his intentions. He would not be jealous or uneasy lest any should discover his designs, or penetrate into his views, even though the human spirit was capable of entering into and searching the deep things of God. He rather encourages a modest inquiry into his works; and the more they are understood the more they proclaim his glory, and call for a larger tribute of praise and thanksgiving. And accordingly the saints, both of the Old and New Testament, as Moses, Deborah, David, Hezekiah, Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist, devout old Simeon, and the blessed Virgin herself, have left behind them eternal monuments of their praise and acknowledgment, in the exalted songs composed by them. In ver. 11. following, this apophthegm, It is good to keep close the secrets of a king, but honourable to reveal the works of God, is repeated. If it was there enclosed in a parenthesis, the sense would be better connected. It is observable that the Vulgate, Syriac, and Munster's version omit it in that place.

Do that which is good, and no evil shall touch you.] The sentiment is somewhat like that of St. Paul, We know that all things work together for good to them that love God. (Rom. viii. 28.) To the same purpose the wise son of Sirach, There shall no evil happen to him that feareth the Lord. (Ecclus. xxxiii. 1.) Tully comes near these writers, when he says, "Nunquam viro bono quicquam mali evenire potest, nec vivo, nec mortuo; nec unqnam ejus res a Diis immortalibus negliguntur."

Ver. 8. Prayer is good with fasting, and alms, and righteousness.] Not that prayer is indifferent or unavailable without fasting and alms, but the meaning is, that prayer is better, or more prevalent, when joined with the other. St. Austin says, that fasting and alms are like two wings to prayer, wafting it up to heaven. Our Saviour joins all three together, Matt. vi. as duties equally to be observed, and helping one another. Δικαιοσύνη, or righteousness, seems to have come in here, either from the following sentence or from the margin; it is omitted by St. Cyprian and other fathers quoting this passage. Ἐλεημοσύνη and δικαιοσύνη, are often in the Greek exegetically put, the one to expound the other, and so we find it in this and the following verse: but in the Hebrew there is but one word for both. Thus in that known place of Dan. iv. 27. where the Vulgate reads, Peccata tua eleemosynis redime, et iniquitates tuas misericordiis pauperum (and the rendering of the LXX. is in the same manner), our version, following the Hebrew, has, Break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by shewing mercy to the poor. And so in the Syriac and Arabic translation of the New Testament, alms is expressed by a word signifying righteousness; and the Latin interpreter renders it by justitia. See also Matt. vi. 1. where the Vulgate has, "Attendite ne justitiam vestram faciatis coram hominibus;" Take heed that you do not your righteousness, i. e. alms, before men; and some Greek copies favour this rendering. For this acceptation of righteousness, see Psal. xxxvii. 21. 25, 26. cxii. 6. Prov. x. 2. xi. 4. xxi. 26. and Mede's Works, b. i. disc. 22.

Ver. 9. For alms doth deliver from death, and shall purge away all sin: those that exercise alms and righteousness, shall be filled with life.] Though life eternal is not mentioned, yet it is here meant, and is the true sense of the passage. The Vulgate accordingly expresses it, Facit invenire misericordiam et vitam æternam. Alms certainly are not a natural means to procure a long and happy life, though God, by blessing the charitable man, is pleased often so to order it. Tobit himself is an instance of the poverty to which those are sometimes reduced, who shew most zeal in exercising works of charity. The verse following confirms this sense, They that sin are enemies to their own life, i. e. they bring upon themselves death and destruction; or, they expose themselves to eternal misery. If we understand this of the natural term of life only, or of the certain happiness of it, the observation is not just, as the wicked and undeserving often enjoy a longer and more prosperous state of life than the righteous; as the Psalmist and holy prophets frequently complain in their writings, and even expostulate with God upon the occasion. When it is here said, that alms shall purge away all sin, we are not to understand these words in so extensive and absolute a sense, as if they implied, that charity shall purge away or cover all manner of sins and transgressions, how gross and heinous soever, but in such a limited sense, as that passage, 1 Pet. iv. 8. is generally interpreted, Charity shall cover the multitude of sins; i. e. it shall cover many lesser failings and neglects, many sins of infirmity, surprise, and daily incursion, which are properly enough for their number styled the multitude of sins. Solomon has the like observation, expressed almost in the same words, That by mercy and truth iniquity is purged: (Prov. xvi. 6.) and the son of Sirach explains the great efficacy of charity, by a very apt comparison, As water quencheth flaming fire, so alms maketh an atonement for sins, Ecclus. iii. 30. (See also Dan. iv. 27.)

Ver. 12. When thou didst pray, I did bring the remembrance of your prayers before the Holy One.] The notion that the angels, as ministers of God, presented to him the supplications of mankind, was very ancient; the heathens themselves thought, that the office of angels was to serve as messengers between the gods and men, to present to the former the prayers and sacrifices of men, and to bring back to them orders from above, and to return the fruits of their petitions. The Platonists in particular held, that demons, or angels, were of a middle nature betwixt gods and mortals, that they brought our prayers and offerings to them, and their commands to us. (Plato in Convivio.) "Inter homines (says Apuleius) cœlicolasque vectores hinc precum, inde donorum, qui ultro citro portant hinc petitiones, inde suppetias, ceu quidam utriusque interpretes et salutigeri." (De Deo Socrat.) So Lucian describes Mercury as attending upon Jupiter for the like purpose, τῷ Διὶ παρεστάναι, καὶ διαφέρειν τὰς ἀγγελίας, τὰς παρ' αὐτοῦ, ἄνω καὶ κάτω. Philo gives us the sentiments of his nation on this subject, describing them as messengers of good things from God to his creatures, and carrying back to God their exigencies and wants. (De Gigant.) Indeed all among the Jews, except the Sadducees, embraced this notion, and from this opinion probably sprung that θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων, or worship of angels, condemned by St. Paul, Col. ii. 18. And not only the fathers, but even the Scriptures seem to represent the angels as thus commissioned and employed. When Gabriel tells Zachariah that his prayer was heard, (Luke i. 13.) and the angel Cornelius that his prayers and alms were come up for a memorial before God, it seems no improbable conclusion that they have some knowledge at least of the success of the prayers of the saints. But St. John's vision, if we may argue from thence, and the angel there mentioned was indeed one merely of their order, most strongly countenances what Raphael here mentions of himself: I saw another angel standing at the altar, having a golden censer, and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne. And the smoke of the incense which came with the prayers of the saints ascended up before God out of the angel's hand. (Rev. viii. 3, 4.)

Ver. 13. And when thou didst not delay to rise up, and leave thy dinner, to go and cover the dead, thy good deed was not hid from me; but I was with thee.] Something farther must be contained in these words than what is expressed, or else the sense will be the same with the end of the foregoing verse. St. Cyprian (de Mortalitate) reads, Quia non es cunctatus derelinquere prandium tuum, abiisti, et condidisti mortuum, missus sum tentare te. The Vulgate renders in like manner, or rather more fully, Quando mortuos abscondebas per diem in domo tua, et nocte sepeliebas eos, ego obtuli orationem tuam Domino; et quia acceptus eras Deo, necesse fuit ut probatio tentaret te. Munster reads yet more explicitly, Because of your good deeds in burying the dead, therefore God has tried you by this blindness, for so God chooses to prove his faithful servants. The Syriac version is to the same purpose. What makes this interpretation the more probable is, that after the mention of Tobit's great zeal in burying the dead, (ii. 7, 8.) immediately follows the account of his blindness, as if by the infliction of it a farther proof was required from him of his faith and patience under afflictions. And it should seem from the context, that his blindness was not by mere accident, but by God's order and appointment, and perhaps through the ministry, and by the hand of this very angel. This interpretation, at least, has some countenance from the beginning of the next verse.

Ver. 14. And now God hath sent me to heal thee, and Sara thy daughter-in-law.] i. e. God having visited you with blindness, hath sent me now to restore you; or, having proved you by this great affliction of blindness, and found you perfect, has sent me again to heal you; for so St. Cyprian reads the passage, Iterum me misit Deus curare te, as if the copy he used had καὶ πάλιν instead of καὶ νῦν, the present reading. With respect to Sara's cure, the Vulgate is very explicit, Ut Saram uxorem filii tui a dæmonio liberarem.

Ver. 15. I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before the glory of the Holy One.] This expression, like that Matt. xviii. 10. seems only to signify their intimacy in the court of heaven, and their attendance upon God, as his retinue, servants, or messengers, to do his pleasure. Munster's Hebrew copy makes no mention of seven angels. Some interpreters maintain, that we are not to understand the passage of seven distinct angels precisely, but that seven is put for an indefinite number, as in some places of Holy Scripture. For it is certain, that there are infinitely more than seven angels before the throne of God. In Dan. vii. 10. Rev. v. 11. mention is made of thousand thousands ministering unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand standing before him. Others are of opinion, that there are seven principal angels, the most exalted, most glorious, and chief of the heavenly host, that hold the first rank in the hierarchy of angels, and are as princes in the court of the sovereign Lord of the universe. That some angels were under the command of others, seems probable from Zech. ii. 3. The Jews have an ancient tradition, that there are seven principal angels, which minister before the throne of God, and are therefore called archangels, some of whose names we have in Scripture; as Michael, whom Daniel styles one of the chief princes, x. 3. Gabriel, ix. 21. Luke i. 19. here we have Raphael, and 2 Esd. iv. 36. mention is made of Uriel, or, as others read, Jeremiel, the archangel. Clemens Alexandrinus says expressly, ἑπτά μέν εἰσιν οἱ τὴν μεγίστην δύναμιν ἔχοντες, πρωτόγονοι ἀγγέλων ἄρχοντες, i. e. Principes primarii, seu primogeniti angelorum principes. There are several passages in the book of Revelation, which seem to confirm this tradition, i. 4. iv. 5. v. 6. but the most express is, viii. 2. I saw the seven angels, οἳ ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ ἑστήκασι, an expression very much resembling this of Tobit, I am Raphael, one of the seven angels which stand and minister before the Holy Blessed One, i. e. God. For this, according to a very learned writer, is the true rendering. The Greek indeed hath, οἳ προσαναφέρουσι τὰς προσευχὰς τῶν ἁγίων, κ. τ. λ. but neither St. Jerome, who translated it out of the Chaldee, nor Fagius's ancient Hebrew copy, perhaps translated from the same Chaldee original, hath any such reading; and therefore it seems an addition or liberty of the Greek translator, who thought their ministry to consist in presenting the prayers of the saints, and translated accordingly. (Mede's Works, disc. 10.) The notion of seven supreme angels, Grotius conceives to be drawn from the seven chief princes of the Persian empire: and indeed the number seven has given rise to some other conjectures—as, that they have the charge over the seven principal parts of the world, as some are pleased to divide it; that they preside over the seven planets, and direct the influences of them, &c. which are speculations rather curious than useful. One of the considerable objections against the authority of this book is, the representing the angel Raphael here, as offering up the prayers of the saints before the throne of God, which has been thought an invasion upon Christ's mediatorial office: but if we allow guardian angels, that they pass from heaven to earth, and from earth to heaven, and make a report of their charge to the Deity, as our Saviour's own words seem to intimate, the passage may then be defended, so that we attribute to the angels such offering of the prayers of good men, as is merely ἱστορικὴ, not ἱλαστικὴ.

Ver. 16. Then they were both troubled, and fell upon their faces, for they feared. Ver. 17. But he said unto them, Fear not, for it shall go well with you.] It is easy to imagine their fright upon hearing so surprising a relation, and probably seeing, upon their eyes being opened and rightly disposed, that he, whom they had hitherto took for a man, and had entertained as a hireling, was a quite different sort of being, and that it was an angel of God whom they had so long conversed with. Upon this discovery, the text says that they fell on their faces; and no wonder that they were so affected, as it was an opinion among the Jews in those days, that if they saw apparently an inhabitant of the other world, he came to call them away from this; as appears fully from the story of Manoah and his wife, Judg. xiii. 22. (See also Gen. xxxii. 30. Exod. xxxiii. 20.) But the angel comforts them, by bidding them fear no harm, or, as others explain it, by wishing them all manner of happiness; as another does Gideon, who cried, Alas, O Lord God, for I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face; by saying, Peace be unto thee, fear not, thou shalt not die. (Judg. vi. 23.) It is an observation of some of the fathers, that good angels comfort those in the event, whom at first they frightened by their appearance; but evil angels, on the contrary, fill those with horror and trouble whom they appear to.

Ver. 18. For not of any favour of mine, but by the will of our God I came; wherefore praise him for ever.] The notion of angels presenting prayers to God, has given rise to the invocation of them, (see Chemnit. Exam. p. 3. de Sanc. Invoc.) and, amongst other passages, the foregoing verse is brought to countenance this error. But what Raphael here says of himself, that he came not out of any favour of his own, but by the will of God, the God of angels and of men, who sent him on this commission, seems to destroy what has been wrongfully built upon it. For though he mentions his high dignity and office, at the same time he acknowledges himself but a servant; that the commission he was now executing was not by his own choice; neither his affection nor power had any concern or direction in it, but God's good pleasure. He seems to guard against their paying him any tribute of religious thanks, as being only a messenger in the court of heaven, and by directing them to praise God only for the mercies received; not unlike that exhortation to St. John, who fell down to worship before the feet of the angel, Worship God, Rev. xxii. 8, 9. It may be presumed, indeed, that, in that state of blessedness which they enjoy in the heavenly Jerusalem, from which we are at a great distance, these loving spirits look upon us favourably, as persons travelling thither; that they are touched with a concern and compassion for us, and, by the will and appointment of God, aid and assist us in our return towards our common country, that we may be blessed and happy with them in the communion of the saints triumphant; but we are no where warranted to pray to them to conduct us thither. Thus St. Austin, "Attendunt nos peregrinos, et miserentur nos, et jussu Domini auxiliantur nobis, ut ad illam patriam communem aliquando redeamus, et ibi cum illis fonte Dominico veritatis et æternitatis aliquando saturemur." (In Psal. lxxii.)

Ver. 19. All those days I did appear unto you, but I did neither eat nor drink, but you did see a vision.] The Geneva version seems preferable, I did neither eat nor drink, but you saw it in vision. The Vulgate here renders, Videbar vobiscum manducare et bibere, sed ego cibo invisibili et potu, qui ab hominibus videri non potest, utor. See Gen. xviii. 8. xix. 3. where, though the text says of the angels, which were guests unto Abraham and Lot, that they did eat, that must be, and is generally understood by interpreters to be done only seemingly, or in appearance. And thus also some would understand Luke xxiv. 43. ἐνώπιον αὐτῶν ἔφαγεν, but it seems most probable, that our Saviour did really eat before them after his resurrection, to prove to them that his body was truly raised, and that he was not a phantom or spirit. St. Austin indeed says, "That we ought not to believe that angels eat only in appearance, when we read of their being entertained hospitably; though it may be true that men are often deceived in supposing them to eat out of necessity, like themselves, as Tobias was in supposing Raphael to eat through necessity like others, and for the support and nourishment of his body. The bodies of the just, when they shall be raised, will have no need of bodily nourishment, as they will have no hunger nor thirst, and though they may have the power to eat, yet will they not be forced to it by any necessity. After this sort we are to conceive of angels eating, when at any time they have appeared under the sensible and visible figure of a human body; not that they then eat through any necessity or want, but because they chose to do it to familiarize and ingratiate themselves with those for whose service God sent them. The difference between them and mortals in this respect (continues he) may be exemplified by water drawn up and exhaled by the sun, or sucked in by the parched and thirsty earth; the former does it wholly by his power, the latter through necessity and the want of such a refreshment, aliter absorbet terra aquam sitiens, aliter solis radius candens; illa indigentia, ista potentia." (Epist. 99.) But this explanation will not prove the point it was brought to illustrate: for if by eating we understand either the putting meat into the mouth, chewing it, and its going into the stomach, or else the nourishing and turning into the substance of the body what is eaten; in either of these senses, it is certain angels do not really eat, for it is inconceivable how they can perform the first, as what they assume is only an aerial appearance of a body, not gross or carnal, or having any parts proper for mastication or digestion. Secondly, Allowing that angels have no occasion for nourishment, as they perceive no decay of their substance, nor want to repair their strength, as bodies do, through the loss by exercise and perspiration, yet, upon the supposition that they eat, what becomes, it may be asked, of the viands which they partake of? Calmet therefore, as if sensible of these objections, supposes Raphael to make, what he seemingly carries to his mouth, to vanish in an instant, and to disappear to the eyes of all present. And, indeed, though it may with some carry the suspicious air of legerdemain, yet how shall we account for what the Scripture affirms on this occasion, without supposing some deceptio visus, or illusion on the senses?

Ver. 20. Write all things which are done in a book.] It is commonly believed, that Tobit and Tobias wrote their own history. This opinion is principally founded upon the angel's commanding them to write all things that were done in a book. In the Vulgate it is only, Narrate omnia mirabilia ejus; but in the Hebrew, Greek, and the older Latin version it is, Ye shall write, &c. A second argument is, because in the Greek, Syriac, and Hebrew copies, they speak of themselves, αὐτοπροσώπως, or in the first person. (See Du Pin's Prelim. Dissert. p. 120.) Huetius thinks the twelve first chapters were wrote by Tobit the father; the whole thirteenth chapter and part of the fourteenth, all but the last two verses, by Tobias the son; and that these, as mentioning his death, were added by some uncertain author, probably one of the family. (Demonstr. Evangel. prop. 4.) After this eclaircissement and explanation, the ordering what passed to be noted in a book, was doubtless to advance and propagate the belief of angelical visions and communications with holy men, according to the received Jewish notions; as what follows in the remainder of the chapter, of future glorious times and of the last and most distinguished state of the church in the new Jerusalem, built as of God with precious stones, was to comfort the afflicted and persecuted Jews, with a prospect of the approaching ruin of their persecutors, and their certain deliverance and exaltation.

Ver. 22. Then they confessed the great and wonderful works of God, and how the angel of the Lord had appeared unto them.] The rendering of the Vulgate here is very observable; Tunc prostrati per horas tres in faciem benedixerunt Deum. I shall conclude this chapter with a fine reflection from the Port-Royal comment, upon the devout behaviour of these persons for mercies purely temporal: "How ought the consideration of this to affect such who know and are persuaded that not one particular angel, but the Lord of all those blessed spirits, hath conversed with them, not for the space of a few months, but for thirty-three years; and during all that time laboured by the example of his life, words, and sufferings, not to cure one or two particular persons only, but to save a lost world! How great ought their tribute of thanksgiving to be, and with what prostration of soul and body should they appear before his throne, from a sense of the far greater things done for them; when they consider this surprising mystery, this most exalted instance of love and philanthropy, God emptying himself of his majesty for the redemption of his creatures!" (Com. in loc.)

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 2. FOR he doth scourge, and hath mercy, he leadeth down to hell, and bringeth up again.] We meet with the like sentiment, Wisd. xvi. 13. Thou hast power of life and death, thou leadest to the gates of hell, and bringest up again. The expression in both places seems to be taken from 1 Sam. ii. 6. The Lord killeth, and maketh alive: he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. "What consolation do these words administer to one of sound faith; and how refreshing is it to the afflicted servants of God, to be assured that the chastisement by which he proves their virtue tendeth to their good, and will end happily at the last! To murmur at God's dispensations is a sure mark of a weak faith, since the same hand that leadeth down to the gates of death, is as mighty to save, and to bring from thence him that is ready to perish. A consideration that should induce us under all afflictions to cast our care upon him who careth for us." (Port-Royal com. in loc.) This prayer of Tobit's, in which he foretells not only what should happen to Israel, and to the holy temple at Jerusalem, but also the future triumphant state of God's church, was probably inserted by his son Tobias, who, from the beginning of this chapter, continues the history to the two last verses. Munster's Hebrew copy has at the entrance of it, In tempore illo scripsit Tobias omnes sermones istos cum gaudio, dixitque Tobias, benedictus Dominus, &c.

Ver. 3. Confess him before the gentiles, ye children of Israel, for he hath scattered us among them.] The Jews were carried away from their own land by Shalmaneser and Tiglath-Pilcser, kings of Assyria, and dispersed in all the provinces of the kingdom of Babylon, (Esth. iii. 8.) and through various parts of the east; this was done, says the Vulgate, that they might publish the wonderful works of God in the land of their captivity, and convince the heathen, "Quia non est alius Deus omnipotens præter eum." As the wisdom of God knows how to raise his own glory from events seemingly indifferent, so the captivity of the Israelites contribute to spread his honour among the nations in several respects. First, They were, or might be, convinced of the power and justice of God, in that they saw almost an entire nation delivered over to captivity, and reduced to a state of slavery and bondage, as a punishment for their sins, even by the confession of the captives themselves. Secondly, Hereby the law of the Lord, the Scriptures his word, and the prophecies contained in them, were spread and propagated through all Asia, which would one day dispose that people to know and return to the Lord God, and embrace his true worship: which was the more probable, as many of the captives were likewise persons of great note and authority. (See i. 13. 21, 22.) And that they wanted neither care nor diligence to improve every opportunity to recommend their religion, we may learn from the books of Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. Thirdly, God wrought special miracles in favour of his people, in countries where his name was unknown, in order to affect the minds and senses of the heathen, and to render them inexcusable in their excesses, which were so many witnesses and arguments in behalf of true religion against error and idolatry. Fourthly, The Almighty, in thus dispersing his chosen people, thereby fulfilled the prophecies which he had pronounced by the mouth of many of his prophets, that he would thus deal with them if they persisted in their iniquities. (See also Joseph. Antiq. lib. viii. 2.) Lastly, The firm attachment of the prophets, Ezekiel and Daniel, to the law of their God, and the solid piety of Tobit, Mordecai, Esther, the companions of Daniel, and many others, in their captivity, as it did credit to their religion, so was it as signal a rebuke, and a public condemnation, of the reigning vices of the Assyrians and Babylonians.

Ver. 6. Therefore see what he will do for you.] The Vulgate has, Aspicite ergo, quæ fecit nobiscum; to which agrees the Syriac. The Greek, καὶ θεάσασθε ἃ ποιήσει μεθ' ὑμῶν, sed contemplabimini quæ facturus est erga vos; i. e. If you turn to him with your whole heart, then will he turn to you, and ye shall see what great things he will do for you. Fagius's Hebrew copy has, Adeo ut demiremini multitudinem miraculorum, et rerum mirabilium quas faciet vobiscum; μεθ' ὑμῶν may mean, Ye shall see what he will do with you; i. e. he will shew his power in gathering you out of all nations, and bring you back to your own country. Our version here is flat, and wants the spirit of the other. That of Geneva is preferable, If you deal uprightly before him, he will not hide his face from you, and ye shall hear what he will do with you.

In the land of my captivity do I praise him, and declare his might and majesty to a sinful nation.] Whom are we to understand by a sinful nation, either the Israelites or Assyrians? The Vulgate seems to point out the Israelites, now captives on account of their sins. According to this acceptation, Tobit blesses God, and magnifies his justice and power, not for favours to, but his chastisement of, an ungrateful people, laden with iniquity, who had rendered themselves unworthy of his mercy. Herein Tobit acted agreeably to the character of the true servants of God, who bless him even in and for the afflictions he is pleased to visit them with, and acknowledge the justice of his conduct towards them, though he distinguishes not between them and sinners by any particular exemption. If they are fellow-sufferers with the ungodly in any national calamity, they are not so conceited of their own righteousness, as to complain of any hard lot, or to think that their innocence ought to have protected them from sharing the common fate with the rest. As applied to the Assyrians, the meaning either is, That he took a pleasure to publish the noble acts of the Lord, and to shew forth all his praise, amidst that idolatrous people with whom he was in bondage; or he here refers in particular to that signal overthrow of the Assyrians some few years before, when the angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred fourscore and five thousand; (2 Kings xix. 35.) an event, in which the Divine Majesty and Omnipotence most conspicuously appeared, by the uncommon vengeance taken on that sinful nation. Or Tobit may be considered as speaking here prophetically, as he does in several parts of this hymn, regarding the future as if it was the time past, and foreseeing that which would come to pass a long time after, when God, taking pity upon his people, shall cause them to return to their own land. He blesses God even in his captivity, as if the restoration was already accomplished, and, anticipating his mercy, blesses God for the greatness of it. See Lee's Dissert. on the second book of Esdr. who makes the two last chapters to be both prophetical and cabalistical, p. 21. and observes farther, that there is such an agreement in several particulars between the two last chapters of Tobit, and the two last of the Revelation, (chap. xiii. xiv. to the end, and xiv. 5—8. comp. Rev. xxi. 10. to the end, and xxii. 10. to the end, and xxii. 3—6.) as it is not easy to know which hath been taken from the other, or alludeth to the other, p. 64.

Ver. 10. Praise the everlasting King, that his tabernacle may be builded in thee again with joy.] If this is to be understood literally of the destruction of the city and temple, as all the interpreters expound it, it must refer to that in the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, when Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came up against Jerusalem, and took it, and burnt it with the temple. (2 Kings xxv.) Now this did not happen till above a hundred years after the history here related: to prevent, therefore, so great an anachronism, it will be more consistent to understand Tobit here as speaking prophetically, that the ruin of the house and kingdom of David should precede the coming of the Messias, but that the breaches thereof should be repaired and built again at his coming. The captivity of Zedekiah by the Chaldeans perfected the fall of David's kingdom, which could not rise before the return from that captivity, and was to rise, as seems to be implied, before a new captivity began. But after the Babylonian captivity was over, none of David's race was of any great account: this, therefore, most probably relates to the days of the Messias; and the meaning seems to be, That God would restore the kingdom to the house and family of David in the person of the Messiah, and recover that family, which, for several years before his coming, was reduced to a mean and obscure condition, (Micah v. 2. Luke i. 48.) to its ancient splendour and dignity. Tobit here seems to refer to Amos ix. 11. In that day I will raise up the tabernacle of David which is fallen down; and, keeping to the metaphor of a tabernacle or building, prays, that God would raise up this tabernacle or building, and close up the breaches of it; that at a certain future time he would again exalt David's kingdom, which, for awhile, had lain in a desolate and forsaken condition; or, in other words, he prays for or foretells the happy days of the Messiah, when, the time of that age they were then under being fulfilled, the miserable and captive Jews, whose condition answered to the ruinous materials in the prophet, will have great reason to rejoice in the blessed change, (see Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 175, &c.) and that the accomplishment of this long-wished-for event, viz. another and more complete return, than that from Babylon, made a part of their prayer, whilst the sacrifice was consuming. (See 2 Macc. i. 26, 27. 29. ii. 17, 18.)

Ver. 11. Many nations shall come from far to the name of the Lord, with gifts in their hands, even gifts to the King of heaven.] This relates to the calling of the gentiles, as does xiv. 7. who shall embrace the true religion, that of Jesus Christ, as should seem from the mention of gifts, by way of homage, which probably has a distant glance at the offering of the wise men, Matt. ii. 11. Or thus, God shall call the gentiles to enter into covenant with him, and make those of them that shall be called by his name to become his people and possession, (see Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 112.) and to be part of the restored kingdom of David, to supply the many families that were lost from his heritage, and the place of the ten tribes that fell off first from David's kingdom, and of many of the two tribes that never returned from their dispersion. This Amos expresses by the remnant of Edom and of all the heathen being possessed by the Lord, and called by his name, Amos ix. 12. It is very observable, that in Fagius's Hebrew copy, the very words of Psal. lxxii. 10. to which likewise Tobit may probably allude, are inserted at length. Calmet understands this, as connected with the two foregoing verses, of the great respect paid to the holy city after the captivity by the greatest princes of the world, Cyrus, Darius, Artaxerxes, Alexander the Great, the kings of Egypt and Syria, and even some of the Roman emperors testified their value for it and the temple, by great presents and offerings sent thither; that since the establishment of Christianity, the great regard for this holy place has not diminished; many emperors and kings have contributed to enlarge its beauty or privileges, and have prided themselves in being styled its protectors. Hence the several crusades and holy wars which catholics have engaged in, to rescue the holy land from the possession and profanation of infidels: hence those many voyages and pilgrimages, which Christians of all ranks have taken, merely to have the pleasure to see that holy city which Jesus Christ honoured with his presence and miracles: hence the great care to preserve its venerable remains, and to consecrate even the very dust; (see August. de Civit. Dei, lib. xxii. cap. 8.) but the first sense is most natural.

Ver. 16. For Jerusalem shall be built up with sapphires, and emeralds, and precious stone: thy walls, and towers, and battlements, of pure gold.] Tobit having prefigured, under the image of rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem after the captivity, the far more glorious establishment of the Christian church, immediately passes on to the description of the new and heavenly Jerusalem, or the church triumphant above. The magnificence and pompousness of the expressions leave no room to doubt that this is not to be understood literally, but of that spiritual building, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. (Eph. ii. 20.) This description very much resembles that, Rev. xxi. 10. 18. 23. of the new Jerusalem, so called to distinguish it from the earthly city of that name, and is there described as coming down from God, and adorned with all those gifts and graces which can render it glorious and durable, which are metaphorically represented under the figure of a solid, four-square, and beautiful structure, consisting all of gold and precious stones; having the glory of God upon it, and appearing with so remarkable a difference, that as that to the Israelites was like devouring fire, terrible to behold; this should have nothing of terror in it, but only a pleasing, delightful splendour, like unto that of the most beautiful jasper, clear as crystal, whose glory and lustre should be so constant, as not to need either the sun or moon to enlighten the said city. To this the writer to the Hebrews probably refers in those words, τὴν τοὺς θεμελίους ἔχουσαν πόλιν, (Heb. xi. 10.) i. e. the city which hath THE foundations, or the new Jerusalem, the foundations of whose walls were garnished with all manner of precious stones. Plato seems to have borrowed these figures, when he sets forth the beauty and felicity of the paradisiacal earth, by the stones of several colours and brightness which it abounded with: "In this pure earth (which he supposes to be quite different, as well as far removed from this of ours), the true light is always to be seen, and the appearance admirable and surprising; all things there shine with the glistering lustre of gold, jaspers, sapphires, and emeralds, and those that inhabit it enjoy a long life, free from accidents or afflictions." (In Phæd.) Who does not discern the style of the prophets in this passage, or can any way doubt that this notion of his was borrowed from their lofty description of the glorious Jerusalem, and that the names of the precious stones are particularly taken from Isa. liv. 11—13. where God promises to lay the foundations of his future church in the latter times with sapphires, and all her borders with pleasant stones; or from Ezek. xxviii. 13. where the glory of Eden is represented by the plenty and joint lustre of gems of various kinds? From these fine images of the prophets, which Tobit adopts into this hymn, he encourages his nation in the hopes and expectation of the Messias, when great shall be the peace of the once afflicted children. (See Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 52.) St. Austin alluding to and charmed with this glorious description, in pious rapture breaks forth, "Felix anima mea, semperque felix in sæcula, si intueri meruero gloriam tuam, beatitudinem tuam, pulchritudinem tuam, portas, et muros, et plateas tuas, et mansiones tuas multas, nobilissimos cives tuos, et fortissimum regem tuum in decore suo. Muri namque tui ex lapidibus pretiosis, portæ tuæ ex margaritis optimis, plateæ tuæ ex auro purissimo: in quibus jucundum alleluja sine intermissione concinitur: mansiones tuæ multæ quadratis lapidibus fundatæ, sapphiris constructæ, laterculis coopertæ aureis. In quas nullus ingreditur nisi mundus, nullus habitat inquinatus." (Medit. cap. 25.)

Ver. 18. And all her streets shall say, Hallelujah, and they shall praise him, saying, Blessed be God which hath extolled it for ever.] In Fagius's Hebrew copy it is, Blessed be God who hath exalted the horn of his kingdom for ever; i. e. made the horn of David to bud forth. And accordingly the streets did sing Hallelujah, when the blessed Jesus, as the Messias, was conducted triumphantly into Jerusalem; for then the multitude cried aloud, Hosanna, Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna in the highest. (Mark xi. 10.) See Isa. lx. 18, &c. from whence this verse, at least the beginning of it, seems to be taken.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 2. AND he was eight-and-fifty years old when he lost his sight, which was restored to him after eight years.] The Vulgate has only fifty-six years, and that he recovered his sight when he was sixty, being blind only four years. There is the like disagreement in the versions about the time of Tobit's death; the Vulgate makes him one hundred and two years old, the Greek one hundred and fifty-eight, fifty-six years difference. And so with respect to Tobias; the former supposes him ninety-nine at his death, and our version, following the Greek, one hundred and twenty-seven. This uncertainty makes it difficult to fix the determinate time of Tobit's age, when he prophesied of Nineveh's approaching ruin, or to ascertain the particular year of its destruction, as happening just before Tobias's death. And, indeed, that great event is a point far from being agreed and settled among chronologers; Archbishop Usher placing it fourteen years earlier, in the fifteenth year of Josiah; Newton, Prideaux, Whiston, &c. fourteen or fifteen years later, about the twenty-ninth of that prince's reign, which was the twenty-third of Cyaxares, in the kingdom of Media. What is most certain, says Calmet, is, that there is a mistake crept into one or both the texts, with respect to the years of Tobit and his son; and the diversity of the versions confirms this.

Ver. 4. I believe those things which Jonas the prophet spake of Nineveh, that it shall be overthrown.] Grotius contends, that both here and ver. 8. the true reading of the Greek is, Ναουμὸς ὁ προφήτης, and Junius seems of the same opinion. That prophet, indeed, (chap. ii. iii.) did foretell the revenge which God would take of the Assyrians for their repeated provocations, and for all the wrongs done to the ten tribes whom they had carried away captive, by making an utter end of Nineveh, that once famous city of three days' journey; but there seems no necessity for such an alteration of the text, if the prophecy of Jonah did really extend to and include the destruction of Nineveh by the Medes and Babylonians; and that it did so, seems probable from the following reasons:—First, Though it is well known that, upon the humiliation and repentance of the inhabitants, the first prediction of Jonah against Nineveh, that it should be destroyed in forty days, was not at that time fulfilled, yet it seems necessary to infer, that the like judgments hung over that city, to be executed at such a time hereafter, when the people were equally wicked and abandoned. The sentence, therefore, against it seems only suspended, and its destruction, as St. Jerome observes, (Præfat. in Jon.) deferred, till those who before had found mercy, should, by a relapse into the like vicious courses, make it necessary for God to bring upon them those judgments, which had been only respited for a time, and lay, as it were, dormant, till the increase of their wickedness should again make them ripe for destruction. Secondly, and more particularly, It seems not improbable, that a clause in the present copies of Zephaniah, (ii. 13—15. iii. 1.) which foretells the destruction of Nineveh, does not belong to that prophet, but to the prophecy of Jonah, though now dropped, in which he foretells afresh the final destruction of that city; and to this Tobit, as having another and better copy of Jonah's prophecy, may probably allude: see Whiston's Authen. Record. vol. ii. Appendix iv. and indeed his reasons for this suspicion, from Zeph. iii. 1. where woe is denounced against Nineveh, called, according to the LXX. the famous redeemed city, and by the Syriac, emphatically, the city of Jonah; and from ver. 6. as referring to the destruction of Nineveh as already past, are strong arguments in favour of his opinion. The like interpolation of a prophecy, and upon the very same occasion, he suspects to be, 2 Esd. ii. 8, 9. 20—23.

Jerusalem shall be desolate, and the house of God in it shall be burned.] This passage, as it occurs in the Vulgate and most of the Latin versions, has been objected to as a mistake in point of time, as making mention of the temple of Jerusalem as then burnt, which being inconsistent with the times in which it is placed, has given occasion to some to overthrow the authority of this book. But the Greek version, and the English which is taken from it, speak prophetically of it, as an event which was still to happen, and not historically, as of that which was already done. But there is no necessity of supposing with some, that Tobit had the gift of prophecy, he rather grounds his observation on the prophecies of others, Jer. xxvi. 18. Micah iii. 12. which expressly foretold this desolation of Jerusalem, and the house of God, in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah, and so it continued for fifty-two years after; till, by the favour of Cyrus, the Jews being released from their captivity, and restored again to their own land, repaired these ruins, and built again their holy city. (2 Kings xxv. 8. Jer. lii. 12.)

Ver. 5. And that again God will have mercy on them, and bring them again into the land, where they shall build a temple, but not like to the first, until the time of that age be fulfilled; and afterward they shall return from all places of their captivity, and build up Jerusalem gloriously, and the house of God shall be built in it for ever, with a glorious building, as the prophets have spoken thereof.] Tobit here prophesies of three periods, which should fall after his time. First, The rebuilding of the temple, which should continue to the conclusion or the consummation of the age, i. e. the Jewish state; for the words, ἕως πληρωθῶσι καιροὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος, are here to be rendered, till or when the seasons of the age be fulfilled, called, Matt. xxiv. 3. συντέλεια αἰῶνος, the consummation or conclusion of the age, or, as Fagius's Hebrew copy has it, till the first age was out. For the Jews were wont to distinguish their state under the law, which they called the present age, from the period of time after the coming of the Messiah, which they called the age to come. Thus Daniel seals his prophecy to the time of the end, or consummation, as the Greek renders it, not the end of all time, but of the Jewish economy. And so the destruction of the Jewish state may be styled the consummation, fulfilling, or the shutting up that age, which is the second period. And then after, in the third period, follows the state of Christianity, the glorious Jerusalem, that building spoken of by the prophets, and in the Apocalyptical visions, xxi. 18, 19. and described here, ver. 6. by the turning of the nations, converting of the gentiles, serving God truly, and burying their idols, which clearly is the state of Christianity. The learned Mr. Mede conjectures from the words, and afterward they shall return from all places of their captivity, that the sense is very imperfect, and that there is an hiatus here of a whole sentence both in the Greek and Jerome's version: for, according to the present reading, he says there is no connexion of the parts, mention being made of a return from captivity, different from the former, and yet their going into that captivity is omitted. From the authority therefore of Fagius's Hebrew copy, he would have this sentence inserted, And they shall go again into another very grievous captivity, beyond all the former in its greatness and duration; and then what follows comes in very naturally, And afterward they shall return from all places of their captivity; (de duplici Judææ Captiv. p. 580.) for the mention of a return cannot be sense, without a preceding one of a captivity. And that it belongs to the destruction of the Jews by the Romans, appears by another passage added also in that Hebrew copy, and directly parallel to Matt. xxiv. 31. for as there after the destruction of Jerusalem, v. 29. mention is made of the angels sent to gather the elect Jews from the four winds, so it follows in that Hebrew copy, But God, holy and blessed, shall remember and gather them from the four corners of the world. (See Dan. xii. 1.) We have in Jeremiah an eminent prophecy of the restoration and final happy state of all the twelve tribes, with the mention of the horrible distress they were in before. (Jer. xxx. 1—24. xxxi. 1—14. 23—25. 27—40. l. 4—7. 19, 20. li. 5—10. 15—19.) This is also agreeable to what the prophet Micah says, v. 3, 4. "Although God will send his ruler or Messiah into Israel, yet he will let Israel remain in captivity till Sion hath gone the full time of her travail, and then her sorrows shall have a joyful issue; then the remnant of his brethren shall return with the children of Israel, and he (the Messias) shall stand and feed in the strength of the Lord, &c. and they shall be converted, and he (the Christ) shall be great unto the ends of the earth, and he shall be the peace." (See Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 158.)

Ver. 6. And all nations shall turn, and fear the Lord God truly, and shall bury their idols.] The learned prelate above quoted says, that in this, and the foregoing verses, Tobit mentions four great events which he took from the prophets; viz. The end of the Jewish age or state, and a long captivity of his nation ensuing it. Secondly, A general return from the captivity. Thirdly, The rebuilding of the city and temple gloriously: and, lastly, The conversion of all the gentile nations from idolatry, when the horn or kingdom of his people should be exalted. (Ibid. p. 50.) With respect to this last particular, we may in general take notice, that the destruction of idolatry is often mentioned in the prophets as a principal circumstance in their description of the flourishing state of the church, which should come to pass in aftertimes; see Isa. i. 29. Jer. iii. 17. xvi. 19. Zech. xiii. 2. But that of Micah, v. 12—14. is most clear and full, And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord, that I will cut off all witchcrafts out of thine hand, and thou shalt have no more soothsayers. Thy graven images also will I cut off, and thy standing images out of the midst of thee, and thou shalt no more worship the work of thine hands. And I will pluck up thy groves out of the midst of thee, &c. And it appears to have been the sentiment of the ancient Jews themselves, that the utter abolishing of idolatry should attend the happy times of the Messias.

Ver. 10. Remember how Aman handled Achiacharus that brought him up; how out of light he brought him into darkness, and how he rewarded him again: yet Achiacharus was saved, but the other had his reward; for he went down into darkness. Manasses gave alms, and escaped the snares of death, which they had set for him; but Aman fell into the snare, and perished.] Ἐκ τοῦ φωτὸς ἤγαγεν αὐτὸν εἰς τὸ σκότος, i. e. He endeavoured, according to Drusius, to take away his life, or, from a flourishing condition, to bring him into poverty or banishment. Who Achiacharus was, is uncertain; probably it is Tobit's nephew, mentioned i. 21. xi. 18. Much less do we know who Aman or Manasses is.

There is no reason, but the mere name, to suppose the latter to be Judith's husband; it is more likely to be, as Junius conjectures, another name for Achiacharus, and that Nasbas should be inserted in the text instead of it. (See note on xi. 18.) Nor is Aman here, that Haman who was Mordecai's and the Jews' enemy, whose history we have in the book of Esther; for this is utterly incompatible with the time which Tobit is supposed to live in. The elevation of Mordecai to his great dignity, and the fall and disgrace of Haman, happened after the captivity of Babylon was ended, and after the time of Darius the Mede. This, therefore, is either an interpolation, as some suppose, in the history, and indeed it is wholly omitted by the Vulgate, or it refers to some accident or charge against Achiacharus, which Tobias was acquainted with, possibly brought against him by some haughty ungrateful courtier whom he had contributed to raise. However, from his happy escape, through God's blessing on his deeds, from the perfidiousness and treachery of Aman, we are furnished with a fresh instance of the power and reward of charity, and of the truth of Tobit's observation, iv. 10. That alms deliver from death, and suffer not to come into darkness; the very phrase used here.

Ver. 15. But before he died, he heard of the destruction of Nineveh, which was taken by Nabuchodonosor and Assuerus.] Usher, in his Annals, A. M. 3378. Prideaux, Connex. p. 47, 48. and other learned men, understand this of Nabopolassar, father to Nebuchadnezzar (called in the Greek Nabuchodonosor), and Cyaxares, king of Media, called by Daniel Ahasuerus, ix. 1. This remarkable transaction is generally placed in the twenty-ninth year of king Josiah, and the fixing it to this time, exactly agrees with the account given by the heathen historians, Herodotus, Strabo, Alexander Polyhistor, and others. Eusebius places the time of the taking of Nineveh in the twenty-second year of Cyaxares, and the Hebrews in the first of Nabuchodonosor, both which accounts agree; for according to Eusebius, this twenty-second year of Cyaxares falls in with the first of Nabuchodonosor. These two princes entering into an alliance together, by means of a marriage between Amyitis, daughter of Astyages, and Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, marched with their combined forces against Nineveh, and besieged Chiniladanus in it; and after the city was taken, his dominions were shared between the two conquerors; Nabopolassar became master of Nineveh and Babylon; and Cyaxares, of Media and the bordering provinces. Some learned men have started an inquiry, how Cyaxares and Assuerus can be the same person? Sir Isaac Newton gives the following solution of it, "That Assuerus is the same name with Achsuerus, Oxyares, Axares, and Cy, in the Persian language, signifying a prince or ruler, Cyaxares means prince Axares." (Chronol. see also Drusii Quæsit. p. 17, 18.) It is uncertain who inserted the two last verses of this book; Tobias is generally supposed to have continued the history from the end of the twelfth chapter to ver. 14. of this, but he could not write the account of his own death. It was added probably by one of the family, as what relates to Moses's death, at the end of the Pentateuch, was inserted by Joshua his successor, or some other hand. I shall only observe, that though the Syriac concludes as our version, yet Munster's and Fagius's Hebrew copies omit the mention of the death both of father and son.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. IN the twelfth year.] How is this consistent with what is mentioned ver. 13. where it is said that he marched in battle-array in the seventeenth year? Vatablus and others, to avoid this difficulty, suppose the war to have begun in the twelfth year of Nabuchodonosor, and to be finished in the seventeenth. But this is more than they have authority for; the account being rather of a particular battle, than of a continued war. Possibly this is one of those various readings which Jerome professeth to have cut off, as corruptions of the text; for it does not occur in his translation. And agreeably his version placeth the expedition of Holofernes, that was the next year after this battle of Ragau, in the thirteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, which Dr. Prideaux says is the truth of the matter. (Connex. vol. i. p. 29.) It is remarkable that the Greek text of this book precedes the Latin one five years, as appears from the instance above, and from ver. 1. of the next chapter, where the Greek has the eighteenth year, which in Jerome's version is only the thirteenth. Some account for the difference this way, that Nabuchodonosor, the adopted son or grandson of Asar-haddon, reigned jointly with him five years, and sole thirteen years, to the time of his army being cut off with Holofernes before Bethulia, (chap. xv.) In the last year but one of his reign Nabuchodonosor overcame Arphaxad, and destroyed Ecbatane, and in his last, Holofernes was beheaded by Judith. The Vulgate begins this book with, Itaque Arphaxad, &c. which looks as if this was a continuation of something preceding. Calmet says, "It may be joined to the history of Tobit without any great inconvenience, or much breaking in upon the regular series of events. For the building of Ecbatane, and the war between Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor mentioned here, follow closely enough the taking of Nineveh by Assuerus,

i. e. Cyaxares, or Astyages, which Tobias lived long enough to hear of, and the taking of Nineveh is the last event mentioned in the book of Tobit." But it cannot be inferred from this connective particle, that Judith is a continuation of the preceding history, because these two do not synchronize, if that of Judith is rightly placed, A. M. 3348. and the taking of Nineveh, according to Usher, be in 3378. Nor ought this to be joined to Tobit, or necessarily to follow it, because so placed in most editions, the placing thereof probably being accidental and arbitrary: nor do their subjects agree, the history of Tobit being the memoirs of a private family, and Judith that of the Jewish nation. It seems more probable, as Calmet conjectures, either that this history made a part of, and was taken from, some public registers, wherein the most remarkable events are entered and recorded, in a regular series and order; or that the particle here is superfluous, as a like one, et, is placed at the head of several books of Scripture, where it has nothing to do with the sense. But the best way to solve this is to observe, that the Greek and other more correct versions wholly omit it.

Of the reign of Nabuchodonosor, who reigned in Nineveh the great city.] The Medes, after subduing several of the neighbouring nations, under the conduct of their second king Phraortes, invaded Assyria. Saosduchinus, or Saosduchius, called here Nabuchodonosor, raised a powerful army to oppose them, summoning the whole force of his wide-spreading dominions, and inviting all the nations of the east to his assistance. Most of those which were summoned received his ambassadors with contempt, upon which he resolves on nothing less than being avenged on the whole earth, and choosing Holofernes for the instrument of his vengeance; as he was commander-in-chief of his forces, he orders him to put all to the sword who should oppose him, (ii. 11.) As to the cruelty with which these orders were executed, the dread and terror that merciless general struck into the countries through which he marched, the courageous resolution taken by the Jews to withstand the mighty conqueror, the great strait to which the city of Bethulia and their whole nation were reduced, and their miraculous deliverance; and, lastly, the great slaughter of the Assyrian army: these particulars we have a distinct and minute account of in the following chapters. Herodotus confirms the main of this history, telling us, that Phraortes, the Mede, made war against the Assyrians, "Those I mean, (says he, lib. i. cap. 102.) who lived at Nineveh, who had formerly been the chief of all, but now were deserted by their friends or vassals, though nevertheless in a good condition to defend themselves." No two historical pieces can, so far as they are concerned together, more illustrate each other than Herodotus and this book of Judith. (See Montfaucon, Hist. Ver. Judith.) It hath been objected, that the king of Nineveh is here called Nabuchodonosor, which is the proper name of the kings of Babylon; to this it may be answered, That we find not only in writers of different characters, the Greek and Hebrew, the sacred and profane, but even in writers of the same nation, the same person under different appellations: though therefore in strictness of speech it may be counted an error in history, to call the king of Nineveh by the name of Nabuchodonosor, yet, as it was the style and manner of the Jews to denote any prince who lived beyond the Euphrates by that name, (see Tobit xiv. 15.) we need not wonder to find this writer, who wrote either at Babylon or in Chaldea, and lived in an age when the fame and reputation of Nabuchodonosor the Great had quite eclipsed the name of all his predecessors, calling another prince, who lived at a far distance, viz. Saosduchinus, the king of Assyria, by the name of the king of Babylon, which perhaps at that time might be the standing name of every great and distant monarch. Others say, that this Nabuchodonosor, then king of Assyria, sprang from the royal line of the kings of Babylon, and that he chose to retain the Chaldee name of the kings of Babylon, viz. Nabuchodonosor, as a standing memorial of his extraction, and that it might appear he was king of Babylon as well as of Assyria and Nineveh.

In the days of Arphaxad, which reigned over the Medes.] Arphaxad seems to be a common name of all the kings of Media, as Merodach was of those of Babylon, and Pharaoh or Ptolemy of those of Egypt. The question is, what Arphaxad is here meant? As Arphaxad is said to be that king who was the founder of Media, Prideaux contends that Deioces must be the person. (Connex. vol. i. p. 28.) But Calmet and many others are of opinion, that by Arphaxad is not here meant the Deioces in Herodotus, but his son Phraortes, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Media; which seems more probable, as the history informs us, that this Arphaxad was overcome by Nabuchodonosor, or Saosduchinus, king of Assyria, and slain in the mountains of Ragau, by the Assyrian archers, (i. 15.) which even Herodotus himself makes to be the fate not of Deioces the father, but of his son Phraortes, (lib. i. cap. 97.) who, having subdued the Persians, as he tells us, and made himself master of almost all Asia, was not content therewith, but coming at last to attempt Nineveh and the Assyrian empire, was himself defeated and killed in the bold attempt.

In Ecbatane.] This city is by the ancients constantly called Ecbatan of Media, to distinguish it from another in Syria, bearing the same name. For beauty and magnificence it was little inferior to Babylon or Nineveh. In compass it is said to have been near two hundred furlongs. It was the metropolis of all Media, and the seat both of the Median and Persian monarchs, their ordinary residence in the heat of summer, as Susa was in the winter-time. The royal palace was about seven furlongs, or a mile in compass, and built with all the cost and skill that a stately edifice did require. (Polyb. lib. x.) Some of its beams are said to be of silver, and the rest of cedar strengthened with plates of gold.

Ver. 2. And built in Ecbatane walls round about of stones hewn three cubits broad and six cubits long.] Prideaux says of Deioces, that having repaired, beautified, and enlarged, the city of Ecbatana (which, according to Diodorus, lib. ii. had been built from the times of Semiramis, one thousand three hundred years before), he made it the royal seat of his kingdom, and reigned there with great wisdom, honour, and prosperity, fifty-three years; during which time, it growing to be a great city, he is for this reason reckoned by the Greeks to have been the founder of it: (Connex. vol. i. p. 20.) but as the writer of this history does not mention the founding of this city here, though the Vulgate, without authority, does, but the adding new and magnificent fortifications to it, it is probably to be understood of Phraortes his son, who being a prince of warlike spirit, and having many forces under his command, may not improperly be supposed to delight in works of this nature. His father indeed might lay the foundation of some great designs, and during his lifetime carry on the buildings, and leave the completion of them to his son, as undertakings of this kind are not so soon completed; and in this sense he may be considered as a joint founder, and what is here said of Arphaxad be applied to him. Particular mention, we may observe, is here made of the largeness of the stones employed in the works, as the ancients placed a great part of the magnificence of their buildings herein, as appears from the description of old monuments in history, and from the ruins of such antique buildings as have in some measure escaped the injury of time and the rudeness of past ages.

And made the height of the wall seventy cubits, and the breadth thereof fifty cubits. Ver. 3. And set the towers thereof upon the gates of it a hundred cubits high, and the breadth thereof in the foundation threescore cubits.] The walls of this city are much celebrated by the ancients, and minutely described by Herodotus. (Lib. i. cap. 98.) They were seven in number, all of a circular form, and gradually rising above each other by the height of the battlements of each wall. The situation of the ground, rising by an easy ascent, was very favourable to the design of building them, and perhaps first suggested it. The royal palace and treasury were within the innermost circle of the seven. The first of these walls was equal in circumference to the city of Athens, i. e. according to Thucydides, (lib. i.) one hundred and seventy-eight furlongs, and had white battlements, the second black, the third of a purple colour, the fourth blue, and the fifth of deep orange. But the two innermost, as serving more immediately for a fence to the royal person of the king, and within one of which was his palace, were embellished above the other; the one being covered or gilt with silver, and the other with gold. Each of them being higher than the other, and distinguished by the colour of their several pinnacles, gave unto the eye a most agreeable prospect. (Herod. ibid.) This description indeed of Herodotus savours somewhat of romance, but the uncommon height and superb magnificence of the walls are confirmed by other good authorities. It should seem as if the walls of Ecbatane were each of them seventy cubits high, fifty cubits broad, and the towers upon the gates a hundred cubits higher; but this is to be understood only of the innermost wall. And this is the more probable, because the description in these verses is of the height and breadth, τοῦ τείχους, the wall, not walls, as if a particular one was only meant. The Vulgate is faulty in rendering, Fecit muros ejus in latitudinem cubitorum septuaginta, et in altitudinem cubitorum triginta. St. Jerome's version agrees with our translation, and understands the seventy cubits of the height, which seems the true rendering, and is confirmed by the Greek and Syriac.

Ver. 4. And he made the gates thereof, even gates that were raised to the height of seventy cubits, and the breadth of them was forty cubits.] It is to be presumed, that this extraordinary height takes in all the embellishments over and about the doors, and not that the gates themselves opened to such an exact height. We shall the less wonder at the extraordinary grandeur of the towers and gates here mentioned, if we reflect upon what is related of Nineveh,—that it had fifteen hundred towers upon the walls of it, each of them a hundred feet high: and on what Josephus says of the gates of the temple of Jerusalem, that they were sixty cubits high and twenty broad.

Ver. 5. In the great plain, which is the plain in the borders of Ragau.] The plains of Ragau are very probably those which lie about Rages, a town of Media, standing upon the mountains of Ecbatana, and distant about a small day's journey from that city.

Ver. 6.] There is a great difference between the Greek and Latin version of this book, particularly as to the proper names. Probably both the great plain itself and the rivers had different names. What is called here and in the Greek, Hydaspes, is styled Jadason in the Latin versions. Calmet observes, that the Syriac is most exact as to the names of places; it reads here, that Nabuchodonosor engaged with Arphaxad in the plains of Dura, mentioned Dan. iii. and instead of the river Jadason, it puts Ulai, which occurs likewise in Dan. viii. 21.

Ver. 7. Sent unto all that dwelt in Persia.] The mention of the Persians as a distinguished people at the time of this transaction has been thought inaccurate, as the name of the Persians was hardly if at all known before Cyrus, at least they were till then an obscure people, and included under the name of Elam, or Elamites. (See Boch. Geogr. lib. iv. cap. 10.) But this objection, supposing it well grounded, is not particular to this writer. Inaccuracies in geography and chronology are found in almost all ancient writers; and even the sacred text is not free from them, at least according to our version.

Ver. 10. Until you come beyond Tanis and Memphis, and to all the inhabitants of Egypt.] The Vulgate only mentions terram Jesse, which Calmet expounds the land of Goshen, in the lower Egypt, called the land of Gesem, I presume, in the preceding verse. Probably by synecdoche a part was designed for the whole. It should seem from this and ver. 12. that Nabuchodonosor did command in Egypt before the conquest of Judea, which yet was a necessary passage for the invading of Egypt: what is mentioned therefore here of Egypt, has been condemned by Diodate and others, if not as false, at least as premature. But allowing this, might not such an imperious and conceited prince as Nabuchodonosor is here described, send his orders to those beyond Tanis and Memphis, and to all the inhabitants of Egypt, though he had no power or command in Egypt, to attend his summons, and to accompany him to the battle? which indeed appears from the following verse to have been the very case. He who expected the whole earth should submit to him, might easily flatter himself that Egypt, a small part of it, would not dispute his orders. The like answer may serve for his message into Persia, ver. 7.

Ver. 11. But all the inhabitants of the land made light of the commandment of Nabuchodonosor, neither went they with him to battle, for they were not afraid of him: yea, he was before them as one man, and they sent away his ambassadors from them without effect, and with disgrace.] It may seem surprising and strange, that the inhabitants of the land should dare to behave in the manner here related, except they thought that Nabuchodonosor could not stand against Arphaxad, a valiant prince, and at the head of a numerous and powerful army. The truth is, after the destruction of Sennacherib's army by the destroying angel in Judea, the power and credit of the kings of Assyria began to dwindle; and among others who broke from that government was Merodach-Baladan, king of Babylon, who before was tributary to the king of Assyria. Or probably, the nations mentioned in the foregoing verses, instructed by the misfortunes of others, and seeing that their submission served only to render the conqueror more fierce and insolent, might take the resolution here mentioned, though seemingly rash and imprudent. It seems most probable that this message and invitation to the inhabitants of the several places here mentioned to come to his assistance, was before the engagement with Arphaxad, as our version, following the Greek, represents it; but the Vulgate makes it to be after that battle, to induce them by a sense of his conquests, and the terror of his arms, to submit to his dominion and empire; or whether he sent to the same people twice, as some have conjectured, both before and after the engagement: however this be, it is certain that his pride was very sensibly piqued at the disappointment, when he found so many people, whom, in his own mind, he looked upon as already vanquished and subdued, daring to dispute his orders, and affronting him in the person of his ambassadors. They regarded him, says the text, only as one man, i. e. as a private man, without respecting his public dignity or character, as one that had no right or business to command them to attend, and, therefore, as their equal, ὡς ἀνὴρ ἴσος, as some copies have it, or being but a man, no better than themselves.

Ver. 12. Therefore Nabuchodonosor was very angry, and sware by his throne and kingdom.] This was anciently esteemed a most solemn, sacred, and inviolable oath. Herodotus says, that the Scythians, whom the older Latin version mentions here instead of the Syrians, particularly used this form, when a more solemn oath than ordinary was to be taken, (lib. iv. cap. 68.) It appears from the gospel, (Matt. v. 34. xxiii. 22.) that the Jews sometimes swore by heaven, or God's throne, which was virtually swearing by God himself, who sat upon it. And the Persians use it to this day. (See Tavern. Voyag. b. i.) And may not Nabuchodonosor, in like manner swearing by his throne and kingdom, be conceived as swearing by himself, as he owned no superior either in heaven or on earth? Homer introduces Achilles swearing by his sceptre. (Il. Δ.) And it is observed by Aristotle, that when princes swore, they usually held up their sceptre.

That he would slay with the sword all the inhabitants of the land of Moab, and the children of Ammon, and all Judea . . .] In judging of Nabuchodonosor's behaviour, a great difference is to be made between those who were subject to him, and those whom he intended to make so. The former, in refusing to obey his orders, and send their troops to his assistance against the Medes, were doubtless rebels to their sovereign, and deserved his sharpest resentment: but such as were free and unsubdued, were at liberty to act as they pleased; as they were under no ties of duty, policy and prudence alone were to direct them. This seems to have been the case of the Jews in particular, they were independent of him, nor had he any right over them or their country. It does not appear that they owed him either services or tribute; or if some small acknowledgments of this sort were due from them, they did not imply such vassalage as to oblige them to be auxiliaries upon every occasion. The justice of their refusal will appear yet farther, if we consider that Nabuchodonosor, besides his scheme of universal dominion, intended likewise to oblige the several nations to acknowledge him only to be God, (iii. 8. vi. 2.) which the Jews could not submit to without a renunciation of their religion. And God seems to have approved the conduct of his people by the miraculous deliverance wrought in their favour.

Ver. 15. Mountains of Ragau.] It is no improbable conjecture, that this city, the same with Rages, Tobit i. 14. was built by Reu the son of Peleg. For not only the descendants of Arphaxad (of whom came Peleg, the father of Reu) settled in these and the adjacent parts, but Reu is called by the LXX. Ragau. And as to the posterity of Arphaxad settling here, it is remarkable, that in the beginning of this book mention is made of Arphaxad, who reigned over the Medes in Ecbatane. This name being probably given to the said king, in memory and honour of their forefather Arphaxad, the son of Shem, and grandson of Noah, who, probably, upon the dispersion of mankind, settled himself in these parts of Asia, whence we find here a whole country retaining plain footsteps of his name, it being called Arrapachitis in Ptolemy, probably for Arphaxaditis. (See Well's Geography, vol. iii. p. 196.)

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND in the eighteenth year . . .] The placing the expedition of Holofernes in this year seems to be in consequence of the former mistake, (i. 13.) and a continuation, says Prideaux, of the same blunder. (Connex. vol. i. p. 29.) Jerome's version has the thirteenth year here, the expedition of Holofernes being the year after the battle of Ragau, which, according to that version, was in the twelfth of Nabuchodonosor. And with this agrees Usher, in his Annals, A. M. 3348. It is said here to be in the two-and-twentieth day of the first month, i. e. in that part of the month Nisan, or in the beginning of spring, called in the Hebrew the return of the year; which the Scripture takes notice of, as the usual time when kings go forth to battle. (2 Sam. xi. 2.)

Ver. 2. And concluded the afflicting of the whole earth out of his own mouth.] Καὶ συνεκάλεσε τὴν κακίαν τῆς γῆς ἐκ τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ. This verb seems to have crept in from the beginning of this verse, and to have no place here. Other copies have συνετέλεσε, which our version follows; but it will be difficult to fetch the sense given in it from the present Greek. As it now stands, it differs very little from what goes before, and what follows. Badwell's sense of the place is new and agreeable: "He declared to, and laid before his nobles whom he had convened, all the rudeness offered to him from the nations he had sent to, and the contemptuous treatment his ambassadors met with." The authors of the Geneva version manifestly understood it in this sense when they rendered, He communicated with them his secret counsel, and set before them with his own mouth all the malice of the earth. And Junius's rendering is to the same effect, Colligens omne malum regionum istarum ore suo. And so Calmet, Nabuchodonosor representa lui même la malice de toute la terre. When it is here said that he meditated revenge on the whole earth, this is not to be understood absolutely, but includes such people and nations only, as refused to attend his summons, those mentioned in the former chapter, ver. 7—10. γῆ and οἰκουμένη are both taken frequently in Scripture in a restrained sense to signify a particular country: Judea, especially, is often so denominated.

Ver. 4. Called Holofernes . . .] Some annotators are of opinion, that the word Holofernes is of Persian extract, in the same manner as Tisaphernes, Intaphernes, &c. but others imagine, that this general was a native either of Pontus or Cappadocia. Polybius makes mention of one of that name, who having conquered Cappadocia, soon lost it again by endeavouring to change the ancient customs of the country, and to introduce drunkenness, together with feasts and rites to Bacchus. Whereupon Casaubon conjectures, that this was the same Holofernes that commanded Nebuchadnezzar's forces; as it must be owned, that his riot and debauchery, as well as the rapidity of his conquests, make him not unlike him. (Polyb. lib. x. cap. 11. and Casaub. in Athen.)

Ver. 4. The chief captain of his army which was next unto him.] By Zonaras he is called Archisatrapas, by Tertullian and St. Austin, Rex; on account probably of the supreme power and command which he had. He seems to have been in the same favour, dignity, and power, with Nabuchodonosor, as Joseph was with Pharaoh in Egypt, and Haman with Ahasuerus in Persia, (Esth. iii.) and Achiacharus with Esar-haddon in Assyria. (Tob. i.)

Ver. 5. And the number of horses, with their riders, twelve thousand.] Here our translators have, with great judgment, followed the Alexandrian copy, which has χιλιάδας, instead of the other copies μυριάδων. No doubt μυριάδων δέκα δύω is a mistake here, and seems to have been the gloss to the number in the line above, χιλιάδας ἑκατὸν εἴκοσι, over against which some hand had put the usual way of expressing that number, viz. twelve myriads; and this by mistake afterward crept into the text in the line below.

Ver. 7. Thou shalt declare unto them, that they prepare for me earth and water.] This, according to the margin, is after the manner of the kings of Persia, to whom earth and water were wont to be given, in acknowledgment of their being lords of land and sea. Thus Darius, to make trial which of the Grecians would submit to him, and which would not, sent heralds to all their cities to demand earth and water. On the arrival of these heralds, several of the Grecian cities, dreading the power of the Persians, did as was required of them; but when those who were sent to Athens and Lacedemon came thither with this commission, they flung them, the one into a well, and the other into a deep pit, and bid them fetch earth and water thence. But this being done in the heat of their rage, they repented of it when come to a cooler temper, and would gladly have made any satisfaction for the wrong that would have been accepted of; and the Lacedemonians sent a proper person on purpose to Susa to make an offer hereof. (Herod. lib. vii.) From the tribute here demanded, some have inferred, that it was a Persian monarch that gave these imperious orders, and they confirm this opinion from these farther reasons: 1. The Apostolical Constitutions mention what is here recorded to have happened ἐπὶ Δαρείου. (Lib. viii. 2.) 2. The name of Holofernes, the general of this army, and next in power to the king, like those of Tissaphernes, Artaphernes, Intaphernes, Barzaphernes, is known by its termination to be of Persian extraction. 3. It appears from Josephus, (Ant. lib. xi. 5.) that Joacim, mentioned in this history, iv. 6. was not high-priest till the end of Darius's reign. 4. The hymn of thanksgiving upon the wonderful deliverance God had vouchsafed his people, mentions particularly that the Persians quaked at her boldness, and the Medes were daunted at her hardiness, which seems to imply their having a principal share in this war. This history cannot be assigned to the times of Nebuchadnezzar, who carried the two tribes captives, inasmuch as it is declared therein, v. 18, 19. that it happened after the return of those tribes out of captivity, long after the death of that king. A learned writer, and a great stickler for this opinion, surmises, that the Jews changed the name of Darius into Nabuchodonosor, when they set up their spurious Messias, Bar Chocab, and that the true era of this history is in the thirty-sixth year of Darius. (Whiston's Hist. of the Old Test. vol. i. p. 369.) Others, without having any recourse to the corruption of the text, suppose, that some Persian king, who resembled Nebuchadnezzar in his designs and actions, is here called by his name, in like manner as any noted conspirator may be called a Catiline. Sulpicius Severus, from the likeness of the two characters, will have Ochus, the successor of Artaxerxes, to be the person, who was very cruel and fond of going to war. (Sacr. Hist. lib. ii. cap. 22.) Some have fixed upon Cambyses, particularly Eusebius, (in Chron.) St. Austin (lib. xviii. cap. 16. de Civ. Dei), and the Venerable Bede, and have assigned it as the reason why Cambyses opposed the building of the temple, (Ezra iv.) because the Jews killed Holofernes. But this history of Judith cannot fall in with the twelfth of Cambyses, (see ver. 1.) as that prince lived but seven years and five months; (Herod. lib. iii.) but whoever is fixed upon, there seems to lie this objection against the conjecture in general, that Nabuchodonosor here mentioned, is all along particularly characterized as king of the Assyrians, (i. 7. 11. ii. 1. 4, &c.) and his general, as chief captain of the army of Assur, (ii. 4. 14. v. 1. vi. 1, &c.) As this particularity therefore seems necessarily to confine it to a Babylonian or an Assyrian monarch, and as the times of Nebuchadnezzar suit not with those of this history, might we not rather imagine, if a change of names through any Jewish corruption of the copies is to be suspected or admitted, that they changed the name of the king of Assyria or Babylon, Saosduchinus, or some other, into Nabuchodonosor? Farther, if the demand of earth and water was not peculiar to the Persians, but in use among other nations, and is only a common form of acknowledging subjection; and if the Persians are to be considered here only as auxiliaries, as seems most probable from i. 7. and were, among others, summoned themselves to assemble at Nabuchodonosor's command,—then what is here recorded should seem to belong to the times before Darius, or even the very establishment of the Persian empire; for it cannot be supposed, that when that was in its glory, the Persians under Cambyses, Darius, or Xerxes, or indeed any of their kings, then lords of the east, should be so obsequious to the commands of the proud Assyrian, as to assemble at his summons; or so void of policy, as to join their forces to subdue the earth to him, to enlarge his power and dominion, and in effect to lessen and diminish their own; besides, "Did any of these Persian monarchs (says Calmet) reign at Nineveh? Did they declare war against a king of the Medes? Were they ever kings of Assyria? Did they conquer Cappadocia, Cilicia, Syria, Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Phœnicia? Or, rather, did not all these provinces make part of the empire, which they received from their ancestors?"

Ver. 11. But concerning them that rebel, let not thine eyes spare them.] i. e. Either through a motive of compassion, or a principle of avarice, as Saul did, when, instead of obeying the commandment of God, to smite Amalek, and utterly to destroy all that they had, out of a false compassion he spared Agag, and the best of the sheep and the oxen, and all that was good. (1 Sam. xv. 3. 9.)

Ver. 12. For as I live, and by the power of my kingdom, whatsoever I have spoken, that will I do by mine hand.] When we consult that Divine light which teaches us, that men can do nothing but as God shall please to enable them, or shall allow to be done, one cannot help being surprised, and scarce forbear laughing, at the vanity of the Assyrian prince, who, flushed with the conceit of his victory over Arphaxad, and the advantages hitherto gained, resolves upon the vast attempt of subduing the whole earth, as if his power was invincible, and his project, founded either on pride, ambition, or resentment, could not fail of success. From the secrecy and well-concerted measures of his expedition, and the number of forces ready to engage in it, he assures himself of conquest, not considering, that success depends upon God's good pleasure, who often delights to defeat the unjust designs and unwarrantable enterprises of such princes, who aim at establishing their own glory and greatness upon the ruin of innocent and less powerful states. Especially such it is his will to bring low, who pride themselves in their own sufficiency and strength, (ver. 5.) and, without asking his leave, or seeking for his assistance or blessing, are confident of victory, that their counsels cannot be disappointed, nor their combined forces overthrown and defeated. From the authoritative manner and lofty language of this verse, one would have thought that it was God himself that was speaking, he who has the sovereign dominion over all creatures, and whose decrees and orders are always infallible and irresistible; who never commissions a Moses or a Joshua to go and fight their enemies with a promise of success, but the event is always answerable, and the attempt successful. But what a prodigious difference is there between the precarious resolutions of vain man, and the unerring decrees of an all-wise God; between a prince who has nothing of his own, but his pride, and an all-powerful Being, to whom kings, even in the summit of their fancied greatness, are subject and accountable! The event of this history in particular shews the vanity of such presumptuous boasting, in defiance of the Most High; that even weak and inconsiderable means shall have the power, by God's appointment, to stop the career, and confound the pride, of the mighty; and a Judith unarmed, if sent by the Lord of hosts, and inspired with resolution by him, shall perform wonders for the deliverance of his people, against the whole force of an insulting enemy, who took not God for their strength, but trusted in the multitude of their hosts.

Ver. 21. Near the mountain, which is at the left hand of the upper Cilicia.] It is probable that Taurus and Antitaurus are here meant, as these are large mountains bordering on Cilicia.

Ver. 23. And destroyed Phud and Lud.] i. e. Egypt and Lydia; for Lud cannot mean here Ethiopia, because the Ethiopians (i. 10.) had no concern in this affair, the Assyrian monarch had received no affront or contemptuous answer from them. If what Grotius observes of the geography of this writer be true, that it is παχυμερὴς, crassoque filo, one shall the less wonder, that Phud and Lud, i. e. Egypt and Lydia; Rasses and Ishmael, i. e. Tarsus and Arabia; Mesopotamia and Cilicia, are connected together, without a proper regard to the order or situation of places.

Ver. 27. Then he went down into the plain of Damascus.] If we do not suppose Holofernes to have been assisted in extending his conquests, and to have executed part of what is mentioned in this and the foregoing verses, by several large detachments from the general army, under the conduct of other generals and lieutenants, the rapidity of his conquests is almost incredible. He seems to conquer more places in less than two months, than another could even visit with so numerous an army as his in so short a time; for in about six or seven weeks' time he conquered Cappadocia, Lydia, Cilicia, Mesopotamia, from the river Chabor, which empties itself into the Euphrates, to the Persian Gulf; as likewise Arabia, and the country of the Madianites, towards the Dead Sea; and, last of all, Damascus: which makes it the more surprising, that, after having run through so many provinces, and subdued so many nations, by the mere terror of his name, a little insignificant town in comparison should stop his progress, and oblige him to stay before it a month or two without making any assault upon, or executing any thing considerable against it, except seizing on the aqueducts, and, by rendering them useless and unserviceable, depriving the inhabitants of Bethulia of the convenience of water. Our translators here scarce reach the force of the verb ἐξελίκμησε: it is an elegant expression, and means, that he winnowed their countries, i. e. he took their substance, and left the chaff.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. So they sent ambassadors to him to treat of peace.] i. e. The inhabitants of the sea-coasts, mentioned in the last verse of the foregoing chapter, and people very remote, made solemn and respectful application to him to avert the danger and mischief that might otherwise befal them. Curtius mentions the like formal address made by the most distant nations to Alexander the Great, to intercede for peace, and to engage his favour. (Lib. x.) Thus the Gibeonites, knowing the success usually attending such dutiful and early application, to save themselves from danger, craftily said to Joshua, We be come from a far country, we are thy servants, now therefore make a league with us. (Josh. ix.)

Ver. 2. We the servants of Nabuchodonosor the great king.] These people surrendered themselves as vassals to the king of Assyria, called here the great king by way of eminence. This was the usual title given to this monarch. Thus Rab-shakeh, speaking of his superior power, addresses himself to Hezekiah, Thus saith the great king, the king of Assyria, What confidence is that wherein thou trusteth? (2 Kings xviii. 19.) Daniel, speaking to Nebuchadnezzar, (ii. 37.) applies to him the like august terms of sovereignty, Thou, O king, art a king of kings; for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory. And Cyrus in his epitaph is complimented in the like manner as βασιλεὺς βασιλέων. (Strabo, lib. xv.)

Ver. 4. Behold, even our cities, and the inhabitants thereof, are thy servants, come and deal with them as seemeth good unto thee.] As nothing very material occurs in the literal sense of this chapter, Messieurs of Port-Royal have drawn the following allegorical one from the great power of the king of Assyria, represented above in all its terror on the one hand, and the vast panic and abject obsequiousness of the neighbouring nations on the other; "That by Nabuchodonosor, who had decreed to subdue the whole earth, and would be acknowledged and adored as a god by all the nations whom he had conquered, we may pertinently understand the devil, whose grand design is, ever since the withdrawing his own allegiance, and exalting himself as God, to seduce mankind, and to persuade them to desert the free and happy service in which they live under their great Creator, and to transfer their obedience to him, as their only lord and master." By Holofernes his general, they conceive, may be aptly meant, "all the agents and emissaries of the devil, who, in compliance with his suggestions or orders, labour through unjust means and wicked arts to establish his empire. Such were those idolatrous princes, who persecuted with fire and sword the true servants of God, to oblige them to submit to the power and dominion of the devil, and to renounce Jesus Christ. And to say nothing of the world itself, whose threats, as well as caresses, are alike successful in drawing men from their duty, such especially are all those, who, through the example of a bad life, or the poison and infection of evil principles, seduce others from their duty and steadfastness, to leave the true way of salvation, and to walk in the paths which lead to perdition and death." (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 7. So they, and all the country round about received them with garlands, with dances, and with timbrels: yet did he cast down their frontiers.] i. e. Their frontier-towns, forts, and strong holds, which might otherwise give him opposition and disturbance. The Vulgate is more explicit in rendering the last clause, Nec ista tamen facientes, ferocitatem ejus pectoris mitigare potuerunt, nam et civitates eorum destruxit. It should seem, from this account, that it would have been more safe and glorious for these princes and people to have united their forces, and to have joined together to defend themselves against a barbarian, without any bowels of tenderness and compassion, and with whom the greatest submission was unavailable any ways to move or affect him. If their villages had been sacked and plundered, they would, however, have had the glory to have defended their liberties at the expense of their lives. But fear seldom reasons truly; (Wisd. xvii. 12.) and those who are seized with it, without weighing the consequences, follow implicitly what it suggests and dictates. The learned expositors above, here again strike out an allegorical sense, and apply it to the conduct of the wicked:—"The wicked (say they), when they surrender to and enter upon the service of sin and Satan, propose advantageous things to themselves; it is their aim and intention, like the people here mentioned, to procure safety and happiness to themselves in this life; but herein they are miserably deceived, since the devil in the end is really more cruel and mischievous to those that submit to him, than to those who have the virtue and resolution to oppose him. For should this evil spirit, like the enraged Holofernes, threaten to do all the evil imaginable to the latter, should he by violence take away their lives, a death so precious before God will be rewarded by an immortal life and eternal felicity; or should he aim at what is more dear to them, the subversion of the true religion, his attempt would be fruitless against its great Protector: but with the wicked it is not so; those who go out to meet this fiend, as these nations did Holofernes, and who willingly submit to his empire, and even rejoice and take a pleasure in his service, prove often unhappy, even in this life, and have a terrible prospect of ruin before them for the time to come: for they are in the service of a master, who, being, according to the account given of him in Scripture, a murderer from the beginning, continues his implacable hatred against mankind, and is so false a friend, that he gives the most deadly wound to the soul, at the same time that he outwardly appears to be the most kind and favourable; cunningly advancing the temporal interest and fortunes of those whom he means eternally to ruin. As he makes no account of riches, or any of the transitory goods of this life, he is disposed to give, if he had it in his power, all the kingdoms of the world, as he once pretended to offer even to our Saviour, provided he could induce any thereby to fall down and worship him, and, by so doing, to be eternal partners with him in misery and punishment."

Ver. 8. Cut down their groves . . .] Where they used to offer sacrifice to their gods or idols, under green trees for the greater solemnity and reverence, as well as the greater secrecy of their mysteries. That among the heathens, trees and groves were the temples of their gods, appears from innumerable passages in sacred and profane history. And in the Roman laws of the twelve tables, in the second law of religion, it was commanded to have groves in the fields. From this idolatrous use of them among the heathens, the Israelites were bidden in the course of their conquests to cut them down, and Deut. xii. 3. to burn them; and this law was executed by the good kings of Judah, in obedience to the commands of the true God. (2 Kings xviii. 4. xxiii. 6. 14.) They were also forbidden to plant any grove or tree near unto the altar of the Lord. (Deut. vi. 21.) Under groves, probably all other monuments of religious use are comprehended, as houses, high-places, temples, (see iv. 1.) pillars, statues, and the like. All of which Nebuchadnezzar ordered to be destroyed, as so many rivals of his majesty and greatness.

For he had decreed to destroy all the gods of the land, that all nations should worship Nabuchodonosor only, and that all tongues and tribes should call upon him as God.] The Assyrian princes, when they rose to the sublimity of empire, were not only despotic in their government, but affected even Divine honours, as may be seen in their history, and set themselves above all the gods of the people they vanquished; and not only presumed to pass sentence by the word of their mouth upon the whole world, but sometimes required that none other under heaven should be worshipped but themselves. We find in the account here given of Nabuchodonosor, that he was resolved not only to subdue the several nations from the Euphrates to Ethiopia, but intended likewise to oblige them to adore and acknowledge him only to be God. Accordingly his general, Holofernes, did not content himself with demolishing idols and false gods, but he would remove the true God likewise, and set up Nabuchodonosor in his stead. This appears to have been the avowed purpose of his sending his great armies, not merely from a spirit of resentment, but rather of ambition to be acknowledged the king among gods. And, indeed, as if he had been a professed atheist, as some have represented him, the sense of his great success in life had so intoxicated his reason, as to forget that he was a man, or that there was a God that could control him. But the king of Nineveh was not the only prince that we find infected with the folly and impiety of desiring to pass for a god; the flatterers of Darius, who reigned over the Medes and Persians in the time of Daniel, proposed to him to make a decree, under pain of being cast into the den of lions, that no one should dare to ask a petition of any god or man, but of him only, for the space of thirty days. (Dan. vi. 7.) Nor was Sennacherib less insolent, who boasted, 2 Kings xviii. 35. that he had not yet met with any god that could withstand his power, Who are they among all the gods of the nations, that have delivered their country out of mine hand? and from thence vainly infers, that neither would the Lord be able to deliver Jerusalem out of his hand; exalting himself above all that is called god, or is worshipped. Alexander the Great, and many of the Roman emperors, had the like ambition of passing for gods. Nor is it very surprising, that those whom the devil had thus taken possession of, should, like him, aspire to be equal with God. For that proud spirit, however jealous of his honour, is not averse for special ends to communicate part of it to his favourites, and willingly allows that they shall be looked upon and treated as gods, if he can by such superstition tempt any to leave the service of the true God, and by consequence become his slaves.

Ver. 9. Over against the great strait of Judea.] Called the hill country, Luke i. 39. It is particularly described ver. 7. of the next chapter.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 2. THEREFORE they were exceedingly afraid of him, and were troubled for Jerusalem, and for the temple of the Lord their God.] It is not to be wondered at, that the people of the Jews should be much afraid of, and tremble at, so great a force coming against them, to which so many nations, from an apprehension of greater evils, had submitted, and notwithstanding had been treated with great severity. Their fear therefore was the more excusable, and had this good effect, that through a distrust of themselves, and their own sufficiency, it put them upon applying to God for his assistance, and asking of him in their distress the help of his all-powerful arm. It is observable, that the Jews are not represented here as concerned for and afraid of their goods, their liberty, or lives; but the occasion of their uneasiness was the apprehension they were under, that the holy city of Jerusalem and the temple of the Lord should be profaned and treated as other the like places had been, where Holofernes with his army had passed. The Jews, it is well known, had a profound veneration for their temple, and on many occasions have shewed themselves ready to undergo a thousand deaths for the preservation of that holy place, which distinguished them from all other nations; and therefore their thoughts at this time were chiefly fixed, and their wishes and prayers confined to their beloved sanctuary. "What they did from a pure zeal and spirit of Judaism, and to preserve so glorious a monument of their religion, we should be equally zealous to do (say Messieurs of Port-Royal), from a truer principle, and a more excellent religion. It becomes us to be always more sincerely concerned for, and affected with, what any ways reflects dishonour upon or is injurious to the glory of God and the interest of his church, than for any thing that can happen to ourselves. We find that even the meek Jesus was affected with passion upon observing the sanctity of his father's house profaned by merchandize, and the place of prayer changed into a den of thieves: but one does not read of any resentment he expressed, all the time that he was in the hands of his bitterest enemies, and exposed to their outrageous insults; though his body was without comparison a temple far more glorious and precious than that material one, for which the Jews testified so much respect, and shewed so much concern for its safety."

Ver. 3. For they were newly returned from the captivity, and all the people of Judea were gathered together; and the vessels, and the altar, and the house, were sanctified after the profanation.] It is a great dispute among the learned, whether what is related here happened before or after the captivity, and where the date of this transaction is to be placed. Those who maintain the latter opinion, ground it chiefly upon this passage, wherein the author, according to the Greek version, says (for the Vulgate wholly omits it), that the Jews were newly returned from captivity, and the vessels, and the altar, and the house, were sanctified after the profanation. And v. 18, 19. it is farther affirmed, That they were led captives into a land which was not theirs; that the temple of their God was cast to the ground, and their cities taken by the enemy; but now are they come up from the places where they were scattered, and have possessed Jerusalem again. The bare reading of these passages, say they, naturally leads one to conclude, that what is here mentioned was not transacted till after the return from the captivity; which is confirmed by the opinion of many of the ancients, as well as moderns. (See Calmet's Pref. sur le Liv. Judith, and Stackhouse's Hist. of the Bib.) Those who maintain that this transaction happened before the captivity are divided, some placing it under Manasses, and others under Zedekiah; but the difficulties on either hypothesis possibly may be adjusted, if we be careful to distinguish the slight and particular dispersions and captivities of the Jews, from the long and more general one; and if we understand the captivity here referred to, not of the grand captivity of Babylon, but of one that was slight in comparison of it, that in the time of Manasseh seems most probable to be meant. When that prince was carried captive to Babylon, what is here mentioned of the country being desolate, the people dispersed, and the temple profaned, really happened; and upon his return from thence with some of his subjects, and being restored to his kingdom through God's blessing upon his exemplary penitence, the temple by as great a zeal for the true religion was purified again, and the service of the sanctuary restored to its ancient dignity. (2 Chron. xxxiii. 12—14.) But it must be acknowledged, that in St. Jerome's version, made from the original Chaldee, as is supposed, this verse, on which the controversy is founded, is wholly left out; and it is no improbable conjecture of a very learned writer, that it was put into the Greek version (from whence the English is taken) from some of those corrupted copies of the original, which St. Jerome complains of. (Prid. Connex. vol. i. p. 32.) As the authority, therefore, of this, and that other passage, v. 18. is so dubious, nothing certain can be concluded from either, or both of them, as to the point in question.

Ver. 4. Therefore they sent into all the coasts of Samaria, and the villages, &c.] Nothing could have induced these two irreconcilable enemies, the Jews and the Samaritans, who had a mutual aversion to each other, (see note on Ecclus. l. 25, 26.) to act jointly, and to be confederates, but the sense of the common danger which threatened them from the expedition of Holofernes.

Ver. 5. And possessed themselves beforehand of all the tops of the high mountains, and fortified the villages that were in them.] As Jonathan the high-priest did against Apollonius, (1 Macc. x. 70.) being by the nature of their situation more tenable and less easy of access. During the captivity, and some time after, not villages only, but almost all the cities, lay defenceless, and even Jerusalem itself was without sufficient walls for its security, as may easily be imagined in such a time of desolation and distress.

Ver. 6. Joacim the high-priest which was in those days in Jerusalem.] He is sometimes called Eliakim; accordingly St. Jerome's version promiscuously uses both names for this high-priest. The Syriac also does the like: and indeed they are both names for the same person. And so Luke iii. 23. Some copies have Joiakim instead of Heli, which, according to Chemnitius, is Eliakim contracted; and Philo makes Joiakim, Heli, and Eliakim, to mean the same person. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 34. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4.) It has been objected against this history, that none of the name of Joiakim or Eliakim is to be found either in the Scriptures or in Josephus, that was high-priest before the captivity. As to that part of the objection from the Scriptures, it may be answered, that the succession of the high-priests is so imperfectly recorded there, that Joacim might easily be omitted: for whoever examines the succession of the Jewish high-priests, as we have them delivered to us in the first book of Chronicles, and in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, will find them so intricate and perplexed, so many omissions and dislocations, such a diversity of names and numbers, and such seeming contrariety in the several accounts, as will cost no small pains to reduce them to any tolerable regularity. The reason is, because the Scripture no where professes to give an exact catalogue of all such as had been admitted to that office and dignity until the captivity. And in such catalogues as are delivered, several are inserted that never were high-priests, and several are omitted that were. The high-priests of the family of Eli are instances of the latter, for they are left out of that pedigree; and those of the true race who were excluded by them are instances of the former, for they are in it, though they never were high-priests. It is very likely, as Prideaux observes, that from the time of Solomon to the captivity, many more such instances might have happened to hinder that pedigree from being an exact catalogue of the high-priests. But it is not certain that Joacim or Eliakim is not named in Scripture; for several learned men are inclined to think, that what is said of Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, Isa. xxii. doth very well agree with that part which Joacim is said to have acted in this book. (Connex. lib. i.) As to the catalogue of Josephus, that too is so imperfect and corrupt, that scarce five names in it agree with the Scripture account. For several are in his catalogue who never were high-priests, and several are left out that were; particularly Amasiah in the time of Jehoshaphat, Jehoiada in the reign of Joash, and Azariah in that of Uzziah: and therefore Joacim might have been high-priest at this time, though there be no mention made of him as such, either in the Scriptures or the history of Josephus.

Ver. 8. And the children of Israel did as Joacim the high-priest had commanded them.] One is surprised to find in this important juncture, and indeed throughout this history, the high-priest Joacim giving all the orders, and no mention in any respect made of the king, though this was an affair of state rather than religion, and the supreme power was doubtless in him; as if he had no concern in or for the event of this war, nor for the danger threatened to his people, and his duty did not call upon him more loudly to do and order what the high-priest is here represented as doing. But the conjecture of very many learned men is not at all improbable, that at this time Manasseh dwelt at Jerusalem, being just returned from the Babylonish captivity, and being deeply affected with that calamity, and with the mercy shewed to him in his deliverance, cared not to concern or interest himself with public affairs, being wholly intent upon serving God. And it is not unlikely, that from his long confinement and the miseries he underwent, he might so have impaired his health, as to be hindered from acting in a public sphere: or it is possible that he might then be engaged in the defence of some other part of his kingdom, and so devolved the care of public business upon the high-priest and senate, who had acted during his absence. Josephus informs us, Antiq. lib. x. cap. 4. from the time that Manasses returned from Babylon, he spent the whole remainder of his time in the service and worship of God with the greatest strictness, being a sincere penitent for the many abominations he had committed. And the Scripture intimates the same, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 13. where it is said of him, that he humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers, and took away the strange gods, and the idol, out of the house of the Lord. And though it is said, ver. 14. that he built a wall without the city of David for its defence, and put captains of war in all the fenced cities of Judah, yet in the general, after he was humbled by his great affliction, he committed the management of public business, and especially the fortifying frontier-places, to the high-priest and other great men. On the other hand it is said, that allowing him to be greatly intent on devotion, and not to concern himself with public business, yet, in such a case, the name and authority of the king had not been dropped, nor is usually, though the act was the act of the minister. And as to the possibility of Manasses being engaged in the defence of some other part of his kingdom, or in some foreign expedition, neither the concurrence of history, sacred or profane, nor Manasses's own circumstances, are thought to countenance such a supposition: and had it been so, might it not have been expected that the author of this very history should have dropped some notice of it, as the reason of Joacim's acting on this occasion with an absolute and independent power?

Ver. 9. Then every man of Israel cried to God with great fervency, and with great vehemency did they humble their souls.] It is not to be doubted but that the Israelites, by fortifying the hills, and guarding the passages, and the like necessary provision in a time of danger, used all the precautions possible to prevent any surprise from their enemies; but it is manifest that they did not place their whole confidence in human policy or foresight. They did all that was in their power for their security, because God allows his creatures to employ all lawful means for that purpose; but being convinced of the truth of David's observation, Psal. cxxvii. 2. Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain, they had recourse, according to the direction of the high-priest, to prayer, fasting, and humiliation, as to arms, which alone could render them invincible. And presuming these instances of mortification to be well-pleasing to and successful with God, they continued them for many days in all Judea and Jerusalem, (ver. 13.) waiting for God's protection and assistance at the time, and in the manner, he should please to send it; and it was this perseverance that at length procured them victory. The Vulgate puts the following speech into the mouth of Joacim the high-priest, Scitote quoniam exaudiet Dominus preces vestras, si manentes permanseritis in jejuniis et orationibus in conspectu Domini. Memores estote Moysi servi Dei, qui Amalec confidentem in virtute et potentia sua, et in exercitu suo, et in clypeis suis, et in curribus et in equitibus suis, non ferro pugnando, sed precibus sanctis orando dejecit. Sic erunt universi hostes Israel, si perseveraveritis in hoc opere quod cœpistis. One cannot but observe, how different the conduct and behaviour of the Israelites was upon this occasion from that of common armies. They thought the help of man was but vain, and therefore their trust was in the Lord of hosts. Instead of the sound of trumpets, and other warlike instruments, they poured forth their devout supplications to him that was able to save, accompanied with strong crying and tears. Instead of outward pomp and the pride of dress, they were distinguished by sackcloth and ashes, and lowly prostrations. And who among the proud Assyrians, seeing such instances of dejection, would not have despised and laughed at these Israelites, as a people half dead with fear, and even almost below their notice to engage with? and yet it was this profound humiliation that was alone available to oppose and subdue the haughtiness and pride of Holofernes. Other nations hastily submitted through the very terror of his name, but this people, providing better for their safety, humbled themselves under, and thereby obtained, the help of the mighty hand of God, and triumphed over him who threatened revenge upon the whole earth.

Ver. 14. And Joacim the high-priest, and all the priests that stood before the Lord, and they which ministered unto the Lord, had their loins girt with sackcloth, and offered the daily burnt-offerings, with the vows and free gifts of the people, Ver. 15. And had ashes on their mitres, and cried unto the Lord with all their power.] The Vulgate is more emphatical than our version, Etiam hi qui offerebant Domino holocausta, præcincti ciliciis offerrent sacrificia Domino. Only it is observable, that it omits the mention of the high-priest. And indeed the occasion must be more pressing and calamitous than ordinary, for the high-priest himself, if not to put off his glorious apparel altogether, at least to appear in the time of the public ministration in the habit of a mourner, who might not mourn, according to the law, for the death of his nearest kin; (Lev. xxi. 10, 11.) but public calamities, such as affected the very being of the state, admitted of an exemption from the ordinary rule. Accordingly the prophet Joel, in such a time of distress, exhorts that the priests, the ministers of the altar, should gird themselves, lament, and howl, and lie all night in sackcloth, (i. 13.)

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. AND had laid impediments in the champaigne countries.] The word σκάνδαλον here used has many significations: it sometimes signifies, in general, any obstacle or hinderance laid in a man's way, by which a passenger is detained or stopped: here it is peculiarly taken to signify those sharp stakes, or other instruments, which in time of war men were wont to put in the fields, where the enemy was expected to follow, to wound their feet or legs with, and thereby to retard their passage, and therefore here properly called impediments. Against which accident, being so usual and ordinary in war, anciently they used greaves of brass to defend their feet or legs. (See 1 Sam. xvii. 6.)

Ver. 2. Wherewith he was very angry, and called all the princes of Moab, and the captains of Ammon.] He applied to these more particularly, says Calmet, as he presumed, that the Moabites and Ammonites, being neighbours to the Hebrews, could better inform him of the truth than any other persons.

Ver. 3. Tell me now who this people is that dwelleth in the hill country.] It may seem strange, and scarce to be credited, that a general of the Assyrians, such a one as Holofernes was, should be ignorant of the people of the Jews, and ask the questions which are here mentioned concerning them; but it is probable that Holofernes was not of the number of those captains of the king of Assyria, whom the Lord sent to carry Manasseh into captivity, and therefore possibly he might not understand either their constitution and discipline, or the situation and extent of their country, much less the genius of the people, their original and genealogy; since even Tacitus the historian, who had conferred both with Titus and Vespasian, who overthrew Jerusalem, seems unacquainted with their genealogy, when he affirms, that they came from Ida, a mountain of Crete. (Hist. lib. v.) The questions here proposed to the princes of Moab, and the captains of Ammon, seem not to have proceeded from any ignorance of this people, nor to have been really asked for information's sake; for, considering the trophies, and spoils, and number of captives, brought from Judea not very many years before, by those powerful kings of Assyria, Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmaneser, and Sennacherib, such particulars relating to the Jews could not but be known. But they are questions rather of a sneering and insulting general, despising the enemies he had to deal with, as of no note or consequence, and not worthy of any regard. Not unlike that expression of the proud Pharaoh, speaking of the God of Israel with great contempt, Who is the Lord that I should obey his voice? (Exod. v.) and that of Nebuchadnezzar, (Dan. iii.) Who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands? But that of churlish Nabal, 1 Sam. xxv. 10. comes nearest the point, Who is David? and who is the son of Jesse? But the more the Assyrians despised the Jews, the more must they be surprised, and the greater their confusion, when they beheld their proud and insulting general vanquished and killed, with the far greater part of his army, by the means of one single woman among that people, whom they would seem even not to know, in order to depress and undervalue them the more.

What king is set over them, or captain of their army?] The Vulgate has only, Quis rex militiæ illorum, without the distinction. The latter clause seems exegetical of part of the office of a king; viz. his leading out and going forth before his people to battle. (2 Sam. xxi. 17.) Holofernes might possibly ask the question, who was their king, as Manasses's captivity might be a secret to him, who was not carried to Nineveh or Susa, but to Babylon.

Ver. 5. I will declare unto thee the truth; . . . and there shall no lie come out of the mouth of thy servant.] Such instances as these are not to be considered as tautology; they are used to shew the earnestness of the speaker, and to gain an easier belief by a more vigorous manner of expression. There are many instances in Scripture of this manner of reduplication. See Deut. ix. 7. 2 Kings ix. 3. Matt. xxviii. 14. Mark xiv. 61. Luke i. 20. ix. 45. John i. 20. Acts xiii. 11. xiv. 8. xviii. 9. 1 Thess. v. 5. Apoc. iii. 16. and particularly 1 John ii. 27. which very much resembles the passage before us; as does that of Plato, ψεύδεσθαι, καὶ μὴ τἀληθῆ λέγειν, who has also, ἀπειθοῦντες, καὶ μὴ πειθόμενοι; and so Virgil, Non adversata petenti Annuit; and instances are still more frequent among the Greek poets, particularly Homer, Euripides, Sophocles, and Aristophanes.

Captain of all the sons of Ammon.] Under the general title of the sons of Ammon, some conceive to be comprised the Edomites, or Idumeans, who may be considered as brethren of the Jews, being descended from Esau, the brother of Jacob; and that they chose to pass under that name at this time, to avoid the odium of being engaged against and invading the Israelites their kinsmen. Achior, the chief of these people, it may be presumed, was an Idumean likewise, and, having a perfect knowledge of all that concerned the Jews, was the spokesman to Holofernes, and gave him all the light and intelligence concerning them that is mentioned in this chapter; and from the detail here given of them, it appears that he very well understood their history. One cannot but take notice of the open manner in which he speaks to the Assyrian general of the people of the Jews, and of the God of Israel's impartial and just dealing with them, according as their conduct deserved; an observation tending greatly to his glory, and scarce to be expected from this Ammonite. And there seems to be something providential in it, and not merely chance, that he should find admittance and protection among this people, and even be made one of them by the rite of circumcision, where in all human appearance he might rather have expected to have been evil-entreated, or to have suffered death as a spy, or an enemy in disguise.

Ver. 6. This people are descended of the Chaldeans.] We read, Gen. xi. 31. that Terah took Abraham his son, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife, and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan. Hence the children of Israel are said here to be descended of the Chaldeans, as claiming Abraham for their father, who was a Chaldean: and probably it was with design to render Holofernes favourable to the Jews, that Achior represents to him, in the beginning of his speech, that they were descended of the Chaldeans, as Holofernes himself was a subject of the Assyrian monarch, the prince of that country.

Ver. 8. For they left the way of their ancestors, and worshipped the God of heaven, the God whom they knew; so they cast them out from the face of their gods, and they fled into Mesopotamia, and sojourned there for many days.] As these nations had been long infected with idolatry, and were under a government that established and supported idolatrous worship, the ancestors of Abraham and his family were expelled this land for worshipping the God of heaven, and leaving the way of their forefathers; a land so famous for superstition and idolatry, that Chaldeans and magicians were synonymous terms. From hence they passed into Mesopotamia, i. e. into a province so called from its situation between the two rivers, Tigris and Euphrates; and on account of their relation to Abraham, the Jews are said to sojourn with him there. For as they are mentioned in the foregoing verse to be descended from the Chaldeans, because Abraham, from whom their stock was derived, was a Chaldean, so are they here represented on the same account, as accompanying him and settling with him in Mesopotamia. St. Stephen, Acts vii. 2—4. greatly illustrates what Achior here adds; when speaking to the Jews, he says, The God of glory appeared unto Abraham, and ordered him to depart this country, &c. Then came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran; and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed into the land of Canaan. Abraham's stay at Charran is supposed, by the most exact chronologers, to be about two years; but Achior's expression, He sojourned there many days, seems to imply a much longer time, as appears from the same phrase, ver. 16.

Ver. 10. But when a famine covered all the land of Canaan, they went down into Egypt.] Calmet observes, that Achior, in his narration, seems to confound the going of Abraham into Egypt with that of Jacob's thither: but there is not much weight in this observation, as the account here is of the Jewish people and their concerns collectively, rather than of Abraham personally. However this be, it reminds me to illustrate a like instance, Acts vii. 16. where St. Luke, in reciting St. Stephen's speech, either puts Abraham for Jacob, (see Vitring. in Isai. Prolegom. p. 23.) or Abraham must be used here patronymically, for Jacob, his descendant; or possibly the name Abraham crept into the text, as Beza suspects, from a marginal annotation.

Ver. 16. And all the Gergesites.] The Gergesenes, or Girgashites, were an ancient people of the land of Canaan; their habitation was beyond the sea of Tiberias, where we find some footsteps of their name in the city of Gergesa, upon the lake of Tiberias. The rabbins inform us, that, when Joshua first came into the land of Canaan, the Gergesenes took a resolution rather to forsake their country than to submit to the Hebrews. They are also of opinion, that Joshua proposed the following conditions to the Canaanites, viz. flight, subjection, or war. The Gergesenes resolved to fly, and accordingly retired into Afric; and to this flight possibly that inscription in Phœnician characters, which Procopius mentions, may refer; "We are some of those people who fled before that robber, Joshua, the son of Nun." Though the tradition be very old, that the Gergesenes fled out of the land of Canaan when Joshua entered it, nevertheless it is certain, that a good number of them stayed behind; since Joshua himself informs us, that he subdued the Girgashites, (Josh. xxiv. 11.) and they whom he overcame were certainly on this side Jordan. It may be, therefore, that they who fled into Afric were the Girgashites, who dwelt beyond the sea of Tiberias, and that the others continued in the country; and both these may be meant and included in the expression here, All the Gergesites. By the Sichemites, mentioned just before, the Hivites seem to be intended.

Ver. 17. And whilst they sinned not before their God, they prospered, because the God that hateth iniquity was with them. Ver. 18. But when they departed from the way which he appointed them, they were destroyed in many battles very sore.] This observation of Achior's was framed according to the known experience of those times; for the rise and fall, the prosperity or adversity, of the Jewish people, was, in the apprehension of other nations, as well as their own, always proportionable to their own religious behaviour, and not to be measured by any rules of policy or the effect of it. The ground of this observation was God's first promise to Abraham, Gen. xii. 2, 3. which promise, as it principally concerned the temporal state of the Jews, was to be limited according to the tenor of Achior's speech, and did then only take effect, when they followed Abraham's footsteps, and lived in a faithful obedience to God's laws; or, having transgressed them, did turn again with their whole hearts to seek the God of their fathers. And it was their love of sin, so displeasing unto God, which brought them so often into subjection unto their enemies, according to that of the Psalmist, lxxxi. 14, 15. O that my people would have hearkened unto me; for if Israel had walked in my ways, I should soon have put down their enemies, and turned my hand against their adversaries; and that of Solomon, Prov. xvi. 7. When the ways of a man please the Lord, he maketh his enemies to be at peace with him. As the nations round about Judea waited all such opportunities to take revenge of the Jews, when God by their misery and calamities seemed to forsake them, so, for the same reasons, were the nations round about as earnestly bent to hinder the re-edifying of Jerusalem after their return from the captivity, as fearing lest this people's good fortune should rise again with their city walls, as Nehemiah expressly intimates, vi. 16. that after the enemies had heard that the wall was finished, they were afraid, and their courage failed them, for they knew that this work was wrought of God. (See Jackson's Works, vol. i. p. 86.) Hence did the wise men of Chaldea, upon the first notice of the Jews beginning to recover themselves, and fortune turning for them, read Haman's destiny, but too late, If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt not prevail against him, but shalt surely fall before him. (Esth. vi. 13.) See also Ezra viii. 22. which comes nearer this place. A very learned prelate observes of this speech of Achior's to Holofernes (whether truly uttered or feigned, says he, by the penman of the history), that it was framed and grounded upon the confessed observations of those times, and contained such advices as a faithful counsellor, well acquainted with the affairs of the Jews, should have given to his lord, who did not so well understand them. (Patrick's Com. on Esth. vi. 13.)

Ver. 18. They were destroyed in many battles very sore, and were led captives into a land that was not theirs.] Some would have the captivity here referred to, to be that under Nabuchodonosor, and the restoration from it here mentioned to be that under Cyrus: Plantin's Bibles manifestly take it in this sense, referring in the margin of this place to 1 Esd. i. 2. Others understand it of that under Shalmaneser; but it seems less liable to exceptions, to explain the place of the Assyrian captivity in the time of Manasseh, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. when Judea was wasted by the Chaldeans, than of the Babylonish one, which happened after. The Vulgate seems to take it in this sense, rendering here, Exterminati sunt prœliis a multis nationibus, et plurimi eorum captivi abducti sunt, &c. If Achior had been here speaking of the Jews carried captive to Babylon by Nabuchodonosor, he would not have said, many of them, but all; nor that they were destroyed in battle by many nations; for in that grand captivity they were oppressed only by one nation, viz. the Chaldeans.

And the temple of their God was cast to the ground.] As this particular is not in St. Jerome's version, and probably was put into the Greek from some corrupted copy of the original, nothing certain can be concluded for or against this history, or the true time of it, from this passage of the speech of Achior. (See note on iv. 3. and Du Pin's Prelim. Dissert. p. 20.) Perhaps by the words as they now stand in the Greek and English versions, nothing more is intended or meant than a profanation of the temple, and its dignity being thereby brought low. That the temple may be said to be in a manner destroyed by a profanation of it, see 2 Kings xxi. 2 Chron. xxxiii. that it was destroyed actually by the Chaldeans in the time of Manasseh is not true, which happened in the reign of Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar, and so must be a great mistake if understood strictly: and besides, the whole tenor of this book intimates the temple then to be standing: (see iv. 2. viii. 24.) or these words may be considered as spoken by a stranger, an Ammonite, who might possibly without grounds allege the destruction of the temple, as Rabshakeh does, 2 Kings xviii. 22. with regard to Hezekiah's taking away the altar of the Lord.

Ver. 19. Now they are returned to their God, and are come up from the places where they were scattered.] As what is said in the foregoing verse seems best understood of the Assyrian captivity in the time of Manasseh, when the Jews were dispersed into different parts, and left their country desolate, so the return from their dispersion here mentioned seems better to be referred to the restoration of that prince, when Jerusalem, which had been for a time in the hands of the Assyrians, was restored to him, and the temple, which was desolate and in a manner destroyed, recovered its former lustre, being again frequented and purified, and its holy service re-established. There is nothing in this exposition but what is agreeable to the history of Manasseh, as far as can be collected from the short account which we have in the books of Kings and Chronicles, and it is liable to fewer objections, than understanding the place of the restoration of the Jews to their own land, after the Babylonish captivity, which happened later.

Ver. 20. If there be any error in this people.] This is better expressed in the next sentence, which fixes and determines the sense of this passage. The Hellenists often express sins by errors or ignorances: see Numb. xii. 11. Ezra viii. 22. 1 Esd. viii. 77. Ecclus. xxiii. 2, 3. and many others in the canonical and apocryphal writings, where error and ignorance plainly mean sins and transgressions.

Ver. 23. We will not be afraid of the face of the children of Israel; for, lo, it is a people that have no strength nor power for a strong battle.] This boast of Holofernes's officers, and their contemptuous scorn of the Jews, as a people having no strength nor power for war, shews their ignorance of the true God, the God of Israel, who, to display his own almighty power, and what little stress is to be laid on the arm of flesh, often interposes in behalf of his chosen in a way not usual nor expected. To give peace to a favourite land he will enable five to chase a hundred, and a hundred to put ten thousand to flight. (Lev. xxvi. 8. Deut. xxxii. 30. Josh. xxiii. 10.) The more unprovided the Israelites were of military strength, the more room was left for the invincible arm of the Almighty to appear with uncommon glory in their behalf; the less they knew of the art of war, the more their enemies ought to admire, in the victories gained by them, the all-powerful hand of Him who declared for them, and who supplied, in a manner so extraordinary, what was wanting either in strength or policy.

Ver. 24. Now, therefore, lord Holofernes, we will go up, and they shall be a prey to be devoured of all thine army.] Messieurs of Port-Royal conclude this chapter with the following fine reflection upon the abject obsequiousness of Holofernes's minions: "Such generally is the false wisdom and servile complaisance of those who think they cannot please their princes, or ingratiate themselves into their favour so well, as by telling them, not what is most agreeable to truth or right reason, but that which most sensibly flatters their pride, and soothes their vanity. For what in truth was more reasonable than Achior's whole harangue? he does not attempt or presume to compare, in any respect, the power and force of the Israelites with that of Nabuchodonosor, but, as if it was insignificant in itself, and not of consequence enough to be mentioned, resolves their whole strength, and the success they were occasionally blessed with, into the favour and protection of their God. Could any thing be conceived in less offensive terms, or even a Jew have expressed himself better? Or can there be a greater instance of presumption and wickedness, than to think an injury done to Nabuchodonosor, by setting God above him, or preferring him only before him?" (Com. in loc.)

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 2. HIRELINGS of Ephraim.*] Calmet suspects from Achior being called, ver. 5. a hireling of Ammon, that this reading is a mistake; and indeed this conjecture seems confirmed from the Syriac version, which has mercenarii Ammon in both places. The expression implies great disrespect and contempt; but the sarcasm is much stronger upon the Jews, when Holofernes calls them, ver. 5. The people that came out of Egypt, intimating that they were a race of slaves.

Ver. 2. And who art thou, Achior, and the hirelings of Ephraim, that thou hast prophesied amongst us as to-day, and hast said, That we should not make war with the people of Israel, because their God will defend them?] Achior's speech in the foregoing chapter is much to be admired for the justness of the sentiments, and the generous disinterestedness with which he supports the cause of the God of Israel: though himself was one of the uncircumcised, he harangues like Moses or Joshua on the state of the Jewish people, their good or evil success, according as they continued faithful, or otherwise, in the service of the true God. To hear him thus speak of and extol the mighty power of the God of Israel, when he regarded, and would have all others likewise regard, Nabuchodonosor as the most high God, and only invincible, grated the jealousy and ambition of the Assyrian general; and one would have expected from his pride and fury, that he would instantly have ordered him to be put to death, for the freedom with which he expressed himself. But this was not in his own or master's power, how great an idea soever he had conceived of it; God had resolved to reward a declaration, so much to his honour, from the mouth of this alien, and to reserve him to become one at length of his chosen, whose cause he had so signally vindicated. The honest freedom of Achior, and the evil return it met with, are not without precedent in history; the following extract bears a near resemblance and affinity to it:—Darius being on the point of giving battle to Alexander, demanded of Charidemus, an Athenian captain, what he thought of his army: the stranger answered, That it might serve to frighten some neighbouring states, but it appeared to him not disciplined or strong enough to oppose the forces of Alexander, which he commended exceedingly, especially for their experience and discipline; "That to an army of Macedonians equal forces should be opposed, and the silver and gold which shone upon the arms of his soldiers, would be better disposed of to levy forces in Greece. Pari robore opus est. In illa terra, quæ nos genuit, auxilia quærenda sunt; argentum istud atque aurum ad conducendum militem mitte." Darius, though naturally humane and good-natured, was vexed with so free an answer, and without any farther consideration ordered him to be killed on the spot; but he was soon sensible of the rashness of this step; he lost the battle, and lamented the hasty sentence pronounced upon one who had given him so good advice. (Q. Curt. lib. iii.) The speech of Holofernes here, conceived in the spirit of military pride, and expressed in domineering and insulting terms, and with a full confidence of victory, reminds one either of that of Goliath the Philistine, defying the armies of the living God, and threatening to give the flesh of David, whom he haughtily disdained, in comparison of his enormous self, unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field, 1 Sam. xvii. or that of Rab-shakeh, whom Sennacherib sent to reproach the living God; Hear the word of the great king, the king of Assyria; hearken not unto Hezekiah, when he persuadeth you, saying, The Lord will deliver us. Who are they among all the gods of the countries that have delivered their country out of mine hand, that the Lord should deliver Jerusalem out of mine hand? (2 Kings xviii.) But the event shewed, that the confidence of such profane boasters was but vain; their blasphemies drew down upon them God's judgments, and their overthrow made it appear, that the Lord he is the God, the Lord he is the God.

And who is God but Nabuchodonosor?] It was thus his sycophants flattered him. The truth is, if we will credit the account here given of this prince, he was a professed atheist: the sense of his success in life, and of the wonderful deeds performed by him, especially in a military capacity, had so intoxicated his reason, that the avowed purpose of his sending his armies under Holofernes was, that all nations should worship him only, and that all tongues and tribes should call upon him as God. In like manner a successor of his, Nebuchadnezzar the Great, upon the contemplation of his magnificence and greatness, grew so arrogant and elate as to think himself equal at least to God: Is not this great Babylon, which I have built by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? (Dan. iv. 30.) But they were both at length convinced, the former by the shameful death of his general and the defeat of all his forces, and the latter by being reduced to the condition of a beast, that the Most High only ruleth in the kingdoms of the earth. It is surprising to observe from this instance, that of Heliogabalus, and others, that such princes as have been worst and most abandoned, and have acted even below the very character of men, have most affected Divine honours, and to be acknowledged and complimented as gods.

Ver. 4. For he said, none of my words shall be in vain.] Οὐ ματαιωθήσονται τὰ ῥήματα τῶν λόγων μου. As Nabuchodonosor would pass for a god, so he affected to talk like one, his orders are absolute and uncontrollable, as if he was possessed of all power both in heaven and earth. As דבר signifies among the Hebrews both a word and thing, so ῥῆμα hath the same double meaning among the Hellenists; see particularly Deut. xvii. 1. Luke i. 37. Acts x. 37. accordingly ῥήματα τῶν λόγων, to avoid tautology, must signify the things, matter, or contents, of his speech.

Ver. 5. And thou Achior, a hireling of Ammon, which hast spoken these words in the day of thine iniquity.] i.e. Who hast been hired by the Jews to prophesy falsely, to discourage my soldiers, and hast this day betrayed thy perfidiousness and treachery. Junius accordingly has, Qui prolocutus es sermones istos injustitiæ tuæ; and the margin, Quum perfidiam tuam, ut mercenarius improbus, retexisti. It is a Hebraism, and means, that he had that day spoken words of iniquity, i.e. of baseness and falsehood, as would be proved by the event.

Ver. 6. And thou shalt fall among their slain, when I return.] Ὅταν ἐπιστρέψω. When I shall turn, or put my enemies to flight, says Badwell; and so the Geneva version has it, Thou shalt fall among the slain when I shall put them to flight: or the meaning may be, which the words seem more naturally to suggest, When I return victorious and in peace; and in this sense it reminds one of what the king of Israel said to Micaiah the prophet, Put this fellow in the prison, and feed him with bread of affliction and water of affliction, until I come in peace. And the answer there given is equally applicable, If thou return at all in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. And he said, Hearken, O people, every one of you. (1 Kings xxii. 27, 28.)

Ver. 9. And if thou persuade thyself in thy mind, that they shall not be taken, let not thy countenance fall.] See Gen. iv. 5. where the like phrase is used to signify Cain's grief and discontent; and Job xxix. 24. such a state of mind is expressed by the falling of the light of the countenance, as the lifting up of the face on the contrary was a token of comfort, joy, and confidence. (Job xi. 15.) The meaning here seems to be, "If thou art assured of the truth of what thou sayest, do not betray any, or so much concern and fear, nor let signs of conscious guilt and confusion appear on thy countenance: if thou art indeed a true prophet, there is no occasion for fear; but if by the event thou art detected to be a false one, thy perfidiousness will draw on thee, thou must expect, a more severe punishment."

Ver. 10. Then Holofernes commanded his servants that waited in his tent to take Achior, and bring him to Bethulia, and deliver him into the hands of the children of Israel.] Holofernes, transported with fury at Achior's open and free manner of speaking, says to him, "Since you have taken upon you to be a prophet, in telling us that the God of Israel would be the defender of his people, to shew you that there is no other god but Nabuchodonosor, my master, when we have put these people to the sword, we will destroy you likewise.—And that you may yourself experience the vanity of your own prophecy, I will have you carried to Bethulia, there to run the same risk, and undergo the same fate, with them, whom you believe and pronounce to be invincible." "Propelli Accitor (says Sulpicius, Sac. Hist. l. 2.) in castra Hebræorum jubet, ut cum his periret, quos vinci non posse affirmaverat." The insulting general hereby intended no favour to Achior; he spared his life only that he might at length take it from him in a manner that should most sensibly affect him; viz. after he had seen with his own eyes the entire ruin of a people, whose God he had so much extolled as their protector. But how unsearchable is the counsel, and adorable the conduct, of the Most High, who knows how to confound the blindness, and disappoint the ambition, of wicked enterprising spirits, and to procure mercy and deliverance for his chosen by those very means, which short-sighted wisdom had contrived most effectually to destroy them!

Bethulia.] From what quarter Holofernes attacked Judea is not certain, and much more uncertain where to fix this Bethulia, though it be the very seat of the siege itself. Many learned men think they see reason from iii. 9,10. iv. 6. vii. 3. to place it northwards in the tribe of Zebulun. But the following difficulties attend this opinion; Bethulia is said to be the frontier-town, and entrance into the hill country, vii. 1. but that the hill country lay at a distance from this tribe, is plain from St. Luke, chap. i. who tells us, the Virgin Mary arose from Nazareth (which was in the tribe of Zebulun, and neighbourhood of Bethulia), and went into the hill country; which plainly enough infers, the hill country was different from the tribe of Zebulun; divided indeed from it at the distance of many days' journey, being on the south of the tribe of Judah, "Initium sumpsit Mons Amorrhæus a Cadesh Barnea, limite terræ Israeliticæ Australi, ac se horrente gibbositate protrusit in Judæam, ultra Hebronem, mutato nomine tandem in montanum Judææ." (Lightfoot, Cent. Chorog. in Matt. p. 23.) Again, all the persons of Bethulia, whose tribe is distinguished, were of the tribe of Simeon; so Judith, Manasseh her husband, and Ozias the governor, &c. the town itself therefore cannot but be supposed to belong to that tribe. How then shall we account for a town of the Simeonites in another tribe, and that not near, but at a great distance from, the tribe of Simeon? These inconveniences, I presume, have induced others to place Bethulia within the limits of the tribe of Simeon, which tribe reached the hill country. In favour of this opinion, we find a Bethul, Josh. xix. 4. within Simeon's division; and again, 1 Chron. iv. 30. Bethuel; both which names easily take the Greek form, Bethulia. Yet this situation seems not consistent with iii. 9, 10. and iv. 6. much less with its neighbourhood to Dothaim, which last, it seems pretty clear, was in the northern parts of the land. For when Jacob was at Hebron (which town is known to be in that part of the country which was afterward the tribe of Judah, with the tribe of Simeon to its south and southwest), his ten sons went out to feed their father's flock to Shechem, which lies several miles north of the tribe of Judah; thither he sent their brother Joseph to inquire after their welfare, who found they were removed farther into the country, even to Dothan; or, as it is called in the same verse, Dothain, which is the same with Dothaim, the difference only lying in the Chaldee termination. This is again about twenty miles north of Sichem, and brings us into the tribe of Zebulun; consequently, Bethulia, which was in the neighbourhood of Dothaim, that lay in one of the northern tribes, could not be in the tribe of Simeon, which was the farthest of all the tribes southward. Eusebius, de loc. Hebr. has a passage which confirms this, "Dothaim, ubi invenit Joseph fratres suos pecora pascentes, qui et usque hodie in duodecimo a Sebaste milliario contra Aquilonis plagam ostenditur;" i. e. Dothaim lay twelve miles north of Sebaste, which was another name for Samaria. Farther, if Holofernes attacked the Jews on the north side of the land, as has been inferred from some passages in the present history, then if Bethulia were in the tribe of Simeon, and south of Jerusalem, he must, which is absurd, have left Jerusalem, the capital of the kingdom, behind him unsubdued, and be got to the end of the country, where the history represents him as but at the key or entrance into it. It seems better therefore to acknowledge, that this writer was inaccurate in his geography, which he has some excuse for, as being the general fault of his countrymen, especially after the captivity, than, from some difficulties about the situation of the place, to conclude against its existence at all; especially if we credit what Adrichomius affirms with much confidence, "Exstat etiamnum in monte hoc quoddam castellum, et multa pulchra ædificia, plurimæque urbis ruinæ; sicuti etiam in campo versus Dothain, castrorum Holofernis adhuc vestigia quædam restare scribuntur." (Theatr. Terr. Sanct. p. 137.)

Ver. 15. Ozias of the tribe of Simeon.] Whether Bethulia was a city of the tribe of Zebulun, or Simeon, Ozias probably was free of it; or when the ten tribes were carried away captive to Assyria, he was perhaps, by chance or design, carried to Bethulia; or possibly upon this expedition of Holofernes he was sent to Bethulia by king Manasses, or Joacim the high-priest, with a public character or commission, as one who was capable of giving orders, and commanding upon so important an occasion. By the Vulgate he is called the prince of Judah, chap. viii. and prince of the people of Israel, chap. xiii. which makes it the more probable, that, being a man of authority and consequence, he was sent to Bethulia to defend that place against the assault of Nabuchodonosor's army, and was for that time at least one of the governors of the place. They are called the ancients of the city, viii. 10. x. 6.

Ver. 19. And look upon the face of those that are sanctified unto thee this day.] There are different senses of these words. Some understand them, as if the Jews prayed to God at this melancholy juncture, in the following manner: "Look not upon our merit, which is as nothing, but upon the merits of thy faithful saints, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and others, who have distinguished themselves by continuing true and steadfast in thy covenant; that we, who labour under the burden of our sins, and are justly punishable for them, may, on their account, and in regard to their righteousness, be accepted by thee, and obtain the deliverance we at present stand in need of." Or they may be understood of the Jews in general, urging before God their near relation to him, as his peculium, thus:—"Regard, O Lord, the prayers of thy people, whom thou hast separated from all other nations, whom thou hast adopted in an especial manner, and chosen to be thine inheritance." Or the meaning may be, "Hear the supplications of those who have prepared and sanctified themselves in this time of calamity, to appear before thee, who join with most devout affections in the holy offices of fasting and praying, to implore thy help and mercy against an insulting and proud enemy, defying even thy almighty power." Or, lastly, we may, with Grotius, understand the words of the priests and such persons in particular, who are separated to a holy ministry and use, whose prayers and intercessions, in behalf of his distressed chosen, they beseech God most graciously to accept. The formidableness of Holofernes's army struck them with a panic: they saw themselves in the most imminent danger, and the defeat of all the adjacent countries, together with the cruelties exercised upon them, was to them a certain presage of what they might expect, and of the mischief intended against them, if the Almighty did not interpose in their behalf as their protector. On this account they fell prostrate before him with the profoundest humility; they fasted, they prayed, they passed whole nights in solemn supplications, to implore the aid and assistance of him whom they looked upon as only able to deliver them from so powerful an enemy.

Ver. 20. Then they comforted Achior, and praised him greatly.] It may seem a little surprising, according to all human appearance, that the inhabitants of Bethulia, and those that had the chief command among them, should so readily and easily give credit to what Achior told them; for they might with good reason have mistrusted him as another Sinon, a suspicious person sent by Holofernes, with an insidious design, to make observations to their disadvantage, or to betray them to their ruin. To this it may be answered, that though, according to the ordinary rules of judging, and the maxims of common prudence, they ought to have been more wary and cautious, and in the opinion of some to have proceeded rather by torture, yet possibly God might, in regard to the noble testimony which Achior bore, influence the hearts of this people to receive and to take care of him: or perhaps some among them might be affected with his story, and the circumstance of his being bound, or know and answer for the probity and integrity of this Ammonite chief. However that be, it is certain, that though they received him with humanity, and treated him with honour and respect, they were so careful as not to intrust him with any share of the administration of affairs, contenting themselves with having afforded him a safe retreat among them, and taking, without doubt, such wise precautions as not to be surprised through too easy a credulity.

Ver. 21. Ozias took him unto his house.] Not bound or under guard as a prisoner, but probably watched a little and observed. Hence, when Judith returned in triumph to Bethulia, bringing Holofernes's head, and all the people ran together to the sight, it is observable that Achior comes not till called and sent for, (xiv. 6.)

And made a feast.] How persons attacked by a power so formidable, and whom that fresh insult of the enemy, the sending Achior to be both a witness and sharer of their ruin, would rather, it should seem, have intimidated more than ever, should on the contrary be so fond of, and rejoice with, their new acquaintance, as to make a great feast for him at such a time, and in such circumstances, may probably be accounted for, without supposing, as some do, God to act upon and influence the hearts of the inhabitants thus to behave. For it would have been highly disgraceful to the people of God to have betrayed any sign of cowardice and fear in the presence of that stranger who was not himself afraid, even in Holofernes's hearing, to dwell upon and extol the power of the Almighty God of Israel, and his frequent interposition in their behalf. Nor could they better or more effectually testify to Achior their sense of God's former goodness, and their hopes and reliance upon his mercies at this perilous juncture, than by such an instance of unconcernedness, as if they were confident of his favour and assistance. And the entertainment itself was, according to the Vulgate, that of sober and well-disposed persons; for it was made after they had fasted strictly all the day, and they continued, after the ending of it, the whole night in prayer.

To the elders . . .] By elders we are here not to understand the priests only, nor ancient people as such, but certain appointed magistrates; for, according to Josephus, Moses appointed that every city should have a council of seven magistrates, men of exemplary virtue and lovers of righteousness; (Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8. Seld. de Synedr. lib. ii. cap. 6.) and this perhaps was the determinate number in his time. But anciently there seems to have been more, because Boaz mentions ten elders, who were probably the same with the judges in the city of Beth-lehem. (Ruth iv. 2.)

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. To take aforehand the ascents of the hill country.] The town of Bethulia is represented in the history as a place of prodigious strength, either by art or nature, or both, nor was to be attempted by assault, but by starving its inhabitants: what remains then or marks do we hear of from travellers of so wonderful a place? if time and wars have destroyed all the works of art, yet would not nature and situation still continue the same? its own natural strength, and the ever-memorable deliverance wrought at it, must, one would think, have distinguished it to posterity, and that there should have been some tradition at least among the inhabitants, or their neighbours, to lead us to it. The Phocian Thermopylæ, the Portæ Caspiæ, are known and distinguished now as heretofore; but has any man's curiosity found out, or remarked here the passes, which gave it the command of the country, and made it the gate or key of Judea, as represented in this history? the place has been visited, and yet nothing extraordinary this way is observed of it. Mr. Maundrell, who was upon the spot, and whose accuracy and fidelity may be depended on, says only of it, that it stands upon a very eminent and conspicuous mountain, and is seen far and near, (p. 115.) He takes not the least notice of any grand defile or particular passes which commanded the entrance into Judea, which, if it had been so, could never have escaped his observation, who attended to every circumstance relative to the descriptions or allusions in Scripture. On the other hand, his account rather supposes the country to have been more a plain, or flat all about it, than mountainous. To this it may be replied briefly, 1. That some works or remains of art, some vestiges of foundations and ruins of edifices, are, according to Adrichomius and others, still visible; and if there were none, this would no more conclude against the quondam being of such a place, than against the existence of Babylon, Nineveh, Persepolis, and other once famous cities, which have little or no traces now remaining. 2. That however the surface of the country about Bethulia was, which authors have represented in a different manner; yet, as Bethulia is acknowledged to have been situated upon a very high and conspicuous mountain, the very situation itself, still to be discerned and admired, points out not merely the probability of its being there placed, but the propriety and importance of such a choice, which, as it was more tenable by its natural strength; so, 3dly, That it had uncommon difficulty of approach and access, either by one grand defile, or very strait and dangerous passages, appears sufficiently from its foiling so great an army as one hundred and eighty thousand men so long before it; nor does there seem any necessity or occasion to transmit as particular what a rocky and perpendicular situation naturally suggests.

Ver. 2. The army of the men of war was a hundred and seventy thousand footmen and twelve thousand horsemen.] The number of warriors varies very considerably in the Greek and Latin editions. It is not improbable that there is some mistake in the numbers in the different texts. The Vulgate has, Erant autem pedites bellatorum centum viginti millia, &c. and indeed with so many only the army of Holofernes set forward from Nineveh; (see ii. 5.) but it had been increased by considerable reinforcements, which came from divers provinces of Assyria, and by an addition of auxiliary troops from the countries newly conquered, which might raise the number to that mentioned in the Greek, viz. one hundred and seventy thousand. There is also a difference between the Greek and Latin copies with respect to the cavalry. The Vulgate enlarges the number to twenty-two thousand, which probably is right; as Holofernes's cavalry at this time had been augmented by ten thousand Assyrian horse. The difference in both accounts seems, in short, to have arisen from the flux state of the army increasing and decreasing from many accidental causes.

Ver. 3. And they camped in the valley, near unto Bethulia by the fountain, and they spread themselves in breadth over Dothaim.] There is some difficulty with respect to the posts which are here assigned to Holofernes's troops; the village of Dothaim, or Dothan, as it is sometimes called, was, it is objected, too far from Bethulia for them to extend to it in breadth, whether it is placed in the tribe of Zebulun or of Simeon. It is urged, that it was at least eight or ten leagues from the sea of Tiberias, and, by consequence, about an equal distance from Bethulia, in the tribe of Zebulun, and more than thirty leagues from Bethulia, in the tribe of Simeon. If this be so, and the distance of Dothaim from the place of the siege was indeed so great, it is probable, that as there are many villages in this history wrongly placed (for the geography of it, it must be confessed, is far from being exact), so this of Dothaim is here erroneously inserted; or perhaps, by mistake, one name is put for another, and it is difficult, says Grotius, In Græcis adeo corruptis, ut est hic liber, locorum nomina restituere. But, on the other hand, there are authorities which give some reason to think, that the situation of Dothaim was contiguous to Bethulia, as is represented in the history. Adrichomius makes Dothaim to be, "Oppidum quod a monte Bethuliæ miliario uno in terra campestri positum, utrinque montibus cingitur." (Theatr. Terræ Sanctæ, p. 139.) The writer of Itinerarium Scripturæ, p. 321. places Dothaim four miles from Bethulia, and at the like distance from the sea of Galilee. (See also Well's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. iii. p. 197.)

And in length from Bethulia unto Cyamon, which is over against Esdraelom.] Ἕως Κυάμωνος. Grotius conjectures the true reading here to be, ἕως Χελμωνος, which is confirmed by the Vulgate rendering. Esdraelon was a great plain extending itself from the cities of Megiddo and Aphec, to the sea of Gennesareth or Galilee. The camp of Holofernes was so great, that it took up all this plain, which contained sixteen miles in length. (See Itiner. Sac. Script. p. 320.)

Ver. 4. Now the children of Israel, when they saw the multitude of them, were greatly troubled, &c.] It may very pertinently be asked, why the Bethulians durst venture to oppose Nabuchodonosor. The truth is, that king was resolved not only to subdue the several nations from the Euphrates to Ethiopia, but intended likewise to oblige them to acknowledge him only to be God; (vi. 2.) and therefore the Bethulians, who could not without impiety and a renunciation of their religion, submit to the dominion of such a king, had good reason to hope for success against a prince who had declared himself an enemy to the God of heaven.

Ver. 5. When they had kindled fires upon their towers, they remained and watched all that night.] This signal was set up on the mountains, on the tops of which they made great fires. There were also large trees planted on purpose to spread and display some ensign or colour, that they might be seen at a great distance. Centinels also, or watchmen, were generally placed in towers and on the tops of mountains, to sound the trumpet, or make some signal at the top of a pole at the approach of the enemy, to give notice to the people to run to their arms. See Isa. xviii. 3. xxx. 17. Jer. vi. 1. where the prophet says, Blow the trumpet in Tekoa, and set up a sign of fire in Beth-haccerem, for evil appeareth out of the north.

Ver. 12. Let thy servants get into their hands the fountain of water which issueth forth of the foot of the mountain. Ver. 13. For all the inhabitants of Bethulia have their water thence.] The Idumeans, or children of Esau, as they are called, ver. 8. may be considered as brethren of the Jews, being descended from Esau the brother of Jacob; it may therefore seem not only very surprising but unnatural, that they should, by giving such pernicious counsel to Holofernes, betray the Israelites to the Assyrians, instead of protecting them as relations, and speaking, as Achior their chief did, in their behalf and favour. It should seem by this instance, as if they inherited Esau's spleen against his brother: but however to guard against censure, and to remain undistinguished and undiscovered, they chose to pass under the title of Ammonites. (See note on v. 5.) One may observe from hence, say Messieurs of Port-Royal, that false brethren, such as these proved to the Jews, are more to be feared than open and declared enemies, and that treachery is often more dangerous than force. As it does not seem probable that all the inhabitants of Bethulia should fetch their water at such a distance, or that this fountain at the foot of the hill should be sufficient for the general use of the city; and as neither the fountains mentioned ver. 7. could afford a competent supply, much less could their waters be conveyed up in any large quantity the steep sides of the hill, whose height is represented here to be very great; we must necessarily suppose cisterns for rain water likewise within the city; or probably they might be assisted also by some springs, as many high mountains are known to have, all of which were either rendered useless by the enemy, or at last failed through the length of the siege. The Vulgate supposes the city to have been supplied by an aqueduct, which to a place otherwise situated than Bethulia was, would have been a great convenience; but was it possible in so lofty a site to have received any advantage from thence, except water should have forgot its own nature, and move upwards?

Ver. 18. Then the children of Esau went up with the children of Ammon, and camped in the hill country.] The Idumeans, being the posterity of Esau, bare an ancient grudge against the Jews, upon account of their ancestor's losing his right of primogeniture, and the subduing of Edom by David afterward. (2 Sam. viii. 14.) Upon both these accounts they took hold of all opportunities of venting their spite towards the Jewish nation, particularly see 2 Chron. xxviii. 17. For this their behaviour, they were often reproved by the prophets. (See Ezek. xxv. 12. xxxv. 5.) The ill-will that they bore them, not only appeared by the mischievous advice given by them, ver. 10—12. but by their being amongst the foremost, and particularly instanced in here as such, to encamp against them in the hill country. But the spite that they shewed towards them was most remarkable at the time of their captivity, as appears by those pathetical words of Psal. cxxxvii. 7. Remember the children of Edom, O Lord, in the day of Jerusalem; how they said, Down with it, down with it, even to the ground. The Ammonites too, though related likewise in blood to the Jews, yet bore a constant hatred towards them, which they took all opportunities to shew when the Jews were under any distress, for which they are also often reproved severely by the prophets, and threatened with judgments. (See Ezek. xxi. 28. xxv. 2. 6. Zeph. ii. 8. 10.)

Ver. 20. Thus all the company of Assur remained about them four-and-thirty days.] The Vulgate has, Cumque ista custodia per dies viginti fuisset expleta, defecerunt cisternæ: making the time to be only twenty days. Another more ancient Latin version has, diebus viginti et quatuor. The Syriac makes the siege to last two months and four days.

Ver. 26. Now therefore call them unto you, and deliver the whole city for a spoil to the people of Holofernes, and to all his army.] Polybius mentions many cities, otherwise well provided for a siege, that were obliged to surrender, by being deprived of a supply of water; and adds, that when matters come to that extremity, that the people are necessitated to be stinted, and to have it delivered out in very small quantity, the anxiety is the greater, as the appetite generally craves most what is not allowed, or cannot be come at. (Lib. vii. cap. 5.)

Ver. 27. For it is better for us to be made a spoil unto them, than to die for thirst; for we will be his servants, that our souls may live, and not see the death of our infants before our eyes.] Josephus observes of the Arabians, that being in a miserable distress for want of water, four thousand of them came out to Herod, and offered themselves to captivity and chains, to avoid the more insupportable calamity of a raging drought; and that the rest made a sally by consent, and attacked the besiegers, in which encounter seven thousand fell, choosing rather a present certainty of death, than to expose themselves to the lingering torment of it, for want of water. (Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 8.) But how sad would have been the condition of Bethulia, and indeed of all Judea, if Ozias and the chief of the city had listened to the clamour of the people, and through impatience of thirst had surrendered themselves! In what misery would they have been involved, and what an opportunity of victory and triumph would they have lost! Lysimachus, king of Macedonia, was sensible of this too late, who, being choked with thirst in Thrace, surrendered with his whole army to the enemy, and when plentifully refreshed with water so much longed for, cried out, For what a small satisfaction and pleasure have I, from the state of a king reduced myself to be a slave!

Ver. 28. We take to witness against you the heavens and the earth, and our God, and Lord of our fathers, which punishes us according to our sins, and the sins of our fathers, that he do not according as we have said this day.] Μαρτυρόμεθα ὑμῖν τὴν οὐρανὸν καὶ τὴν γῆν, καὶ τὸν Θεὸν ἡμῶν, καὶ Κύριον τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν, ὃς ἐκδικεῖ ἡμᾶς κατὰ τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἡμῶν, καὶ τὰ ἁμαρτήματα τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν, ἵνα μὴ ποιήσῃ κατὰ τὰ ῥήματα ταῦτα ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ σήμερον. The latter part of this verse is obscure, and the several versions and expositors understand it differently. Coverdale, following the Vulgate, has, We take heaven and earth this day to record, and the God of our fathers (which punishes us according to the deserving of our sins), and give you warning that ye give up the city now into the power of Holofernes' host, that our end may be short with the sword, which else shall endure long for want of water, and for thirst. The Geneva Bible, We take to witness against you the heaven and the earth, and our God, and Lord of our fathers, which punishes us according to our sins, and the sins of our fathers, that he lay not these things to our charge. The Syriac, Contestamurque adversus vos cœlum et terram, Dominumque Deum patrum nostrorum, qui vindictam exigit de nobis secundum ea quæ dicta sunt hodierno die. Junius renders, Videte ut non faciat quemadmodum diximus hodierno die. To which agree Grotius and Badwell, who suppose an ellipsis here, as Gen. iii. 22. xxxviii. 11. xlii. 4. Matt. xxv. 9. and make the sense to be, See that the calamity which we have mentioned, and warned you against, of seeing our wives and children perish before our eyes, come not upon us. Or, understanding it of Holofernes, as the margin does, See that he bring not upon us the evils which we have solemnly forewarned you of this day. Calmet has, We conjure you before heaven and earth, and the God of our fathers, that evil befal us not this day, the evil of seeing our wives and children die before our faces. And the Port-Royal comment, We call heaven and earth to witness the earnest supplication we made to deliver up the city to Holofernes, and to die instantly by the sword, rather than by thirst to undergo a lingering death.

Ver. 29. Then there was great weeping with one consent in the midst of the assembly, and they cried unto the Lord God with a loud voice.] There seems to be a sort of contradiction here with respect to the context, at least there is in the Vulgate: ver. 24. 26, 27. they murmur against Ozias, and charge him with the evils they suffered, and beg importunately, that the city may be delivered for a spoil to the people of Holofernes, and that they may be his servants; and ver. 28. they call God to witness the sincerity of their desire: here they cried unto him in the words of the Vulgate, Miserere nostri, et noli tradere confitentes te populo, qui ignorat te, ut non dicant inter gentes, Ubi est Deus eorum? This irresolution and sudden change of sentiments will best be accounted for, probably, from their fear, which at different times suggested different means and motives of acting to them: at one time the thirst they laboured under induced them to wish and pray importunately, that they might live as captives among the Assyrians; at another time the reflection on Holofernes's cruelty, and a strong presumption that he would use them worse for daring to resist his power, threw them into despair, and, changing their minds on a sudden, they requested that they might fall into the hands of God, and not into the hands of men.

Ver. 30. Then said Ozias to them, Brethren, be of good courage, let us yet endure five days, in the which space the Lord our God may turn his mercy towards us.] See note on viii. 12. Sulpitius Severus makes the time fixed for the surrender to be fifteen days, "Quinto decimo die deditionis tempus constituit:" (Sacr. Hist. lib. ii. xxiv.) but this probably is a mistake; the true reading of the place seems to be, as Drusius conjectures, "Quinto demum die deditionis tempus constituit." We meet with a like instance, 1 Sam. ii. 3. where, upon the threats of Nanash, king of the children of Ammon, or, as others suppose, the captain of his host, the elders of Jabesh Gilead desire a respite of seven days, to send messengers into all the coasts of Israel, and promise to surrender themselves, if in that time none came effectually to their help and relief. And the event answered accordingly; for, as the text there says, the Spirit of the Lord stirred up Saul to come to their assistance within the expected time, and they proved victorious.

Ver. 32.] This verse is entirely omitted by the Vulgate, but is retained in the other versions.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. NOW at that time Judith heard thereof, which was the daughter of Merari the son of Oz, the son of Joseph, the son of Oziel, &c.] The versions differ greatly in the names of the fifteen descents here mentioned; the Syriac and Greek particularly from the Vulgate. One reason of this difference perhaps may be, that the same person is here called by two different names, one of which is mentioned in the Greek, the other in the Latin versions: or the confusion which is observable in the genealogy, may probably come from hence, that the copyists have put all the proper names, which were in different verses, into one; and by that means have intermixed and confounded the relations of Judith, with those of her husband Manasses. What seems to confirm this strongly is, that the genealogy of Manasses, which Fulgentius gives separately, and in a more concise manner, (Epist. 2. ad Gall.) is ranked under, and connected with, that of Merari, the father of Judith, in the Greek and Syriac copies.

Ver. 2. And Manasses was her husband, of her tribe and kindred.] i. e. Of the tribe of Simeon, as Judith was. (See ix. 2.) The Vulgate omits this particular, perhaps as a known and customary thing: thus Anna and Tobias were of the same tribe and kindred: (see Tob. iii. 15. 17. vi. 12.) and Joseph and Mary were both of the house and lineage of David, and as such were espoused.

Ver. 3. As he stood overseeing them that bound sheaves in the field, the heat came on his head, and he died.] Manasses seems not only to have had the care of his own business and concerns abroad, but to have been an overseer by public appointment, and to have had the inspection and ordering the whole number of reapers, in that wide and large field adjoining to Bethulia. That there was among the Jews such a post or employment for public use, Josephus testifies, who mentions that such a charge of the fields, and of the labourers there employed, was committed to Æbutius. The being exposed to the scorching heat of the sun in an open plain, in the middle of the day, has often proved dangerous, and occasioned faintness, and sometimes mortal diseases: "Meridie ipso faciam ut stipulam colligat; tam excoctum reddam atque atrum ut carbo est," is mentioned as a punishment by Terence, Adelph. act. v. sc. 3. And Victor Uticensis speaks of it as a thing dangerous as well as irksome, "sub ardentis solis incendio cespites messium desecare." The writer of the Geoponics has the same observation, τῶν ἐν τῷ ἡλίῳ ἐργαζομένων ἥλιος βλάπτει τὰ σώματα καὶ τὰς φλεβάς. It appears from the instance mentioned 2 Kings iv. 18. 20. which resembles this, that persons of note in ancient times (for the quality of his wife shews him to be no mean person, which also may be observed of Judith) looked after their corn, and oversaw their labourers; and sometimes for their health, and the increase of their estates, laboured with their own hands. (See Jonah iv. 8. Matt. xx. 12.) This and the five following verses should be put, as Junius places them, in a parenthesis.

And they buried him with his fathers in the field between Dothaim and Balamo.] The Vulgate says expressly, that he died and was buried in Bethulia, his own city, the place of his nativity, Mortuus est in Bethulia civitate sua, et sepultus est illic cum patribus suis; with which agrees the old Italic version. Calmet contends that this is the truth, as no reason can be assigned why Manasses should be interred so far from his own tribe, and from the city of Bethulia, as the other opinion supposes: and should we even place Bethulia in the tribe of Zebulun, Dothaim would be at least thirty miles from it.

Ver. 4. Judith was a widow in her house three years and four months.] The Syriac reads in like manner; but Archbishop Usher makes the time to be three years and six months, ad A. M. 3348. in which year he places the death of Holofernes. The Vulgate makes this quite clear, which has, Erat autem Judith relicta ejus vidua jam annis tribus, et mensibus sex; i. e. Judith had now been a widow so long before this great enterprise happened; for it cannot mean that three years and a half was the whole time of her widowhood, because she lived to be very aged, and never married after the death of her husband Manasses.

Ver. 5. She made her a tent upon the top of her house.] The Vulgate seems to understand this of a chamber in the upper part of the house, in superioribus domus suæ fecit sibi secretum cubiculum, in quo cum puellis suis clausa morabatur. The Jews that lived at a distance from Jerusalem, generally either went up into an upper chamber to pray, with the windows opened towards the temple, as is expressly mentioned of Daniel, (vi. 10.) and of the apostles when assembled together, (Acts i. 13.) and of Sara, Raguel's daughter; (Tob. iii. 17.) or, when they were out of Judea, or Jerusalem, and so could not go up to the temple at the hours of prayer, went up to the house-top, or roof of the house, as is recorded of St. Peter, (Acts x. 9.) for the sake of privacy, and to be freer from noise and distraction, turning themselves towards that part which looked towards Jerusalem, according to Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple, 1 Kings viii. 29, 30. 35. 38.

Ver. 6. She fasted all the days of her widowhood.] A great instance this of her pious disposition, and of the tender regard which she had for the memory of her deceased husband. This great strictness and severity of life and manners, customary among the Jewish women, passed afterward into the church. We read of Anna the prophetess, a widow of fourscore and four years old, that she never departed from the temple, but served God with prayer and fasting, night and day. (Luke ii. 37, 38.) St. Paul gives the like description of a truly devout widow, She that is a widow indeed, and desolate, trusteth in God, and continueth in supplication and prayers night and day; but she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth. (1 Tim. v. 5, 6.)

Save the eves of the sabbaths, and the sabbaths, and the eves of the new moons, and the new moons, and the feasts, and solemn days of the house of Israel.] It is agreed on all hands, that it was the custom of all the Israelites who feared God, to observe the sabbaths and the new moons, among the feasts of the house of Israel; and they seem carefully to have observed their solemn feasts in their worst as well as in their best state, from the earliest to their latest times: (see 1 Sam. xx. 5. 1 Chron. xxiii. 31. 2 Chron. ii. 4. viii. 13. xxxi. 3. Isa. i. 13. lxvi. 23. Ezek. xlvi. 1. Hos. ii. 11. Amos viii. 5.) and these Ezra took care to revive at the return from the captivity. But when the regard here mentioned to be paid to the eves of the sabbaths and new moons first began, and on what occasion, and whether in use so early as the days of Judith, is much controverted. It is certain the custom was very ancient, but according to the Talmudists was not in force in the time of Judith, but afterward in use among the Jews in their dispersions. Various reasons are assigned for the origin of this practice; Grotius thinks that the eves were thus respected, as a sort of fence to the law, which forbade fasting on any part of a festival, and that this was done by way of caution, that there might be no remains of a preceding sorrow on the day of the festival; for the eve before any festival was esteemed part of that festival: from whence the same custom was derived afterward into the Christian church; and as the Jewish festivals were always kept from even to even, so the sabbath began on the Friday evening. (See Lev. xxiii. 32. Isa. xxx. 29.) And the feast of the Passover, it is well known, was always kept in the evening, and concluded with hymns. (See Matt. xxvi. 30.) Cunæus carries the matter farther, That fasting was not only forbid on the sabbath and its eve, but even on the day following the sabbath, that the joy of that solemnity might not be disturbed, nor lessened by any sorrow or humiliation, either preceding or subsequent. (De Rep. Heb. lib. ii. cap. 10.) Others imagine that the reason of this was, the almost impossibility of keeping a fast that day, being the day of the preparation, so called by the sacred writers, because on it they were obliged to make provision of victuals for the sabbath, and could not well avoid tasting of what they were so preparing. (Schickard de Purim.) With respect to the new moon in particular, and the not fasting on its eve, it probably began when the Jews appointed two feasts the beginning of each month, for fear of being wanting in any respect or particular which the law required; as to guard also against any inconvenience, from the uncertainty of the precise time when the new moon appeared. Calmet is inclined to think, that what is mentioned of the eves of the sabbaths, and of the new moons, is an addition, as no notice is taken of them either in the Syriac or Jerome's version, and that the practice referred to is probably later than the days of Judith: that the Greek translator inserted the clause in that version, as being the custom of the Jews at that time when it was made, and in the parts where he lived, though it might not be in the original from whence he translated.

Ver. 7. She was also of a goodly countenance, and very beautiful to behold.] This may be concluded from the power which she appears to have had over Holofernes, and his being captivated at first sight; a conquest not to be wondered at, especially if she was not older at that time than twenty-five years, as Prideaux conjectures: but supposing her forty-five, or more, the expression is as justifiable as that Gen. xii. 11. where Sarah, who was then sixty years old, is said by Abraham to be γυνὴ εὐπρόσωπος: this particular, as well as her being rich, is here added, lest any should think that she embraced the strict manner of life here described, rather out of necessity than choice. But in one so accomplished, severity and retirement are not a little to be admired, and in proportion as her beauty was amiable, her humility to decline appearing in public view, was the more exemplary and meritorious; particularly her wearing sackcloth, and using such austerities in dress and appearance, as naturally contributed to disfigure and lessen the agreeableness of her person, which the generality of the sex take such pains to improve by studied ornaments, shews her to have been devoid of affectation and vanity. For continual fasting in the midst of affluence and abundance, save on the eves of certain festivals, and particularly her choosing to continue in a state of widowhood, though she had many offers and temptations to change her condition, (see xvi. 22.) are not less worthy of admiration and notice. In fine, a virtue so perfect received a new and additional lustre, as appearing among a people sensual and carnal, who regarded pleasures, riches, and marriage, as substantial parts of happiness. Fulgentius proposes her as the most perfect pattern of widowhood, and gives the following fine character and eulogium of her, which comprises all the excellences abovementioned, "Ecce vidua præclara natalibus, facultatibus dives, ætate juvenis, specie mirabilis, divitias contempsit, delicias respuit, carnis incentiva calcavit, et induta virtute ex alto, non quæsivit secundo famulari connubio." (De statu viduali, Epist. 2. see also Hieron. Epist. 10. tom. i. p. 96.)

Ver. 8. And there was none that gave her an ill word, for she feared God greatly.] The character which the historian gives Judith here is a very high commendation, says St. Jerome, considering how tender and delicate a thing the reputation of a young and beautiful widow is; who elegantly expresses his remark upon it in the following words; "Tenera res in fœminis fama pudicitiæ, et, quasi flos pulcherrimus, cito ad levem marcescit auram, levique flatu corrumpitur; maxime ubi ætas consentit ad vitium, et maritalis deest autoritas, cujus umbra tutamen uxoris est." (Ad Salv.) And from the character here given by the author of this history of his heroine's piety, there is the less reason to credit the objections raised by some against her religion and modesty, from particular passages in it misunderstood, which we shall consider in their order, and reconcile with a just sense of both. The Abbot de la Chambre, in a funeral oration on one of the queens of France, took these words for his text, and observes upon them, "That they are perhaps the finest commendation that ever was given to woman; for though there may be some women, who, notwithstanding the prodigious detraction that has prevailed so long in the world, have yet escaped the attacks of it, yet this good fortune rarely happens to those who have otherwise a shining reputation, and who are, as the text says, famosissimæ." So that we may challenge all the Greeks and Romans to shew us a passage in their books that in so few words gives us so great an idea as these do of the heroine Judith, who reached the highest pitch of glory and renown, and which is aptest to alarm and raise the envy of the world; yet her virtue and merits were so engaging and powerful, so guarded with discretion, and so incomparably amiable, as to silence and strike mute that restless and implacable passion. And what is farther to be admired in our author here is, that he has so happily and justly pointed out the true cause of her matchless virtue, and the universal admiration it met with: "She had (says he) a great reputation in all things, and was secure from every evil tongue, because she was sensibly touched with the fear of the Lord." (See Bayle's Dict. in voce Judith, note d.)

Ver. 10. She sent her waiting-woman that had the government of all things that she had, to call Ozias, and Chabris, and Charmis, the ancients of the city; and they came unto her.] By the ancients of the city, we are not to understand the oldest people in it, nor yet the priests, though the Vul-

gate has here presbyteros, but certain officers or magistrates so called. And though Joacim the high-priest is joined, xv. 8. with the ancients of the city, and is said in the Vulgate to come to Bethulia, cum universis presbyteris suis ut videret Judith, yet the Greek expresses it by ἡ γερουσία τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραὴλ, i. e. the senate, or ruling elders of the people. Estius observes, that there is no one place in all the books of the Old Testament where the word presbyter is taken in the sense of sacerdos, however it may be used in the New. And by the two ancients of the people, (Sus. 5.) that are said to attempt Susanna's chastity, we are neither to understand priests nor persons stricken in years, but stated judges, as is plain from the text itself. It may seem perhaps assuming in Judith to send to these ancients or magistrates to come to her, instead of going to them herself in person: but this ought not to be ascribed to any motive or principle of pride, as if from an affected superiority she thought herself better or more considerable than they; such a carriage by no means agrees with one who, on many occasions, distinguished herself for her humility. It rather proceeded from her modesty and unwillingness to expose to public view her beauty, which she had industriously concealed, that she desired them to come to her, that she might impart to them a matter of great consequence.

Ver. 12. And now who are you that have tempted God this day, and stand instead of God amongst the children of God?] By limiting God to such a certain time as five days, or promising in his name help within that space; as if he could not help you, if he did not precisely do it at the time fixed by you, and his power then was shortened; contrary to that fine and just sentiment, ver. 15. Judith's reproof on this occasion was very just; for the fixing thus a time to the Almighty, besides the assuming a prerogative that did not belong to them, shewed a great diffidence in them; it was declaring they would no longer depend upon him, if he did not answer their expectation in the time limited. As true religion consists in just and worthy notions of God, in a modest and humble trust in him, submitting entirely in all events and exigencies to his pleasure, leaving the time and manner of deliverance to God's own method and determination; so to act otherwise is tempting God. To tempt God, in Scripture language, signifies to distrust his power, truth, or providence, after sufficient demonstrations and reasons given for encouragement to depend upon them. (See Isa. vii. 12. 1 Cor. x. 9. 13.) These people, therefore, who had received so many proofs of the Divine protection upon different occasions, betrayed a great want of faith, in fixing a limited time for his interposition and assistance; as if his wisdom and providence ought not to choose when and in what manner he would favour and relieve them. But such is the impatience and conceitedness of men, as to presume to fix the times and seasons which God has particularly reserved the disposal of to himself, and keeps in his own power.

Ver. 13. And now try the Lord Almighty, but you shall never know any thing.] i. e. Try if you can find out in this, or in any other matter of consequence, what the mind of the Lord is; the result of the inquiry will be, that you cannot do it to any certainty or perfection. The Geneva version has, So now you seek the Lord Almighty, but you shall never know any thing; i. e. You would penetrate into the secret designs and counsels of God, of which nobody could ever fathom the depth. See Wisd. ix. 13—17. where the like sentiment is expressed more at large. Holy Job, describing the unsearchableness of God's wisdom, says, Touching the Almighty, we cannot find him out: he is excellent in power and in judgment, and in plenty of justice: he will not afflict. Men do therefore fear him: he respecteth not any that are wise of heart, (xxxvii. 23, 24.) It may not be improper incidentally to observe, that the last clause here is inaccurate in our version; it seems a reflection on the Almighty, as if he neglected or had no regard to such as are well-disposed towards him; for that this is the meaning of the phrase, see Exod. xxviii. 3, &c. Job xi. 4. Prov. x. 8. xi. 29. The rendering of the LXX. is much clearer, φοβηθήσονται δὲ αὐτὸν καὶ οἱ σοφοὶ καρδίᾳ; but the Geneva version is most agreeable to the context, Let men therefore fear him, for he will not regard any that are wise in their own conceit; and Coverdale's is much to the same effect, It is not we that can find out the Almighty; for in power, equity, and righteousness, he is higher than can be expressed; let men therefore fear him, for there shall no man see him, that is wise in his own conceit.

Ver. 16. Do not bind the counsels of the Lord our God; for God is not as man, that he may be threatened.] i. e. Think not to tie down God to terms and conditions, to assist you when or in the manner ye please, as one obliges a debtor to pay in a certain fixed time, or to give security to satisfaction; for God is not a weak creature like man, to suffer himself to be insulted or intimidated by menaces. This verse is nearly the same with that Numb. xxiii. 19. especially if it be rightly translated, God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent; where our version is by no means accurate; the verb ἀπειληθῆναι, the same that is here used, does not signify to repent, but to threaten. And in this sense the LXX. translate the Hebrew word, Gen. xxvii. 42. and so ἀπειλέομαι is rendered by the lexicographers, and not as signifying to repent. The verb εἰλέομαι, vertor, indeed, has such a sense, but not the compound ἀπειλέομαι. St. Cyprian, who quotes this place of Judith, accordingly renders, Neque quasi filius hominis minas patitur. (Testimon. cont. Judæos, lib. ii. cap. 20.)

Neither is he as the son of man, that he should be wavering.] Οὐδ' ὡς υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου διαιτηθῆναι. The reading of all the copies seems corrupt; the true one probably is, διαρτηθῆναι, which is followed by all the ancient fathers who quote this place; St. Cyprian particularly has, Non quasi homo Deus suspenditur. We are justified in this alteration by the parallel passage, Numb. xxiii. 19. where the verb used is διαρτηθῆναι, which the Greek scholiast renders σαλευθῆναι, i. e. to be shaken in his resolutions, or to be in doubt or suspense what to do. It no where signifies to lie, as our version in that place of Numbers has it. (See Origen and Theodoret in loc.) If we retain διαιτηθῆναι, I think it should be derived from αἰτέω, and the meaning be, entreated; i. e. God is not as a man that he may be threatened, neither as the son of man that he should be persuaded, entreated, won by solicitations, or teasing. The versions understand it as coming from δίαιτα. Vulgate, Ad iracundiam inflammabitur. (Vers. Lat. vet. ut judicetur.) Syriac, Ut in ordinem redigatur; but I cannot reconcile it with that derivation.

Ver. 18. For there is neither tribe, nor family, nor people, nor city among us, which worship gods made with hands, as hath been aforetime. Ver. 19. For the which cause our fathers were given to the sword, and for a spoil, and had a great fall among our enemies. Ver. 20. But we know none other God, therefore we trust that he will not despise us, nor any of our nation.] What Judith here urges, was an argument of real consolation to them in their present circumstances; viz. that if the many calamities their nation at different times had laboured under, as desolation, captivity, and the sword, &c. were owing to the then corrupt and idolatrous state of the people, they had great reason now to hope, that being free from that crime and abomination which was the occasion of their forefathers' miseries (for it was a common and confessed observation among them, that the sin of the golden calves had a share in all their punishments), they might rely upon his favour and protection, and should not therefore, through despair of assistance, deliver themselves up rashly to their enemies.

Ver. 21. For if we be taken so, all Judea shall lie waste, and our sanctuary shall be spoiled, and he will require the profanation thereof at our mouth.] Judith cunningly aggravates the fault which they had committed, in being so dispirited, and ready to deliver up their city, from a consideration of a more public nature; viz. that on the safety and preservation of the city of Bethulia depended even that of the holy city Jerusalem, and consequently of their temple and altar, and the right and regular performance of their whole religious service; as it was not allowable to offer sacrifice any where else but at the temple, it would, therefore, she insinuates, be an instance both of great weakness and rashness, to form a resolution to give up the city, if not relieved in five days; as it would be exposing at the same time their whole nation to the common danger, to defend which, and their most holy rites from being discontinued or profaned, they ought rather courageously to shed the very last drop of their blood, than to pursue such an unadvised measure, to the hazard of the common safety. There is a great variety in the Greek copies here; some have, ὅτι ἐν τῷ ληφθῆναι ἡμᾶς, οὕτως καθήσεται πᾶσα ἡ Ἰουδαία. Others, οὔτε ἐν τῷ ληφθῆναι ἡμᾶς, οὕτως κληθήσεται, κ. τ. λ. To which agrees the Geneva version, which has, Neither when we shall be taken, will Judea be so famous; and in one we have καυθήσεται. Our translators seem to have followed a copy different from the rest, which placed the comma after οὕτως; as does Junius likewise, Neque vero si deprehendamur ita, nominabitur Judea amplius.

Ver. 23. For our servitude shall not be directed to favour, but the Lord our God shall turn it to dishonour.] The Geneva version has, Our servitude shall not be directed by favour; i. e. The slavery we shall bring upon ourselves will not procure us the more favour; that we shall not have the better treatment for our tameness in yielding, we may be assured from the example of other nations who have submitted. Junius seems to take it in this sense, when he renders, Non enim reddetur servitus nostra gratiosa.—Nous ne pourrons leur plaire par toutes nos soumisions, Nous ne trouverons point graces à leurs yeux, says Calmet, in loc.

Ver. 24. Now, therefore, O brethren, let us shew an example to our brethren, because their hearts depend upon us.] Ἐξ ἡμῶν κρέμαται ἡ ψυχὴ αὐτῶν. Though Judith knew the great consternation and fright in which the besieged were, and their disposition to surrender; yet she would not address herself personally to the body of the people, notwithstanding she might with good reason have expected to have raised their drooping spirits, and made them resolute by what she had to offer. But she chooses to apply herself only to the chief men of the city, to let them know and understand, that being the ancients and rulers of the people, and by consequence their life and soul, on whom they depended and placed all their hope; it was their duty, on so important a conjuncture, to animate them by their example, and to betray no signs of fear or despondency themselves, but rather to act like their great forefathers, who were troubled on every side, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed. For it has not only a bad aspect, but is generally attended with evil consequences, when those who are at the head of affairs appear themselves dispirited; and they are so much the more blamable herein, as by their pusillanimity they cast a damp and panic upon others, and probably will be thought to have contributed, through their discouragement, to any future miscarriage that may ensue. In like manner, as, when generals, who have the command of an army, and ought to animate and encourage the soldiers by their martial spirit and example, betray themselves signs of fear, and backwardness to engage; if afterward it happens that they are vanquished by the enemy, they are deservedly in disgrace with their prince, as being the real, the reputed occasion, at least, of the great loss sustained. A learned writer thinks the rendering here would be more proper, Their hearts agree, or conspire with us, according to the use of the verb in some parts of Scripture, as Luke xix. 48. (See Hammond, in loc.) But the former sense I think more agreeable to the context, especially if we read ἐξ ὑμῶν κρέμαται, as some copies have it, and is confirmed by the Vulgate rendering.

Ver. 25. Let us give thanks to the Lord our God, which trieth us, even as he did our fathers.] In this and the two following verses, there is an excellent advice given to all such as at any time labour under afflictions, and it consists of the following particulars: 1. That they are of such a nature, that instead of being uneasy under them, men should rather give God thanks for them. 2. That they are graciously designed, and rather kind admonitions, than any real tokens of God's displeasure. 3. That God's most faithful servants, the patriarchs and prophets, have been visited in the same manner, for the examination of their hearts, and the trial of their patience. To which the Vulgate adds a fourth reason, That murmuring provokes God to inflict heavier judgments, as he did on the Israelites of old in the wilderness on that account. The words of that version are very observable; Illi autem qui tentationes non susceperunt cum timore Domini, et impatientiam suam, et improprium murmurationis suæ contra Dominum protulerunt, exterminati sunt ab exterminatore, et a serpentibus perierunt; exactly agreeing with the very words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. x. 9, 10.

Ver. 28. Then said Ozias to her, All that thou hast spoken, hast thou spoken with a good heart, and there is none that may gainsay thy words.] The inhabitants of Bethulia do not seem hitherto to have made the least effort to defend themselves, no blood spilt, no remedy attempted. Thirst pressed them sore, and yet they had not the courage to attempt the Assyrian guard, that had seized upon the fountains and reservoirs of water. It was not without reason, therefore, that Judith reproaches them with want of courage. Upon reviewing and comparing the very different conduct and behaviour of her, and the persons she speaks to, one sees the observation, that God chooses the things that are weak to confound the things that are mighty, remarkably verified. Judith, a defenceless widow, whilst the men around her quake for fear, and even the chiefs themselves give up all for lost, appears quite undaunted, and argues with so much coolness and constancy of mind, as well as strength of reasoning, as really to deserve the character Ozias here gives her. That one single woman should dare to venture on an act of such danger and boldness, and be so successful as to accomplish it, was owing at least to her great zeal for the safety of God's chosen people; or shall we ascribe it to a Divine impulse?

Ver. 33. I will go forth with my waiting-woman.] The word in the ancient translation is, abra, which signifies a companion or maid of honour (such as ladies of the first condition had) rather than a servant; for the same word in the LXX. is applied to the women who attended both Pharaoh's daughter, Exod. xi. 5. and queen Esther, iv. 4. Thus Calmet understands the word. In other writers it is certain it signifies merely a servant, a chambermaid, or housekeeper; and whether it is not to be taken in this latter acceptation, see ver. 10. compared with xvi. 23.

Within the days that you have promised to deliver the city to our enemies, the Lord will visit Israel by my hand.] Judith, ver. 11—17. blames Ozias and the rest of the governors, for presuming to limit the interposition of the Almighty, within the space of five days, and does she not seem to do the same here herself, engaging for his assistance within that precise time? Was this in compliance with them, and that she might encourage their hopes; or shall we charge her with rashness and enthusiasm for assuring them that she should be the happy instrument to accomplish their deliverance within the fixed time? or, with the Romanists, suppose that she had an assurance of the successful event of her intended enterprise, by some particular revelation? Without having recourse to this, it seems better to resolve Judith's engaging in so adventurous an exploit, into her strong confidence of God's favour and assistance against a usurper of that honour and adoration which belonged to him alone.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. UNCOVERED the sackcloth wherewith she was clothed.] Ἐγύμνωσεν ὃν ἐνεδιδύσκετο σάκκον· i. e. She discovered the sackcloth she had upon her, by taking off some upper garment, which she probably put on occasionally, out of compliment to the elders that came to her. The Syriac makes her to tear her upper garment, Scidit tunicam etiam, et apparuit saccus quo induta erat. According to Calmet the sense is, She resumed her sackcloth, which she had put off to receive the governors of the city. Thus also Junius takes it, Imposuit cilicium, positâ, quam induerat, veste; and Grotius, who restores the Greek text, which he thinks corrupt, to this sense, and makes the true reading to be, καὶ γυμνωσαμένη ἐνεδιδύσκετο σάκκον. The Geneva version, which has, She put off the sackcloth wherewith she was clothed, seems faulty here, and not to be reconciled with the context, which mentions prostration, putting ashes on her head, and the like instances of humiliation, to recommend and enforce her suit more effectually to God.

Ver. 2. O Lord God of my father Simeon, to whom thou gavest a sword to take vengeance of the strangers, who loosened the girdle of a maid to defile her.] Judith here begs of God to inspire her with a zeal, like that of Simeon, who massacred the Sichemites, to punish the violation of his sister's honour, in order to take vengeance of the blasphemous Assyrians, and to deliver his people from their present sad state, and the imminent danger that threatened them. But does not the book of Genesis acquaint us, that this action of Simeon and Levi very much displeased Jacob their father, and that he condemned it as cruel and unjust? (See Gen. xlix. 5, 6. compared with xxxiv. 30.) How then can we excuse Judith for commending this fact of Simeon, whom Jacob cursed for the very barbarity of it? But in answer it may be said, that these words do not necessarily imply, that she applauded the fact, nor does the phrase of God's giving a sword to take vengeance, mean any thing more than his permitting an action to be done. As he may be said to put the like means of destruction into the hands of tyrants, whom he occasionally makes his scourges. The like may be said of other wicked persons, whom he sometimes permits in his anger to execute his justice upon a people, often not more abandoned and undeserving than themselves. (See Jer. xxv. 9.) And thus he is said to arm his creatures to avenge his honour, or to make the creature his weapon for the revenge of his enemies, Wisd. v. 17. (See also Joel ii. 25.) So that nothing can be concluded for the merit of the person, that is occasionally made the instrument of God's vengeance. Judith rather praises God for his justice, in revenging such an instance of brutal lust, though executed by the sword of cruel Simeon: she only commendeth the zeal or just indignation shewn on the occasion, but by no means justifies the cruel manner of revenging the affront. The resentment of such an injury was just; but the involving such a number of people in its punishment, was a criminal excess of zeal, and an instance of great barbarity.

Ver. 3. Wherefore thou gavest their rulers to be slain, being deceived.] The difference between the people of God and idolatrous nations, was visible in the point of lust and carnal uncleanness, from the first separation of them, as appears by the zeal of Simeon and Levi, here mentioned, for their sister dishonoured. The idolatrous nations, who were abandoned to the service of strange gods, as the Sichemites were, looked upon all uncleanness of this nature as a thing indifferent, and made no account of it, but in civil regards, as it dishonoured the house, or tainted the issue; being deceived or mistaken in considering it in this respect only; but the Israelites, being bred in the knowledge of the true God, and of the abomination, in which he hath all such acts of uncleanness, regarded them in a moral or religious view; and if they acted herein, as the idolaters, or seemed to countenance them in others, by overlooking them, thought they could no longer be taken for God's people. Hence Simeon and Levi proceeded probably to revenge the injury offered to their sister, considering it as an act, which God had forbidden, which his true servants abhorred, and was a pollution of the holiness of their blood, which distinguished them from idolaters. (See Thorndike, of the Laws of the Church, p. 62.) Calmet observes, that the description in these verses of this foul act, and its consequences, are described poetically, and that it is probable, that this writer had read the poets, as appears from xvi. 7.

Ver. 5. For thou hast wrought not only those things, but also the things which fell out before, and which ensued after: thou hast thought upon the things which are now, and which are to come.] The Geneva rendering here comes nearer the Greek For thou hast wrought the things afore, and these, and the things that shall be after; i. e. As thou wast the author of all the miracles done in our forefathers' days, so thou art no less of those that now come to pass, or shall hereafter. All events succeed one another by the ordering of thy wise providence, which has so disposed them according to thy eternal counsel. The last clause the Vulgate renders indeterminately, Illa post illa cogitasti, which seems to imply such a succession of thoughts in God, as is observable in the human mind; but I conceive the meaning there to be, that God executeth the things that are present at the same time in the Divine mind, at different successive times; or that all things done gradually in time, were at once and all together in his sight and knowledge.

Ver. 6. Yea, what things thou didst determine were ready at hand, and said, Lo, we are here: for all thy ways are prepared, and thy judgments are in thy foreknowledge.] The Geneva version is clearer, For the things which thou dost purpose are present, and say, Behold, we are here: for all thy ways are ready, and thy judgments are foreknown; i. e. Thy infinite prescience foresaw all things with their events, and what thou didst at any time determine to effect, must necessarily come to pass. For thou executest without any difficulty whatever thou pleasest; no obstacle lies in thy way, thy measures are never wrong, nor thy designs ever ill concerted; nor is it possible that they should be discovered, or disappointed by thine enemies, as the means that thou employest are sure and infallible. The mighty power of God in producing, as it were instantaneously, whatever his wisdom determines to have done, is beautifully described in the following words, What things thou dost determine are ready at hand, and say, Lo, we are here. (See Job xxxviii. 35.) The Syriac rendering of them is much to be admired, Tu cogitasti, et facta sunt; consultasti, et steterunt coram te; vocasti, et dixerunt, Ecce hic sumus. The observation in the latter part of the verse about the Divine prescience, is parallel to that, Acts xv. 18. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world. Seneca has almost literally expressed the same sentiment, "Nota est illis (sc. Diis) operis sui series: omnium illis rerum per manus suas iturarum scientia in aperto est; nobis ex abdito subit: et quæ repentina putamus, illis prævisa veniunt, ac familiaria." (De Benefic. iv. 32.)

Ver. 7. For, behold, the Assyrians are multiplied in their power; they are exalted with horse and man; they glory in the strength of their footmen; they trust in shield and spear.] Ἤλπισαν ἐν ἀσπίδι καὶ ἐν γαισῷ· gæsum, or gæsus, was a javelin used among the Gauls. (See Cæsar, de Bell. Gall. lib. iii.) And from them the Greeks and Romans borrowed the word. We meet with it in the LXX. Josh. viii. 18. which the author of the book of Ecclesiasticus, reciting the same story, renders by ῥομφαία, or a sword, xlvi. 3. (See Hody, de Vers. Græc. auth. lib. ii.) But Symmachus and the Vulgate render it by a shield. This verse seems not well connected with the foregoing; the Vulgate expresses it clearer, and illustrates it by the example of the Egyptians, whom God destroyed for their self-sufficiency and presumption, Respice castra Assyriorum nunc, sicut tunc castra Ægyptiorum videre dignatus es, quando post servos tuos armati currebant, confidentes in quadrigis, et in equitatu suo, et in multitudine bellatorum; sed aspexisti super castra eorum, et tenebræ fatigaverunt eos. Tenuit pedes eorum abyssus, et aquæ operuerunt eos. Sic fiant et isti, qui confidunt in multitudine sua, &c.

Ver. 10. Smite by the deceit of my lips the servant with the prince, and the prince with the servant.] i. e. Prosper the stratagem which I have laid, to lead the enemy into a mistake by my words, and inflame their general with such a fond love of me as may prove a snare to deceive and ruin him. But how could Judith entertain any hopes of success from such a request? Can we suppose, consistently, that God would approve of either of these ways? Can the God of truth patronize falsehood, or the most pure Being favour any attempt towards impure lust? To this it is answered, on the other hand, that the reading of some Greek copies is, πάταξον ἐκ χειλέων ἀγάπης μου, and not ἀπάτης, as our version has it; and so the Vulgate expressly renders, Capiatur laqueo oculorum suorum in me, et percuties eum ex labiis caritatis meæ. Secondly, That it was the opinion of those times, that, in a lawful war, surprise, stratagem, deceit, and craft, were fair and allowable; that one might disguise, dissemble, counterfeit, and use all possible means to conceal a design, which the enemy has no right to know; and that if, through misrepresentation or equivocation, he be led into any mistake prejudicial to his safety or interest, there is no just ground of complaint, according to that old maxim, "Dolus, an virtus, quis in hoste requirat?" Thus Jael prevailed, by the deceit of her lips, against Sisera, Judg. iv. 18. 21. And Grotius thinks the men of Jabesh-Gilead used the like deceit towards the Ammonites, 1 Sam. xi. 10. And thus Elisha deluded the Syrians, 2 Kings vi. 18, 19. (See Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 1. sect. 17.) But however some casuists may gloss over mental evasions, equivocations, untruths, and officious lies, as they term them, yet the case is widely different, when one forges express lies, with a direct intention to betray men into wrong measures, and evil counsels, to their ruin; especially when religion is made an accomplice in the cheat, when it is pretended that what is spoken is by inspiration of God, and from a zeal for his religion and glory; (see xi. 16, 17. 19.) when studied arts and allurements are made use of to stir up impure love, and kindle an unlawful flame, and thereby to destroy the soul as well as the body; than which complicated mischief, nothing can be more cruel or more contrary to the law of God. It is well known in what an exemplary manner God treated the Midianites, for following the evil counsel of Balaam, to send their daughters into the camp of the children of Israel; what vengeance he took of the false prophet that gave that ensnaring advice, and of the Midianites that followed it, and of the Israelites that were seduced and corrupted thereby. (Numb. xxxi. 16.) "For these, and the like reasons (says Calmet), we cannot approve, in all respects, either the prayer or action of Judith; we commend her good intentions, and think that the uprightness of her designs and her ignorance abate much of the crime: we neither blame her for concealing her purpose, nor for leading Holofernes into a mistake, nor even for the murder of him; for all this is just and allowable in a lawful war. Yet will not this suffice entirely to excuse her; a lie, told with so much solemnity, and carried on through her whole conversation with Holofernes, is still indefensible. The employing her beauty, and all her little winning arts, to inflame his passion, and thereby exposing her person to a rude attack, is a step likewise not to be justified."

Ver. 11. For thy power standeth not in the multitude, nor thy might in strong men.] It was a firm persuasion of this truth, that induced Jonathan, and his armour-bearer only, to attempt the Philistines' garrison; It may be that the Lord will work for us, for there is no restraint to the Lord, to save by many or by few. (1 Sam. xiv. 6.) By the same, Gideon, with his three hundred men, prevailed over the Midianites. (Judg. vii. 7.) This also encouraged king Asa, when Zerah the Ethiopian came out against him with a thousand thousand; he comforts himself with this reflection, Lord, it is nothing with thee to help with many, or with them that have no power: we rest on thee, O Lord, and in thy name we go against this multitude. (2 Chron. xiv. 11.) Not unlike this is Judas Maccabeus's observation to his soldiers, who, seeing a mighty host of the ungodly coming against them, discouraged at the sight, said to him, How shall we be able, being so few, to fight against so great a multitude, and so strong? whom that great and good leader piously comforts, It is no hard matter for many to be shut up in the hands of a few; and with the God of heaven it is all one, to deliver with a great multitude, or a small company. For the victory of battle standeth not in the multitude of a host, but strength cometh from Heaven. (1 Macc. iii. 17—19.) Artabanus's speech to Xerxes, who had a much larger army with him in his expedition against Greece, surprises us, as coming from a heathen, "Ingens exercitus ab exiguo profligatur, quoties Deus iis, quos detestatur, aut metum, aut tonitru incutit."

Ver. 13. And make my speech and deceit to be their wound and stripe.] i. e. Make the deceit of my speech to be their ruin, ἐν διὰ δυοῖν, not unlike that of St. Paul, Col. ii. 8. Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit; i. e. through the vain deceit of philosophy, or through the deceit of vain philosophy. Our version follows a copy which read, δὸς λόγον μου καὶ ἀπάτην εἰς τραῦμα, κ. τ. λ. and so the Alexandrian MS. has it. Other copies have, δὸς λόγον μου, καὶ ἀπάτην καὶ τραῦμα, καὶ μώλωπα αὐτοῖς, i. e. make my speech to be a snare and hurt to them. In this sense Junius takes it, Præsta ut sermo meus sit fraudi, et vulneri, et cicatrici istis. The Geneva version affords another, but more obscure sense; i. e. Grant me words, and craft, and a wound, and a stroke, against them that enterprise cruel things against thy covenant.

Ver. 14. And make every nation and tribe to acknowledge that thou art the God of all power and might, &c.] It seems as if the former part of this verse had suffered much by transcribers, as the reading of the Greek is so different in the several editions. Some copies have, καὶ ποίησον ἐπὶ πᾶν τὸ ἔθνός σου, καὶ πάσης φυλῆς ἐπίγνωσιν, τοῦ εἰδῆσαι, κ. τ. λ. Others, ποίησόν ἐπὶ παντὸς ἔθνους σου, καὶ πάσης δυνάμεως καὶ κράτους, ὅτι οὐκ ἔστιν ἄλλος, κ. τ. λ. The Alexandrian MS. seems to retain the true reading, ποίησον ἐπὶ παντὸς ἔθνους σου, καὶ πάσης φυλῆς ἐπίγνωσιν, τοῦ εἰδῆσαι ὅτι σὺ εἶ ὁ Θεὸς, Θεὸς πάσης δυνάμεως καὶ κράτους, καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἄλλος, κ. τ. λ. To which agrees the Syriac, Fac toti populo tuo, et omnibus familiis, ut sciant te esse Deum omnis potentiæ et dominii, nec esse alium qui protegat Israel, præter te: and the Geneva version, Shew evidently among all thy people, and all the tribes, that thou art the God of all power and strength, &c. The sense, I conceive, will be somewhat improved, and the wish more extensive and affectionate, if, by a small transposition, we read the passage thus, ποίησον ἐπὶ παντὸς ἔθνους καὶ πάσης φυλῆς σου ἐπίγνωσιν, κ. τ. λ. which Junius greatly confirms, Affer in omni gente notitiam tui, et totius potentiæ tuæ, &c.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 3. WASHED her body all over with water.] The Jews first washed, and then anointed themselves with precious oil. So Naomi to Ruth, Wash thyself therefore, and anoint thyself, (iii. 3.) So David, after the death of his child, rose up and washed, and anointed himself. (2 Sam. xii. 20.) The like is mentioned of Nausicae, and her maids,

Αἱ δὲ, λοεσσάμεναι, καὶ χρισσάμεναι λίπ' ἐλαίῳ,
Δεῖπνον ἔπειθ' εἵλοντο. (Οδ. vi.)

And anointed herself with precious ointment.] This refers to the Jewish custom of anointing the head, more particularly on festivals and other solemnities. Instances of this in profane story are almost innumerable, in the description of their festivities: and that it was usual among the Jews, appears by many passages. Thus Psal. civ. 15. we have mention of oil, to make a cheerful countenance. And in this sense learned men understand the oil of gladness, Psal. xlv. 8. as referring to the oil used on festivals, which is expressly called gladness or joy, 1 Chron. xii. 40. But that passage in Eccles. ix. 8. comes nearest to what is here mentioned, Let thy garments be white, and thy head want no ointment. (See also Luke vi. 17.) On the other hand, upon days of humiliation and mourning, and particularly on the great day of expiation, the Jews were interdicted both washing and anointing. (2 Sam. xiv. 2. Dan. x. 3.) Though Judith is described in this and the following verse, with braided hair, and with a rich mitre or bonnet tied round her head with ribbons finely embroidered, and with other decorations and ornaments, yet are these no certain signs or tokens of a loose turn of mind, or of wanton inclinations; though Jezebel indeed is described with some of them, 2 Kings ix. 30. but her character is the very reverse of this heroine: they are such only, as were worn by the women of that age of condition and distinction, and were now only occasionally used to set off her person, for the better accomplishment of the great design in hand. What the Vulgate here adds, that God himself at this time gave her uncommon and irresistible beauty, to make her admired and amiable in the eyes of all beholders, has no foundation in any of the other ancient versions.

And put on her garments of gladness, wherewith she was glad during the life of Manasses her husband.] It may seem surprising, that Judith, who was so cautious of exposing her person to public view, and was so singularly strict in her dress, should, on a sudden, put on fine and gay apparel, to allure the eyes of all men that should see her: but this she did to ingratiate herself the more to Holofernes, to disarm his fury and resentment against her, as one of the Hebrews, and thereby to procure her a more favourable audience and admittance. Her putting on the very garments she wore in her husband's lifetime, was probably to remind her, that, being attired in these, it was incumbent on her to behave with as much distance and reserve as in her conjugal state, to prevent her yielding to any criminal solicitation, by the very sight of them; to be careful not to reflect any dishonour, through misconduct, on her husband's memory, but to revere his ashes, by preserving her chastity as a widow. This seems to be St. Ambrose's meaning, when, speaking of this particular, he says, "Et bene conjugales pugnatura resumpsit ornatus, quia monumenta conjugii arma sunt castitatis; neque enim vidua aliis aut placere possit, aut vincere." (De Viduis.)

Ver. 5. And filled a bag with parched corn, lumps of figs, and with fine bread.] These are the principal food of the eastern nations; the constitution of their bodies and the nature of their clime inclining them to a more abstemious diet than is used in colder countries. And she took her own provisions with her, that she might not be obliged to partake of the victuals of the gentiles, which the law made her to regard as polluted and defiled, (xii. 2.) Ἄρτος καθαρὸς here means unfermented bread, pure, and free from leaven. Instead of which the Vulgate has, panem et caseum; and the Syriac renders in like manner.

Ver. 12. I am a woman of the Hebrews, and am fled from them, for they shall be given you to be consumed.] See xi. 15. It is to be observed in general of the speeches of Judith, that many expressions therein are spoken ironically, and many equivocally, or with a double meaning. Here she cunningly conceals the truth, when she says, that they shall be given you to be consumed; having some such mental reservation as this, unless God extraordinarily interposes in their behalf, which she seems to be well assured of. Others consider these words as spoken prophetically, as presaging some future captivity to the Jews, unless they repented. In this light the generality of expositors consider Judith's conduct, and endeavour to excuse her from any imputation of falsehood.

Ver. 13. I am coming before Holofernes to declare words of truth.] Which, indeed, she did with respect to herself, that she was a woman of the Hebrews, and had left or fled from them. (See xi. 12.) But supposing her to speak ambiguously, ironically, or even deceitfully, is she not excusable, if it be considered, that the war, which the children of Israel were engaged in at this time, was a just and necessary one; and that, in the judgment of most casuists, stratagem, dissimulation, and even deceit, in such circumstances, have been thought allowable? (See note on ix. 10.) But how shall we justify her, when she says, in the latter part of this verse, I will shew him a way whereby he shall go, and win all the hill country, without losing the body or life of any one of his men? She seems to have made her promise good in effect, when she acquainted Holofernes (xi. 12.) with the state of the besieged, that their victuals failed them, and their water was scant, and, therefore, were under a necessity of surrendering speedily. So that what she says about taking the hill country, without the loss of a man, was true, considered in this light, as there was no need of force, or the hazard of an action, where the famine was so pressing, though this indeed was not the whole of the business she came about, and her main and principal design she concealed in her own breast. Thus Samuel, when sent to anoint a king at Beth-lehem, instead of Saul, to prevent his killing him, gave out, by the order of God, that he came to sacrifice to the Lord: (1 Sam. xvi. 2.) the excuse was not only plausible, but the thing itself true; but still the chief part of his commission he kept to himself, viz. anointing David to be king. Herein Samuel and Judith were both alike, that they spoke the truth, but did not think it proper or safe to lay open their whole purpose.

Ver. 14. Now when the men heard her words, and beheld her countenance, they wondered greatly at her beauty, &c.] As the courage of Judith must be acknowledged great and uncommon, to venture into the Assyrian camp, accompanied only with her maid, so early as break of day, circa ortum diei, as the Vulgate has it, so it is equally to be wondered at, that the soldiers should offer no rudeness of any sort to her; but, on the contrary, for her safer conduct, should appoint her a guard of a hundred men, till she reached the general's tent. We must, I conceive, ascribe this unusual civility to some of the following causes; either to the majesty of her countenance, the splendour and eclat of her dress and appearance, which bespoke her a person of distinction; or to the importance of the dispatches which she said she brought with her; or, lastly, to the Divine protection. St. Ambrose makes the same reflection, "In qua fœmina insidiosæ pulchritudinis novitatem hostilis exercitus vehementer expavit, ut in ejus obsequio vires amitterent, arma projicerent, et colla curvarent. Deducitur ad prætorium subjectis ordinibus fraus Holofernis, et lugentis victoria civitatis." (Serm. 228.)

Ver. 19. And every one said to his neighbour, Who would despise this people, that have among them such women?] This remark of Holofernes's soldiers very much resembles, says Madame Dacier, that of the venerable old counsellors in the third book of the Iliad, who, though they had suffered all the calamities of a tedious war, and were consulting upon methods to put a conclusion to it, upon seeing Helen, the true and only cause of it, approaching towards them, are struck with her charms, and cry out,

> Οὐ νέμεσις, Τρῶας καὶ ἐϋκνήμιδας Ἀχαιοὺς
> Τοιῇδ' ἀμφὶ γυναικὶ πολὺν χρόνον ἄλγεα πάσχειν·
> Αἰνῶς ἀθανάτῃσι θεῇς εἰς ὦπα ἔοικεν.

Which Mr. Pope has thus beautifully rendered,

> ——— No wonder such celestial charms
> For nine long years have set the world in arms.
> What winning graces! what majestic mien!
> She moves a goddess, and she looks a queen!

Ver. 21. Now Holofernes rested upon his bed under a canopy, which was woven with pearls, and gold, and emeralds, and precious stones.] This piece of state, more agreeable to the softness of an eastern monarch, however customary in times of peace, and suited to the indolence of the tender and delicate, was an indulgence not so much to be affected by a soldier. The business and hurry of a camp scarce admits or requires state, and therefore we conceive but meanly of Holofernes, and should of any other general, to see him at such a time extended on a sofa, or lying ingloriously under a magnificent pavilion, as if luxury and pleasure were chiefly regarded. Horace's observation, considered either as a reflection on Antony himself, or on the degeneracy of the old Roman spirit, by the introduction of effeminate softness, is very just and apposite,

" Romanus, eheu! (posteri, negabitis)
Emancipatus feminæ
—spadonibus Servire rugosis potest:
Interque signa turpe militaria
Sol aspicit conopium." (Epod. Od. 9.)

Ver. 22. And he came out before his tent, with silver lamps going before him.] Either, because it was yet scarce daylight, (see xi. 5.) or because it was dark within the tent of Holofernes; for it consisted of two apartments, an antechamber, and a withdrawing or inner room. From the latter he came out to meet Judith, preceded by servants carrying lamps; which were continually, as Calmet supposes, burning in it. In this piece of state Holofernes may be thought to imitate the customs of the Persians, among whom it was usual to carry fire before their kings; as it was afterward done before the Roman emperors, and is at present before the emperor of the Turks. Whether this was a Persian custom or not, herein however we know that all the oriental nations were unanimous, viz. in affecting pomp and grandeur.

Ver. 23. She fell down upon her face, and did reverence unto him: and his servants took her up.] It was neither a sudden fright at the sight of this great and formidable general that thus affected Judith, for she who seemed to have defied the whole Assyrian army, by passing through them with a single waiting-woman only, would scarcely fall down in a swoon at the sight of one man, however considerable; nor was it the eclat and splendour of all that pomp and magnificence which surrounded Holofernes, that dazzled her senses so as to occasion her falling down: her prostration was rather an expression of duty and profound reverence, and a submissive token of her meanness and unworthiness to appear in his presence. The paying him a sort of worship and adoration, was an artifice to work upon his vanity, to recommend her to favour, and to draw him into her snare.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. WOMAN, be of good comfort: fear not in thine heart, for I never hurt any that was willing to serve Nabuchodonosor, the king of all the earth.] Οὐκ ἐκάκωσα ἄνθρωπον, ὅστις ἠρέτικε δουλεύειν, κ. τ. λ. i. e. I have never hurt any man that was willing to submit to and serve Nabuchodonosor; much less shall I injure a defenceless woman, who is fled to me for safeguard. Judith had but little reason to depend upon this declaration, or to trust to his veracity, as he sets out with a falsehood, in saying that he never hurt any that submitted to his great lord; for iii. 8. mention is made of his casting down the frontiers and cutting down the groves of such as had sued for peace, and had surrendered themselves and their cities, and had been received into protection.

Ver. 3. Be of good comfort, thou shalt live this night and hereafter.] How are we to understand night here and in ver. 5.? does it mean that Judith came first to Holofernes in the night, and had an audience in his tent, as our version, following the Greek, seems plainly to represent it? But how then shall we reconcile this with x. 10. where it is said, that the men of the city looked after and followed Judith with their eyes till she had passed the valley, and then saw her no more? which intimates that it was not night, but rather, as the Vulgate has it, about daybreak or sunrising, circa ortum diei. Possibly it might seem night to Holofernes, who went no farther than his antechamber, and had then lights burning in his tent; or else it must mean the night ensuing, or that he determined to have her be with him for a continuance. It is probable that Holofernes could not speak the Syriac or Chaldee language which Judith used; for v. 3. he asks the princes of Moab who this people were, as if he was an absolute stranger to them; we may suppose, therefore, that the conversation which passed between them was managed by an interpreter.

Ver. 6. If thou wilt follow the words of thy servant.] Jael's behaviour to Sisera was not unlike this, when she said to him, Turn in, my lord, turn in to me; fear not: (Judg. iv. 18.) and with the like design of treachery. Such also was Rahab's receiving, concealing, and conveying away, the spies, which was all a crafty management, assisted and carried on by an untrue suggestion; for she said, There came men unto me, but whence they were, I wist not; and when it was dark, the men went out; but whither they went I wist not: pursue after them quickly, for ye shall overtake them: and yet she knew they were concealed in the house at the same time. (Josh. ii. 4, 5.) It would be too bold to charge what she said and did upon the occasion with the guilt of a lie, since the writer to the Hebrews, xi. 31. records her name with honour. In like manner, when a city is straitly besieged, and sore distressed for want of either succours or sustenance, the casuists allow a liberty to amuse the enemy with feigned reports, and false accounts of their state, and to make use of any crafty stratagem they can devise, that may be of service or relief to themselves, though altogether inconsistent with the truth. This, and such-like practices, have been thought sufficiently justified from the very state and exigency of things in time of war. For when people are at open hostility with one another, whether matters be managed by mere force or cunning sleight, it makes no difference; and therefore, if it be lawful to kill an enemy outright, much more is it so to deceive him, though it be to his very great hurt. What some writers have observed to excuse evasive answers, or equivocating behaviour, in those mentioned, and other examples in sacred story, viz. that a mixed action may be commended for the good that is in it, or which it occasions, without any express notice or censure of the evil, seems applicable to the case of Judith.

God will bring the thing perfectly to pass by thee.] i. e. God will execute what he has decreed and purposed, and will grant a complete victory. The expression is equivocal, and may either mean a victory to or over you. Here it is to be taken in the latter sense, and as spoken with such a reservation, as that x. 12. Holofernes understood her to speak of victory, by the surrender of the Israelites, or their overthrow; but Judith's meaning was, that the victory should be obtained by the death of Holofernes himself. The next sentence also is equivocal; viz. My lord shall not fail of his purposes: which may either mean that Holofernes, to whom she was speaking, and whom she compliments with the title of her lord, should gain his point, if he would follow her advice: or, that her Lord God would infallibly execute his design, touching the deliverance of his people. Where Judith's speeches are capable of a double meaning, it is sufficient to free her from the imputation of lying, if one of the two senses be true, viz. that which she herself had in view, though Holofernes and his officers might understand her in a quite different sense; who, for their pride and repeated blasphemies, deserved to be blinded in such a manner as to interpret in his favour what was really against them.

Ver. 7. As Nabuchodonosor king of all the earth liveth, and as his power liveth.] i. e. As true as it is that Nabuchodonosor liveth, and that his power is felt, and acknowledged by the nations around him, so true is it, that thou shalt not fail in thy purposes. It was a common form among the people of the east, to swear by the life of their kings, and other persons of great merit and dignity: thus Hannah, the mother of Samuel, swore by the life of the high-priest Eli; (1 Sam. i. 26.) Elisha by that of Elijah his master; (2 Kings ii. 4.) Abigail by the life of David, when she met him as he went to avenge himself on the family of Nabal; (1 Sam. xxv. 26.) and her compliments, and fair speeches to ingratiate herself, and soothe his anger, somewhat resemble those of Judith. Abner swore by the life of Saul, (1 Sam. xvii. 55.) and Joseph by that of Pharaoh, (Gen. xlii. 15.) But in this sort of oath there was neither superstition nor idolatry: for neither these, swearing by the life of holy men or prophets, nor the other, by that of kings, regarded them in so doing as gods; but being persons held in reverence, and reputed sacred and inviolable, and as representing the power and majesty of God, whose ministers they were, the swearing by their life, was the introducing and applying as it were a thing sacred, to attest the truth of what was spoken: and the setting such a value upon their lives, as of public concernment, was a species of homage, and so high a degree of political respect, as soothed the vanity of princes.

Who hath sent thee for the upholding of every living thing.] This does not suit the character either of Nabuchodonosor or Holofernes, who destroyed all before him, in pursuance of that prince's orders, who had vowed to avenge himself on all the earth; except it be understood as spoken ironically. Our version here seems inaccurate; the Greek εἰς κατόρθωσιν πάσης ψυχῆς will admit of another and better meaning, viz. for the new modelling, correcting, and reforming of all amiss, or that have been out of order, or given offence. And thus the Vulgate, Ad correctionem omnium animarum errantium; and the Geneva version, Whose power hath sent thee to reform all persons. But tyrants, such as Nabuchodonosor, however complimented, seldom concern themselves about reformation in earnest; they are indeed often scourges appointed by God to correct and punish wicked nations, such as the Assyrians were to that of the Jews when they carried them away captive.

For not only men shall serve him by thee, but also the beasts of the field, and the cattle, and the fowls of the air shall live by thy power, under Nabuchodonosor, and all his house.] This is a rhetorical exaggeration; and the mention of animals, and things without reason, submitting to his jurisdiction, as well as men, means only that whole provinces submitted to him, with all the creatures in and belonging to them, though indeed not voluntarily, but through fear or compulsion.

Ver. 8. For we have heard of thy wisdom, and thy policies, and it is reported in all the earth, that thou only art excellent in all the kingdom, and mighty in knowledge, and wonderful in feats of war.] To free Judith from the imputation of lying, as flattery often partakes of it, it may be necessary to observe, that in what she says here of Holofernes, she declares rather the praises which others bestowed upon him than praises him herself. For as there were many flatterers that cried up the merits of that general, so even among those who had submitted to him there were some who were forward to flatter him upon those excellent qualities mentioned here; viz. the prudence of his conduct, his policy, and contrivance, and depth of stratagem; his power, or, as the margin has it, the favour he was in with his prince, his skill in military discipline and the art of war; the great exploits he had performed, and his humanity and goodness to the vanquished. If this is only panegyric, it is not purely of her making; she is not answerable for the justness of the character, as she only mentions what others said of Holofernes.

Ver. 10. Our nation shall not be punished, neither can the sword prevail against them, except they sin against their God.] The truth of this observation the Jews experienced in every stage of their state, from their first becoming a nation to their ceasing to be so, by the captivity of the twelve tribes; their obedience or disobedience respectively ruined or saved them. It was therefore Balaam's policy, says Philo, to make the daughters of Moab to sell the use of their bodies to the Hebrews, upon condition that they would sacrifice unto idols, as knowing that the children of Israel were not otherwise to be subdued than by their own sinfulness and breach of God's commandments, εἰδὼς Ἑβραίοις μίαν ὁδὸν ἁλώσεως παρανομίαν. (See Numb. xxv. xxxi. 16.) And the like reflection holds true universally, that no Divine judgment overtakes a nation in any signal and exemplary manner, but what is brought upon it by its own repeated transgressions, and a confirmed obstinacy in sinning.

Ver. 11. And now, that my lord be not deceived and frustrate of his purpose, even death is now fallen upon them, and their sin hath overtaken them, wherewith they will provoke their God to anger, whensoever they shall do that which is not fit to be done.] The sense of this and the following verses, as they stand in our translation, is very obscure, occasioned by the great confusion of the tenses; nor do the Greek or oriental versions afford any light or assistance. That of Geneva makes it rather clearer, by putting the three following verses in a parenthesis. Junius's exposition, founded on the context, seems most natural; only allowing, what is far from being unreasonable, that sin may then be said to lay hold of us, when first being conceived it is entertained and encouraged, and as it were completed in our thoughts, before the actual commission of it: on this supposition the drift of Judith's speech is to the following effect: "The elders of Bethulia have judged it already allowable, and in case of necessity lawful, to eat what at other times is forbidden by the law; for form's sake, indeed, they have sent deputies to Jerusalem for a dispensation from the Jewish Sanhedrin, which from their own practice in a similar case, they are assured of: but even now the inhabitants of Be-thulia are guilty, and will suffer as such for their wicked intention." Judith's design, without doubt, was to impose upon Holofernes, as is plain from ix. 10. 13. and her story was framed to agree with what Achior had before told him, that if the Hebrews had or should sin against their God, he might easily overcome them: she now shews there was such a sin in their hearts, and soon would be actually committed by them, as would stir up the anger of their God, the moment they should commit it, and the execution waited only the return of the messengers with the licence, instantly expected, and they would then immediately be given up to destruction, and even Jerusalem itself and all Judea, as the sin would hereby become general, be a prey and spoil unto him. But, to give a shorter answer to this difficulty, may not Judith be supposed to speak here as of a fact already done, to shew her assurance of the certainty of it, and to gain the greater credit with Holofernes? or by a Hebraism the preterit be put for the future, instances of which are not unfrequent?

Ver. 16. God hath sent me to work things with thee, whereat all the earth shall be astonished, and whosoever shall hear it.] This address is so artful, as that the words of it admit of a double meaning: Judith inwardly meant her own enterprise, but Holofernes, from her speech, fondly concluded, that the God of the Hebrews was angry with the Jews, and had given them up to destruction; and this he imagined, through mistake, to be the cause of Judith's quitting them.

Ver. 19. I will lead thee through the midst of Judea, until thou come before Jerusalem.] Holofernes flattered himself, from the intelligence and assurance given him by Judith, that he should go up thither himself in triumph; but her reserved meaning was, that his head should be carried thither, and through all Judea, in triumph.

And thou shalt drive them as sheep.] This, too, is capable of a double meaning; the secret sense in Judith's mind was, that he should be the occasion, by the surprise of his death, of the Assyrians' being driven in this manner, when the Jews should pursue after them, destroy many of them, and spoil their tents. What follows, viz. A dog shall not open his mouth at thee, is also equivocal; and may either mean, that none shall oppose or make any resistance to him, in his victorious march through Judea, or that, when he is dead, and there is no longer any fear of him, he shall give no disturbance or uneasiness to any. It is a proverbial expression, and used in this sense, Exod. xi. 7. Josh. x. 21.

For these things were told me according to my foreknowledge, and they were declared unto me, and I am sent to tell thee.] This is scarcely intelligible, as our version has it; for what necessity of telling or declaring the thing to her, if she herself had foreknowledge of it? Grotius thinks the true reading of the Greek is, κατὰ πρόγνωσιν θεοῦ, according to the foreknowledge of God: (see ix. 6. xii. 4.) which is confirmed by the Vulgate, Hæc mihi dicta sunt per providentiam Dei. Whichever reading we follow, she flatters manifestly Holofernes, in making him believe that God watched particularly over him for his good and preservation, by sending a person to him of such great penetration, and filled with the spirit of prophecy.

Ver. 22. God hath done well to send thee before the people, that strength might be in our hands, and destruction upon them that lightly regard my lord.] i. e. God hath dealt favourably and kindly with you, in sending thee hither, for thereby thou wilt save thy life. (See x. 15.) Thus Calmet, Dieu vous a favorisée de vous envoyer ainsi devant ceux de vôtre nation. The Vulgate has, Benefecit Deus qui misit te ante populum, ut des illum tu in manibus nostris. Our version follows the Greek, which is more explicit.

Ver. 23. And now thou art both beautiful in thy countenance, and witty in thy words; surely if thou do as thou hast spoken, thy God shall be my God.] Junius thinks that Holofernes swears here by her beauty (instances of which, used by lovers, occur in Plautus and other writers), That if she, or, as the Vulgate has it, her God, brought that to pass which she had promised and engaged for, he himself would become a Jew, and adopt her God. It is not easy to think, says Calmet, that Holofernes spoke this seriously, and in good earnest, as his conversion would prejudice his fortune; or he must certainly be ignorant that the God of Israel allowed not any to worship strange gods together with him. He meant only hereby to flatter and please Judith, to insinuate himself into her affections, and to gain her love. And observing Judith to be a woman of strict piety, and strongly attached to her religion, he foresaw this would be the principal difficulty in the way of his passion; he declares, therefore, that a difference in religion ought not to create in her any distance or estrangement to his person, as he was ready to become a Jew, as soon as he saw the accomplishment of what she had assured him of.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND bade that they should prepare for her of his own meats.] Συνέταξε καταστρωθῆναι αὐτῇ ἀπὸ τῶν ὀψοποιημάτων αὐτοῦ. Calmet, from the authority of the Syriac, which has, Et jussit sterni ipsi, darique ipsi de convivio suo, &c. thinks the true reading of the Greek, συνέταξε καταστρῶσαι αὐτὴν, καὶ δοῦναι αὐτῇ ἀπὸ τῶν, κ. τ. λ. he ordered that a bed or couch should be prepared for her, and that she should sit or lie down, and his own meat and provisions should be given her.

Ver. 2. And Judith said, I will not eat thereof.] It was the custom of ancient times (see Grotius on Dan. i. 8. Casaub. ad Athen. lib. i. cap. 11.) to consecrate all that they did eat or drink to their gods, by putting part of it on the altar, or casting it into the fire; so that to eat of meats and drinks so consecrated, was in effect to partake of things offered to idols. Whereas, by the laws of Moses, nothing was to be eaten or drank by the children of Israel, but which had been offered to the Lord, either immediately in itself, or virtually in the first-fruits and offerings. (Lev. xvii. 3. xxiii. 14. Deut. xii. 21. 26.) The Jews, therefore, as appears from the examples of Daniel and his associates at the court of Nabuchodonosor, of Tobit at that of Shalmaneser, (i. 11, 12.) and of Nehemiah at that of Artaxerxes, who, being cupbearer to that king, was dispensed with from drinking the wine of the gentiles; the Jews, I say, when they could not avoid conversing with the gentiles, took great care to abstain, not only from things really sacrificed to idols, but from most things that came out of gentile hands, because there was some presumption, that a part of most kinds, by way of first-fruits, had been consecrated to idols, the rest being by such first-fruits deemed polluted, as dedicated to them. From the places above cited it appears, that the Jews forbore all meats and drinks that came from the gentiles, in like manner as the Egyptians would not eat with the Hebrews, whom they looked upon as impure and profane, and esteemed it an abomination so to do. (Gen. xliii. 32.) When the enemies of the Jews aimed to vex and displease them, they compelled them to eat swine's flesh and other forbidden meats; and great was the persecution of them by Antiochus, and other heathen rulers, especially in the times of the Maccabees. In like manner, Julian the Apostate, to be revenged upon the Christians at Antioch, made all the food that was brought to market to be first dedicated at a heathen altar. (Theodoret, lib. i. cap. 14.)

Lest there be an offence.] The word σκάνδαλον, in general, signifies a stone or block, or something in the way, at which men are apt to stumble and fall; and accordingly in the Old Testament it is taken for a fall, and sometimes for sin, the lapse of the soul, as it seems to be, Judg. viii. 27. and so the sense here may be, Lest by eating forbidden meats I sin against God, and so be a hinderance to what God had otherwise decreed to have brought to pass by my means for the public good: or, secondly, offence, or scandal, as it is rendered from the Greek, sometimes signifies a snare; and so another sense of this place may be, That she would not eat with him, lest his table should prove a snare unto her, an occasion of falling, and an inlet to temptation: or, lastly, we may understand it of her giving offence to others thereby, as the word is used when applied to eating, 1 Cor. viii. 13. This determined the venerable and good Eleazar not to eat even of his own lawful meat and provisions, because, being brought to him secretly, he was apprehensive that many young persons might think that Eleazar, being fourscore years old and ten, was now gone to a strange religion, and so his dissembling prove a snare unto them. (2 Macc. vi. 18—24.)

Ver. 4. As thy soul liveth, my lord, thine handmaid shall not spend those things that I have, before the Lord work by mine hand the things that he hath determined.] Messieurs of Port-Royal observe, that there is the less reason to believe that Judith is guilty of lying, as she occasionally confirms what she says by an oath; sometimes swearing by God, and asseverating solemnly, that she was sent from and commissioned by him; at other times by the life of Nabuchodonosor, and here by that of Holofernes, which, if made use of in confirmation of any falsehood, is inconsistent with that character of her, viii. 8. that she feared God greatly. However this be, it is certain, that throughout almost her whole discourse with this general, she converses dubiously, or in equivocal terms, and particularly here, when she says, that the Lord will work by her hands what he has determined, she speaks of her design to cut off that general's head, and Holofernes understands her of delivering the Jews into his power.

Ver. 5. Then the servants of Holofernes brought her into the tent, and she slept till midnight, and she arose when it was towards the morning-watch, Ver. 6. And sent to Holofernes, saying, Let my lord now command that thine handmaid may go forth unto prayer.] According to the Vulgate, Judith asks this favour of going forth to prayer at a distance from the camp, at her first entrance into the tent appointed her, which seems more probable than disturbing Holofernes unseasonably by such a message towards the morning-watch. And indeed Judith had prepared Holofernes to grant this favour, by telling him on the preceding day, thy servant will go out by night into the valley, and pray unto God, (xi. 17.) Judith could as well have prayed within her tent, and God could as effectually have heard her from the most secret and retired part of it; but persisting out of policy in her first resolution, of going forth at a distance from the camp for that purpose, she thought it an instance of more duty and respect to apply for leave afresh. This conduct of Judith, though very artful, was regular, and of a piece, and left Holofernes no room to suspect her fidelity and integrity. For as it was necessary at first to take this precaution, so was it likewise to manage the liberty indulged her, of going forth for three days, in such a manner as to create no jealousy; that after having cut off Holofernes's head, and accomplished the great design she came upon, she might retire with more ease, safety, and confidence, to Bethulia again, without any stop or molestation. To retire apart for prayer, that it may be performed with more earnestness and attention, and freer from the notice and hearing of the rude and profane, is certainly most laudable; but the true reason of Judith's procedure at this time, seems rather to be founded on artifice, than on any obligation either from the Jewish law or custom. By this pretext s heinduced Holofernes to think, what was contrived for his ruin to be most advantageous to his great designs, and, under a notion of praying for victory and success in his undertaking, she opened a way to triumph more securely over the grand adversary of her country, and to facilitate her own safe return.

Ver. 7. And went out in the night into the valley of Bethulia, and washed herself in a fountain of water by the camp; and when she came out, she besought the Lord God of Israel, to direct her way to the raising up of the children of her people.] One is astonished to see here a woman of such beauty go out in the night-time, accompanied only with her waiting-woman, and pass through the camp of the Assyrians, without any insult or violence offered to her. But it is most probable, that the dread of Holofernes's resentment, who was captivated with her person, and regarded her as one who would soon crown his warmest wishes, hindered the soldiers from attempting any rudeness or assault. There is no necessity to suppose, with the Romish expositors, that either an angel conducted her at first from Bethulia, or secured her each night from danger when she went out into the valley. The occasion of her going was to wash herself in a fountain, whether that at the foot of the mountain, whose aqueduct, according to the Vulgate, Holofernes cut off from all communication with the city, is not material to determine; it may be more proper to observe, that fountain-water seems particularly enjoined by the law, Lev. xv. 13. where the Chaldee interpreter has, in aquis fontis. Spencer adds this farther reason, Aqua fontana purior, et acrioris ad purgandum virtutis, adeoque lustrationi magis apta crederetur. (De Purific. p. 774.) Purification, or washing the hands or body before prayers, or sacrifices offered to the Deity, was a very ancient religious ceremony. The Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, all used these washings before their devotions; and from the heathens probably this custom was derived to the Jews. (Spenc. ibid. p. 788. Philo, περὶ φιλανθρωπ. Eurip. Alcest. ver. 157. Hom. Il. Z. Ovid. Fast. lib. v. Virg. Æn. ix.) Thus xvi. 18. of this history, we read that, as soon as the people were purified, they offered their burnt-offerings; and to this custom the Psalmist alludes, Psal. xxvi. 6. as the apostle also is thought to do, 1 Tim. ii. 8. I will therefore that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands, ὁσίους χεῖρας, puras manus. It is certain that the Jews even to this day wash their hands before they enter the synagogue to pray: (Leo Moden. de Jud. Rit.) and from Mark vii. 2—4. it appears, that when they returned from market, or other public place, they used with great care and exactness this ceremony, to purify themselves from any defilement, which a converse with strangers, or the touch of any thing that was thought impure, according to the law, might occasion. And so Judith being all day in the camp of the Assyrians, probably took the opportunity of the night to wash herself, that she might purge or purify herself from any defilement or uncleanness which she might have contracted from conversing with gentiles, among whom she was.

Ver. 9. So she came in clean, and remained in the tent until she did eat her meat at evening.] It seems from this place, as if Judith, to fervent prayer for the happy success of her enterprise, added likewise strict fasting, to render herself more worthy to effect the deliverance of her people: for being an Israelite, indeed, serving the God of heaven in spirit, day and night, (xi. 17.) she rightly judged it necessary to purify her heart before God of all that might displease him, as well as to use the outward ceremony of washing. And as thereby she returned pure, so she resolved to continue so both in body and spirit, passing the whole day in severe fasting until the evening, before she took any refreshment; according to the custom of the more religious, who used to fast not only till evening, but even till the stars began to appear. And nothing but prayer, added to such a severe discipline, say Messieurs of Port-Royal, could have kept one so beautiful, chaste, and virtuous, in the midst of a camp of rude barbarians; or enabled an instrument so feeble to execute a work of such vast danger and importance. St. Ambrose has the same remark, "Non bibebat fœmina Judith, jejunans omnibus diebus viduitatis suæ. His armis munita processit, et omnem Assyriorum circumvenit exercitum. Sobrii vigore consilii abstulit Holofernis caput, servavit pudicitiam, victoriam reportavit. Hæc enim succincta jejunio, in castris prætendebat alienis: ille vino sepultus jacebat, ut ictum vulneris sentire non posset. Itaque unius mulieris jejunium innumeros stravit exercitus Assyriorum." (De Jejunio.)

Ver. 10. And called none of the officers unto the banquet.] i. e. That he might be more at liberty, and have fewer witnesses of his intemperance and lasciviousness. Most of the copies have, εἰς τὴν χρῆσιν, but the Alexandrian and the Complute, which last our translators generally follow, have, εἰς τὴν κλῆσιν. Thus in the third book of Maccabees κλητοὶ are guests invited to a feast, to which is opposed ἄκλητοι in Homer, and invocati in Plautus. In the glossaries we have, κλήτωρ, and δειπνοκλήτωρ, invitator. And so Matt. xxii. 3. καλέσαι τοὺς κεκλημένους, is to be understood, and is an expression like that here, ἐκάλεσεν εἰς τὴν κλῆσιν.

Ver. 11. Bagoas, the eunuch, who had charge over all that he had.] Bagoas is not a proper, but a common name for a eunuch, at least for the chief of them; for so the principal ones were called among the Persians and Babylonians, according to Pliny, (lib. xiii. 4.) Q. Curtius calls Alexander's eunuch Bagoas, (lib. x.) Herod also had one called by the same name. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. 3. see Sulpit. Sever. Sac. Hist. lib. ii. in Not.) We find eunuchs in vogue among the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes, and Persians, and all the eastern princes. They were anciently employed in the most momentous affairs, all places of the greatest trust being filled by such. The term eunuch, therefore, does not always signify a real one, but often an officer at court, and near the king's person. In the book of Esther, i. 10. vi. 2. they are called chamberlains, that served in the presence of the king; such as was Potiphar to the king of Egypt, as many have supposed. To them the Persian kings not only committed the guard of their own persons, (Xen. Cyr. lib. vii.) but likewise the education of their children; it being a custom among them to put the heir-apparent to the crown, as soon as he was born, into the hands of eunuchs, under whose tuition he remained till he attained the seventh year of his age. (Plato in Alcib.) Formerly they were entrusted likewise with the care of some favourite women, and to watch over their conduct. Thus Ovid,

"Quem penes est dominam servandi cura Bagoæ."
(Amor. lib. ii.)

As in later times they have been employed in seraglios. From the words, πεῖσον τὴν γυναῖκα τὴν Ἑβραίαν, ἥ ἐστι παρὰ σοὶ, it seems probable that Bagoas had the care of Judith, and that she lodged with him, or in his tent.

Ver. 12. For it will be shame for our person, if we shall let such a woman go, not having had her company: for if we draw her not unto us, she will laugh us to scorn.] These words of Holofernes are capable of a double meaning, and contain either a harmless invitation to the banquet, and innocent freedom of discourse, or in a bad sense they may imply an intention in Holofernes to abuse and debauch her, in which sense ὁμιλέω is often taken by Lucian, Aristotle, and other writers. (See particularly Hist. of Susanna, ver. 54. 58.) The Syriac and Geneva versions understand it in the former sense; the Vulgate and Sulpitius Severus (Sacr. Hist. lib. iii.) in the latter; which the conclusion of the verse, and the context, (see ver. 16.) render most probable, and is better adapted to the dissolute character of the person spoken of, to say nothing of the profession. But what a mean and detestable opinion does it give us of Holofernes's honour, and of his loose and degenerate manner of acting, to hear him declare, that it will be a reflection and disgrace to him not to have ruined a woman's virtue! As if it was a commendable triumph, or added to the laurels of a general, to glory in the spoils of beauty, or signalize himself by debauching innocence. And how degenerate must those or any times be, when rapes are accounted gallantry, and brutal lust an accomplishment! As virtue wears not the attire of a harlot, so neither was Judith like any of his Assyrian prostitutes; he needed not have been afraid, if he did not draw her, i. e. as the Geneva version has it, allure her to him, that she would have ridiculed him for his backwardness, or reproached him for coming away undefiled; for as she would not permit indecent freedoms, so neither would she take them, nor act beneath the unblamable character she had maintained, by any criminal levity of conversation.

Ver 13. Then Bagoas said, Let not this fair damsel fear to come to my lord, and to be honoured in his presence, and drink wine, and be merry with us, and be made this day as one of the daughters of the Assyrians, which serve in the house of Nabuchodonosor.] The infamous pander but too well understood his master's inclination; he therefore invites her freely to drink wine, the great incentive to lust. The Persians were much more free and dissolute at their entertainments than the other nations of the east, who allowed not their women to appear at their banquets, nor to dine with them in public: they generally ate by themselves apart, and did not affect to be introduced on such occasions. One sees in the book of Esther how backward queen Vashti was to attend the royal summons, with what a fierceness of spirit she received the message, and absolutely refused to go into the apartment, where Ahasuerus was dining with his nobles, (i. 12.) In the history of the Hebrews, and that of the Egyptians, we read of no women at their public entertainments, nor among the ancient Greeks; but the Persians took much greater liberties, had women promiscuously among their guests, and were very indiscreet, according to many writers, in their behaviour and conduct towards them. (Herod. lib. v. cap. 18. Justin. lib. vii.) Even lewd and infamous women sometimes attended to sing and dance before them, and were afterward employed in scenes of wickedness. It is true, that the manners of the Persians and Assyrians were not altogether alike; but they greatly resembled one another, says Calmet, and the liberties taken with women by the one were to be found and paralleled in the other. One need only read the life of Sardanapulus to be convinced of the dissoluteness of their kings, nor have a stronger proof to what abandoned and vile purposes the daughters of Assyria, who served in the house of Nabuchodonosor, were employed, than the proposal made to Judith by this intriguing eunuch.

Ver. 14. Then said Judith unto him, Who am I, that I should gainsay my lord? Surely whatsoever pleaseth him, I will do speedily.] It hath been objected against this history, that the author of it makes his heroine act and talk in a manner not so well comporting with that sense of virtue and religion which she professes to have; (xi. 17.) for she seems, from this verse, as a woman devoid of modesty, who endeavoured to ensnare Holofernes in a sinful amour, and answered to the declaration of a criminal passion, with too little modesty and reserve. To this it is answered, by its advocates, in favour of her conduct, that her answer to the eunuch's suggestions she might design for no more than a common compliment, which the situation of her affairs at that time obliged her to make. She might perceive, very likely, the bad design which the Assyrian general had upon her; but she did not think herself concerned to discover that she perceived it. She pretended, in some measure, to be ignorant of it: and to pretend an ignorance in what is proposed, when the thing is faulty, and will not bear an examination, is a point of modesty as well as prudence; as, where it will admit of a double construction, there to take it in the better sense, is ever reputed an act of candour and good breeding. Let not this fair damsel fear (says the old pander) to come to my lord, to be honoured in his sight, and to be as one of the daughters of Assyria, who serve in the court of Nabuchodonosor. How the daughters of Assyria, who served in this capacity, were used, Judith very probably had been informed; but since the eunuch put it upon the foot of a great favour and dignation done to her, she could do no less than return him a compliment. But then we all know that the offers of service, which upon every occasion we are so apt to make to one another, and those expressions of submission and respect, which so commonly pass among us, are not to be taken in a literal sense, because they always imply a tacit condition. And, therefore, the answer which the historian puts in Judith's mouth, Surely whatsoever pleaseth him, I will do speedily, will fairly admit of this construction:—"Whatever Holofernes shall desire of me, so far as is consistent with my duty, honour, and religion, I will not fail to do." (See Calmet, in loc. and Stackhouse's History of the Bible, vol. i.) There is also a farther solution to be given of this seeming forwardness of Judith, that by her Lord she might mean the Lord God, whom she had all along endeavoured to please by her prayers, fastings, and special acts of faith; and might with good reason say to the eunuch, who was sent to her from Holofernes, "Whatever pleaseth him I will do, and it shall be my joy unto the day of my death;" and her meaning might only be, "I am willing to do what that good and acceptable and perfect will of God requires of me, and it shall be the pleasure of my life to fulfil it; as the accomplishment of it I know will be my happiness in this life, and be the means of blessedness in the other." The eunuch, indeed, who spoke to Judith in this manner, regarded his master as the person whom she called her Lord, and being blinded with this persuasion, and interpreting Judith's answer by the passion of Holofernes, he contributed to make that general fall into the snare, which was his overthrow, without thinking of any evil consequence.

Ver. 15. And her maid laid soft skins on the ground for her, over against Holofernes, that she might sit and eat upon them.] Εἰς τὸ ἐσθίειν κατακλινομένην ἐπ' αὐτῶν. It appears, from hence, that Judith did not eat at the same table with Holofernes, but apart by herself, and on her own meats; not sitting, as our version has it, but recumbent, κατακλινομένη, on soft skins spread on the ground, a custom among the ancients, which Homer mentions, Il. i. and Strabo, lib. iii. The translator of the LXX. in our Polyglot, has, Ut manducaret accumbens super eas, et ingressa recubuit Judith. Junius renders in like manner. The Jews' ancient posture at table was sitting. Saul, when he was king, sat upon his seat by the wall. (1 Sam. xx. 24.) And they continued the posture of sitting, for the most part, in the reign of Solomon. (Prov. xxiii. 1.) At the feast of Ahasuerus, the princes lay on magnificent beds, (Esther i.) as they did also at the banquet Esther made for the king and Haman, (chap. vii.) which, though it relates only to the Persians, yet shews the antiquity of this custom of lying at meals in the east: and after the Jews had acquaintance and dealings with the Babylonians, Persians, and Syrians, little or no mention is made of sitting at meals. The posture of lying at them sprang first from luxury and effeminacy, and as such it is mentioned by the prophets; (Amos vi.

4. 7. Ezek. xxiii. 41.) but after the captivity it became more general. In the gospel-times, beds to lie on at their meals were common; our Saviour was on one of them, when Mary Magdalen anointed his feet, and also when he ate the last supper with his disciples.

Ver. 18. I will drink, now, my lord, because my life is magnified in me this day, more than all the days since I was born.] The glory of which Judith speaks, was that springing from the hopes of victory, which she entertained over Holofernes, the person who aimed to triumph over her chastity; a conquest, not of her eyes, but the effect of her courage; a satisfaction not arising from love, but hatred. For a woman so religious, so attached to the love of her country, and of the sanctuary in particular, was, we may be assured, averse to the addresses of this alien and barbarian, and very far from regarding it as an honour to serve and please him, whose design was, as she mentions in her prayer, to defile the sanctuary, and to pollute the tabernacle, where the great and glorious Name rested, and to cast down the horn of the altar, (ix. 8.) She could never have any thoughts or inclination to respect and honour one so wicked, whom with such earnestness she implored God to give her grace to despise, and strength to subdue. As she had anticipated victory in her mind, and reflected on it as a glorious instance of the power of God, that the wicked and proud Assyrian should fall merely by the hand of a woman, she had reason to regard that day, when she should cut off the head of the grand adversary of her country, as the most glorious in her whole life.

Ver. 20. And Holofernes took great delight in her, and drank much more wine than he had drank at any time in one day since he was born.] I cannot better illustrate this than by St. Ambrose's reflection upon it:—"Temperantia virtus est fœminarum. Inebriatis vino viris, et somno sepultis, abstulit vidua gladium, exseruit manum, bellatoris abscidit caput, per medias hostium acies intemerata processit. Advertitis igitur quantum mulieribus nocere possit ebrietas, quando viros vina sic solvunt, ut vincantur a fœminis? Esto igitur vidua temperans; casta primum a vino, ut casta possit esse ab adultero. Nequaquam te ille tentabit, si vina non tentent. Nam si Judith bibisset, dormisset cum adultero. Sed quia non bibit, haud difficile ebrios exercitus unius sobrietas et vincere potuit, et eludere." (De Viduis.)

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. NOW when the evening was come, his servants made haste to depart, and Bagoas shut his tent without. Ver. 2. And Judith was left alone in the tent, and Holofernes lying along upon his bed; for he was filled with wine.] Coverdale's rendering here seems preferable, as it sets this interview in a much stronger light; Now when it was late in the night, his servants made haste every man to his lodging, and Bagoas shut the chamber-door, and went his way, for they were all overladen with wine: so was Judith alone in the chamber. As for Holofernes he lay upon the bed all drunken, and of very drunkenness fell asleep. Here are many particulars very observable:—1. That the tents of the great generals in the east were very spacious, having several apartments, and for their grandeur and magnificence not unlike palaces. 2. It is probable that lamps were burning all night in Holofernes's chamber, without which Judith could not have seen to have managed and conducted her enterprise. 3. When it is here said that Bagoas shut the doors of his tent without, it must be understood with this reserve, that Judith had liberty to go out; for, to prevent suspicion, she had the cunning and precaution to acquaint Bagoas beforehand with her intention of going forth that very night as on the preceding ones. 4. Judith's servant is ordered to wait without, not at the door of Holofernes's tent, as some expositors would have it, that she might be ready at call, and to give any notice or assistance that was necessary, but at that of her own bedchamber, which carried less suspicion with it. Nor does it appear that she had acquainted her waiting-woman with the great design in hand; it seems more probable, from her not communicating it to the elders of Bethulia, when she set out on this enterprise, that she kept it as an impenetrable secret, wholly in her own breast, for fear of any discovery or miscarriage. The foregoing circumstances suggest this useful reflection, That the wisdom of God often makes even the vices and irregularities of men to serve, in a surprising manner, to the execution of his own great purposes. Judith would never have been able to have cut off Holofernes's head, if she had not been alone with him in his tent, and, even when alone, could not have accomplished so desperate a design, if an excess of wine had not quite stupified and laid asleep Holofernes and his officers, so as not to be capable of mistrusting any thing, much less to hinder what she was about to effect. One sees also by the event, how brutal lust and pure love were differently rewarded: Judith, inflamed with the love of her country and its afflicted people, is transported beyond herself at the thoughts she had conceived of their deliverance, and with great presence of mind, and undauntedness of spirit, happily accomplishes it. Holofernes, on the other hand, whose intentions were base and dishonourable, intoxicated with wine, falls a sacrifice to his lusts, a victim to that heroine whom he meant to abuse.

Ver. 4. Then Judith, standing by his bed, said in her heart, O Lord God of all power, look at this present upon the works of mine hands, for the exaltation of Jerusalem.] Judith shews, by this prayer, directed to the God of all power, that it was not upon herself, or her own management or force that she depended for success, but on the all-powerful hand of God, from whom she expected that assistance which she stood so much in need of at this time. Her prayer seems conceived in this or the like manner:—"I know and experience, O Lord, that in myself I am nothing but weakness, and incapable to execute what I have undertaken; I therefore now, in thy presence, disclaim all pretence to the merit or glory of an action, which is far above me to achieve; but I believe, at the same time, and have a firm faith and assurance, that what I cannot do by myself, thou wilt do in and by me, and make thy power the more known and conspicuous, as the instrument thou art pleased to employ is proportionably weak and insufficient." Judith prayed thus, it is said, in her heart, not that she had any fear or apprehension of being overheard by a vocal prayer, as Holofernes was so insensible and stupified by his excessive debauch; but the expression denotes, that God, being a spirit, hears not the articulate sound of the voice, though it be said figuratively to enter into his ears, but has a particular regard to the language and motion of the heart.

Ver. 6. Then she came to the pillar of the bed which was at Holofernes's head, and took down his falchion from thence.] Προσελθοῦσα τῷ κανόνι τῆς κλίνης . . . καθεῖλε τὸν ἀκινάκην αὐτοῦ ἀπ' αὐτοῦ. It is very probable that τὸ κιόνι, is the true reading here, as κιὼν properly signifies a pillar. The acinaces was a short Persian dagger, according to Curtius, Herodotus, lib. vii. Horace, Carm. lib. i. manageable by a woman's hand. Hence likewise some have concluded Holofernes to have been a Persian. It may be asked, whether Judith had any instruments of death with her, as poison or dagger, &c.; for it may seem probable, as she went with a settled resolution to kill Holofernes, she was prepared accordingly. To this it may be sufficient to answer, that she depended upon finding something for her purpose in the Assyrian general's tent, a magazine usually of warlike weapons: or she assured herself, that his own sword at least would be ready at hand to complete her vengeance; in like manner as David, when, unarmed in comparison, he went forth to engage the champion of the Philistines, made use of the uncircumcised giant's own sword to cut off his head: or, like Jael, she might hope to dispatch him, perhaps, with a nail of the tent; and that, as Sisera's, she might smite off his head, when she had pierced and stricken through his temples. (Judg. v. 26.)

Ver. 7. And approached to his bed, and took hold of the hair of his head, and said, Strengthen me, O Lord God of Israel, this day. Ver. 8. And she smote twice upon his neck with all her might, and she took away his head from him.] Excess of wine had made Holofernes not only sleepy and drowsy, but even insensible; by his not waking or stirring during the whole action, he seems to have lost all sense, even that of feeling, which gave Judith time, who was not able to take off his head at one blow, to strike a second, and to complete what she had begun. One shall hardly hear or read of an instance, where such a rough and violent assault passed seemingly unfelt and unperceived. When Sisera was smote by Jael, the text says, At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down; which seems to import, that at the first stroke he started and lifted up his body (his sleep being only occasioned by fatigue and weariness), and shewed some sign of life and motion, but being very much stunned, he fell down again, and by a second stroke on so sensible part (for the very manner of the expression denotes a repetition of the blow) he fell down dead. Holofernes's death was not quite so immediate, nor from the nature of the part wounded could the dire business be so quickly dispatched; but during the whole bloody process of his decollation, no struggle appears, no groan is uttered; he lay, as it were, in a continued coma, or rather slept, as it really proved, the sleep of death. Herein they both agree, that they fell ingloriously by the hand of a woman, and by a like instance of treachery. When Polyphemus lay in the like circumstances, inebriated and in a deep sleep with the copious draughts of Ulysses's generous wine, the wise chief, to whom some god, says Homer, imparted courage for the design, took the advantage of his drowsiness and stupidity, and contrived cunningly the putting out his eye, which alone occasioned such anguish in him, that, as the same poet says,—

Σμερδαλέον δὲ μέγ' ὤμωξεν· περὶ δ' ἴαχε πέτρη. (Odys. ix.)

It is observable, that Virgil, mentioning the same story of the Cyclops, adds, that the persons who were engaged in the design first prayed to the gods to assist them in the attempt—

"Nam simul, expletus dapibus, vinoque sepultus,
Cervicem inflexam posuit,—nos, magna precati
Numina, sortitique vices, una undique circum
Fundimur, et telo lumen terebramus acuto." (Æn. iii.)

The history of Judith is so far similar, that she had her revenge likewise upon a monster of cruelty, and prayed to God to strengthen her hand for the execution of her design. With respect to the act itself, the advocates of this history justify it from the command of God, Deut. xiii. 6. and following verses. In pursuance of this law, Judith, or any other inhabitant of Bethulia, inspired with the like courage and magnanimity, might lawfully, they maintain, endeavour to counterplot the designs of any, even with the death of the person, who, in a hostile manner, should come not only to invade their civil rights and liberties, but to extirpate their religion, and compel them by force of arms to receive an idolatrous form of worship, which neither they nor their fathers knew.

Ver. 9. And tumbled his body down from the bed.] One cannot well guess at the reason which induced Judith to tumble the dead body from the bed upon the ground, unless it was that so frightful a spectacle might strike the greater terror and consternation in those that should behold it, and that the fright and dejection of spirit, communicated from one to another upon the occasion, might at length affect the Assyrian army in general for the loss of their chief, as in reality it did some time after, and occasion their sudden flight, and a successful pursuit after them.

And pulled down the canopy from the pillars.] The ancients, especially in warm countries, made the curtains of their beds of a very fine net-work, which coming round the whole bed, shut them in in such a manner as to have the benefit of the air without the trouble of flies, which could not get through them. Such seems to have been round the bed of Holofernes, called here κωνωπεῖον, and by the Vulgate, conopeum; which was a sort of veil made in the form of a fine net, which left a passage for the light, and at the same time kept out the flies. The Egyptians used this kind of net-work all round their beds, to guard against the inconvenience of certain flies or gnats, which are called κώνωπες. The ponds and marshes, with which Egypt abounded, bred a great number of these insects. They who translated the history of Judith into Greek, probably Alexandrian Jews, seem to speak after their country manner, when they say here, that Judith pulled down the conopeum of Holofernes's bed after she had cut off his head.

Ver. 11. Then said Judith afar off to the watchmen at the gate, Open, open now the gate: God, even our God is with us, to shew his power yet in Jerusalem, and his forces against the enemy.] Καὶ κράτος κατὰ τῶν ἐχθρῶν, which would be better rendered, And his force against the enemy, or his enemies, as the Geneva version has it. Judith, exulting with joy for the happy success of her enterprise, is impatient till the watchmen open the gates for her admittance, that she may communicate the important news to the elders of the city, and the distressed inhabitants. It is observable, that she calls to them afar off, that she redoubles her call, and dwells upon the name of her great and mighty Deliverer. If we should suppose Judith, soon after her entrance, to hasten into the sanctuary of the Lord, there to return her devout thanks in form, it would be no improbable supposition, nor disagreeable to her character, viii. 8. that she feared God greatly. She might then say, in a higher and more exalted sense, Open me the gates of righteousness, that I may go into them, and give thanks unto the Lord. I will thank thee, for thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation. This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. (Psal. cxviii. 19. 21. 23.)

Ver. 14. Then she said to them with a loud voice, Praise, praise God, praise God, for he hath not taken away his mercy from the house of Israel.] The Jews, upon the receipt of any signal deliverance, used to repeat the one hundred and forty-seventh Psalm. Judith probably begins this, the words of which are very applicable to the occasion, particularly ver. 1—3. 5—7. 10—14.

Ver. 15. The Lord hath smitten him by the hand of a woman.] As Judith perceived within herself a sort of inspired courage upon the occasion, less than which would not have conducted her through such a desperate and hazardous undertaking, she represents the victory gained over Holofernes as the act of God, and accordingly calls upon the elders of the city, in the most earnest and importunate manner, to praise God for his mercy, (ver. 14.) One cannot but observe here, the great humility of Judith; she doth not say, I have smitten him, to take the honour of such an enterprise to herself solely, but attributes all the success of the action to God, who had wrought so great salvation for Israel by her hand. Not unlike that devout and humble acknowledgment of St. Paul, Yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me. (1 Cor. xv. 10.) St. Ambrose, among other instances of the merit of this heroine, mentions particularly her strong confidence in God, and that it was the highest commendation of her virtue to be favoured with the assistance of God, and to experience his loving-kindness and protection, "Quanta honestatis auctoritas, ut Deum adjutorem præsumeret, quanta gratia ut inveniret?" (De Offic. lib. iii.)

Ver. 16. As the Lord liveth that hath kept me in my way that I went, my countenance hath deceived him to his destruction, and yet hath he not committed sin with me, to defile and shame me.] i. e. Though he was captivated with my person, and intended the ruin of my virtue, yet hath he not effected his vile purpose; I am free from the sin of impurity and uncleanness. But as it might seem very difficult, and almost impossible, that a single defenceless woman should keep her chastity, unattacked and inviolate, in the midst of an army of lawless barbarians, and even alone, under the covert of night, in the tent of so powerful a ravisher, she calls upon God to attest her spotless innocence; that God who had accompanied her in the way, and brought her back in triumph and safety. "Primus triumphus (says St. Ambrose), ejus fuit quod integrum pudorem de tabernaculo hostis revexit; secundus, quod fœmina de vino reportavit victoriam. Non expavit mortis periculum, sed nec pudoris, quod est gravius bonis fœminis. Non unius ictum carnificis, sed nec totius exercitus tela trepidavit. Stetit inter cuneos bellatorum fœmina, inter victricia arma secura mortis. Quantum ad molem spectat periculi, moritura processit, quantum ad fidem, dimicatura." (De Offic. lib. iii. cap. 13.) i. e. Her first triumph was, that she preserved her chastity unspotted, even in the tent of the enemy; the second, that she prevailed over the temptation and power of wine. She feared not the loss of life, nor even that of her modesty, which is of more value in the esteem of grave and discreet women. So far was she from being afraid of mischief from one ruffian, that she regarded not the power of his whole army: one single woman stood regardless of fear amidst the crowded ranks of soldiers flushed with victory. If we consider the greatness of the danger, she went in peril of her life; if her faith and confidence in God, she was resolute and determined at the expense of it to contend for victory.

Ver. 19. For this thy confidence shall not depart from the heart of men, which remember the power of God for ever.] i. e. As long as mention shall be made of God's omnipotence, so long and often shall they instance in that single act, the deliverance of his people by one single woman, effected through the mighty prevalence of her faith. Or thus—Judith's religious confidence shall in future times be honourably mentioned, as an instance, how God, for the bringing about his secret purpose, avails himself of the weakest instrument, which is strong in faith.

Ver. 20. And God turn these things to thee for a perpetual praise, to visit thee in good things, because thou hast not spared thy life for the affliction of our nation, but hast revenged our ruin, walking a straight way before our God.] The Vulgate has, Sed subvenisti ruinæ ante conspectum Dei nostri. What Ozias here says to Judith, gives one a high idea of her who wrought this deliverance at this time. It seems, say Messieurs of Port-Royal, commenting on this rendering, as if God was angry with his people, and was upon the point of delivering them up to the fury of the Assyrians, when Judith, urged by a secret impulse, and herein not unlike Moses, presents herself before his throne, and interposes between him and the people of Israel, to disarm his fury, and hinder the ruin of her nation. She interposes with him in their behalf, not by urging any merit of theirs, but by her watchings, fastings, and other religious austerities; by her continual prayer, holy confidence, and faith, and above all her profound humility, which rendered her a worthy advocate to apply to, and prevail with God to take pity on his people. St. Ambrose sets the reasons in a strong light, which induced Judith to engage in an enterprise so hazardous; "Honestatis fuit, prohibere ne populus Dei profanis se dederet, ne ritus patrios et sacramenta proderet, ne sacras virgines, viduas graves, pudicas matronas barbaricæ subjiceret impuritati; ne obsidionem deditione solveret. Honestatis fuit, se malle pro omnibus periclitari, ut omnes eximeret periculo." (Lib. iii. Offic.)

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. HEAR me now, my brethren, and take this head, and hang it upon the highest place of your walls.] This was done to discourage and cast a dread upon the Assyrians from so ghastly a sight. Judas Maccabeus did the like by Nicanor's head; he hung it upon the tower, an evident and manifest sign (says the text) unto all, of the help of the Lord, 2 Macc. xv. 35. Livy mentions, that when Asdrubal was slain, his head was flung into his brother Hannibal's tent, that the sight of it might cast a damp upon that general and his soldiers. In like manner, when the Philistines saw the head of their champion Goliath in David's hand, they fled, and were overtaken with a great slaughter. (1 Sam. xvii. 51.)

Ver. 2. And so soon as the morning shall appear, and the sun shall come forth upon the earth, take you every one his weapons, and go forth every valiant man out of the city, as though you would go down towards the watch of the Assyrians, but go not down. Ver. 3. Then shall they take their armour, and shall go into their camp, and raise up the captains of the army of Assur, and they shall run to the tent of Holofernes, but shall not find him: then fear shall fall upon them, and they shall flee before your face.] This was a well-concerted scheme, and a politic contrivance: she advises not, that the Hebrews should go down, and fall on the sudden on the Assyrians, who would be sure to repulse and overcome them, being much stronger and far superior in number: but her counsel is, not to come in reality to blows, but only to make a feint of so doing, and by a false attack to alarm and put their army in motion, and oblige them to run to Holofernes's tent to receive his orders, who, upon seeing their general lie dead, and his mangled carcass upon the ground, would be flung into a panic and confusion, and before they should have time, or be able to recover themselves from the consternation, the Israelites with all their force should attack them, and they would flee with great precipitation and disorder. St. Ambrose admires Judith for this stratagem, and extols her reach of thought above her magnanimity, "Nec dexteræ tantum hoc opus, sed majora tropæa sapientiæ. Nam manu solum Holofernem vicit, consilio autem omnem hostium vicit exercitum. Suspenso enim Holofernis capite, quod virorum non potuit excogitari consilio, suorum erexit animos, hostium fregit, suos pudore excitans, hostes quoque terrore percellens, eoque cæsi sunt et fugati:" (lib. vi. de Viduis.) i. e. The victory which Judith gained was not so much an instance of her courage as of her wisdom. By her hand she triumphed over Holofernes only, but by her counsel over the whole army of the Assyrians, by hanging up Holofernes's head; by an expedient, which not even the elders of the city thought of, she as much exalted the spirits of the besieged, as she depressed those of the enemy. By the sight of this trophy she shamed her own people into courage, as she cast a dread and horror upon the besiegers by so shocking a spectacle: and her stratagem had the desired effect; for, through the power of it, they fled, and were cut to pieces.

Ver. 5. But before you do these things, call me Achior the Ammonite, that he may see and know him that despised the house of Israel, and that sent him to us, as it were to his death.] The Vulgate places this almost at the end of the last chapter. One is surprised to find, since it is said, xiii. 13. that all, both small and great, ran together to meet Judith at her return, that Achior still continued in Ozias's house a stranger to it, and came not among the rest to congratulate her arrival, till he was sent for; as he seems equally interested and concerned to know this important news, it does not appear what should detain him at a time when all others hastened where Judith was. It is probable that Achior had not yet his entire liberty, and that he was in some sort watched, till they saw the success of Judith's expedition; or perhaps, as her return was in the night, Achior might be asleep, and not instantly informed of it. Whatever was the cause, it was highly reasonable to acquaint him with it, to free him from inquietude and fear, whom the proud Holofernes threatened to kill, when he took Bethulia, because he had so much extolled the almighty power of the God of Israel. And therefore Judith was kind in remembering him, and insisting, that before they went forth out of the city, they should fetch Achior to her, that she might give him the pleasure to hear that the tyrant who threatened his life was through her means now no more. Particular favour also might be shewed to Achior, because he differed so much in temper and behaviour from the rest of his countrymen; for it was true of the Ammonites, as well as of the Moabites and Edomites, that though they were related in blood to the Jews, yet they bore a constant hatred towards them, which they took all opportunities to shew, when the Jews were under any distress: and therefore Achior's interesting himself in their behalf, in the time of their distress, at the peril of his own life, was the more remarkable, and on that account he claimed the more notice and favour.

Ver. 6. Then they called Achior out of the house of Ozias, and when he was come, and saw the head of Holofernes in a man's hand in the assembly of the people, he fell down on his face, and his spirit failed.] The sight of the severed and bleeding head of him who had threatened his life, the surprise of an event so great and unexpected, and the joy to see himself thus delivered in an instant from the cruel death which awaited him, if Bethulia had been taken, these meeting together, occasioned within him such a disorder and confusion of spirits, as quite to overset him. "So pious souls are affected (say Messieurs of Port-Royal, who often allegorize part of this history), from considering, that Jesus Christ, the seed of the woman, has bruised the serpent's head, has delivered them from the wrath to come, and wrought for them so wonderful a salvation. The thoughts of their deliverance fill them with holy raptures; like St. Paul, they are, as it were, in an ecstacy, caught up into the third heaven, and can scarce tell whether they are in or out of the body." (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 10. And when Achior had seen all that the God of Israel had done, he believed in God greatly, and circumcised the flesh of his foreskin, and was joined unto the house of Israel unto this day.] i. e. He became a Jew, and his descendants continued so; for being circumcised, and becoming a Jew, were synonymous terms. Thus what our translators render, Esth. viii. 17. Many of the people of the land became Jews, according to the LXX. is, πολλοὶ τῶν ἐθνῶν περιετέμοντο, καὶ Ἰουδάϊζον, were circumcised, and conformed to the Jewish rites and customs. It should seem from the text, as if Achior circumcised himself, and at that instant; but it is more probable, that this was done by the proper minister of circumcision, and not till after the victory was gained over the Assyrians. It also seems to intimate, at least according to the rendering of the Vulgate, and I think it is likewise countenanced by the Greek, that Achior was induced to believe in God greatly, from seeing and admiring this instance of his power; but does not the zealous manner in which he delivered himself before Holofernes and his chief officers, (chap. v.) and his noble declaration of the greatness and majesty of God, his strict justice and impartial goodness in all his dealings with his people, give us reason to think, that he believed in God long before? The truth is, Achior hitherto regarded the God of the Jews as a local Deity only; as the God or protector of one particular people; he doubted not of his power, and the miracles which he had done for his people Israel, but he still continued, according to the custom and mode of his nation, a worshipper of Moloch, or Milcom, and an observer of his abominable and superstitious rites. The elders of Bethulia, when they received him into the city, probably instructed him better, and gave him the choice of being either a proselyte of the gate, or a proselyte of justice. Upon seeing this farther evidence of God's power in behalf of his chosen, exerted by Judith's hand, and the proud leader of the Assyrians, for his blasphemy and contemptuous defiance, so exemplarily punished by him, he received circumcision, the initiatory rite into the true religion, and proved the sincerity of his inward belief, by outwardly submitting to this ceremony. But still as an Ammonite, he was not entitled to any of the privileges usually allowed to a proselyte of justice, which makes his faith the more conspicuous and remarkable, as he was now joined to a people despised, and embraced a religion, where he could not expect or hope for, either for himself or his descendants, any temporal advantages, belonging to the Jewish people. And hence we may satisfy an objection which naturally offers itself from this place, viz. how Achior, being an Ammonite, could be joined unto the house of Israel, since the law expressly says, Deut. xxiii. 3. that no Ammonite or Moabite shall enter the congregation of the Lord for ever, even to the tenth generation. But this prohibition is not to be understood strictly and literally, since it is agreed on all hands, that neither a Moabite, or Ammonite, or even a Canaanite, were hereby incapable of becoming converts or proselytes to Judaism, and entering thereby into the congregation of the Lord: the intention of this negative precept was only to hinder such from ever partaking of the Jewish privileges, prerogatives, dignities, places, preferments, or other temporal emoluments; and it does not appear from the story, that Achior was so fully received among the Jews, as to be admitted to partake of any, or all of the privileges and advantages of that people: though Aquinas and some others have maintained, that the rigour of this law was dispensed with in favour of Achior, on account of his signal profession and acknowledgment of God's power and providence before Holofernes. The like difficulty has been started with respect to Ruth, who being a Moabitish woman, and married to Boaz, became a Jewess. But here the case is still clearer, as that law in Deuteronomy affected not women, who might from any nation be admitted proselytes, and by reason of their sex were incapacitated from aspiring to or enjoying any dignities, prerogatives, or emoluments.

Ver. 13. Waken now our Lord, for the slaves have been bold to come down against us to battle, that they may be utterly destroyed.] The appellation of slaves is disgraceful; but the Vulgate speaks of them as contemptibly when it renders, Egressi mures de cavernis suis, ausi sunt provocare nos ad prælium. And probably it spake of them as such, from the fastnesses in which they secured themselves, and as appearing very diminutive on the top of so high a mountain to those in the plain.

Ver. 14. For he thought that he had slept with Judith.] This is expressed with great decency, though an impure sense is intended: Ὕπνος is often used for concubitus by the Hellenist Jews and other writers. (See Wisd. iv. 6. vii. 2. with the notes on those passages.) Terentius Christianus renders it not improperly, Nunc imperator noster in amore est totus.

Ver. 15. But because none answered, he opened it, and went into the bedchamber.] By the description of Holofernes's tent it seems rather to have been a pavilion, which was generally built with long palisadoes made of fir, the top of it covered with reeds, and the inside divided into several apartments, as this is described to be. Thus Achilles, in Homer, had his αὐλὴ μεγάλη, or great hall, and behind it were lodging-rooms. So again, Il. ix. Phœnix has a bed prepared for him in one apartment, Patroclus has another for himself and his captive Iphis, and Achilles had a third for himself and his mistress Diomeda. Such fixed tents were not used in common marches, but only during the time of sieges, when their long stay in one place made it necessary to build such tents. At other times they lay in the open air, their spears standing upright to be ready upon any alarm, and generally with the hides of beasts spread on the ground instead of a bed.

Ver. 18. These slaves have dealt very treacherously.] Ἠθετήκασιν οἱ δοῦλοι. This expression seems to be a kind of stated form, the form of a cry intimating sedition. Like that 1 Sam. xiii. 3. which the LXX. it is observable, render by the expression here used, ἠθετήκασιν οἱ δοῦλοι, though our version in that place renders it, Let the Hebrews hear—a form likewise in use among the Jews to bespeak attention.

One woman of the Hebrews hath brought shame upon the house of king Nabuchodonosor: for, behold, Holofernes lieth upon the ground without a head.] To overcome the captain or general of the hostile host personally, and by one's own hand, was the highest point of military glory, and such as no more than three of their heroes had ever gained, from the foundation of the Jewish commonwealth. In this action of Judith's, personal prowess and great bodily strength, which are made essential ingredients to complete the character of a great hero, were supplied and compensated by fineness of stratagem, artifice well conducted, and a resolution not to be shaken. And the renown arising from this action was the greater, as being done by the hands of a woman, and therefore reflected the more disgrace upon the house of king Nabuchodonosor. And well may she be said to have saved her country, and destroyed its enemies; because to vanquish the general himself, whose presence and bravery were the support of his troops, was in effect to dismay and to defeat his forces, as experience proved.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 2. AND fear and trembling fell upon them, so that there was no man that durst abide in the sight of his neighbour; but rushing out all together, they fled into every way of the plain, and of the hill-country.] One can hardly look upon the fright which seized the Assyrians as merely natural; for allowing it possible, that an army may on the report of the sudden death of its general, be affected with great surprise and consternation, and that it may be increased by the reflection on the manner of it, and especially by the discouraging sight of his head hung out to public view, yet, as there are always experienced commanders ready to supply the place of the deceased chief, and as they knew the condition of the besieged to be so desperate, for want of water, as to be obliged to surrender within a very few days, one would think, that such an accident happening to one man, though a principal person indeed, could not have affected the whole host in such a manner, as not only to break up the siege ingloriously, but to flee with the utmost precipitation. And it is yet more unaccountable to see so formidable an army pursued and cut to pieces, by a people famished and weakened for want of necessaries, whom just before they looked upon with the utmost contempt. It is therefore not improbable, supposing the truth of this history, that God cast upon them a supernatural panic, as he once confounded with a sudden fear the host of the Syrians; (2 Kings vii. 6.) and that, to humble their pride and presumption, he took from them the spirit both of counsel and of courage, for they seem not to have deliberated what to do, or what course to take, but, like sheep scattered and dispersed, they fled before the Hebrews.

Ver. 5. Now when the children of Israel heard it, they all fell upon them with one consent, and slew them unto Chobai, &c.] This overthrow of the Assyrian host may seem the more probable, as they fled without order, in different and unknown ways, and through an enemy's country, who having notice of what had happened, lay in wait for their coming, and slew such as fell into their hands. The event reminds one of Gideon's success in slaying a hundred thousand of the Midianites, by so small a company as three hundred only: and the description in the book of Judges, vii. 21—25. of their flight, the pursuit, the dispatching messengers throughout all Mount Ephraim to intercept them, and their final overthrow in consequence of it, very much resembles the account here. Messieurs of Port-Royal have a fine and pertinent reflection upon this defeat of the Assyrians: "Let none presumptuously assure himself of success, on account of the number of his forces, when he considers that the proud Holofernes, who had the vanity to tell Achior that he knew no other God but Nabuchodonosor, and that he would destroy all the Jews as one man, fell himself by the hands of a woman; and his great and very numerous army itself, fled like one man before the face of those very Jews whom he so cruelly threatened. Nor let the meanest at any time be discouraged, or fall into despair, at the sight of insulting enemies, how formidable soever they may appear, when he reflects upon the unexpected and miraculous deliverance which the weak hand of Judith, strengthened by the all-powerful one of God, procured for the children of her people." (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 8. Then Joacim the high-priest, and the ancients of the children of Israel, that dwelt in Jerusalem, came to behold the good things that God had shewed to Israel.] Our version here, with the Vulgate, follows the Roman edition, which has, τοῦ θεάσασθαι τὰ ἀγαθά. The Complut. Ald. and some others have, τοῦ θεμελιῶσαι τὰ ἀγαθά. Grotius prefers the latter; and his exposition of the place is, that the ancients of Jerusalem came to be certified of the truth of the good news: but were they not before assured of this by messengers dispatched thither on purpose, or by the men that told them what things were done in the camp of their enemies, ver. 5.? Nor is the sense of the Geneva version, which follows the same reading, sufficiently clear; viz. that the ancients of the children of Israel that dwelt in Jerusalem came to confirm the benefits that God had shewed to Israel. The meaning seems rather to be, and the passage would thereby be more intelligible, that the ancients of the people, or judges at Jerusalem (for the Sanhedrin, of which some expound it, possibly might not be in being at this time, as its institution is generally thought to be after the return from the captivity), sent a solemn deputation of the principal persons in authority, to compliment Judith upon the success of an enterprise so wonderful, to testify in her presence the grateful sense which they had of the extraordinary service done to all Israel, and to Jerusalem in particular, by destroying the common enemy, and putting the Assyrian army to flight; and their public acknowledgment of God's loving-kindness and mercy to their whole nation, and to improve withal the advantage gained by Judith, and settle upon a sure and lasting foundation the quiet and safety she had procured for them. And from the account in the last verse of this history, that there was none that made Israel any more afraid in the days of Judith, nor a long time after, it appears, that they fixed the public repose upon a firm basis.

Ver. 10. Blessed art thou of the Almighty Lord for evermore.] In like manner Deborah the prophetess called Jael blessed among women, for the like fact committed on Sisera, Judg. v. 24.

Ver. 11. And the people spoiled the camp the space of thirty days.] The Syriac has only three days instead of thirty, as the Greek and Vulgate have it. It may be alleged in defence of this reading, that the camp of the Assyrians was doubtless very large, of great circuit and extent, detachments of it being differently distributed on the mountains, or distant parts of the plain, for the greater convenience of subsisting so great an army, and therefore must require no little time to go through and plunder it. The camp itself indeed might be plundered in less time than a month, but it may be supposed that the people continued for the whole thirty days to ransack, and constantly to find some things which escaped former searchers: it is probable the first that went out in quest of the spoil did it in a hurry and with precipitation. On such occasions, where variety offers, people are wont to take only what strikes them most, and to leave many things, which afterward are gathered with more exactness and care when the plenty is not so great and the hurry not so pressing. Or the meaning perhaps may be, that a whole month passed before a division and distribution was made of the whole spoil; it might take up the greater part of that time before all the plunder could be brought into Bethulia, to be faithfully and equally distributed among the people, according to the rules of war, and prescription of the law, mentioned Numb. xxxi. 27. 1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25.

And they gave unto Judith Holofernes's tent, and all his plate, and beds, and vessels, and all his stuff.] The Syriac has, Tabernaculum et lectum ejus, jumenta, et universum instrumentum ejus. In dividing the spoils taken from an enemy, the person who chiefly conducted the enterprise had always a more particular and larger share. Some rich present was also set apart to the Lord, and consecrated in his temple. (See xvi. 19.) What remained was usually divided among the soldiers, as well those that guarded the camp as those that were actually in the battle. Judas Maccabeus gave a portion to the maimed, the widows and orphans, of the spoils taken from Nicanor, and the residue was divided. (2 Macc. viii. 28.)

Ver. 12. And she took branches in her hand, and gave also to the women that were with her.] Θύρσους. The thyrsus was a sort of spear twisted about with ivy, used in the mysteries and triumphs of Bacchus. It is probable the Jews borrowed this, as they did many other customs, from the heathens, and applied it to their feasts of tabernacles and other solemn occasions. Boughs were made use of by both of them, to adorn and set off the pomp of their solemn processions, and as public ensigns of triumph. When Judas Maccabeus had cleansed the temple from the pollutions which Antiochus Epiphanes brought into it, all the people, to do him honour and to express their own joy, carried branches or boughs in processions, (2 Macc. x. 7.) and sang psalms unto him that had given them good success in cleansing the holy place.

Ver. 13. And they put a garland of olive upon her, and her maid that was with her.] Crowns, and particularly those made of olive twigs, were very rare, especially for women. This is the only instance one meets with, says Calmet, among the Hebrews; but nothing was more proper to grace Judith's triumph than such a crown. The olive was a tree in much esteem among the ancients, and its boughs used on certain festival occasions; it was also made by them an emblem of peace, and as such now very pertinently applied to distinguish and adorn her who was the happy procurer of it. Pliny mentions the honour paid to it by the Romans, "Oleæ honorem Romana majestas magnum tribuit, turmas equitum Idibus Juliis ex eis coronando, item minoribus triumphis ovantes." (Lib. xv. cap. 4.) And among the Greeks, the reward of the conquerors at certain games was a crown made of olive. (Alex. ab Alex. Gen. Dier. lib. v. cap. 8.)

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. ALL the people sang after her.] The way of singing alternately, or for the people to join in the chorus, and sing the ἀκροτελεύτια, or ends of the verses which the Psaltæ began, was a very common and ancient practice; see Exod. xv. 21. where, after the children of Israel had passed the Red Sea, Moses and the men sang a song unto the Lord, and Miriam the prophetess, with all the women, joined in the chorus. (Exod. xv. 20, 21.) So, after David's victory over Goliath, the general chorus of the women was this, Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands. (1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7.) And in the ceremonies used on the passage of the ark from one place to another, the chorus is generally thought to have been, For his mercy endureth for ever. (Psal. cxxxvi.) Calmet thinks this song of thanksgiving was composed extempore by Judith, animated and inspired by the Spirit of God; and that the people replied in the measure she began, and joined together in the chorus. Others are of opinion, that this was sung publicly in the temple at Jerusalem, when Judith went thither to offer the trophies of her victory to the Lord, carrying with her the head of Holofernes in triumph.

Ver. 3. For God breaketh the battles.] Judith, in her prayer to God, chap. ix. to throw down the strength of the Assyrians by his power, and bring down by his wrath the forces of them that were exalted with horse and man, who gloried in the strength of their footmen, and trusted in shield and spear, and bow, and sling, uses this very expression, Thou art the Lord that breakest the battles, the Lord is thy name. And very properly does she here, when her prayer was answered, and she had obtained her request, repeat it, and expatiate, with great pleasure and thankfulness, upon his almighty power and mercy, shewed to her amongst the camps, and in the midst of the people, who threatened to destroy their borders. The Jews, to exalt the almighty power and majesty of their God, sometimes describe him as going forth like a mighty man of war, armed with a sword to take vengeance of his enemies; sometimes as the God of the armies of Israel in particular, and sometimes as the Lord of hosts in general. The Vulgate furnishes us with a new and not improper sense of the remainder of the verse, Qui posuit castra sua in medio populi sui, ut eriperet nos de manu omnium inimicorum; i.e. his ministering spirits watched over the Israelites, and procured their deliverance, by striking a panic into the hearts of the Assyrians, and occasioning their flight.

Ver. 4. Assur came out of the mountains from the north.] Though Assyria and the other provinces beyond Euphrates were not directly north of Judea, the prophets notwithstanding usually describe them by the north. (See Isa. xiv. 13. 31. xli. 25. Jer. i. 13—15. iii. 12—18. Ezek. i. 4. viii. 3, &c.) It seems to be, because the people beyond Euphrates came into Judea by the defiles of the mountains of Libanus and Hermon, which are north of Judea: the way through Arabia Deserta, which was the direct and shortest way, was impassable for an army, as having neither water, nor wood, nor forage of any sort, nor any villages.

He came with ten thousands of his army, the multitude whereof stopped the torrents.] The Jews often confound the torrents with the valleys through which they pass, the same word נחל, with them signifying both; and so the sense here may be, that the Assyrian army covered all the valleys. The Greek seems to imply, that they maliciously stopped up and spoiled all the springs, wherever they came, that the inhabitants and their cattle might perish with thirst. Or the meaning may rather be, that through the great number of their forces, they had drained and exhausted all the torrents, as Sennacherib boasted, that he had dried up all the rivers of besieged places. (2 Kings xix. 24.) The like is mentioned of Xerxes's army, Juven. Sat. x. Herod. lib. vii. cap. 108, 109.

Ver. 6. The Almighty Lord hath disappointed him by the hand of a woman.] He who had defied the God of Israel, and had threatened to destroy his people, as one man, ignominiously falls by the hand of a woman. In the like disgraceful manner, Sisera, who was determined to destroy the children of Israel utterly, was given up into the hands of a woman, who slew him with a nail, and the workman's hammer. (Judg. iv. 21.) Dying by the hand of a woman, was reckoned so ignominious, that Abimelech, being wounded by the hand of a woman, desired his armour-bearer to save his honour, and thrust him through with his sword, lest it might be said, that a woman had slain him. (Judg. ix. 54.)

Ver. 7. Neither did the sons of the Titans smite him . . .] Some have formed an objection from this term as taken from the heathen poets; but have not some of the inspired writers borrowed words and even sentences from the poets, especially St. Paul and St. James? And why is this word more to be condemned than the name giant, which is as poetical as that of Titan? for giants are supposed to be so called, quasi γηγενεῖς, or earth-born, according to poetical fiction: it seems to be used here only to vary the expression. The LXX. and Vulgate have taken the same liberty, and particularly in the book of Job, by inserting the names of the Pleiades, Hyades, Orion, Arcturus, Amalthea, &c. (See note on Wisd. xix. 21.) All, I think, that can with reason be inferred from the use of this term is, that the author of this history, or however the translator of it, had read the Greek poets. By Titans are here meant the Rephaim, giants, often mentioned in Scripture.

Ver. 9. Her sandals ravished his eyes.] By the shape and size of these, the beauty of the feet was discovered: these shoes or sandals were anciently wont to be set off, or adorned with jewels, as we learn from many authors, (see Isa. iii. 18.) and were richer and neater than men's. The rabbins say, that the Israelites of condition appeared in the temple on solemn days with crimson shoes; Virgil describes Venus in the dress of a Phœnician damsel, with buskins of purple. The bride's sandals, Cant. vii. 1. were probably of this colour, How beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O prince's daughter! Their shoes did not hide their feet as ours do, but were like the Phœnician buskins, which discovered the foot and part of the leg, the whiteness whereof was set off by the lustre of the purple. Judith, in all probability, had a pair of these buskins on when she appeared before Holofernes.

Her beauty took his mind prisoner . . .] Nothing can be more poetical than this, or express the power of beauty stronger; see Ecclus. ix. 8. 1 Esd. iv. 26, 27. where the words, πολλοὶ ἀπενοήθησαν ταῖς ἰδίαις διανοίαις διὰ τὰς γυναῖκας, καὶ δοῦλοι ἐγένοντο δι' αὐτὰς, sufficiently confirm this passage.

Ver. 10. The Persians quaked at her boldness, and the Medes were daunted at her hardiness.] Possibly the Medes and the Persians were at this time subjects to the king of Assyria, and made up part of his army, as they did when Sennacherib besieged Jerusalem, that army consisting of several sorts of nations. (Isa. xxix. 7.) Except we should think that Nebuchadnezzar was foisted in here, and that this expedition was undertaken by Darius, or some other Persian prince. (See note on ii. 7.) Calmet thinks these two nations submitted to Nabuchodonosor after his victory over king Arphaxad, or Phraortes, (i. 13.)

Ver. 11. Then my afflicted shouted for joy, and my weak ones cried aloud; but they were astonished: these lifted up their voices, but they were overthrown.] i. e. The people of Bethulia, her weak and afflicted ones, through want of water and other necessaries occasioned by the siege, shouted for their deliverance: or, in a more general sense, the Israelites, threatened with ruin and destruction by this proud conqueror, triumphed upon his overthrow. But the Assyrians, as the margin rightly understands it, were astonished at a calamity so sudden, and a defeat so unexpected. The former lifted up their voices in songs and acclamations; and the latter were overthrown by those whom they had insulted for their impotency and weakness. There is a sort of contrast here which heightens the sense, and makes it preferable either to that of the Syriac or Vulgate, which understand the whole of the Assyrians.

Ver. 12. The sons of the damsels have pierced them through, and wounded them as fugitives' children: they perished by the battle of the Lord.] i. e. Because the Lord fought for Israel. The meaning here is, that raw youths, or children in comparison, overcame these mighty men of valour, so little resistance did they make; so little, that, according to the Geneva version, they fled away from those that wounded them like so many children; or, as the Syriac has it, suffered themselves to be put to death, like timorous women, without returning a blow.

Ver. 15. For the mountains shall be moved from their foundations.] i. e. Such proud princes, who, like the Assyrians, trust in the multitude of their forces, shall be disappointed and overthrown. Or it may be applied to the overthrow on which this song, or ἐπινίκιον, was composed.

Ver. 16. For all sacrifice is too little for a sweet savour unto thee, and all the fat is not sufficient for thy burnt-offering; but he that feareth the Lord is great at all times.] i. e. Is always in great favour with him. Qui timet Dominum, magni est apud eum semper. This sentence is very remarkable, and a strong proof of the inefficacy and unprofitableness of the ancient sacrifices as such: that God does not regard the sacrifice itself, however nice and costly, so much as the mind and holy disposition of the offerer; nothing but the fear and love of God can render men agreeable to him, or their oblations effectual in his sight.

Ver. 17. The Lord will take vengeance of them in the day of judgment, in putting fire and worms in their flesh. . .] i. e. The Lord shall slay all the enemies of the Jewish nation, and they shall be like to so many putrefying carcasses lying slain in the field of battle, and overrun with worms and stench. They shall be a lasting monument of God's justice, like Sodom, set forth for an example of the Divine vengeance, and of that eternal fire which is prepared for the ungodly. (See Mark ix. 44. Ecclus. vii. 17.) An expression of the like import we meet with in Isa. lxvi. where it is said of the enemies of God, that the worm shall not die, neither shall the fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorrence to all flesh. It seems more curious than useful to inquire, whether the fire and worms mentioned here and in Scripture, as the punishment of the wicked, are really material. If by these is to be understood a wicked and polluted conscience only, with the racking reflections that always accompany it, as was the opinion of Origen, there seems but little reason for the wicked to triumph, as the stings of conscience must be a greater torment than any bodily punishment, and will be coeternal with the soul.

They shall weep under a sense of their pains for ever.] The ancient Jews held, that the punishment of the wicked in hell should be perpetual, or without end. Josephus informs us, de Bell. Jud. lib. ii. Antiq. lib. xviii. that the pharisees maintained, the souls of the wicked were to be punished, ἀϊδίῳ τιμωρίᾳ, with perpetual punishment, and that there was appointed for them, εἱργμὸς ἀΐδιος, a perpetual prison. Philo says, the punishment of the wicked is, ζῆν ἀποθανόντα ἀεὶ, to live for ever dying, and to be for ever in pain, and grief, and calamities, that never shall have an end. (De Præm. et Pœn.) Instead of κλαύσοντας, the common reading of the place, a learned writer would have, καύσονται ἐν αἰσθήσει. (See Thirlby notes in Just. Apol.)

Ver. 18. As soon as the people were purified, they offered their burnt-offerings.] See note on xii. 7. Philo's testimony, with respect to the antiquity of this rite of purification, is too particular to be omitted: "Let the person (says he) who is about to offer sacrifice, after he has washed and purified his hands, lay them upon the head of the victim." (De Vict.) The Psalmist seems to allude to this custom, Psal. xxvi. 6. I will wash mine hands in innocence, and so will I go to thine altar. The priests were more particularly and strictly obliged to this purification, when they were to attend the public service, and minister about holy things, Exod. xxx. 20. see Gen. xxxv. 2. where we read that Jacob's servants, before they performed their devotions in Beth-el, washed themselves and changed their garments. The meaning of this passage is, that the people offered sacrifice as soon as they were purified from the uncleanness which they had contracted from the slaughter of the Assyrians, and the touching their dead bodies, and carrying away their spoils.

Ver. 19. Dedicated all the stuff unto the Lord.] The reason of this was, to acknowledge God is the giver of all victory. Almost all nations have concurred in this duty of thankfulness and gratitude after some signal success, and called, as Virgil expresses it, in prædam partemque Jovem. So the Philistines hung up the arms of Saul in the temple of Ashtaroth, and carried the ark into the temple of Dagon. The sword of Goliath, slain by David, mentioned 1 Sam. xxi. 9. to be wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod, is thought by learned men to be dedicated unto God. Thus Josephus understands it, τὴν ῥομφαίαν ἀνέθηκε τῷ θεῷ· And Sulpitius Severus, Gladium postea in templum posuit. Thus Abraham gave to Melchisedec, the priest of the most high God, as a return of gratitude to him, δεκάτην τῆς λείας, the tenth of all the spoils. (Heb. vii. 4.) And the Jews sometimes offered all the spoils taken in war, 2 Sam. viii. 12. or the first-fruits, 1 Sam. xv. 21. according to the rendering of the LXX. or the tenths, Heb. vii. 4. or hung up in the forefront of the temple, some more remarkable part of the spoils, as shields, &c. in token of victory, and as an instance of gratitude for it, 1 Macc. iv. 51. (See Spencer, de Leg. Heb. de Solut. Decim.)

Ver. 20. So the people continued feasting in Jerusalem before the sanctuary for the space of three months.] Such a fact as the killing of Holofernes, and thereby defeating the whole army of the Assyrians, and rescuing the Jews, not only from the danger of the present siege, but from such farther attacks as might have affected the very being of their state,—was it indeed true, say objectors, one might well expect that some public notice, some standing memorial, besides the temporary rejoicings here mentioned, though longer indeed than usual (being three months, according to all the versions but the Syriac, which mentions only one), should have been instituted of so auspicious an event. Public blessings of an inferior nature to this were went to be commemorated by anniversary feasts, and that no such should be appointed in memory of this may seem scarce credible. From the foundation of the Jewish state, and the first giving of the law, scarce any deliverance happened to that people which was of greater consequence than this, if it had been truly such as is here represented, and yet we find no such annual triumph and festivities, though the occasion may seem to demand it. Some Latin editions, indeed, as particularly the Vulgate, conclude this book with the following verse, Dies autem victoriæ hujus festivitatis, ab Hebræis in numero sanctorum Dierum accipitur, et colitur a Judæis, ex illo tempore usque ad præsentem diem. But as there is no mention of this in the Greek and other versions, nor any festival taken notice of by the Jewish writers, as instituted on this occasion, it has been judged a corrupt addition to the text. Huetius thinks this is not a sufficient reason, because in time such a feast might be abrogated and laid aside. (Dem. Evang. prop. 4.) And this, Calmet says, is not improbable, as being only a human institution, and therefore it might drop by disuse or other accidents. In like manner, as the anniversary festival of Judas Maccabeus's victory over Nicanor, which in Josephus's time was celebrated with great rejoicings, (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 17. 1 Macc. vii. 2 Macc. xv.) afterward ceased, and it is now many ages since any notice was taken of it. The Babylonish captivity gave so violent a shock to the Jewish state, and occasioned such confusion and disorder, that it is no wonder, during so long an exile, if they forgot and dropped many of their ancient feasts and solemnities, such especially as were not of Divine institution. Scaliger, indeed, mentions, lib. vii. de Emend. Temp. that the church of Ethiopia still observes the feast in memory of this victory, and that it is kept on the fourth of August in particular; which agrees very well with the history which places the siege in the time of harvest, and when the season was dry and hot. Which shews that the feast here said to be observed, could not be that of the dedication of the temple, instituted by Judas Maccabeus, as Grotius would have it, since that was confessedly kept in the winter, John x. 22. On which place that learned writer observes, that it was instituted in memory of the purification of the temple from the pollutions of Antiochus. But if this book was composed before that time, (see Præfat. in Jud.) how can the festival here mentioned possibly relate to it?

Ver. 22. And many desired her, but none knew her all the days of her life, after that Manasses her husband was dead.] Judith is not more magnified for her severe fastings than she is for her widowhood of so many years, and living with one husband only for the space of so long a life. She continued in the state of widowhood, not from any imbecility of body, or for want of solicitation, but from the magnanimity of her virtue. St. Ambrose admires and celebrates her prudent conduct on this occasion:—"Nec his tamen elata successibus, cui utique gaudere et exsultare licebat, viduitatis reliquit officium; sed contemptis omnibus, qui ejus nuptias ambiebant, vestem jucunditatis deposuit, viduitatis resumpsit. Nec triumphorum suorum amavit ornatus, illos existimans esse meliores, quibus vitia corporis, quam quibus hostium arma, vincuntur." (De Viduis.) Like that holy pattern of widows, Anna the prophetess, a widow about eighty-four years of age, (Luke ii. 38.) whereof she lived seven only with one husband from her virginity, and continued the rest of the time separated and retired, serving God with fastings and prayers night and day. Great things are said in the ecclesiastical writings in praise of perpetual widowhood: it is put upon a footing with, and by some preferred to, continual virginity. For as the lapsed, who remained true to the faith after their reconciliation to the church, were the more valued and esteemed, so the widows indeed, who, after casting off their first faith, continued single and chaste, were counted worthy of double honour. Second marriages, anciently, were looked upon as infamous, especially in women, and, even among the heathens, esteemed faulty, and somewhat criminal; and the reason was, because it brought them under a suspicion of incontinence. Nay, some writers have carried it much farther, and made it a sort of adultery. After the same manner second marriages were condemned by the Jewish rabbins, Filii mulieris viduæ, filii scortationum sunt; i. e. the children of a woman once a widow are the children of whoredom; and even some of the fathers seem to have been of the same opinion.

Ver. 23. And waxed old in her husband's house, being a hundred and five years old.] Transit autem in domo viri sui annos centum quinque, Vulgate. Not that she lived so long with her husband, or even in his house, but that her life was prolonged to that term, or that she died at that age.

Ver. 24. And the house of Israel lamented her seven days.] See Ecclus. xxii. 12. where the son of Sirach says, Seven days do men mourn for him that is dead: and that this was the stated time of mourning among the Jews appears from many instances; see Gen. v. 10. where Joseph's mourning for his father is said to have been seven days. The like was observed with respect to Saul and his sons, 1 Sam. xxxi. 13. Archelaus performed the accustomed solemnity of seven days' mourning for his father Herod.

And before she died, she did distribute her goods to all them that were near of kin to Manasses her husband, and to them that were nearest of her kindred.] From hence it seems probable, that she had no children by her husband, as she adopted those that were nearest of kin on both sides to inherit her substance. As barrenness lay under a sort of disgrace among the Jews, her continuing without issue seems to have arose from an abhorrence of a second marriage.

Ver. 25. And there was none that made the children of Israel any more afraid in the days of Judith, nor a long time after her death.] There is not a greater difficulty in all this history, than to account for so long and continued peace as is here mentioned. For according to the account of this writer, says Dr. Prideaux, (Connex. vol. i.) "Peace must have lasted at least eighty years. For allowing Judith to have been forty-five years old at the time of her killing Holofernes (and in an older age she cannot well be supposed to have beauty enough to charm such a man), there must be sixty years after to the time of her death. But the expression, a long time after, in the text, cannot imply less than twenty years, and so carries the computation still farther." Calmet endeavours to explain and settle the difficulty thus: "From the death of Holofernes, A. M. 3348. to that of Manasses, A. M. 3361. we read of no war or considerable disturbance either in Israel or Judah: Amon, who succeeded him, reigned but two years, he was slain in his own house, but no account of any war in his time. Josias lived in like manner in peace and quiet, during the one-and-thirty years of his reign, to A. M. 3394." According to this reckoning there are forty-six years of continued peace. He supposes farther, as the text says nothing certain of the age of Judith at the time of this assassination, that she might be sixty-three or sixty years old, being then what we call a fine woman, and having an engaging air and person. In this case, and if this be allowed, he maintains, that from the raising of the siege of Bethulia to the death of Judith, and even some time longer, there was no war, or considerable disturbance in Israel, for the space of six-and-forty years. The following table will make his scheme clearer:—

A. M.
3285	Birth of Judith.
3306	Manasses began to reign.
3328	He is brought prisoner to Babylon, and after some months sent back to Judea.
3347	War between Nabuchodonosor and Arphaxad.
3347	Victory of Nabuchodonosor over Arphaxad.
3348	Expedition of Holofernes.
3348	Siege of Bethulia.
3361	Death of Manasses, king of Judah.
3390	Death of Judith, aged a hundred and five years.
3394	Death of king Josiah.
3414	The last siege of Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor.
3416	The city taken, the temple destroyed, and the people brought captive to Babylon.

APPENDIX

COMMENTARY ON JUDITH.

THE time in which the history of Judith is to be placed, is a point the most contested and most difficult of all others to be settled, and is indeed that on which depends the solution of most of the other difficulties usually urged against this book. If one could once fix a certain epoch of the great event recorded in this history, the adversaries of it would have little to object against its truth and reality. The opinion most followed, and which is countenanced by the best chronologers is, that the date of this history ought to be placed before the last Babylonian captivity. But they are not generally agreed whether it should be placed in the reign of Zedekiah, Manasses, Amon, Josiah, or Jehoiakim. Our learned Usher fixes it particularly in the time of Manasses, or A. M. 3348. (Per. Jul. 4058. ante Christ. 656.) And the same opinion is espoused and followed by the author of the Index and Tables to the Quarto Bibles, supposed, with good reason, to be the work of the truly great and eminent Bishop Lloyd. But even those that place it under Manasses, are divided among themselves; some think this event happened while that prince was prisoner at Babylon, and that the history itself countenances this notion by its silence with regard to the prince that then reigned. Others will have it to be a little after his return from thence, and ascribe his absenting from public business, partly to prudential and political views, which hindered him from declaring himself openly against the king of Assyria, and partly to a spirit of humiliation and contrition, which engaged his thoughts and pleased itself in retirement. The last reason Calmet thinks most probable; his system with regard to the date of this history, Judith's age at the time of Holofernes's death, and the long peace that ensued upon it, as it has been more generally approved and followed, I have explicitly set down, and for more clearness added a short chronological table at the conclusion of the Commentary, of his hypothesis. But against his scheme the following objections have been thought to lie, and to carry with them some considerable weight: 1. From his account the heroine of the story, who by her singular beauty makes such a conquest as is hardly to be paralleled in all history, was at that time at least sixty years old; rather an old woman, than one capable or likely, by the sprightliness of her charms, to captivate such a general. 2. His solution has been objected to, as inconsistent with sacred history. Judith's death happens, according to him, twenty-nine years after that of Manasses: at the end of this book it is expressly said, that none made the children of Israel any more afraid for a long time after her death; and yet, in the thirty-third, or at most the thirty-fourth year after the death of Manasses, that is within four or five years after her death, Josiah, king of Judah, found himself under the unfortunate necessity of opposing Pharaoh-Nechoh, who would force a way through his country against the king of Babylon, to whom Josiah had sworn allegiance and fidelity. In this fatal struggle Josiah fell, and with him, as Prideaux expresses it, "perished all the glory, honour, and prosperity, of the Jewish nation." But these objections I shall have an opportunity to consider, and in some measure reply to, under the following hypothesis; viz. that of Montfaucon, who agrees with Calmet, and the learned chronologers above, in placing the siege of Bethulia in the reign of Manasses, but fixes it to the latter part of it: he supposes Judith at this time to be about forty-five, or at most fifty years old, and peace to continue to the end of the reign of Jehoiakim; and by this account there will be sixty years of tranquillity; viz. the sixteen last years of Manasses, two of Amon, thirty-one of Josiah, and eleven of Jehoiakim. In this hypothesis the objection with respect to Judith's age is somewhat weakened, but if it be thought very rare, that a woman should preserve her beauty in such perfection to fifty, and especially to sixty years, let it be considered, that it is no less surprising, that one of that sex should live to a hundred and five; and that such, whose constitution is so strong and vigorous, as to live to so very long a term of life, generally were better, and preserve their complexion and beauty longer, than other people, especially if they have had no children, nor any of the accidents or infirmities incident to teeming women, as was particularly the case of Judith. I might here add also, what the Vulgate expressly says, though I do not pay an equal regard to it with the catholics, "that God, for the more effectual deliverance of his people by her hand, added to the grace and lustre of her beauty at the time when she presented herself before Holofernes." But possibly this representation of her, with these additional advantages, may not be thought consistent with the eunuch Bagoas calling her, fair damsel, and the Greek παιδίσκη; (xii. 13.) but there is the less stress to be laid on this, as the LXX. call Ruth νεᾶνις, when she had at that time lived many, at least ten, years with her first husband, and Sarah εὐπρόσωπος, when she was older than Judith in either of the reckonings is supposed to be here: as Abraham and David in like manner, each of them is, by the same writers, called παῖς, even when somewhat advanced in years. As to the next particular, viz. the long continuance of the peace in and after her time, it is observed by the same learned apologist for the truth of this history,* "that the Jews, from their coming out of Egypt, never enjoyed so long a respite and tranquillity as at this time, the whole term being little less than sixty years; the happy effect probably of the sincere penitence and contrition of Manasses, and of the great piety of Josiah. We find in Herodotus, a farther reason of their long quiet, and placid state of affairs; viz. that the most powerful empires of the east were then so engaged and employed on different occasions in warlike enterprises, that they were not at liberty to molest their neighbours, which they would not have failed to have done if they had been at peace. Hence the Babylonians and Assyrians were hindered from carrying their arms into Judea; and hence too it happened, that we read of no war in the books of Kings and Chronicles, after the return of Manasses from his captivity, to the death of Josias:" unless that struggle indeed is to be called a war, wherein Josiah only defended his own borders, and the war was properly and truly, according to the best historians, between the king of Egypt and the king of Assyria. Some indeed perhaps will not be brought to consent, that the peace should be allowed to continue after the death of Josiah, in a reign when the Jews were tributary to the Babylonians; but, as the paying tribute, though an instance of the people's weakness, does not always infer war, so the mulct imposed upon the Jews, hinders not, but that all this time may pass for a time of peace and repose, especially with regard to a people so accustomed to slavery as the Jews were; and consequently the eleven years of Jehoiakim are to be included in the long term of peace here mentioned, and their national calamity to be dated from their final transmigration, when there was an end more properly of the Jewish glory and prosperity. Farther, it has been thought a strong presumption of a fiction, as we have the history of the reigns of Manasses and Josiah twice recorded in Scripture, that we find not the least syllable there, relating to such mighty events, as are mentioned in the book of Judith: and if Josephus had believed them real, it is surprising, that, were he professedly writing the history of those times, he should not take occasion to supply that omission. Josephus's absolute silence as to this whole transaction, is urged as increasing the difficulty: had he believed the history to be fact, the taking notice of it was so much for the dignity and glory of his country, so proper to raise the figure of his people, which was the grand point he had in view throughout his history, that one would almost as easily believe an able historian could attempt to write the history of our king Edward III. and yet quite overlook the battle of Cressy, the most glorious and distinguished character in it. As for the books of Kings and Chronicles not mentioning this great event, it may be sufficient to reply, that the reason of this perhaps may be, that the sacred history being very concise, a particular account of all facts relating to the Jewish nation, is not to be expected. It sometimes mentions remarkable occurrences transiently, and in a few words, and sometimes altogether omits things considerable and important. This observation is particularly applicable to the books of Kings and Chronicles, which speak in general terms, and refer for actions unmentioned to books then extant, but long since lost. (See 1 Kings xiv. 19. 29. 2 Kings xvi. 19. 1 Chron. xxix. 29. 2 Chron. ix. 29. xxxiii. 19.) As to that part of the objection drawn from Josephus's silence, I shall not, in solution of it, urge that the writer says nothing of some other important transactions within the compass of history, as the infanticide, and the actions of Jesus Christ, and John the Baptist, these being rather repugnant to the general design of his writings, but shall set down some, I think not improbable, reasons of this silence. 1. As it was not his design to take in all occurrences that any ways related to the Jewish people, so he professes to confine himself to such things and facts as were recorded in their ancient books, i. e. the Hebrew Scriptures comprised in their canon, and therefore might pass over the circumstances of this history, however known to or believed by him, as not being wrote in that language, nor admitted into the sacred code: and should it be allowed, that he has occasionally inserted in his history some circumstances and facts apocryphal and unrecorded, yet this, I conceive, proves more against the veracity of Josephus himself, and his little regard to the profession he makes of a strict attachment to the Hebrew Scriptures only, than it impeaches the credit of the history of Judith. 2. Those who have read Josephus with care must have observed, that in his history of the times which precede the captivity of Babylon, he scarcely mentions any thing more of the kings of Judah, than what he finds in the books of Kings and Chronicles. And hence probably it happened, that many remarkable facts omitted in those sacred books are likewise omitted by Josephus. It is observable, that he follows these step by step, and possibly he either would not interrupt their series and order, if he knew of Judith's history, or might not certainly know in what time to place it. Which is more probable, as he seems not to have had any great knowledge of the history of the Medes, wherein several very considerable omissions are to be discovered. It is certain that the Scythians invaded Asia in the time of Manasses; that they made great devastation there; that they entered even Palestine, robbed and plundered the temple of Venus at Ascalon, and at length settled at Bethsan, a city of Judea, and from their own name called it Scythopolis. Might not one expect, in such a history as that of Josephus, some account, or mention at least, of so great and interesting events? And yet that historian wholly omits them, probably as not being taken notice of in the books of Kings and Chronicles, which are the memoirs he proceeds upon, and are his only guides and authority in the Jewish history. The same answer will in a great measure satisfy another objection, sometimes urged from Josephus, viz. his omitting Joacim in his list of the high-priests, from the times of David to the captivity; for as he omits several of that order, even those mentioned in Scripture, it is no wonder that he should omit a single name which occurs in this history. It appears then from what has been observed, that the objection founded on the silence of Josephus is but of little weight, and that the history of Judith may notwithstanding be true, though Josephus does not mention it. It may be proper here also to examine more fully another difficulty, in some measure indeed replied to in its place, founded on the words of Achior, v. 18, &c. who, speaking of the Jews, says, The temple of their God was cast to the ground. From hence some have inferred, that the history of Judith ought to be placed after the captivity, and that the meaning is, that the temple was entirely ruined from the foundation, and that the words they are returned from the places of their captivity, point out their return from the captivity of Babylon. But before I proceed to the objection itself, it may be pertinent to premise, that Achior, who speaks in this place, being a stranger, an Ammonite, too much stress ought not to be laid on his account of Jewish affairs; for possibly he might not be well informed of what passed in Judea, or related to it, and might have heard that the number of Jews returned from their captivity was much greater than it really was, as a report often exaggerates matters, and deceives persons at a distance. But there is no occasion to rest in this general answer, or to have recourse, with Bellarmine, to any supposed corruption of the text; for the Greek, ὁ ναὸς τοῦ θεοῦ αὐτῶν ἐγενήθη εἰς ἔδαφος, may fairly admit of another meaning, viz. that the temple had been abused and profaned by gentiles and idolaters, who entered into it, and dealt with it as a common place; Templum Dei ipsorum habitum est ut profanum solum, says Junius, very closely and explicitly; and some more ancient Latin copies, Templum Dei ipsorum factum est in pavimentum. For though εἰς ἔδαφος καταβάλλειν in Plutarch, and εἰς ἔδαφος καθελεῖν in Thucydides and Josephus, may mean solo æquare, I know not of any authority to make εἰς ἔδαφος γίνεσθαι signify solo æquari. And even though one should find εἰς ἔδαφος γίνεσθαι in the sense of solo æquari, yet this passage will not admit of it here. It is manifest it speaks not here of any particular calamity that happened to the Israelites, such as the destruction of their temple, but of God's general conduct with respect to them, that so long as they were obedient, so long God filled them with blessings; but when they forsook his worship, he delivered them to their enemies to be slain, and carried captive; and even permitted his own temple to be profaned and desecrated, and in that sense trampled under foot; as happened in the time of Rehoboam, when it was spoiled and abused by Shishak king of Egypt; in that of Amaziah, by the king of Israel, who was himself an idolater; in that of Ahaz, by Tiglath-Pileser, and by the scandalous idolatry of Manasses himself; and probably by the Assyrians, when they made him prisoner. It is not then of the actual destruction of the temple, but of its profanation on different occasions, that this passage is to be understood. This will more plainly appear to be the sense, by considering iv. 3. where it is said, that the people were newly returned from captivity, and the temple, altar, and holy vessels, purified after their profanation. Can this possibly relate to the return from the last captivity of Babylon, when there was neither altar nor temple remaining to be purified? Or can it be expounded better than of the profanation of them by Manasses, of the captivity of him and his people, of his and their repentance, and their return in consequence of it; and of the purifying of the holy place and utensils through his care, to compensate for his former great wickedness? (See 2 Chron. xxxiii. 15, 16.)

Strange have been the whims which even learned men have fallen into with respect to this history. Luther will have it to be no more than an artful tragedy; and even Grotius labours, in a forced manner, to make it wholly enigmatical, by fancied derivations, or allusions to the Hebrew: by joining to the names Bethulia and Holofernes what letters he thinks proper, or dividing and splitting them as he pleases, he makes words to signify just what he would have them. Bethulia, or, as the Greek has it, Βετυλούα, must be Beth-el-ia; though El, which is the name of God, is rarely, if ever found wrote with ul, much less is it usual to join two names of God in one word. Nor could he certainly know, how these proper names were wrote in Chaldee, the original language of this book. And to make of Holofernes, which is confessedly a Persian name, Halpar-nahas, i. e. binding the serpent; is not this straining words beyond all reason, or explaining away their true meaning? Or, finally, could there be any manner of reason to invent a fable, as he supposes, such as he would have this to be, to raise the spirits of the Jews at this time, when there were so many well-attested histories of God's gracious interposition in behalf of his chosen, and by the hands of those famous worthies, whom the writer to the Hebrews so justly celebrates? The allegorizing this history in the manner he has done, and violently extorting a recondite meaning, supposed to be concealed under every place and person, seems rather the sport of fancy than the result of judgment. To conclude, I conceive this to be a real history, and one which is so circumstantial cannot be suspected or objected to, without subjecting other histories to the like caprice or fancy. There is certainly this useful moral contained in it, viz. that God is never wanting to his faithful servants; and as he has an infinite variety of means, to bring about his secret purposes, so he is able, and often chooses to do it, by the most feeble and unpromising.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. AND these are the words of the book.] It begins abruptly, as if it was a part or continuation of some former work; but the connective particle και, or et, is often to be observed in the beginning of books, particularly the historical ones of the Hebrews. (See Exod. i. 1. Lev. i. 1. Numb. i. 1. Josh. i. 1. and 1 Macc. i. 1. Judith i. 1. in the Vulgate.) By book we are to understand the letter (see ver. 14.) which Baruch wrote from those that were carried into Babylon to such as remained in Judea, and begins at ver. 10. (the first part is a sort of preface) and contains that confession which the Jews were to use in their public worship, upon solemn days, during their captivity. It begins, i. 15. and is continued to iii. 8.

Which Baruch the son of Nerias, &c.] It is certain that the true Baruch, whom this writer seems to personate, was of an illustrious family; his father and grandfather were of great note in their times, and distinguished in their country. His brother, Seraiah, was sent on an important commission to Nebuchadnezzar, to request him to send back the holy vessels which he had carried to Babylon, when Jerusalem was taken in the time of Jechonias. Josephus confirms the account of his being of a very eminent family, and that he was well skilled in the language of his country; (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11.) which two characters, says a learned writer, seem to imply, that Josephus had read the genealogy of Baruch prefixed to this book, and that it was written in the language of his country, either in Hebrew or Chaldee. (Authen. Rec. vol. i.) Grotius, on the other hand, maintains, that it was not wrote in Hebrew (which St. Jerome urges as the reason of its not being received into the Jewish canon), but the work of some Hellenistic Jew, well skilled in Greek, who exercised his fancy in composing the letter contained herein, framing it as if it was wrote from those who were carried to Babylon, and addressed to those of their brethren who still continued at Jerusalem.

Wrote in Babylon.] Probably, says Calmet, in the fourth year of the reign of Zedekiah, when he accompanied his brother to Babylon; and whilst the latter was soliciting the return of the holy vessels, belonging to the temple, Baruch repeated to the captive Jews residing there, the prophecies of Jeremiah concerning the fall of Babylon, (li. 60. 64.) and the encouraging promises of their future deliverance.

Ver. 2. In the fifth year, and in the seventh day of the month, what time as the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire.] This writer neither mentions what the month was, i. e. by what name it was called, nor from whence one should compute the fifth year. It seems probable, that it means the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity. (See ver. 9.) But to make as it should seem the account more clear and explicit, is added, what time as the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire, which is attended with two difficulties. 1. That the temple is represented here as burnt by the Chaldeans in the fifth year of Jechonias's captivity, which was not till the eleventh of Zedekiah; and, secondly, that after the burning of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, there remained notwithstanding there a high-priest, priests, and numbers of people with them at Jerusalem; (ver. 7.) that the altar was still standing, and sacrifices offered on it; that the solemn days continued to be kept, and particularly that Zedekiah then reigned, and had made vessels of silver for the use of the temple, &c.—circumstances so promising and favourable, as but ill comport with the melancholy times which followed the destruction of the city and temple, and the unparalleled misery described in some of the following chapters.

Ver. 3. Baruch did read the words of this book in the hearing of Jechonias the son of Joachim, king of Judah, and in the ears of all the people.] This fact is said to be false; Jechonias being in captivity, and Baruch himself not then at Babylon, but in Egypt, as appears from Jer. xliii. 6. and chap. xliv. from which chapters it seems plain, that both Jeremiah and his scribe Baruch died among their brethren of the two tribes, who had carried them along with them into Egypt, in the twenty-third of Nebuchadnezzar; and that neither they nor the body of the remainder of the two tribes who were then in Egypt ever returned thence, or saw Babylon, as is asserted in this passage. This, says a learned writer, is a strong objection according to the present copies of the prophecy of Jeremiah, chap. xliv. But from the authority of Josephus, (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11.) who had ancienter and better copies, he contends, "that not only Jeremiah and Baruch might, but that the body of those Jews that were in Egypt probably did, return from thence, and were directly carried into Babylonia by Nebuchadnezzar himself, according to that prophecy, as it stood in the Hebrew copies of the first century. And to confirm Josephus's account, he refers to 2 Esd. xv. 10. as a prophecy (probably of Jeremiah) of this very fact of the Jews' return from Egypt." (Whiston's Authent. Record. vol. i. p. 7.)

Ver. 4. All them that dwelt at Babylon by the river Sud.] Ad flumen Sodi, Vulgate. Babylon is mentioned here as situate on the river Sud; but one does not read of any river in Babylonia of this name. Sodi, indeed, in Hebrew, signifies pride, and so, mystically, may be expressive of the swelling of the mighty river Euphrates, whose course was impetuous and overbearing. The commentators either take no notice at all, or give no sufficient account, of this river. Bochart conjectures, that Sudi, or Sori, is a fault of the copyist, and that it should be Sori, or Suri, because there is on the banks of the Euphrates, a city called Sura, or Sora. His words are, "Me autore legendum est Σοῦρ, Sur. Nam ex Hebræorum monumentis desumptum est, in quibus erat סור Sur, sed fefellit interpretem similitudo literarum ר et ד resh et daleth. Sur idem quod Sura vel Sora, urbs Babyloniæ notissima, ad hunc ipsum Euphratis alveum." Of the reality of such a city he gives ample testimony, and observes, it was called by another name, Mahasia; but that the river Euphrates was called Sur or Sor, he shews not distinctly. However, it is not improbable that it was so, and that the city either took its name from that part of the river, or the river from the city. Ptolemy mentions a branch of the river Euphrates, called Maarsares, which Bochart supposes, and not without some probability, to be a corruption from סרת Naar-Sura, Fluvius Suræ. (See Bochart, Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 9.)

Ver. 8. Namely, silver vessels, which Sedecias the son of Josias king of Judah had made.] Instead of the golden ones, which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon carried away, which Solomon had put in the house of the Lord. These being only of silver, and not of such value as the former, possibly might fall into such hands as to be purchased again, and sent back to Jerusalem. The other, of immense worth, were kept by Nebuchadnezzar, as appears from Dan. v. 2. Grotius thinks this sentence an interpolation. (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 10. Prepare ye manna.] Ποιήσατε μάννα. It is generally agreed, that this is a corrupt reading, as the margin also intimates; it should be mincha, or a meat-offering. Grotius contends, that the true one is μαναὰ, and not μάννα. Ποιήσατε is also improperly rendered prepare, it is a sacrifical expression, and signifies to offer. In the translation of the Old Testament, which is followed by the writers of the New, ποιεῖν is equivalent to ἱεροποιεῖν, or ἱερουργεῖν. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 21. 1 Esd. i. 6.) And the words at the institution of the eucharist, τοῦτο ποιεῖτε, would be as well rendered, Offer this in remembrance of me. It is likewise so used by the Jewish Hellenistic writers, and by the Greek ones of the church, as facere is also among the Latins.

And offer upon the altar of the Lord our God.] The exiles at Babylon are here supposed to send money to the priests to buy the necessary offerings for the altar of the Lord. But how is this consistent with what is mentioned, ver. 2. that Jerusalem was taken and burnt? If the temple was indeed at this time burnt, we must either understand this that they were to bring their oblations to the place where the altar formerly stood, which they esteemed as consecrated ground, or that an altar was actually erected on the same spot, or of a place of worship in general, or of that at Mizpeh in particular; which place continued to be a proseucha, or place of worship. (See 1 Macc. iii. 46.) There is the like expression, and upon a parallel occasion, Jer. xli. 5. Grotius thinks this last clause to be an interpolation.

Ver. 11. And pray for the life of Nabuchodonosor.] We meet with the like, Ezra vi. 10. where Darius orders all things necessary for the sacrifices to be given to the elders of the Jews, that they may offer sacrifices of sweet savour unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king and his sons. Diodorus Siculus has a passage to the same purpose, "Adductis ad eum victimis, mos erat pontificem, sacerdoti adstantem, magna voce in conferta Ægyptiorum corona preces enuntiare, ut Dii sanitatem cum cæteris bonis omnibus regi largiantur." (Lib. i.) And from Tertullian we learn, that it was a solemn part of the service of the church, in his time, to pray for the happiness and prosperity of the princes under whom they lived. (In Apolog.) When the Jews came under the government of the kings of Egypt, Eleazar, their high-priest, writes to Ptolemy thus: "We continually offer sacrifice for thee, thy children, and friends; and the people pray for the happy success in all things, and for the peaceable state of thy kingdom." (Jos. Antiq. lib. xii.) And so they did, when they were under the Seleucidæ. And, lastly, when they came under the Roman government, this was their constant practice, till they began that rebellion which ruined their nation. (Jos. de Bello Jud. lib. ii.) This being, says the same author, the cause of the war, that the seditious did reject the sacrifice offered for Cæsar, though the priests and nobles earnestly entreated them not to desert the custom, which had always obtained among them. And that the Christians, following their example, thus prayed continually, from the beginning, for their kings, though heathens and persecutors, we learn from the writings of Polycarp, Justin, Tertullian, Cyprian, Lactantius, and other ancient writers.

And for the life of Balthasar his son.] As the Scripture mentions Evil-Merodach as son of Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Kings xxv. 27. some have thought that by Belshazzar, Evil-Merodach is here to be understood, and that one and the same person is meant by both names. Others say, that Evil-Merodach was the eldest son of that monarch, and Belshazzar the youngest; and that the eldest being at that time in disgrace with his father, the younger was looked upon as presumptive heir of the crown, and therefore taken notice of here. Others understand by son, his grandson Belshazzar, as grandfathers are frequently called fathers in Scripture; see 2 Sam. ix. 7. 2 Kings viii. 26. compared with ver. 18. especially with respect to such as inherit after them. But Nebuchadnezzar was in truth his grandfather, though called his father, Dan. v. 2. for Belshazzar was son of Evil-Merodach, by Nitocris his queen, and therefore grandson to Nebuchadnezzar.

Ver. 12. And we shall serve them many days.] As the Jews had the greatest reason to consider Nebuchadnezzar and his family, and the Babylonians in general, as their most cruel enemies, since they had overturned their state, burnt their holy city and temple, and either killed or taken prisoners their kings, nobles, priests, and the far greater part of the people, can it be consistently supposed, that they should wish or pray, as the words seem to imply, that they might serve them many days? The meaning therefore must be, that if, according to their melancholy prospect they should continue to serve them many years, they might find favour in their sight, and their servitude in the land of their captivity be easy, or at least tolerable to them.

Ver. 14, 15. And ye shall read this book which we have sent unto you, to make confession in the house of the Lord, upon the feasts and solemn days. And ye shall say, &c.] By book we are here to understand the letter (for so any writing of considerable length is styled among the Hebrews) which Baruch wrote in the name of those that were in Babylon, to such of their brethren as still remained in Judea. It begins properly at the fifteenth verse (for the five foregoing ones are a sort of preface), and it contains that prayer or confession which the Jews used in their public worship, on solemn days, during their captivity. It may be divided into three parts; in the first, which ends at iii. 8. they acknowledge their great unworthiness, and the justice of God's dealings with them; they entreat his forgiveness of their sins past, and repeat the warning and threats of the prophets, whose words and reproofs they had notwithstanding rejected. The second part, which begins at ver. 9. of the third chapter to the beginning of the fourth, recounts the great privileges and advantages which the Jews enjoyed above other nations, in that they had the knowledge of the law of the Most High, and, through the direction of the only true wisdom, were made acquainted with the means of real happiness, life, and peace. From thence to the end of the fifth chapter, is an exhortation to a sincere repentance, and to leave their evil ways, by a speedy conversion, with a promise, on that condition, of a deliverance from the captivity under which they groaned, that the power of their enemies should be subdued, and their haughtiness turned into mourning. This pleasing prospect takes up the remainder of the letter, in which the author has many beautiful turns and lively strokes, and is transported even to a degree of rapture, and the thoughts of the agreeable change. In particular, the happy times of the gospel are spoken of with such assurance and clearness, as to give occasion to some to suspect interpolations in several places, which are indeed too glaring and explicit for the darkness of those times; especially, iii. 37. It is easy to observe, with respect to the supplicatory part of this prayer, that much of it is borrowed from that of Daniel, and that in the description of the glorious state of the church, there is frequent allusion to many passages in Isaiah.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 3. THAT a man should eat the flesh of his own son, and the flesh of his own daughter.] This is to be understood of the first siege of Jerusalem, by the Babylonians, the misery of which Jeremiah thus pathetically describes, They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger: the hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children; they were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people, Lam. iv. 9, 10. see also ii. 20. The like unnatural cruelty happened at the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, when the distress by famine was so great, "That wives tore away the meat out of the mouths of their husbands, children from their parents, and mothers forced the food from the mouths of their infants, and took away even the drops of milk, the last support of their just-expiring babes: but what was most surprising and unnatural, the very instinct of parents towards their children was extinguished by the famine; for they ate their own sons and daughters without horror." (Jos. de Bell. Jud. lib. v. cap. 10. lib. vi. cap. 3.) The like happened at the siege of Samaria. (2 Kings vi. 28, 29.) In all which lamentable instances was fulfilled that passage, Deut. xxviii. 56. The tender and delicate woman which would not venture to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness, her eye shall be evil towards the husband of her bosom, and towards her son, and towards her daughter.

Ver. 11. And hast gotten thyself a name as appeareth this day.] It may be pertinently asked, with what propriety it can be here said, that the destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of the people of Israel, exalted the name of God, and manifested the greatness of his majesty? would not infidel nations from hence take occasion to blaspheme the true God, and to reflect upon his power, as if the gods of the nations had been too powerful for him, by subduing a people, of whom he had proclaimed himself the saviour and protector? To this it may be replied, that what these idolaters looked upon as an instance of God's weakness, was a signal act of his power, justice, and veracity, as it was the remarkable fulfilling of what he had so many hundred years before threatened by his servant Moses, Deut. xxviii. 47—49. If the Chaldeans led his own people into captivity, it was because God was become their enemy; if a kingdom once so flourishing, was destroyed in a manner so deplorable, it was to punish the ingratitude of a people quite insensible of his mercies. So that the greatness of God appeared as visibly in the instances of his severity, as in those of his loving-kindness; and he was as truly the God of Israel, when he delivered them into the power of a nation of a fierce countenance, ver. 50. to suffer all the miseries there threatened, as when he brought them out of Egypt, with a mighty hand and stretched-out arm.

Ver. 13. We are but a few left among the heathen, where thou hast scattered us.] Besides the Jews' decrease by dispersions, who were tossed like vagabonds from one country to another, without any certain settlement; the horrid butcheries which the Jews underwent were innumerable. The Jewish writers, in describing them, cannot find expressions tragical enough to represent them: twice as many, they tell us, perished by the Romans' cruelty only, as came actually out of Egypt, and thereby completed that malediction, Deut. xxviii. 62. If one considers the miseries with which the Jews were afflicted from the reign of Josias only, they are scarce to be paralleled in any other kingdom, in so short a time. Pharaoh-nechoh gained a victory over Josias, conquered Judea, and deposed king Jehoahaz, and set up another, and brought away great part of the people, with their king Jehoahaz, into Egypt; four years after the kingdom of Judah was wasted by Nebuchadnezzar, and not long after Jehoiachin was put to death, and many captives brought to Babylon. Jechonias reigned but three months and ten days, and was also brought to Babylon, with a great number of his subjects. In eight or nine years, how many misfortunes, changes, captivities! how many princes murdered, or deposed!

Ver. 24. The bones of our kings, and the bones of our fathers . . . taken out of their sepulchres.] It was a custom, both among Jews and gentiles, to bury with the deceased some of their most valuable effects and ornaments, and sometimes to put into the sepulchre great quantity of money and treasure. On this account, says a learned writer, "Chaldæi ossa regum Judæ, ac principum, nec non sacerdotum ac prophetarum, e sepulcris effoderunt, ad effodiendos nimirum thesauros, quos in antiquorum sepulcris munifica recondi manu consuetos, ipso experimento edocti probè norant." (Alting. Roma Subter. p. 93.)

Ver. 35. I will make an everlasting covenant with them . . . and will no more drive my people out of the land.] The Jews at Babylon, where this author wrote, did not imagine that the prophecies were at an end in the first return of the Jews under the Persian kings; they, by virtue of the everlasting covenant which God made to drive them no more out of the land, hoped for another more perfect and glorious restoration, as foretold by the prophets, which should be the deliverance of God himself, even salvation by their Messiah. (See Bishop Chandler's Defence, &c. p. 53.)

CHAP. III.

Ver. 4. HEAR the prayers of the dead Israelites.] This passage has been applied by the Romanists, to countenance their notion, that the saints departed intercede and pray for the living, and has been quoted by Bellarmine, particularly, for that purpose. But the place seems capable of a fair and orthodox interpretation, if we consider the following reasons: 1. By the dead Israelites, we are not to understand such of them who are departed this life, and whose souls are separated from their bodies, but those who, being yet alive, are dead in trespasses and sins, as St. Paul speaks, Eph. ii. 1. 2. This sense is farther confirmed from ver. 11. where it is said of Israel, How happeneth it that thou art defiled with the dead? that thou art counted with them that go down to the grave? i. e. as one of them that are near the pit, upon account of their great misery and affliction. And the reason for this their suffering follows the question immediately; viz. Thou hast forsaken the fountain of wisdom, for if thou hadst walked in the way of God thou shouldest have dwelt in peace for ever; i. e. shouldest not have been in captivity. 3. It is no uncommon expression to compare persons under a great calamity to dead men, and to account of them as such. See Ezek. xxxvii. where the Israelites in their captivity are represented as dead bones, ver. 11. and their return from their dispersion, as the opening of their graves; and their restoration is described as a resurrection by Isa. xxvi. 15. 4. After the words, Hear the prayers of the dead Israelites, it follows, and of their children, which have sinned before thee; where the Vulgate and our version seem faulty: the Greek renders it by a participle of the present tense, ἁμαρτανόντων, which shews that this is to be understood of the Israelites then alive, and not of those which had sinned and were dead, for then it should have been ἡμαρτηκότων, in the preter tense. Junius renders here, Exaudi orationem mortuorum Israelitarum, i. e. filiorum qui peccant coram te. Lastly, It is an absurdity for the Israelites to intercede for their intercessors, which according to the Romanists' sense they do, by beseeching God to hear the prayers of the departed Israelites in favour of those that are alive. (2 Macc. xv. 13, 14.) Mr. Whiston says the sense is here,—the prayers of those Israelites who were then alive, and interceded with thee, but are since dead. (See ii. 17.)

Ver. 8. And to be subject to payments, according to all the iniquities of our fathers.] Εἰς ὄφλησιν. ὄφλημα and ὄφλησις properly signify a debt. Here we may understand unjust exaction, as Junius expressly renders, which the Jews in the land of their captivity were exposed to, and probably suffered, being at the will and arbitrary pleasure of those that had them in subjection. According to Calmet, it signifies their being bought or sold into slavery, to satisfy the debts contracted by their fathers. Anciently creditors had a power to sell the children of their debtors for the satisfaction of their debt; (Matt. xviii. 25.) and fathers themselves were sometimes necessitated to sell their children for this purpose. (Exod. xxi. 7. Baruch iv. 6.) Or being subject to payments, may here mean usury. God threatens his people, Deut. xxviii. 44. that they should borrow of their enemies upon interest or usury, and thereby become their bondmen or debtors. The first part of the letter of these captives ends with this verse.

Ver. 11. Thou art defiled with the dead, thou art counted with them that go down into the grave.] The sense is, that, living among the Chaldeans, they were in a state of continual defilement, dwelling as it were among the tombs. He compares the captive Jews, in a strange country, to a person shut up in a grave, or confined in a house with a dead corpse. There is the like expression, Psal. xxviii. 1.

Ver. 14. Learn where is wisdom, where is strength, where is understanding, that thou mayest know also where is length of days and life, where is the light of the eyes, and peace.] By strength, ἰσχὺς, I would not here understand, with most interpreters, fortitude or bodily strength, to subdue enemies, which is but ill connected with the perfections of the soul in this place: it means rather, I conceive, strength of mind; see Dan. ii. 20. where might is rendered by the LXX. σύνεσις. The Vulgate properly distinguishes between μακροβίωσις and ζωὴ, which follow, rendering the former longiturnitas vitæ, and the other victus. The light of the eyes. Castalio renders vita likewise, which would increase the tautology; nor is it better, I think, translated by Grotius, res adversæ. It means rather, as Solomon speaks, that the commandment is a lamp, and the law is light; (Prov. vi. 23.) or, as the Psalmist has it, that the commandment of the Lord is pure, and giveth light unto the eyes. (Psal. xix. 8. see Baruch iv. 2. Ecclus. xxv. 11. and the note.)

Ver. 16. Where are the princes of the heathen become, and such as ruled the beasts upon the earth?] Grotius understands this of kings who delighted in hunting, and the diversions of the chase; who pleased and sported themselves with animals the most fierce and savage; looking upon themselves as lords in a more especial manner of nature and the creation, and exercising a power beyond the common dominion given to man at the beginning. The Scriptures often put animals in the number of the things over which monarchs have dominion. Accordingly, God, to denote the absolute sovereignty which he had given to the king of Babylon, says, that he had given the beasts of the field also to serve him. (Jer. xxvii. 6. xxviii. 14.) Judith flatters the pride of Holofernes, by telling him, that not only men should obey him, but also the beasts of the field and the cattle should do homage to him, (xi. 7.)

Ver. 17. They that had their pastime with the fowls of the air.] If we understand this figuratively, it means such as delighted in high and lofty contemplations, whose towering imaginations played aloft, like the soaring eagle. Grotius expounds it literally of such as delighted in hawking, which was a royal pastime in ancient times. A dominion over the fowls of the air is mentioned also in Scripture, as an instance of the sovereignty of princes. Thus Daniel tells Nebuchadnezzar, that wheresoever the children of men dwell, God had given both the beasts of the field and the fowls of heaven into his hand, and made him ruler over them, (Dan. ii. 38.) Ezekiel represents the king of Assyria as a great cedar, in which all the fowls of heaven made their nests, and under whose branches all the beasts of the field brought forth their young. (Ezek. xxxi. 6. Judith xi. 7.)

Ver. 18. For they that wrought in silver, and were so careful, and whose works are unsearchable.] Ὅτι οἱ τὸ ἀργύριον τεκταίνοντες, καὶ μεριμνῶντες, καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἐξεύρεσις τῶν ἔργων αὐτῶν. The Vulgate and Syriac omit ὅτι, which indeed perplexes the sense, eludes and disappoints the reader, and, after promising him a reason, he finds nothing that it relates to, or can be assigned as a reason of. It seems not improbable that the true reading may be, ἔτι οἱ τὸ ἀργύριον, κ. τ. λ. which gives a natural and clear connexion to what follows. Ἐξεύρεσις, which Maldonat and some other expositors understand here in the sense of lucrum, is not so proper to this place: it seems rather to mean the number and delicacy of the works here spoken of. The sentence, Οὐκ ἔστιν ἐξεύρεσις τῶν ἔργων αὐτῶν, plainly corresponds to the close of the former verse, οὐκ ἔστι τέλος τῆς κτήσεως αὐτῶν, as will appear by laying the two corresponding passages together, "Both they that heaped up riches so extravagantly, that there was no end of their getting, and they that wrought so accurately in sculpture and engravings, that there is no finding out;" i. e. no counting their number, no equalling the excellence of their curious works, are all of them vanished, and gone down to the grave. The author designs the close of the two verses to give strength and force to what went before in each, that he may at last more effectually shew the excellence of wisdom or piety, which is so much better and more enduring than these worldly advantages and attainments; that neither the wealth of these men, which was without end, nor their art, which is now inimitable, could ensure to them life and happiness; whereas they that walked in the way of God (ver. 13.) should dwell in peace for ever.

Ver. 19. They are vanished.] This, according to Grotius and Badwell, denotes the transitory and mortal state of kings, as well as other men, who die and are as quickly succeeded by others. Νεώτεροι, in the following verse, does not mean merely young men, but fresh successors, or new kings. Or it may refer to the curious artists beforementioned, who took such pains to bring their work to perfection, and to make it valuable and lasting, that they are vanished, and dead, like others of less figure and taste. Ἀφανισμὸς is taken absolutely for death, 2 Macc. v. 12. But in those words of the Psalmist, before I go hence, and be no more seen, it is rather a periphrasis of death.

Ver. 23. The Agarenes that seek wisdom.] Called also Ishmaelites. Strabo and Ptolemy call them Agræi. Not only Arabia and the adjacent countries, but the eastern part of the world in general, was famous for the study of wisdom, or philosophy, as it was afterward called. The Edomites put in their claim to this character, Is wisdom no more in Teman? (Jer. xlix. 7.) In the book of Job, Eliphaz, one of the disputants, is called the Temanite, as being descended from Teman, Esau's grandson. Under the burden of Arabia, Isa. xxi. 14. the inhabitants of the land of Tema are mentioned, which Tema is reckoned by Moses among the sons of Ishmael. As this writer joins Meran to Teman, there is reason to think that the first is in Arabia as well as the second.

The authors of fables.] i. e. Ingenious apologues. The margin has expounders, probably of enigmas or riddles. Or it may mean persons skilled in the interpretation of dreams or oneirocritics; a piece of science, but falsely so called, in great request among the Egyptians, Arabians, Persians, Indians, and other eastern nations. (See Medes's Comment. Apocalypt. lib. iii. p. 451. 1 Kings x. 1.)

Ver. 24. How great is the house of God!] How large and extended is his empire! and how great the number of his creatures! the whole earth is his kingdom, all men are his subjects, and all times under his cognizance! but there are but few that enter into his secrets and partake of his wisdom. It is observable, that this writer calls the universe, the house of God; because, great as it is, yet the infinite Being is present every where in it, and governs it with as much ease as a father or master does his family.

Ver. 26. There were the giants famous from the beginning.] These great giants, like all others, were under the empire of the sovereign Monarch of the universe; but they were not preferred, or chosen of God to receive the gift of wisdom. God chose before them Noah and his family before the flood, and after that time he preferred the Israelites to the Rephaim. And, indeed, throughout both Testaments, the constant tenor of his procedure has been, to prefer the meek and lowly to the mighty or more powerful.

Ver. 28. These were destroyed, because they had no wisdom.] Or wanted the fear of the Lord. The fear of God is the principal wisdom, whence, through the whole book of Proverbs, the wicked man, who neglects the fear of the Lord, is called a fool. That passage, Prov. xxi. 16. comes very near this place, the man that wandereth out of the way of understanding, shall remain in the congregation of the dead, or in the assembly of the giants, as it may be rendered from the Hebrew; i. e. shall go and keep them company in that accursed place and condition which they are in.

Ver. 29, 30. Who hath gone up into heaven.] These words allude to and greatly resemble those of Moses, Deut. xxx. 12, 13. It is not in heaven that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us? Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it to us? To the same effect with this of Baruch is that of Philo, What need is there of ἢ μακρὰς ὁδοιπορίας, ἢ τοῦ θαλαττεύειν, either to take long journeys, or to go to sea in search of virtue, seeing we have the root of it within ourselves; or, as Moses expresses it, in our mouth, and in our heart?

Ver. 32. He that prepared the earth for evermore, hath filled it with four-footed beasts.] The Vulgate reads with a conjunction, Qui præparavit terram in æterno tempore, et replevit eam pecudibus, et quadrupedibus. The sense is, according to Calmet, He that made the earth that it might continue always, or that it might never move at any time. The earth was looked upon as the foundation and centre of all the movements and of all the changes that happened here below, without moving or changing itself. Monarchs rise and fall, men die, and others succeed in their place, the seasons change, and are in continual vicissitude; but the earth continues always the same. According to that observation of Solomon, One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh, but the earth abideth for ever. (Eccles. i. 4.)

Ver. 33. He that sendeth forth light and it goeth; calleth it again, and it obeyeth him with fear.] He commands the sun to stop, and it stands still, as it happened under Joshua, x. 12. He commands it to be retrograde, and the shadow returns backward ten degrees, as was the sign to Hezekiah; (2 Kings xx. 9.) he forbids it to shine at all, and darkness is over all the land, as at our Saviour's crucifixion. (Matt. xxvii. 45.) What follows in the next verse about the stars is equally sublime, and very much resembles Ecclus. xliii. 10. Psal. cxlvii. 4. ἔλαμψαν τῷ ποιήσαντι αὐτούς, is inaccurately rendered in the next verse following, They shewed light unto him that made them; it should rather be, They shined, not for his use, but by his order and appointment, that made them.

Ver. 36, 37. He hath found out the way of knowledge, and hath given it unto Jacob his servant, and to Israel his beloved. Afterward did he shew himself upon earth, and conversed with men.] The author shews, that the Jews were in bondage for deserting that way of wisdom, which, being unknown to idolatrous nations, he that founded the earth by wisdom had made known to his people by his prophets; (see Ecclus. xxiv. 8.) and intending to exhort them to stick fast to God, and not to fall away to the idols of the nations in their captivity, as the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah had warned them before, he puts them in mind, that it was none but God that could discover that way of wisdom which the law taught Israel; which wisdom, says he, was afterward seen upon earth, and conversed among men, viz. in and by the prophets, who spoke by the word and wisdom of God. The expression in the thirty-seventh verse, it must be owned, is very like that of St. John, i. 14. that the Word was made flesh, and dwelt amongst us; and is thought to be so close a resemblance of it, that some learned men have fancied, on that account, it was foisted in here by some Christian copyist. A learned writer, who contends for the canonicalness of this book, thinks that this clause, too much favouring the divinity and incarnation of the Messiah, induced the Jews to lay this book aside, soon after Christianity prevailed in the world, which before that time they ever looked upon as sacred and canonical. (Auth. Rec. vol. i. p. 7.) Bishop Chandler thinks by afterward is meant the latter days, or the days of the Messiah; (see Dan. ii. 29. 45.) the time that all Israel shall be saved by the Deliverer's coming to Sion, and his manifesting the Jews to be the children of his kingdom. (Def. Christ. p. 55.) Others, who think that the applying this passage to the incarnation and appearance of the Messiah, would hold out too much light for the times of this writer, refer it either to that occurrence, when, after the giving of the law on Mount Sinai, Moses and Aaron, and the seventy elders, were permitted to see the God of Israel, (Exod. xxiv. 9.) and Moses himself to come up into the mount to him; or to the angel of the covenant appearing amongst, and conducting his people in the wilderness forty years. (Estius, in loc.)

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. THIS is the book of the commandments of God, and the law that endureth for ever.] As the gospel comprises the law and the prophets in two commandments; viz. the love of God and of our neighbour; or, more briefly, in charity: so this writer says, that wisdom, described in the former chapter, contains the substance of the commandments, and of the law, here said to endure for ever; not with respect to its ceremonial ordinances, but the moral and spiritual part, which is fixed and unchangeable. Wisdom therefore here described seems to be no other in effect than charity, so highly extolled, 1 Cor. xiii. 8. whose character it is, never to fail, when even tongues shall cease, and knowledge itself shall vanish away.

Ver. 3. Give not thine honour to another, nor the things that are profitable unto thee, to a strange nation.] It was the glory of the Israelites to know the only true God, to love and serve him, who had chosen them above all other nations to be a holy people, consecrated to his service: this character distinguished his peculium from heathen and infidel nations: by forsaking therefore the God of their fathers, and abandoning themselves to the idolatry of the strange nations, they gave the honour due to the living God only to insensible things, and stained their former glory: and instead of children of God, a title and privilege which they enjoyed before, became slaves, and were rejected by him. And this God threatened to do by Moses, Deut. xxxii. 21. when they should move him to jealousy with that which is not God, and provoke him to anger with their vanities.

Ver. 5. My people, the memorial of Israel.] i. e. Ye poor remains of the Jews, the surviving hopes of sinking Israel, who are preserved to continue the name and memory of once so famous a people, the only remaining monument of distressed Sion.

Ver. 7. Ye provoked him that made you, by sacrificing to devils.] The Psalmist, according to the version of the LXX. says, ὅτι πάντες οἱ θεοὶ ἐθνῶν δαιμόνια, that all the gods of the heathen are devils. (Psal. xcvi. 5.) And of the Jews who sacrificed to them it is said, they sacrificed to devils, and not to God; לשדים to evil, wasting, and destroying spirits. And so they are styled, 2 Chron. xi. 15. Rev. ix. 20. The pulling down idolatrous worship, is, in our Saviour's language, the casting out the prince of this world. (John xii. 31. xvi. 11.) The converting of the gentiles from idolatry to the worship of the true God, is called, turning them from the power of Satan unto God; (Acts xxvi. 18.) the delivering them from the power of darkness, (Col. i. 13.) who before walked according to the prince of the power of darkness, (Ephes. ii. 2.) and were led captive by Satan at his will. (2 Tim. ii. 26.)

Ver. 12. Let no man rejoice over me, a widow, who for the sins of my children am left desolate.] This prosopopœia of Sion, bewailing her children gone into captivity, is moving and beautiful. She assumes the character of a disconsolate widow, an idea often borrowed to represent deep distress, bemoaning the loss of the favourite of her bosom, with these two sad but common aggravations of her sorrow, her children taking evil courses, and as such exemplarily punished, stricken of God, and afflicted; and herself, instead of that compassion which her calamities called for from those around her, neglected, insulted, reproached, and injured. The venting her grief in broken accents, (ver. 17.) But what can I help you? is inimitably, says Grotius, affecting; "I who am devoid, not only of my former substance, my ornaments, and pleasant things, my comforts and conveniences, but reduced to the lowest state, and wanting myself the necessaries of life, what am I able, what can I be expected, to do for you?" At length all appearance of human help vanishing, she raises motives of consolation from that never-failing treasury of delight and comfort to afflicted minds, the word of God, whose statutes had been her song in the house of her pilgrimage; and assures them, from the prophets, of a deliverance from their captivity, and remarkable vengeance overtaking their persecutors. In this pleasing prospect she exults and triumphs, (chap. v.) as a fond mother overjoyed for the recovery of her children.

Ver. 15.] Probably this refers to Deut. xxviii. 49, 50. and may be considered as a fulfilling that prophecy, The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth, a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand. A nation of fierce countenance, which will not regard the person of the old, nor shew favour to the young. This, if applied to the Chaldeans, the description of the place will not suit, for the Chaldeans did not come from a country which was very far from Judea. If to the Romans, the time will not suit with the supposed age of this writer. Josephus, indeed, informs us, that upon the Romans making themselves masters of the temple, they slaughtered all, both old and young indifferently, without any respect to age, having neither mercy nor modesty.

Ver. 16. And left her that was alone, desolate without daughters.] The Geneva version I think clearer, Leaving me alone, and destitute of my daughters; i. e. both sons and daughters were carried into captivity. (See ver. 14.)

Ver. 20. I have put off the clothing of peace, and put upon me the sackcloth of my prayer: I will cry unto the Everlasting in my days.] i. e. I have put off the garment of prosperity, as the margin has it, or of gladness, and put upon me the sackcloth of penance and supplication, Indui cilicium deprecationis meæ, Arabic. And Junius renders in the same manner: or, as the Syriac has it, Clothed me with sackcloth in the solemn time of my prayer and supplication. The last clause, κεκράξομαι πρὸς τὸν αἰώνιον ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις μου, is inaccurately rendered here. It may either be translated with the margin, in the time of mine affliction, and in this sense we are to understand ἡμέρα Ἱερουσαλήμ, Psal. xxxvii. 13. cxxxvii. 7. or the sense may be, I will cry unto the Everlasting all my days; thus Calmet, Je crieray au treshaut tous les jours de ma vie: and the Geneva version accordingly, As long as I live I will call upon the Everlasting. This sense is strongly confirmed by Psal. cxvi. 2. where the expression in the LXX. very much resembles this, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις μου ἐπικαλέσομαι, and our translators rightly render, I will call upon him as long as I live.

Ver. 22. Because of the mercy which shall soon come unto you from the Everlasting, our Saviour.] The like is repeated ver. 24, 25. but how can this mercy be properly said to come soon, as the captivity was to last seventy years? This, say Mess. of Port-Royal, may be admitted, if considered either with respect to God, who inflicted this punishment, in whose sight a thousand years are but as a day; or with respect to the suffering Jews themselves, those especially among them who were touched with a sense of their sins, and their deserving a much longer and sorer punishment; "for a soul which is truly convinced of and sensibly affected with the eternity of punishment due to its transgressions, counts for nothing, or considers but as a moment, the time of penance and suffering which God is mercifully pleased to inflict in this life." (Ver. 22. 24.) This writer, says Bishop Chandler, personates Baruch, and his book is little else than an epitome of what we have at large in the prophets, concerning a more universal return than that was of the Jews under Cyrus, and in virtue of God's everlasting covenant, to drive them no more out of the land. The Jews at Babylon, where this Baruch wrote, did not conceive that the prophecies were exhausted in the first return of the Jews under the Assyrian kings, they hoped for another more perfect and more glorious restoration, as foretold by the prophets, which should be the deliverance of God himself, as the Jews were wont still to call the salvation of the Messiah. In confidence of this so eminent a deliverance, he breaks forth into admiration of this Emanuel, or God with us. (Def. of Christ. p. 53.)

Ver. 25. Shortly thou shalt see his destruction, and shalt tread upon his neck.] This, says Calmet, was literally accomplished in the time of queen Esther and Mordecai, at Susa; and under Daniel, at Babylon; for when they were exalted to the highest dignity, and the most important posts of the government, the Chaldeans themselves were obliged to submit to their authority, and to bow before them, as Isaiah had long before expressly foretold, (lx. 14.)

Ver. 28. For as it was their mind to go astray from God, so being returned, seek him ten times more.] It is not enough, says a pious writer, morally to revoke what is past, by wishing it had not been done, but you must oppose a state to a state, a habit to a habit; i. e. as sin before gave you law, so now must the Spirit of God. Habitual sin must be destroyed by a contrary habit, or state of holiness: this is well summed up by the apostle, As ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness. (Rom. vi. 19.) What the Greek makes matter of exhortation and advice here, is spoken prophetically according to the Vulgate, which accordingly came to pass; for after the captivity, the Jews were more observant of the law of God than they were before, especially with respect to idolatry. But it will be best, if this reading is followed, to understand this of those devout Jews in particular who were converted by the preaching of the apostles, and were the first-fruits of the Christian church.

Ver. 35. And she shall be inhabited by devils.] This expression is grounded on a vulgar notion, that desolate and forlorn places are inhabited by evil spirits, who have their haunts there. The canonical Scriptures seem to countenance this opinion; thus the demoniac (Luke viii. 29.) is said to abide in no house, but to be driven of the devil into the wilderness, and thither was our Saviour led, as being the devil's residence, to be tempted by him. (Matt. iv. 1.) And accordingly our Saviour, in the parable of the unclean spirit, says, that he walks through dry or uninhabited places. (Matt. xii. 43. see also Tobit viii. 3.)

Ver. 36. Look about thee towards the East.] This, no doubt, primarily relates to the restoration of the Jews under Cyrus, and the return from their long captivity by his appointment, or rather God's influencing his heart for that purpose; and though Babylon, properly speaking, was rather to the north with respect to Jerusalem, yet Persia, where Cyrus reigned, and from whence the happy orders were to come, was to the east. That Ἀνατολὴ here is the title of the Messiah likewise, there is no question, whether it be literally rendered the East, as the title formerly was bestowed upon him, (Zech. vi. 12.) or the rising of the sun, that Sun of righteousness, mentioned Mal. iv. 2. However that be, it is certain that where Ἀνατολὴ, the East, is used in most places of Scripture, the commentators and scholiasts have still applied it to Christ, meaning, by the East, that orient or rising sun, and not the point from whence it rises: (see Jer. xxiii. 5.) and this seems the more probable, because, ver. 22. he is called the Everlasting, our Saviour.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 3. Τὴ ὑπ' οὐρανὸν πάσῃ. subaud. χώρᾳ. The like ellipsis occurs Job xviii. 4. Luke xvii. 24. in LXX. Prov. viii. 28. 2 Macc. ii. 18. in Addit. Esth. xiii. 10.

Ver. 6. For they departed from thee on foot, and were led away of their enemies; but God bringeth them unto thee exalted with glory, as children of the kingdom.] i. e. As a royal race, or children of kings, riding in triumph, and in a most magnificent procession. Ezra gives us the number and quality of the persons that returned, their horses, mules, camels, &c. employed on the occasion, (ii. 66.) And it appears, from 1 Esd. v. 2. that Darius himself sent a thousand horsemen to conduct them back safely to Jerusalem, with musical instruments. Isaiah describes their return from Babylon in the most pompous manner, and in terms scarcely inferior to a real triumph, (xlix. 22, 23. lxvi. 20.) "Their transport of mirth and jollity on this occasion (says Josephus) was as great, as if the day of their redemption and return had been the first day of a new life." (Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 4.)

Ver. 7. For God hath appointed that every high hill.] By ὄρος and βουνὸς, we are here to understand those who are lofty, proud, and supercilious, who exalt themselves from a conceit of worldly wisdom: the meek, on the contrary, are represented as prostrate and humble, casting aside every high thought, and adoring, with holy reverence, mysteries that are above them. This refers to a known custom of great kings, who, when they travelled, had their ὁδοποιοὶ, or harbingers, sent before them to make the way plain and commodious, by filling up deep places, and levelling those that were high, and smoothing those that were rough. And so Josephus says, that when Titus came to the wars, there went before him all the royal aids, and all the military men, and those who planed the way (de Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 6. 12.) for the coming of the Roman army. The words here seem to refer to Isa. xl. 4. where the prophet, describing the return of the people from their captivity to their own country, expresses it by "the former deliverance and passage out of Egypt, through uneven craggy ways in the desert, which yet, by God's conduct, was made passable to them, and they brought at last to a happy Canaan." Thus the Targum on Canticles saith, the cloud went before the Israelites in the wilderness three days' journey, to take down their hills, and fill up their valleys before them. Mystically, or by way of metaphor, this expression, of casting down every high hill, means also, the removing of all obstacles to one's happiness or designs, as in those verses of Sibylla Erythræa, set down by St. Austin, De Civit. Dei, lib. viii. where, foretelling the coming of the King from heaven in the flesh, it follows:

> "Dejicient colles, valles extollet ab imo;
> Non erit in rebus hominum sublime, vel altum;
> Æquantur campis montes."

Which is almost the same with the passage cited from Isaiah. Compare also Luke iii. 5. The same metaphor is used by Homer, Il. o. ver. 260. where Apollo, promising to assist Hector, saith,

> Αὐτὰρ ἐγὼ προπάροιθε κιὼν, ἵπποισι κέλευθον
> Πᾶσαν λειανέω,

I will go before and make smooth all passages.

Ver. 8. Every sweet-smelling tree shall overshadow Israel.] i. e. God will furnish his people with all sorts of accommodations for their return home; in particular, that they should not be incommoded with heat, a calamity very incident to travellers in hot countries; God would plant woods, as it were on purpose to shelter his chosen in their return, from the scorching heat of the sun. This undoubtedly refers to Isa. xli. 19. where God says, I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah-tree, the myrtle, and the olive-tree, &c. conducting the people home almost in the same marvellous manner, as he did his chosen in the wilderness, by the shadow of a cloud to defend them from the heat. Or, without having recourse to a miracle, this may be understood of his appointing their return at such a season, when the trees afforded most shade; or that they marched through such places where there was a natural cover over them. Others think, and not without reason, that this is rather a poetical description, to display, but in an exaggerating manner, the easiness and pleasure with which the Jews would return from Babylon. Our translators follow the copies which read ἐσκίασαν, but others have ἐσκίρτησαν, subsultarunt; and thus Junius renders, exsilieruntque etiam silvæ, that all the trees of the wood rejoiced on the occasion, like that of the Psalmist, xcvi. 12.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 3. SEVEN generations.] The word γενεὰ, or generation, has many senses. Sometimes it signifies twenty, twenty-five, or thirty years, but most generally the last term; and in this sense it is used by approved authors, and particularly in the genealogy recorded by St. Matthew. By it here is meant ten years, or rather seven decads of years; but this acceptation is not very common: but as it was very well known to have been predicted by the prophets, that the captivity should last seventy, that is, seven ten years, it cannot be doubted but that this author had that term in view here, and meant the precise period of ten years. The seventy years of the captivity of Babylon are usually reckoned from the first year of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, and the fourth of Jehoiakim, i. e. A. M. 3398, and ended 3468; or before Christ 606, and ended 536, before his appearance; at which time Cyrus gave leave to all the Jews in his dominions to return to their own country. This epistle, said to be Jeremiah's, is supposed to be wrote to the Jews when they were going into captivity with their king, to admonish them to beware of the idolatry which they would see in Babylon: and seems to be the letter referred to, 2 Macc. ii. 2, 3. where the same caution is given as here, to guard against the idolatry they would observe in that place, and is an epitome of sundry things in Moses, the Psalms, and the prophets, against idolatry, and the fullest dissuasive against it, in one continued tract or view, of any through the whole volume of the Bible, and handled in the most proper manner: as banter and ridicule are often found more effectual to expose and confute an error, than grave and serious reasoning.

Ver. 4. Gods of silver, and gold, and wood, borne upon shoulders.] Isaiah takes notice of and condemns this custom, He maketh it a god: they fall down, yea, they worship. They bear him upon the shoulder, they carry him, and set him in his place, and he standeth; from his place shall he not remove, (xlvi. 6, 7.) Jeremiah likewise mentions this idolatry, and their carrying images in great procession and pomp, They must needs be borne (says he) because they cannot go, (x. 5.) And to this sense, Spencer and other learned interpreters explain those words of Amos, Ye have borne the tabernacle of Moloch and Chiun your images, (v. 26.) which the LXX. rightly render ἀνελάβετε, sursum tulistis. Numerous instances of this superstition used among the heathen, are to be met with in sacred and profane writers. (See ver. 26.)

Ver. 6. Say ye in your hearts, O Lord, we must worship thee.] These words seem wrongly pointed in our translation, and the common editions of the Greek. The sense would be better and more agreeable to the context, if the rendering was, "We ought to worship thee, O Lord, with the spirit, or understanding, in contradistinction to senseless images, which take no notice of their votaries." And so St. Cyprian renders this passage, In sensu tibi debet adorari Deus. (De Orat. Domin.) One copy of the Greek reads without any comma at all, probably intending this sense; but for clearness I would place it thus, εἴπατε δὴ, τῇ διανοίᾳ σε δεῖ προσκυνεῖν, δέσποτα. The Psalmist, in like manner, after having exposed the folly of image-worship, and from the honour given by the heathens to their idols, presses the like conclusion upon the Israelites, and excites them to praise the living God, the Lord of the world, with the greater devotion. (Psal. cxxxv. 17—20.)

Ver. 7. For mine angel is with you, and I myself caring for your souls.] i. e. Mine angel shall protect you, which these idols cannot. Our version and the Vulgate seem faulty in the rendering of the latter clause; in the Greek it is, αὐτὸς δὲ ἐκζητῶν τὰς ψυχὰς ὑμῶν, which I would translate, And he (the angel) will watch over you, and revenge any injury done to you. The Geneva version understands αὐτὸς, in like manner, of the angel, For mine angel shall be with you, and shall care for your souls. Junius is more explicit to the same purpose, Angelus meus vobiscum est, qui idem reposciturus est animas vestras; and so the oriental versions also have it.

Ver. 8. As for their tongue, it is polished by the workman, and they themselves are gilded and laid over with silver; yet are they but false, and cannot speak.] The mimic representations of life are all deceit; they are mere insensible images of things, having mouths, and a tongue beautifully polished, but are unable to give a word of advice or comfort to their supplicants. Their images are overlaid with coverings of gold and silver plates; (see ver. 57, 58. Isa. xxx. 22.) either to attract the eyes of the beholders, or to cover some defect; but their gold and silver serve only to expose their weakness. They are of no more value than that of the rich materials of which they are made, and so far from being able to say or do any thing, that they themselves are the handy-work of those that worship them: every excellence that they have is derived from the ingenuity of the artificer, and shews rather his art than their divinity.

Ver. 9. And taking gold, as it were for a virgin that loves to go gay, they make crowns for the heads of their gods.] The Geneva version is clearer, which has, And as they take gold for a maid that loveth to be decked, so make they crowns for the heads of their gods. But the sense, I conceive, would be more perfect, if the pointing was thus, And taking gold, as for some virgin that loves dress and finery, they make crowns for the heads of their gods. And so Calmet understands it, Comme on fait des ornements à une fille, qui aime à se parer, ainsi on fait ces idoles avec de l'or.

Ver. 12. Yet cannot these gods save themselves from rust and moths, though they be covered with purple raiment.] See ver. 72. i. e. Their ornaments and royal attire are perishable things, like those that wear them; pass but a few years, and their riches are corrupted, and their garments moth-eaten, their gold and silver caukered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against them, and shall eat them up, as it were fire, as St. James speaks upon another occasion, (v. 2, 3.) That the heathens, in their idolatrous worship, adorned the images of their gods with costly robes, is confirmed from Jer. x. 9. where, speaking of the decorations and rich apparel of the false gods, he says, that blue and purple are their clothing.

Ver. 13. They wipe their faces because of the dust of the temple, when there is much upon them.] Or, as the Geneva version has it, They wipe their faces because of the dust of the temple, whereof there is much upon them. And so the Vulgate, Extergunt faciem ipsorum propter pulverem domûs, qui est plurimus inter eos; i. e. through the concourse of the people, or votaries, who come there in great numbers. The multiplicity of persons which tread the hallowed courts, which is an honour to the true God, is to them an inconvenience and disgrace; for when the idol-temples, like that of Baal, are filled with worshippers from one end to the other, being unable to help themselves in any respect, they must be beholden afterward to the care of others, to remove any accidental stain or filth that may fasten on them, and to keep them neat and clean. (See ver. 24.)

Ver. 15. He hath also in his right hand a dagger, and an axe.] Arnobius observes, concerning the gentiles, "That they designed to create fear by the manner in which they framed and represented the statues and images of their gods: hence scythes, clubs, and thunderbolts, were appendages to their idols." (Adv. Gent. lib. vi.) Like the god of war, or some martial hero, they were exhibited, armed with swords, lances, helmets, bucklers, or whatever fancy could invent to excite terror. In the foregoing verse, indeed, they are set forth in a milder attitude, to create veneration, seemingly dispensing justice, like some prince or governor of a province, of which the sceptre which they held forth was to be the symbol.

Ver. 19. They light them candles . . . whereof they cannot see one.] Either in their temples, or in their processions. See Cic. Offic. iii. 26. and Apuleius, who says of the pagan processions, that, on such an occasion, "Antistites sacrorum Deum proferebant insignes exuvias, quorum primus lucernam præmicantem claro porrigebat lumine —Magnus præterea sexus utriusque numerus, lucernis, tædis, cereis," &c. The sense of the writer of this epistle would be more complete, if the first sentence of the following verse was added to it thus, They light them candles . . . whereof they cannot see one, for they are as one of the beams of the temple. And thus the Vulgate, from some Greek copies, connects the sense, Lucernas accendunt illis, et quidem multas, ex quibus nullam videre possunt; sunt quidem sicut trabes in domo. And so the Geneva version, They light up candles before them, whereof they cannot see one; for they are but as one of the posts of the temple. And Junius renders in like manner. The intention of the heathens in having lamps or candles burning before their images and altars, seems to have been what Lactantius intimates, the furnishing light for their gods; the folly of which he thus exposes, "Num mentis suæ compos putandus est, qui auctori et datori luminis candelarum ac cerarum lumen affert pro munere?" (Lib. vi. 2.)

Ver. 20. Yet they say, Their hearts are gnawed upon by things creeping out of the earth, and when they eat them and their clothes, they feel it not.] Thus Arnobius, who was himself once a pagan, speaks of idols, setting them upon all occasions in the meanest and most ridiculous light, "Non videtis sub istorum simulacrorum cavis mures habitare? in ore ab aranеis ordiri retia?" (Lib. vi. adv. Gent.) It should seem, say Messieurs of Port-Royal, from the context, as if the priests themselves, who got their livelihood by this false worship, or some of the worshippers at least, made this acknowledgment of the meanness and imperfection of their images. But is such an open declaration from them, much to their great discredit, at all natural or credible? would it not, in the esteem of every sensible and well-meaning votary, be the means to expose and discard them, and at length take from the priests themselves all the gain of their craft? Nor is φασὶν, as others contend, to be understood as spoken by way of hearsay, that it is so reported of them, as Coverdale understands it; little need was there to refer to uncertain tradition or report; every one might be convinced from his own observation of their decay, how contemptible such objects of worship were. Might not this more properly be understood of the idols themselves, betraying their own defects and shame by their frail appearance? i. e. Their idols confess, testify, or make it plain, by the signs of decay and rottenness visible about them, and by their being eaten as a piece of ordinary wood by worms, and not perceiving what is done to them, that they are perishable and senseless. And thus Junius expounds it, "Ipsa idola testantur se facillime a tenuissimis vermibus erodi in partes intimas usque." Or the sense, lastly, may be that of Isaiah, xliv. 9. that the makers themselves are their own witnesses; i. e. they best know the materials of which they are made, and are sufficiently convinced from their wanting often to be repaired and beautified, that they are mouldering vanities.

Ver. 22. Upon their bodies and heads sit bats, swallows, and birds, and the cats also.] Besides the meanness of their original, and the imperfection of their state, if one considers farther the rudeness and insults offered to their divinityships, by vile, despicable, and abject creatures, this also is sufficient to expose men's folly in worshipping them. Minucius Felix is very pleasant upon the occasion: "Quanto verius de Diis vestris animalia muta naturaliter judicant, mures, hirundines, milvi? Non sentire eos sciunt, rodunt, insultant, insident, ac, nisi abigatis, in ipso dei vestri ore nidificant;" (p. 175. edit. Oxon.) i. e. The mice, swallows, and crows, know better than you (pagans) what your gods are; for, by gnawing and sitting upon them, and being ready to make nests in their mouths, if you do not drive them away, they know that they have neither sense nor understanding. Spiders also spin upon their faces, and use their sacred heads for blocks only to hang their webs on.

Ver. 27. If they fall to the ground at any time, they cannot rise up again themselves.] This was the case of Dagon, who fell upon his face to the earth before the ark of the Lord; and though he was once set right again after his fall by his priests, yet fell in the like manner a second time, with the additional misfortune of losing his head and both his hands. (1 Sam. v. 3, 4.) So if Bel at any time is bowed down, and Nebo stoopeth, they cannot restore or make themselves straight again, but must continue in that posture and direction, in which design or accident has placed them. The author of the book of Wisdom has been no less happy than this writer, in exposing the weakness and impotence of idols:—"When the workmen (says he, speaking of this particular defect) had formed it by the skill of his understanding, and fashioned it as he designed, he then looked out for a convenient room for it, set it in a wall, and made it fast with iron; for he provided for it that it might not fall, knowing that it was unable to help itself, as being an image that hath need of help." (Chap. xiii. 15, 16.)

Set gifts before them as unto dead men.] In Scripture, likewise, they are compared to dead things, to nothing, and vanity. The sense here is, that they are served with victuals, which are set before them in form, without their being able to avail themselves of them, to touch or use them, or to receive and feast on the viands and offerings which are made to them. And how, indeed, should they, being inanimate and senseless things? And their votaries themselves must be equally so, to think that they had such a power, or ever could make use of it: and yet we find, by the story of Bel and the Dragon, that the simplicity of the Chaldeans was such, that they thought that idol ate in reality the great store of provisions set before it. By gifts placed before dead men, the writer alludes to the parental or sepulchral entertainments, which were anciently much in vogue in the eastern or other countries, and particularly among some idolaters, whose notion was, that the souls of the departed wandered about their sepulchres, and wanted a proper sustenance; and that it was a pious office to place bread and wine over their graves, for their support and refreshment. (See note on Ecclus. xxx. 18.)

Ver. 28. The things that are sacrificed unto them, their priests sell and abuse.] Instead of exercising acts of hospitality and charity to poor and helpless persons, widows, and orphans, and bestowing upon them the remains of the sacrifices, they make a trade of holy viands, or pervert them to bad and evil uses. It is certain the ancient idolaters were wont to save some part of their sacrifices for magical and superstitious purposes. Herodotus testifies the same concerning the ancient Persians. (Lib. i. cap. 132.) And, therefore, God orders in the paschal sacrifice, that nothing of it should remain until the morning, lest it should be profaned, or any ways corrupted and abused.

Ver. 29. Women in childbed, &c. eat their sacrifices: by these things ye may know that they are no gods.] It appears from their many false rites, and the shameful abuse of their sacrifices, that they are no true gods; for if they were, neither would their priests dare to take such liberties in holy things, nor unclean and impure persons be permitted to approach them, or partake of them, which they might not do of a true sacrifice, nor in the service of the true God; for, according to the Levitical law, such persons were not to enter into the sanctuary, nor touch any hallowed things, but to continue in a state of separation for a certain time, as being defiled by their infirmity. (Lev. xii. 4.)

Ver. 30. For how can they be called gods? because women set meat before the gods of silver.] The sense is more determinate and clear in the Geneva version, From whence cometh it then that they are called gods? because the women bring gifts to them; i. e. their silly and superstitious votaries, through their ignorance, pay the like honours and regard to their idols, as if they were really gods.

Ver. 31. The priests sit in their temples, having their clothes rent, and their heads and their beards shaven, and nothing upon their heads.] Several of the heathen priests, particularly those of Isis and Serapis, had their heads shaven and uncovered, in the manner here described. It was a standing ordinance at Memphis:—"Ut Isidis sacerdotes semper deraso sint capite, utque tertia quaque die corpus eradant." (See Alex. ab Alex. lib. vi. Juven. Sat. vi.) It is observable, that the rites here mentioned were funeral ceremonies, and therefore the most proper to be used in the worship of the heathen deities, who were no better than dead men. In the service of the true God, the Jewish priests were forbid to rend their clothes, and shave their heads, thereby to distinguish them, as we may suppose with great probability, from the heathen priests. (See Lev. xxi. 5—10.) Calmet thinks the writer here refers to the lamentations for Adonis, customary not only in Egypt, Palestine, Phœnicia, and Syria, but also in Babylonia, and the provinces beyond the Euphrates.

Ver. 32. They roar and cry before their gods, as men do at the feast when one is dead.] This refers to a rite or custom among the Jews at their funerals, by the LXX. called περίδειπνον νεκροῦ, or the funeral-feast. For the Jews had feasts or banquets upon account or in honour of the dead, and for the refreshment of the melancholy relations and friends present at the burial. Thus we read of the meat of mourners, Hos. ix. 4. and of the cup of consolation to comfort them for the loss of the deceased, Jer. xvi. 7. And this probably the son of Sirach means, where he mentions θέματα βρωμάτων παρακείμενα ἐπὶ τάφῳ, i. e. Messes of meat set on the sepulchre. (Ecclus. xxx. Tobit iv. 17. see notes on those places.) This custom, as we are informed by one of the Jewish writers, was the impoverishing of many, and that almost unavoidably; for if any one omitted the funeral-feast, he was reflected upon for want of piety. On this account, and some abuses attending these sepulchral entertainments, this custom was at length abolished. By their lamentations and cries before their gods, Calmet thinks those for Adonis most probably are meant.

Ver. 40. When even the Chaldeans themselves dishonour them.] i. e. They inwardly laugh at them, persuaded of their weakness and inability to do any thing. If their priests presented any sick person before the idol, it was rather to comply with the prevailing superstition, than from any hope that the cure would be effected. They were conscious of the cheat, though for gainful reasons they continued the practice. "Haruspex ridet cum haruspicem videret," was Tully's sneer upon such impostors as these. St. Austin argues very strongly against the continuance of such superstitions, from the plain confession of the worshippers themselves of these pagan deities. Junius, who joins this sentence to the following verse, makes the sense to be, That the Chaldeans themselves sufficiently expose the weakness and impotence of such gods, when, despairing of help from their Dii minorum gentium, or inferior sort of gods, they carry the patient to their great god Bel, but to as little purpose.

Ver. 41. If they see one dumb that cannot speak, they bring him, and entreat Bel that he may speak, as though he were able to understand.] Bel was the principal idol of the Babylonians; (Isa. xlvi. 1.) the same with Baal, as Selden conjectures. (Syntag. 1. cap. 2.) How unable Baal was to hear, understand, or answer, the petitions of his worshippers, we learn from that signal instance, 1 Kings xviii. 26. where, though his prophets called on the name of Baal from morning until noon, saying, O Baal, hear us;

yet was there no voice, nor any that regarded. Strange that any should be so senseless, as the author of the book of Wisdom well argues, xiii. 18. as for power to call on that which is weak, and for aid humbly beseech that which hath least means to help, and for speech apply to dumb idols; emphatically, and by way of infamy, so called, as neither having any faculties themselves, nor able to confer the gift of speech upon others.

Ver. 42. Yet they cannot understand this themselves, and leave them, for they have no knowledge.] Καὶ οὐ δύνανται αὐτοὶ νοήσαντες καταλιπεῖν αὐτά. Or, as the Alexandrian MS. has it, τοῦτο νοήσαντες, which would be better rendered, They cannot, though they observe the inability of their idols to administer any help, persuade themselves to leave and forsake them; for they are foolish and infatuated themselves. And thus the Geneva version more clearly, Yet they that understand these things, cannot leave them, for they also have no sense.

Ver. 43. The women also with cords about them.] This refers to the tents or tabernacles of Venus, in which virgins were solemnly prostituted to the honour of that false goddess, under the title of Mylitta, and Venus πάνδημος, or the popular goddess of sensual pleasures. These tents were called Succoth-benoth, i.e. tabernacles of daughters, or the pavilions of girls, on account of their residence. According to Selden, it means the chapels of Venus Mylitta. The men of Babylon, (2 Kings xvii. 33.) are said to make Succoth-benoth, wherein their daughters were prostituted to such as came to worship Venus, as the manner was in Babylon, from whence this filthiness had its original. (See Selden, de Diis Syris, Syntag. 3. cap. 7.) And to this scandalous custom, he thinks Lev. xix. 29. particularly to refer. Every woman, it seems, throughout all the country, was bound once in her life to repair to the temple of Venus, and there to prostitute herself to any that would throw down a piece of money, be it less or more, which money was applied to the temple, and to the honour of the goddess. Herodotus gives the following account of this infamous custom, ὧδε δὴ αἴσχιστος τῶν νόμων ἐστὶ τοῖσι Βαβυλωνίοισι, κ. τ. λ. erat Babyloniorum lex, ut omnes fœminæ semel in vita sederent apud templum Veneris, præstolantes adventum peregrinorum, qui cum eis congrederentur; primum adventantem, qui se offerebat, non debebant recusare, nec eam quam offerebat mercedem, quamvis non ita magnam, quæ in sacrum usum reponebatur. Advena dicebat, ἐπικαλέω τὴν θεὰν Μύλιτταν; tanti tibi deam Mylittam imploro. Et quæcunque fœmina sedere inceperat, non debuit abire, donec vitiata fuerat. Unde formosæ cito dimissæ, sed deformes unum aut plures annos exspectabant; i. e. every Babylonian woman was once in her lifetime bound to prostitute herself to a stranger at the temple of Venus. They were crowned with knots and garlands, and ranged in long ranks before the temple, each rank being parted from the other by a line, that the men might conveniently pass between them, and choose those they liked best. They declared their choice by throwing money into the lap of the woman they most admired, and saying, as they threw it, I implore the goddess Mylitta for thee. The money, how little soever, was by no means to be refused, being accounted sacred. Nor had the woman the power of rejecting any man that accosted her in the form prescribed, but she was absolutely to retire without delay. Having thus fulfilled the law, and performed some ceremonies in honour of the goddess, she returned home; and nothing could tempt her to grant the same favour again to her new lover. Women of rank (for none were dispensed with) might be conveyed to the appointed place in a covered vehicle, and keep in it, while their servants waited their return at some distance. (Herod. in Clio, lib. i. cap. 199.) From this passage it appears into what infamous usage and indecency religion had degenerated: when the most dissolute pleasures were turned into so many acts of devotion, and it was counted a dishonour not to be defiled. By σχοινία, here rendered cords, some understand fine twine, of which their knots and garlands were composed; and possibly this may be the meaning of the Syriac, which has funibus ornatæ. Others suppose them to be rushes, which are easily broken. Selden understands cords, properly so called, to distinguish and guard the passages leading to the women, and to keep them separate.

The women sitting in the ways.] i. e. In the public ways leading to the temple of Venus. This description, and particularity of the place, is very natural and well suited to the followers and retainers of Venus, whose known custom it is to frequent the most public places, to entice and allure passengers. (See Prov. ix. 14, 15.) Thus Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 14. is represented as sitting in an open place, or a place where roads crossed, which is by the way of Timnath, πρὸς ταῖς πύλαις Αἰνὰν, at the gates of Ænan, according to the LXX. Such a place as this was most likely to meet passengers in, and therefore most proper for Tamar's design. Of those who followed the trade in a public way, such whom Plautus calls Scænicolæ, seem most to resemble the Babylonish ones here mentioned. One cannot help observing a sort of gradual decay of decency in women of this profligate character; at first they had their haunts without the city, and followed the trade as it were in disguise, hiding their faces with a mask; afterward they dropped this, and appeared barefaced, but nevertheless, the laws not allowing them to come within the walls, they yet kept their distance: but the state of things every day growing worse and worse, they had the impudence at last to settle and carry on the business of lewdness publicly in cities. But though in all times and places such vile prostitutes have been too much followed and caressed, yet never was any age so degenerate, or people so abandoned, except the Babylonians, as to account them sacred.

Burn bran for perfume.] Badwell takes it in the sense of our version, and the oriental ones translate accordingly. The Syriac in particular has, imponentes pro thymiamite furfures. A poor incense this! but good enough for such a deity, and so scandalous rites. Grotius understands the Greek, θυμιῶσαι τὰ πίτυρα, in an impure sense, from the Hebrew פטרה Petarah, apertura, which the Greeks express by τὰ αἰδοῖα, and thinks it answers to suffire naturam, in Pliny; which seems to be confirmed from Strabo, who, speaking of the Babylonians, says, ὁσάκις δ' ἂν μισθῶσιν ἀλλήλοις ἐπιθυμιάσαντες. (Lib. xvi. Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. vol. i.) Selden renders πίτυρα by οὐλόχυτα, moles, or cakes and libations, called also θυλήματα; and in this sense we meet with θύειν τὰ πίτυρα, in Theocritus, as an expedient to procure love. And to this very custom the prophet Jeremiah is by him thought to allude, vii. 18. where it is said, that the women knead their dough to make cakes for the queen of heaven, another name for the Babylonian Venus, who was also called Venus Urania. (Syntag. 2. cap. 7.) The same learned writer observes of ἐφελκυθεῖσα, in the next sentence, which our translators render drawn, that it means a seeming unwillingness in these votaries of Venus, and a reluctance to comply, Funiculum forsan, usquedum ab amasio fuerit disruptus, veluti retinaculum pudicitiæ muliebri simulatione retinentes. (Ibid.) An artifice only, as he observes, to make the persons that solicit their favour the more eager and enamoured.

Ver. 44. Whatsoever is done amongst them is false.] i. e. Whatsoever is done to or about them is vain, and the labour to no purpose: or whatsoever is said or pretended to be done by them is false. The Alexandrian MS. has γινόμενα παρ' αὐτοῖς.

Ver. 45. They are made of carpenters and goldsmiths, they can be nothing else than the workman will have them to be.] i. e. They are such as were carved out of a refuse piece of wood, (Isa. xliv. 13—15. Wisd. xiii. 13.) which the workmen could have formed into any shape he pleased, to be a thing either of honour or dishonour: or else they came out of the smith's furnace, and were fashioned by the anvil and hammer, as Arnobius expresses it, lib. i. Who in another place, speaking of himself when under a state of paganism, says, "Beneficia poscebam nihil sentiente de ligno:" (lib. vi.) and after, "At quæ dementia Deum credere quem tute ipse formaris, supplicare tremebundum fabricatæ abs te rei?" i. e. What an instance of madness is it to think that a piece of timber hath any more divinity in it than it had before, because it is fashioned and carved into the figure of a man? The prophet Isaiah, with a peculiar smartness of argument, exposes image-worship, from the absurdity, that a man should dress his meat and make his god out of the same stick of wood, and fall down to the sorry stock of a tree and say, Deliver me, for thou art my god. (Isa. xliv.)

Ver. 46, 47. And they themselves that made them can never continue long: how then should the things that are made of them be gods? for they left lies and reproaches to them that come after.] As the effect cannot be more perfect than the cause, so impotent and frail man cannot invent or make any thing or being immortal and divine. The makers of these idols, being mortal themselves, shall leave behind them indeed a proof of their ingenuity; but such as is disgraceful, and exercised upon wrong objects. For the idols made by them are lies and vanities, as the Scripture terms them, and are such despicable and reproachful things in themselves, as posterity, more wise and sagacious, will have in abhorrence. Or the sense may be, like that, Isa. xliv. 11. that the time will come when all the makers of images, and such as have been most devoted to their worship, shall be ashamed and confounded at their own folly, to think that the frail work of man's hands could have any divinity in it, or any principle of long continuance.

Ver. 49. How then cannot men perceive, that they be no gods, which can neither save themselves from war nor from plagues?] As material and perishable things, they are liable themselves to accidents and casualties, called here plagues. And if they cannot help themselves in time of public calamity and distress, much less can they be expected to succour and assist others. And how indeed should they watch over either their own or others' safety, being endued neither with power, life, nor understanding; and are indeed nothing but what they appear to be, senseless wood or stone? One reason which some expositors assign for Rachael's stealing her father's teraphim, Gen. xxxi. 19. was, to let him see that his gods, as he called them, could not preserve themselves, much less do any service to him. (See ver. 57.) The king of Assyria, with equal truth and smartness, reflects upon the impotence of such deities: Have any of the gods of the nations delivered their land out of my hand? Where are the gods of Hamath and Arphad? Where are the gods of Sepharvaim? (Isa. xxxvi. 18, 19.) The like may be observed, from profane history, of Æneas's penates, which were so far from assisting him, that, if he had not taken them along with him, they could not have set one foot forward, nor have been saved themselves at the burning of Troy if his great piety had not secured them. (See ver. 55.)

Ver. 51. There is no work of God in them.] Οὐδὲν θεοῦ ἔργον ἐν αὐτοῖς ἐστιν, i. e. There is no Divine power in them, or they cannot work or effect any thing like a god.

Ver. 53. Nor give rain unto men.] The descriptive character of the living God is, He that giveth rain, both the former and the latter in his season, that reserveth unto us the appointed weeks of harvest. (Jer. v. 24.) The vicissitude of seasons, of cold and heat, of drought and moisture, so wisely fitted for the growth of the fruits of the earth, and other uses of human life, is both the effect and proof of a God and a Providence. "Videmus (says St. Cyprian) Dei nutu tempora obsequi, elementa famulari, spirare ventos, fontes fluere, grandescere copias messium, fructus mitescere vinearum, exuberare pomis arbusta." And therefore Maximus Tyrius expressly, and with great propriety, calls God τῶν ὡρίων ταμίαν, τῶν κάρπων τροφέα, τὸν γενέθλιον, τὸν ὑέτιον, τὸν ἐπικάρπιον. But false gods, or idols, have no power over the elements, nor at the request of any votary can they make any alteration in them, as the true God did, through the intercession of Elias. (James v. 17.) They can neither shew signs (ver. 67.) in the heavens above, nor produce any alteration on the earth beneath; but are themselves subject to, and often suffer by, the great inclemency of weather; they are sometimes struck down by a thunderbolt, or melted by the power of lightning.

Ver. 54. Neither can they judge their own cause, nor redress a wrong; being unable, for they are as crows between heaven and earth.] Our translators follow a copy which had ἑαυτῶν. The Alexandrian and others have αὐτῶν· i. e. They cannot interpose to right themselves by any miracle, nor to execute justice in their own behalf, as the true God did in the matter of Korah and his faction: see ver. 64. which respects the other reading. Nor can they relieve any city or country from distress, Neque regiones liberabunt ab injuria (Vulgate), as the God of Israel did Jerusalem from the power of Sennacherib. They as little know, and are as little able to alter things upon earth, as the meanest bird that flies. Possibly this writer might instance in the crow, as being a bird of omen, according to the superstitious notion of the ancients.

Ver. 56. They cannot withstand any king or enemies: how then can it be thought or said that they be gods?] The prophet Isaiah (xlvi. 1.) takes occasion to insult over the Babylonish idols, who could neither preserve themselves nor their worshippers, but were carried about by their enemies in triumph, by way of contempt and derision. And when he says, Bel boweth down, and Nebo stoopeth, he means to express, that the images of these deities were carried in triumph by the Persians, as part of the spoil; so that the very deities themselves, which were worshipped in the idols, must own that they were conquered likewise. We read, 2 Chron. xxv. 5. that the anger of the Lord was kindled against king Amaziah, for seeking after the gods of the people, which could not deliver their own people out of his hand. And indeed it was a great instance of folly likewise in that prince, after he had subdued and slain the Edomites, to set up their gods, which he ought rather to have burnt in the fire, than bow down to them, and burn incense before them, whose impotency he had proved and detected. Ahaz was more justifiable in this respect, who sacrificed to the gods of those people, who had overcome him, hoping they might be induced to assist him also. (2 Chron. xxviii. 23.)

Ver. 60. For sun, moon, and stars, being bright, and sent to do their offices, are obedient.] Ἀποστελλόμενα ἐπὶ χρείας. The Geneva version here seems preferable, when they are sent for necessary uses, obey. These great bodies follow the appointment of their Creator: if any creature really deserved worship, it should seem that these were most worthy of it. Their beauty and splendour attract our admiration, and the advantages we receive from them claim our acknowledgment: but all their glory and power they derive from the Father of lights. The gods of the nations neither equal these in beauty, nor are alike beneficial by their influence: we ought therefore to confine all our worship and homage to the living God only, and to give no sort of adoration to false gods of any kind.

Ver. 61. In like manner the lightning, when it breaketh forth, is easy to be seen, and after the same manner the wind bloweth in every country.] Ἀστραπὴ, ὅταν ἐπιφανῇ, εὐοπτός ἐστι. Grotius conjectures the true reading to be εὐπειθής ἐστι, is obedient, which indeed is more agreeable to the context, and the reflection, as it now stands, seems but of little weight and consequence. The meaning of the latter clause, which is obscurely expressed, is, that under all climates the wind and storm fulfil his word. (Psal. cxlviii. 8.) And in this sense we may expound Psal. civ. 4. He maketh his angels spirits; i. e. he maketh the winds occasionally his ministers to execute his pleasure; and thus the rabbins understand רוחות ruchoth in that place. (See De Muis, in loc.)

Ver. 70. For as a scarecrow in a garden of cucumbers keepeth nothing, so are their gods.] The birds for a little while are afraid of a scarecrow, προβασκάνιον (a very unusual word; Junius understands it of the statue of Priapus, which is probable enough, as Suicer renders it, pudenda statua), but when once they begin to be accustomed to the sight of it, they give themselves no more pain or concern about it: when one comes near to inspect and examine it, it is found to be a mere nothing, or something occasionally placed in terrorem, and not a real man. The case is the same with idols; it is only the folly and mistake of those who adore them, which gives them their authority, they only impose upon the weak and superstitious, the more knowing and inquisitive soon find out the cheat.

Ver. 72. You shall know them to be no gods, by the bright purple that rotteth upon them.] Ἀπὸ τῆς πορφύρας, καὶ τῆς μαρμάρου. Not the marble itself, which is more durable, but the shining varnish, or polish, like marble. Grotius reads, μαργάρου, i. e. that the lustre of the jewels decays upon them. It is observable that this writer is very explicit, and descends to a detail of the vestments, ornaments, and decorations, of these idols, whom their priests set off and adorned with all possible care, to make them look more rich and glorious. And the reason of his being so particular seems to be, that he might set their delectable things, as the prophet calls them, (Isa. xliv. 9.) in a true light, and expose their unprofitableness and decay to a carnal and gross people, too apt to be affected with pomp and pageantry; and whose senses were likely to pervert their understanding, so as not to discern the cheat and falsity of such a worship.

And they themselves shall afterward be eaten.] This may either refer to idols, worm-eaten through time, or to such living animals as, though they were the objects of the pagan worship, were eaten by others. The Christian fathers and apologists continually expose the heathens for worshipping such deities, as might be sacrificed and eaten, and declare against the practice, as infinitely absurd and ridiculous. Minucius Felix is very pleasant on the occasion, particularly with respect to the ox Apis. Athanasius mentions it as a strong instance of the folly of the heathen worship, that those fishes and calves which the Egyptians worshipped were made the food of others. (Cont. Gent.) And the reasons why Moses beat the golden calf to powder, and made the Jews to drink of it, was, according to St. Jerome, Ut discant contemnere, quod in secessum projici viderant; i. e. that the people might learn to despise what they saw went down into the stomach, and out into the draught. But as the scope of this epistle seems directed to expose idols as mere dead things, the former sense seems preferable.

HISTORY OF SUSANNA.

Ver. 1. IN many editions this and the two other supplemental parts are inscribed Δανιὴλ, and in some διακρίσεις Δανιήλ. In the preface to this story it is said to be set apart from the beginning of Daniel, where it stands in the Roman editions; others, as the Complut. and some Latin ones, make it to be the thirteenth chapter of that book. But if what is here related belongs to the prophet Daniel, it should seem that what is therein contained happened before some other remarkable particulars which are mentioned in his book; especially, if what Ignatius and Sulpitius Severus observe be well-grounded; viz. that the prophet Daniel was not above twelve years of age when this story happened. It has been concluded also from his established character, that it preceded Nebuchadnezzar's dream and its interpretation, because it is then said of Daniel, that he was looked upon as more wise and able than all the magicians, astrologers, and wise men, of the Chaldeans, which great repute he could not, it is thought, have obtained, but by some such wonderful action or determination as this which is here related. But Origen disclaims this history as belonging at all to the book of Daniel, and calls it κίβδηλον τοῦ βιβλίου μέρος, a spurious part of it. (Epist. ad Jul. Afric. see also Grabe, de Vitiis LXX. Interp.)

Ver. 2. A very fair woman, and one that feared the Lord.] This is a great commendation of Susanna, that she was as virtuous and religious, as she was fair and beautiful; qualities both very amiable, but yet do not always go together, as beauty often inclines the owners of it to vanity, exposes them to dangers, and is an inlet to temptations. To excel therefore in both respects was much to the honour of Susanna, as what follows about the great care taken by her parents of her education is to their credit, and probably her being so virtuously disposed was the effect of it.

Ver. 4. Joacim was a great rich man.] Africanus objects, that it is not credible that Joacim, the husband of Susanna, was so rich and powerful in the captivity, as he is here said to be. To this Origen replies, that the Jews that were carried away captives into Babylon, were not so plundered but that many among them were both rich and powerful. (See Tob. i. 13, 14. 22.) To his house the Jews seem to have resorted for advice, or as to a seat of justice. (See ver. 6, 7. 28.)

Ver. 5. The same year were appointed two of the ancients of the people to be judges.] The term ancients has not respect purely to their age, nor proves necessarily that they were far advanced in it: the sensual and impure love which inflamed them for Susanna, makes it more probable that they were in the vigour of their age. The government by ancients or elders was the regimen of most cities. We meet with them in several authors, and from them public sessions or meetings are styled senatus, and γερουσίαι; sometimes these elders are called, πρεσβύτεροι in general, sometimes πρεσβύτεροι λαοῦ; these some think to be the judges here mentioned. Josephus says, that Moses appointed that every city should have a council of seven magistrates, men of exemplary virtue, and lovers of righteousness: (Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8. Seld. de Synedr. lib. ii. cap. 6.) and this perhaps was the determinate number in his time, but anciently there seems to have been more; for Boaz mentions ten elders, who were probably the same with judges, in the city of Beth-lehem, Ruth iv. 2. (See note on Judith vi. 21.) But in this history two only are mentioned, and those as annually chosen; a method and constitution, says Grotius, which obtained not among the Jews. He thinks them rather assessors to the ἀρχιμαλωταρκῆς, the chief or president among the captives. Their business was to be assisting by their advice and opinion, and to give counsel or determination in such cases as were brought before them, chiefly in suits of law, (ver. 6.) or forensic matters. It is probable the Jews retained a sort of judicial power, even in their captivity, and that they executed some of the penal laws of Moses in smaller instances. Thus Haman tells Ahasuerus, Esth. iii. 8. that the Jews observed their own laws. This history of the accusation and trial of Susanna is a proof, says Calmet, that the Jews had their judges and methods of administering justice during the captivity; but that they had not the power of life and death, seems most probable. (See note on ver. 62.)

Ancient judges, who seemed to govern the people.] Οἱ ἐδόκουν κυβερνᾶν. The Vulgate and Junius translate according to our version, with which that of Geneva and also Coverdale's agree. St. Jerome observes, that it is not without good reason that the text here says, that these elders seemed only to rule, for they who judge or govern with partiality and injustice, have only the honourable name of judges, and are rulers in appearance only, rather than true and valuable magistrates; Qui injuste præsunt populo, tantum nomen habent judicum; regere videntur populum, magis quam regant. There may also a second and more literal sense be given from the then state and condition of the Jews; for being in captivity, and under the dominion and tyranny of the Chaldeans, they had rather a shadow of government among them than any real power and jurisdiction. But there is no necessity of understanding these words of seeming power, or the abuse of it, as δοκεῖ and videtur are often used as mere expletives. See Mark x. 42. where οἱ δοκοῦντες ἄρχειν, an expression very much resembling this, is rendered by St. Matthew, xx. 25. οἱ ἄρχοντες, the rulers. And Luke xxii. 24. τίς αὐτῶν δοκεῖ εἶναι μείζων, i. e. which of them should seem to be the greatest, as Geneva and Coverdale have it, means only, which of them should be so. And thus δοκῶ πνεῦμα Θεοῦ ἔχειν, 1 Cor. vii. 40. would be more properly and consistently, I conceive, rendered, I have the Spirit of God. There are other instances of this usage in this epistle: see xi. 16. xiv. 37.

Ver. 9. And they perverted their own mind, and turned away their eyes, that they might not look unto Heaven, nor remember just judgments.] i. e. That they might not look unto nor reflect upon the God of heaven, nor remember his just judgments against such notorious sinners. Heaven, by a metonymy, means the Father of it. (See ver. 35. and Luke xv. 18.) The author of the book of Wisdom has the like observation, and makes the reason of men's going astray to be, Because their own wickedness hath blinded them, (ii. 21.) The judicious Hooker has the following pertinent reflection upon the passage before us; "How should the brightness of wisdom shine where the windows of the soul are of very set purpose closed? True religion hath many things in it, the only mention whereof galleth and fretteth wicked minds. Being therefore loath that inquiry into such matters should breed a persuasion in the end, contrary unto that which they embrace, it is their endeavour, as much as in them lieth, to banish quite and clean from their cogitation, whatsoever leadeth or pointeth that way. The fountain and well-spring of which impiety is a resolved purpose of mind, to reap in this world what sensual profit or pleasure soever the world yieldeth, and not to be barred from any whatsoever means available thereto. And this is the very radical cause of their atheism." (Eccl. Pol. b. v. p. 191.)

Ver. 14. When they were gone out, they parted the one from the other, and turning back again, they came to the same place, and after that they had asked one another the cause, they acknowledged their lust: then appointed they a time both together when they might find her alone.] The description here is very natural of the artifice used on the occasion; they pretend to go home as it were to dinner, and take a formal leave of each other, with hearts equally bent on mischief, and meditating the same wicked design. But hypocrisy and dissimulation were the least blemishes in their character. Lust, ever impatient to perpetrate its schemes, and satisfy its raging passion, hurries them both back to the same haunt, and conscious guilt urging to a confession, unites them in a shameful confederacy against virtue, of which by their station they ought to have been the guardians and protectors.

Ver. 15. She was desirous to wash herself in the garden.] St. Chrysostom takes occasion, from her great circumspection and care to guard all the avenues of her heart, to compare her to a garden enclosed, to a spring shut, to a fountain sealed up. (Cant. iv. 12.) Ἦν ἀληθῶς κῆπος κεκλεισμένος, κ. τ. λ. Quasi hortus erat beatus, quem nemo poterat deprædari, pudicitiæ suaves effundens odores: quasi fons erat fide signatus, ex quo nemo petulans pudicitiæ pulchritudinem poterat haurire. (Serm. de Susanna, tom. vi. p. 141.)

Ver. 19. Now when the two maids were gone forth, the two elders rose up.] St. Chrysostom observes, that these elders were like two wolves or lions, that had seized upon a tender lamb, ἦν μόνη Σουσάννα ἀνὰ μέσον τῶν δύο λεόντων, κ. τ. λ. "Susanna (says he) was alone in the midst of two hungry lions; none were near to assist or succour her, neither maid, companion, neighbour, friend, nor relation, only God was inspector and witness, who indeed could have hindered the wicked attempt, but permitted this trial that he might publish Susanna's virtue, and the others' incontinence; and, at the same time, by her exemplary conduct, give a pattern to the sex of the like resolution and constancy, in case of temptation." (Ibid.)

Ver. 20. We are in love with thee.] The tempter was not wanting to suggest reasons to them, such as they were, to encourage their boldness. They urge their suit from the opportunity of privacy, and the secret passion which they conceived for her; they would persuade her it was love occasioned their fondness, as if a name so tender belonged to their brutal design. Such carnal and sensual love differs as much from the real and virtuous passion so called, as good money from counterfeit coin, or truth from falsehood. Ἐν ἐπιθυμίᾳ σοῦ ἐσμεν, which the Vulgate literally renders, in concupiscentia tui sumus, is a particular idiom, it resembles that of St. Paul, ἐν σαρκὶ εἶναι, Rom. viii. 9. and that mode of speech among the Latins, In voluptatibus esse, in vitiis esse, which we meet with in Seneca, Epist. 59.

Ver. 21. If thou wilt not, we will bear witness against thee.] St. Chrysostom finely harangues upon these words, Κατέχουσι τὴν Σουσάνναν οἱ παράνομοι, κ. τ. λ. i. e. The ruffians seize upon Susanna, and first they attack her by discourse, and endeavour to intimidate her by threats, hoping to prevail that way. "We are the rulers of the people, the guardians of the laws, have the power of binding and loosing, of acquitting or condemning; you are in our hands, may comply safely, there is none present to make any discovery; come, consent to lie with us." On which he breaks out into the following exclamation, "Hei mihi, quos pastores arbitrabar, lupos video; quos arbitrabar eorum, qui tempestate jactantur, esse portus, hi naufragium excitarunt." And then he introduces Susanna thus nobly replying to these wicked tempters: "Ye shall not ruin my honour, nor violate my chastity; I will not consent to disgrace my parents, nor bring a reflection on my family: I will not injure or grieve my husband, nor forfeit my conjugal faith to him, by an unlawful and sinful compliance; a violent and unjust death is more eligible than to consent to your impure solicitations. My husband is always present, if not in person, yet in my thoughts and affections; nor can I so soon or easily forget my parents' valuable instructions, whose image and example are always before my eyes." (Ibid.)

Ver. 22. I am straitened on every side.] And well might she say so; for either way she was exposed to death. If she prostituted herself to their wicked desires, it was death by their laws; and if she refused to consent to their solicitations, she exposed herself thereby to the same peril of death, by an accusation which the authority of the witnesses would make weighty and convincing, though in itself false. Her resolution therefore to withstand the temptation was noble, and as such is commended by all antiquity. St. Ambrose particularly thus honourably speaks of her: "Sancta Susanna, denuntiato falsi testimonii terrore, cum hinc se videret urgeri periculo, inde opprobrio, maluit honesta morte vitare opprobrium, quam studio salutis turpem vitam subire. Itaque dum honestati intendit, etiam vitam reservavit: quæ si id quod sibi videbatur ad vitam utile præoptavisset, non tantam reportasset gloriam. Immo etiam pœnam criminis forsitan non evasisset. Advertimus itaque quod id quod turpe est, non potest esse utile, neque rursus id quod honestum est, inutile." (De Officiis, cap. 14. lib. iii.)

Ver. 23. It is better for me to fall into your hands, and not to do it, than to sin in the sight of the Lord.] Αἱρετόν μοι ἐστίν. Almost all the versions use the comparative degree, except the Greek, which has αἱρετόν ἐστι, i. e. it is good and eligible to fall into your hands, and not to commit the sin, and thereby displease God. A comparison, says St. Jerome, cannot be here properly formed; for to say continency is better, is allowing some sort of goodness to the sin itself. The Greek, therefore, says he, may be supposed not to use it, "Ne videretur comparatione peccati, quod erat bonum, hoc appellare melius." (Hieron. in loc.) But this remark seems rather nice than just; for, besides that there are many instances in approved authors, where the positive is used for the comparative, the comparison is not here instituted of the morality of the actions, but of the danger attending them; or, in other words, that it is better to suffer a temporal than an eternal punishment. Many of the fathers, as St. Ambrose, Jerome, Chrysostom, Bernard, Austin, have wrote set panegyrics upon Susanna's wise conduct and determination. The last of these draws a long parallel between her and the famed Lucretia, the heroine of Roman story; the boasted pattern of chastity for all ages:—"What is Lucretia when compared to Susanna? She murders herself, though she knew herself innocent: the action so much celebrated, was rather rashness than fortitude, the effect not of any superior love of chastity, but of weakness, or false modesty. She was too delicate, it seems, to bear the thought of a shameful action committed even against her consent and concurrence, without revenging it rashly upon herself. Seipsam etiam non adultera occidit; non est pudicitiæ caritas, sed pudoris infirmitas. Or some tincture of pride was lurking under it. She was afraid lest any should think her guilty of the crime, if she did not resent it thus unnaturally. She could not content herself with the approbation and testimony of her own conscience, unless she shewed her detestation of the fact by killing herself, to avoid the very suspicion of it. She ought rather to have hindered the base action of Tarquin at the expense of her own life, than throw it away afterward out of mere vexation. Herein Susanna exceeded her, that she was so far from consenting to the brutal attempt of the elders, that she chose rather to expose herself to the manifest danger of death, than comply with their vile solicitations.—Lucretia killed herself, innocent as she was, lest she should appear guilty; and it is this very consideration of her innocence that aggravates her fault. Why should she kill herself if she was no ways culpable? and if she was culpable any ways by consenting, she must then certainly be thought to have killed herself, merely to have it supposed that she was innocent. Si adultera, cur laudata; si pudica, cur occisa? Susanna was no less sensible of the rudeness offered, but she did not think it her duty to punish upon herself another's crime, and to add to the sin of others, that of wilful murder of herself; Nec in se ulta est crimen aliorum, ne aliorum sceleribus adderet sua. (August. lib. i. de Civit. Dei, cap. 18.)

Ver. 24. With that Susanna cried with a loud voice, and the two elders cried out against her.] One hears, says St. Bernard, two cries very different, and for very different reasons. Susanna cries like an innocent lamb, in danger of being devoured, and the two elders roar like ravenous wolves for their prey, or because they were disappointed of it. St. Chrysostom has the very same comparison, "Clamor ut luporum gravium, et balantis oviculæ inter eos." She cries to fetch in help, and to attest her innocence; they to drown her shrieks, and to cover their own crime by turning accusers, for they now quitted their office as judges, by appearing as witnesses and informers.

Ver. 32. These wicked men commanded to uncover her face, for she was covered.] The way of covering the head was used chiefly on three occasions:—1. In cases of grief and mourning. (2 Sam. xix.) 2. As an expression of reservedness and modesty, as in the instance of Rebecca, Gen. xxiv. 65. and this of Susanna. 3. As a testimony or token of the greatest respect and reverence, or when an inferior was unable to bear the sight and splendour of another's majesty and greatness. Thus Elijah, (1 Kings xix. 13.) when he heard the voice of God upon Mount Horeb, wrapped his face in his mantle. Covering the face with a veil was the universal practice of almost all nations. The Romans in particular were so strict and punctual in the use of it, that when C. Sulpicius Gallus knew his wife had appeared abroad without it, he divorced her only on that account. And from this covering, as the critics observe, the Latin word nubere, which at first signified no more than to cover with a veil, came to express marriage. Calmet thinks, that these judges ordered her to be uncovered under the pretext that it was an instance of disrespect to their office and quality, to continue veiled in their presence, especially when cited before them as a criminal: or, perhaps, pretending that her guilt would discover itself in her countenance, though doubtless the true reason was that given in the text, that they might feed their eyes with her beauty.

Ver. 34. And laid their hands upon her head.] A form used among the Jews, when one accused another of a capital crime: (see Lev. xxiv. 14.) by which ceremony these elders signified that they now appeared as witnesses, and had given the true testimony against her, and thought her worthy of death; and it was customary, according to the Jewish writers, to say, Let thy blood be upon thine own head, which by thy guilt thou hast brought on thyself. And to this alludes probably that other ceremony among them, of laying the hands upon the head of the victim intended for the sacrifice. (Lev. i. 4. iv. 4. 24. xvi. 21.)

Ver. 45. Therefore when she was led to be put to death, the Lord raised up the holy spirit of a young youth, whose name was Daniel.] It hath been objected against this history, that what is here related could not happen when Daniel was a youth, much less when he was παιδάριον νεώτερον, as the Greek expresses it; for it appears from ver. 65. or the last verse of this story, according to some ancient versions, that Astyages was at this time dead, and Cyrus reigned in his stead. Now Daniel, say some objectors, was then well advanced in years. To this it is answered, that this history happened a long time before, and that the verse referred to about Astyages does not at all concern this narration, but that of Bel and the Dragon, which immediately follows; and accordingly in many editions, both Greek and Latin, it is made the very beginning of it. (See Du Pin's Prel. Disc. p. 24.) As to Daniel's age, several writers expressly say, that he was only twelve years old at this time. (See Sulpit. Sever. Sac. Hist. lib. ii. cap. 2. Theodoret. in cap. i. Ezek. Ignat. Ep. ad Magnes.) It seems as if God, by the mouth as it were of an infant, meant to confound the malice and cunning of these elders, and to detect their hypocrisy and iniquity. "One sees in this story (says St. Chrysostom) how far it pleases God to permit the malice and wickedness of men to proceed, and how far he seems to abandon his servants: he permits Susanna to be condemned to death, and even to be led forth to public punishment, to prove her faith and constancy unto the end; in like manner as he tried the faith of Abraham, by letting Isaac come to the very spot where he was to be offered as a sacrifice, and not interposing till his father had bound him, actually had taken the knife, and stretched out his hand to kill him. But as he sent his angel in the very instant to hinder him from laying his hands upon, or doing any harm to, his son, and to assure him that he was pleased with this signal instance of his obedience, so, to prevent the evil intended against Susanna, the Lord raised up the holy spirit of young Daniel, to undeceive the people, and make them open their eyes." (Serm. de Susan. tom. vi.) "It should seem (says St. Jerome, from the text), that the spirit did not then first enter into Daniel, but that it was already in him, only quiescent on account of his tender age: but an occasion now offering to rescue thereby oppressed innocence, it appeared, and acted with power and clearness in favour of justice; God exemplifying in this instance, that his spirit, when he pleases, acts independently, or without regard to the weakness or minority of age, which serves rather to make his Divine power the more illustrious."

Ver. 46. Who cried with a loud voice, I am innocent from the blood of this woman.] God opposed to the two elders a child in comparison, and made innocent Daniel the judge of these corrupt ones; I am clear, says he, from the blood of this woman. "He uses (says St. Ambrose) the same expression with regard to Susanna, as Pilate did with respect to the holy Jesus, but does it much better, and more consistently; for he urges it for the deliverance of innocent blood, whereas Pilate bore testimony to his being a just man, whom he delivered up soon after as a criminal, which greatly aggravated his fault, Gravius est peccatum unum eundemque et pronuntiare justum, et tradere quasi criminosum. Daniel, by his declaration, freed the people from the mistake they lay under and the sin they were about to commit, whereas Pilate by his conduct confirmed the Jews in their wicked design." It is surprising that the words of so young a person should affect the people so all on a sudden, and make them defer the execution of a sentence pronounced in form upon the deposition of two witnesses, so irreproachable in all appearance; it should seem that God, who alone can rule the will and affections, touched the hearts of this people, and inclined them at this time to attend favourably to what the inspired youth offered in behalf of distressed innocence. They had judged too hastily upon the deposition of two such witnesses, without taking the necessary precaution to be assured of the truth of their testimony: especially as Susanna's conduct had always been such as put her beyond suspicion of the crime charged upon her, and she denied so solemnly that she had been guilty of it.

Ver. 48. So he standing in the midst of them said, Are ye such fools, ye sons of Israel, that without examination or knowledge of the truth, ye have condemned a daughter of Israel?] St. Bernard observes, that though Daniel saw himself alone amongst so great a multitude, yet was he not afraid or ashamed, notwithstanding the great authority of these elders among the people, to oppose himself against their false accusation, and the sentence pronounced thereupon. He chose rather to be thought guilty of rashness and presumption for the honest freedom he had taken, than to be found guilty before God in betraying truth and innocence by his silence. Sulpitius observes, that the extraordinary courage and unusual boldness discovered by one so young on this occasion, before so numerous an assembly, was the very reason that induced those Jews who had passed the sentence upon her, to enter again into the examination of the cause: "Enimvero multitudo Judæorum quæ tum aderat, non sine Domino existimans, puerum contemptæ ætatulæ, in hanc constantiam prorupisse, favore accommodato, in consilium revertitur." (Sacr. Hist. lib. ii. cap. 2.)

Ver. 50. And the elders said unto him, Come, sit down among us, and shew it us, seeing God hath given thee the honour of an elder.] Κάθισον ἐν μέσῳ ἡμῶν. This compliment was paid him on account of the superior wisdom which he discovered. See Luke iii. 46. where our Saviour is described at twelve years old, the supposed age of Daniel, as sitting in the midst of the Jewish doctors, both hearing them and asking them questions. But who are they who invite Daniel to this honour? if the persons who speak thus civilly to him are the elders that accused Susanna, we must then either imagine, that what is here spoken and offered him, is by way of sneer or raillery, to insult his youth, and to expose his forwardness and presumption, in pretending to reform the judgment of the whole assembly, or else that they thought to win upon him, and gain him over by their flattery. But it is more probable, that the persons who addressed Daniel in this obliging and honourable manner, were different elders or assessors, not in the plot or interest of the two others, but acting agreeably to their public office and character, and therefore well inclined to detect the falsity of the accusation, and to re-examine the cause for that purpose.

Ver. 52. Thou that art waxen old in wickedness, now thy sins which thou hast committed are come to light.] Ἡμερῶν κακῶν πεπαλαιωμένε. It should seem as if Daniel here alluded to the term elder, especially if that word is literally to be understood; by adding κακῶν the expression answers to πλήρης παντὸς δόλου, Acts xiii. 10. and πεπληρωμένος πάσῃ ἀδικίᾳ, Rom. i. 29. Sins may here either be understood strictly, and the sense be, "Thy former wicked way of life, which thou hast had the artifice to conceal, is now apparent, or may hence be inferred:" or, by a metonymy, we may understand ἁμαρτίαι of the punishment due to sins, (see Numb. xvi. 26. 1 Tim. v. 22. Apoc. xviii. 4.) and then the sense will be, "The punishment due to thy many sins hath now overtaken thee."

Ver. 54. Under a mastic-tree. And Daniel said . . . Even now the angel of God hath received the sentence of God to cut thee in two.] Daniel, in his reply to the elders, alludes to the Greek names of the trees, under which they said the fact was committed, and from the very names of these trees pronounces sentence to their confusion. When one of them said, that he saw the adulterous act ὑπὸ σχίνον, Daniel answers in allusion to σχίνον, The angel of God is ready, σχίσαι σε μέσον, to cut thee in two: and when the other elder said it was ὑπὸ πρίνον, Daniel replies, in allusion to this likewise, The angel of the Lord waiteth with the sword, πρίσαι σε μέσον; which allusions are not, nor can be, preserved in our language. The Vulgate retains the Greek names of these trees; the one is called prinus, the other schinus. The reflection we may draw from the condemnation of these elders, expert no doubt in the art of defence, as well as accusation, is, that the Spirit of God makes use of such means as he sees most proper to confound wickedness and injustice; if he had not in some measure blinded the reason of these wicked elders, it would have been easy for them to have eluded the force of Daniel's questions, and to have prevented the consequence drawn from his answers, by saying only, that they did not trouble themselves to be so particular as to mind the sort of tree they were criminally concerned under, it was sufficient that they saw them indecently acting together in such a part of the garden, and under the covert of some shady tree. As the allusion in these verses is founded upon the Greek names, some have from thence inferred, that this history could not be written by Daniel, but was wrote originally in the Greek tongue by some Hellenistic Jew: to which Origen replies, that Daniel never used the terms or names of the trees as they occur in the Greek, but such other Hebrew or Chaldee words, as the verb that signifies to cut asunder, best answered to: that the Greek interpreter, it is probable, in order to preserve the force of the original, changed the names of the trees, and sought out such other names instead of them, as had the same allusions as the original ones had which were lost. Many instances of this figure of speech, called paronomasia, are to be found in the sacred writings; in the Hebrew of the fifth chapter of Isaiah, ver. 7. it is, he looked for משפט mischpat, but behold משפח mischpach; for righteousness צדקה tsedaka, but behold צעקה tsaaka, a cry. (See also Isa. xxiv. 18. and Vitringa in Isa. p. 120.) The allusion is observable in the Hebrew text of Eccles. vii. 1. but Dan. v. 25. 28. is nearest to the passage before us. Many other examples might be collected out of both Testaments: see Jer. i. 11, 12. Ezek. vii. 6. Hos. ix. 15. Amos v. 5. viii. 2. John xv. 2. Rom. i. 29—31. xii. 3. 2 Thess. iii. 11. Heb. xi. 37. all which instances have an affinity of sound with each other, like these of Daniel, but cannot easily be translated into another language, and therefore the beauty of them is frequently lost.

Ver. 55. The angel of God hath received the sentence of God to cut thee in two.] The punishing offenders by sawing them in two with a wooden or iron saw, to which Daniel here seems to allude, was in use among the ancients. We are assured that the Thracians sawed men asunder alive, Val. Max. lib. ix. cap. 2. by Suetonius, that rebels and betrayers of their country were punished this way; and by Tertullian, Apol. cap. 3. that it was used of old to those who were false to their creditors. It appears from the laws of the twelve tables, that this punishment was annexed to certain atrocious crimes, but was so seldom put in execution, that Aulus Gellius says he never read of any that suffered it. (Noct. Attic. lib. xii.) This is thought to be the punishment inflicted by Samuel on Agag, the enemy of God's people, 1 Sam. xv. 33. and by David on the Ammonites, 2 Sam. xii. 31. It was by Nebuchadnezzar threatened to the blasphemers of the true God, Dan. iii. 29. In general it is observed, that all those places of Scripture, where the word פרץ parats, to divide, or break asunder, is used in the Hebrew text, for putting to death, probably allude to this punishment. In St. Matthew the wicked servant is threatened to be cut asunder, and to have his portion with the hypocrites, xxiv. 51. Among the sufferings of the saints of the Old Testament, the apostle mentions their being sawn asunder, ἐπρίσθησαν, Heb. xi. 37. which the Jews and Christians by tradition understand of Isaiah, who is said to have been put to death in this manner by Manasses king of Judah, for boasting he had seen the Lord sitting on his throne. (Isa. vi. 1.)

Ver. 56. O thou seed of Canaan, and not of Judah.] This is spoken by way of the greatest reproach; for the Canaanites were a cursed generation from an accursed father, so overgrown with wickedness, that God devoted them to destruction, and to be cut off from that good land which they possessed, that he might place Israel therein, the seed of blessed parents, whom for their father's sake he loved, and entailed his blessings upon. The expression here is the same with that Ezek. xvi. 3. Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan, thy father was a Hittite, and thy mother an Amorite: so of the elder it is observed here, that he resembled the manners of Canaan more than those of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, his ancestors, and is therefore said to be of the seed of Canaan, because those, in Scripture dialect, whose manners we resemble, are said to be our parents. And as the name Canaan, in the Greek Σάλος, i. e. commotion or agitation, alludes probably to that disorderly ferment in his blood, which betrayed him into that sin that derived the curse upon his posterity, so one thus wantonly and viciously disposed is properly said to derive his descent from him. There is also an expression resembling this, Hos. xii. 7. where Ephraim, on account of his injustice, violence, calumny, and false accusation, is called by way of indignation Canaan, according to the rendering of the LXX. Vulgate, and oriental versions. That of Geneva has it in the text, and this marginal annotation on it, Ephraim is more like the wicked Canaanite, than godly Abraham, or Jacob; intimating, that they were so unlike Jacob their father beforementioned, that they were not to be reputed his genuine seed, but, as if their birth and nativity were of the land of Canaan, had forfeited their right to the privileges and blessings belonging to Israel, and were become heirs of the curse annexed to Canaan and his posterity. It is observable, that where Ephraim is reproached as Canaan, Judah is before commended. (See xi. 12.) For the tribe of Judah, for the generality, retained the public worship of God, its purity, at least truth of worship, and was comparatively faithful, and that kingdom was the lawful succession of David's lineage. The Jews have a tradition, according to St. Jerome, that when Israel came out of Egypt and were encompassed on one side by a mountain, on another by the Red Sea, on another by the army of Pharaoh, and even quite shut in, the other tribes despaired and desired to return into Egypt, only Judah, with confidence in God, entered into the sea, and so deserved the kingdom. With respect to this fact, Judah is said in the place last referred to, and which ought indeed to begin the next chapter, to be a witness of God's word, and as a faithful assertor thereof, descended with God into the sea, and was most faithful among the holy ones, so as to believe the words of God commanding him. (See Pocock, in loc.)

Ver. 61. And they rose against the two elders.] See Apost. Constit. lib. ii. 49. 51. The Jewish writers, though they do not look upon this history as authentic, yet have a traditional account of the same story, differing only in the relation of it. They make the two elders to be punished by Nebuchadnezzar, by being roasted, or cast into the fire (burning among the Chaldeans being the punishment for adultery); and not by their own people, as mentioned in the following verse. They will have these elders to have been Ahab and Zedekiah, mentioned Jer. xxix. 21. of whom it is there said, that they committed villany in Israel, by adultery with their neighbours' wives. (See Orig. Epist. ad African. Jerom. Epist. 10. and Com. in loc. and on Dan. xiii.) The last clause of ver. 5. here, has been thought by some to countenance this opinion: but this is a mere fancy and conceit, the meaning of that sentence being only, that these elders resembled those corrupt ones which the prophet there speaks of; and it seems more probable from the following verse, that these elders were stoned, as they suffered according to the law of Moses, or in the manner appointed by it for such a crime, and in such sort as they intended to have done unto Susanna.

Ver. 62. And they put them to death.] Though the Jews, as Origen and others maintain, might have the power of the sword sometimes in their dispersions, yet it may be questioned, how far they had the power of life and death during their captivity under the Chaldeans. It seems more probable that they had not such a power, and therefore the Jewish writers will have these elders to have been punished by Nebuchadnezzar. Under the Romans, who gave the Jews as much liberty as the Babylonians, it is certain they had not this power of life and death, as appears from John xviii. 31. It is not lawful for us to put any man to death. It is more likely that they had only magistrates, judges, and courts of justice of their own to decide differences in cases of property, in a way peculiar to themselves; as Strabo, quoted by Josephus, (Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 12.) says, they had at Alexandria in the like state. However this be, it is certain these elders deserved a very exemplary punishment; as their crime was greatly enhanced from their public character as judges, and their sway and authority as such among the people, and yet made use of all the respect and esteem which their age and office procured them, to colour and conceal their detestable crimes.

Ver. 63. Therefore Chelcias and his wife praised God for their daughter Susanna . . . because there was no dishonesty found in her.] As her father and mother, her children and all her kindred wept, (ver. 33.) at the unexpected charge against her, so their joy, no doubt, was proportionably great for her deliverance. "They praised God (says St. Jerome) not so much for the preservation of her life, which she would have lost very happily as being innocent, but because he had afforded her grace and strength enough not to fall under the temptation, and that he had so signally glorified his name by so miraculous a protection of innocence." The fathers greatly extol the constancy of Susanna, and call her the glory of her sex; as on the contrary they style these elders the shame and reproach of theirs.

Ver. 64. From that day Daniel was had in great reputation in the sight of the people.] It is one objection among others brought against this history of Susanna, that Daniel was not advanced upon the occasion that this story mentions; viz. for delivering Susanna from death by his wisdom, but rather for the interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream. (Dan. ii. 48.) But may we not conceive a double advancement of Daniel? the first by his judgment concerning Susanna, whereby he came into great credit with the people; and the second occasioned by his expounding the dream, whereby he came into favour and reputation before the king.

HISTORY OF BEL AND THE DRAGON.

Ver. 1. KING Astyages was gathered to his fathers, and Cyrus of Persia received his kingdom.] Herodotus confirms this, telling us in express words, that Astyages was succeeded by his grandson Cyrus. This immediate succession of Cyrus to his grandfather is vouched by Diodorus, Justin, Strabo, Clemens Alexander, Lactantius, Eusebius, Jerome, Austin, and others: but these, as they have copied after Herodotus, add no weight to the scale. But though the above writers give Astyages no other successor than Cyrus, nor is any notice at all taken of any other in the Canon of Ptolemy, yet Xenophon (Cyropæd. lib. i. cap. 19.) does, and likewise Josephus. (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 12.) The former calls the successor of Astyages, Cyaxares; and the latter gives him the name of Darius, adding, that he overturned the kingdom of Babylon, being assisted in that enterprise by his nephew Cyrus: which is consonant both to Scripture and chronology. For if we suppose that Astyages had no other successor but Cyrus, we must allow him to have lived a hundred years and upwards. Could we believe that Astyages lived to so great an age, we should not scruple to follow Herodotus. But it is certain from Dan. v. 31. that Darius the Mede, or Cyaxares the Second (for they mean the same person), succeeded immediately. Perhaps the reason that Cyaxares is not mentioned as succeeding, may be his reigning only two years at Babylon after he took it, and at his death Cyrus became master of the whole empire: and because the other had no more than the name and shadow of the sovereignty, excepting only in Media, which was his own proper dominion. Our translators follow the Greek, Arabic, and Syriac copies, but the Vulgate places this verse at the end of the history of Susanna.

Ver. 2. And Daniel conversed with the king, and was honoured above all his friends.] It is not agreed what king is here meant, whether Astyages, Darius his son, or Cyrus his grandson. Calmet declares for the last; Messieurs of Port-Royal think the account of Bel suits with neither of the three, as it is well known they worshipped the sun, and not such an idol. Besides, what is mentioned ver. 28, 29. that the Babylonians were angry with and threatened to destroy the king and his house on account of the destruction of the Dragon, is an instance of outrageous behaviour not at all consistent with their being lately subdued by Darius and Cyrus. They suppose therefore this to have happened under Evil-Merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, with whom Daniel was in as high esteem as he had been under Nebuchadnezzar. And they place this history about A. M. 3442. the beginning of Evil-Merodach's reign, Daniel being then, as is supposed, about fifty-six years of age.

Ver. 3. An idol called Bel.] This Bel was the great and national idol of the Babylonians, who had erected a most magnificent and sumptuous temple for it. As Baal is said to be the proper name of Belus, the king of Babel or Babylon, next after Nimrod, and as he is said to be the first man that was deified, or reputed a god after his death, so the said name is supposed by learned men more peculiarly and primarily to belong to him. And accordingly the Hebrew Baal answering to the Chaldee Bel, it is this successor of Nimrod that we are to understand by the god that is called by the name of Bel in this history. Ninus his son erected a statue or idol to his father Belus, to be worshipped, and thereby gave the first hint to idolatry, or image-worship, as many learned maintain. This image or idol of Belus is, they say, what is here called Bel, or Baal, contracted, and continued until Daniel's time, when it was destroyed by Darius the Mede, or Cyrus, upon the discovery of the imposture of Bel's priests.

And there were spent upon him every day twelve great measures of fine flour, and forty sheep, and six vessels of wine.] There are but two ancient writers that make any mention of the history of Bel; viz. this apocryphal one, and Josephus Ben-Gorion, and their accounts differ in several particulars. The learned Selden hath extracted from the latter the daily allowance made to Bel, and makes it to be, Juvencus, 10 arietes, 100 pulli columbarum, et 70 panes subcinericii, et 10 amphoræ vini. Though they vary in the stated quantity of provisions, yet they had some warrant, says he, from sacred history, viz. Jer. li. 44. to represent Bel so voracious, and to countenance his being served in so plentiful a manner by the idolatrous priests. (Seld. Syntag. 2. de Belo et Dracone.)

Ver. 4. And the king said unto him, Why dost thou not worship Bel?] It should seem that the king did not know but that Daniel worshipped Bel, but by his not accompanying him with the rest when he went daily to worship him. But as Daniel hated all hypocrisy and dissimulation, he was too good to seem to countenance by his presence what he inwardly abhorred. But, that he might not appear to stay away through a supercilious pride or obstinacy, he assigns the reason in the following verse, for not joining in this idolatrous worship, and the reason is both natural and cogent; viz. that idols are inanimate senseless things, and both unworthy and insensible of the honour paid them: that God alone, who made all things by his power, even those very persons whose skill and ingenuity contrived and fashioned these idols, was the true object of worship, the ever-living God, subsisting in and from himself; the sovereign Being from whom all others derived their existence, and upon whom they depend for their preservation and continuance.

Ver. 6. Thinkest thou not that Bel is a living god? seest thou not how much he eateth and drinketh every day?] One may easily judge what sort of god this Bel, the god of the Babylonians was, and how imperfect and insufficient to his own existence and happiness, who was beholden to his votaries for his daily sustenance and refreshment in the opinion of his very worshippers. But though the idol had no use of or occasion for this prodigious quantity of provisions, as being insensible of what was set before it, yet the devil, who inhabited and acted therein, greatly availed himself of the cheat and imposition put upon the credulous people, and though he ate none of the good things prepared, but left them to feed the luxury of the priests, yet, in the false religion maintained and propagated by them, he found means in return to satisfy a more craving appetite, viz. his insatiable appetite to ruin and destroy souls. (See Port-Royal Com. in loc.) What a strange blindness must possess this idolatrous king, to fall down before such a despicable object of worship! and how mean and groveling must his conceptions be, whom it became necessary to convince, that his god did not eat all, to prove him to be no god! as if a necessity of eating was any proof of divinity, and not rather an argument of decay and mortality; and as if all-sufficiency was not a distinguishing and an essential attribute of the Deity! How much juster was the conclusion of a much wiser king, who, because of God's absolute perfection and independency on any of his creatures, said unto the Lord, Thou art my God; my goods are nothing unto thee, Psal. xvi. 2. where the rendering of the LXX. who insert the particle ὅτι, is far more strong and beautiful, εἶπα τῷ Κυρίῳ, Κύριός μου εἶ συ, ὅτι τῶν ἀγαθῶν μου οὐ χρείαν ἔχεις. And so the Vulgate, Dixi Domino, Deus meus es tu, quoniam bonorum meorum non eges.

Ver. 11. Bel's priests said, Lo, we go out; but thou, O king, set on the meat, and make ready the wine, and shut the door fast, and seal it with thine own signet.] The wretched sordidness of these priests of Bel, who, through a greediness of gaining the offerings themselves, made the people believe that their god ate up all that was offered in his temple, is not so much to be wondered at, as they were heathens and priests of a false religion. "They are an image of such (if any such there be of the sacred order, say Messieurs of Port-Royal) who, through a selfish principle, are tempted to make free with the corban, or possess themselves of the goods of the church, which being a solemn tribute and homage paid by some among the faithful to God, and an instance of their pious acknowledgment for the many blessings received from him, and devoted by them to holy purposes, are sealed with the seal of the Most High, as things sacred and forbidden to be touched, and cannot be appropriated to private uses, without the guilt of manifest injustice, and even of sacrilege itself. If there be any such, who, after the example of these idolatrous priests, convert holy offerings to their own personal emolument, abuse consecrated things, or seize on what was given for the relief of his poor members, they are not the true pastors, who enter into the sheepfold by the right door, but come in by some private entrance, some unwarrantable way, like thieves and robbers." (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 19. Then laughed Daniel, and held the king that he should not go in, and said, Behold now the pavement, and mark well whose footsteps are these.] "One knows not (says Tertullian, adv. Valentin. cap. 6.) whether to laugh at the folly or lament seriously the blindness of this prince, who suffered himself thus to be imposed upon by his self-interested priests." Daniel laughs at his folly, as knowing that some errors are best exposed by ridicule and contempt. "Let us laugh (say Messieurs of Port-Royal) when we look upon the ashes strewed through the temple of this false god, and the footsteps of these robbers of his offerings, who ridiculously attempted to establish the divinity of Bel upon their own lying and gluttony: but let us lament with tears of blood, if there be any in the church who thus play the hypocrite, and fall upon the piety of the faithful. It is by men's footsteps and goings, i. e. by their conduct and manner of behaviour in the temple of the Lord, that one only justly knows whether they be robbers or true pastors. It is by considering whether they be open or secret workers, and looking into their works, whether they be those of darkness or light. For those who, like these priests of Bel, walk in darkness, know not where they set their feet, and the traces of them, discovered by the light of truth, shew the hidden work they have been about. Happy for them if ashes were the symbol and token of their penitence." (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 22. Then the king was angry, and took the priests with their wives and children . . . and slew them.] A conduct so blamable in the priests, and so scandalous an imposture in persons dedicated to holy offices and the care of religious affairs, carries in it something so shocking and unworthy of their character, that one is not at all surprised at the rigour with which this king punished a cheat so detestable; for nothing is more criminal than fraud in matters of religion, or to impose upon the simplicity of persons who rest their belief often upon the authority of their pastors, whose integrity they entertain a good opinion of, and think they can safely depend upon. But these crafty priests of Bel had too much interest in this imposture not to carry on the ridiculous cheat by a solemn and affected gravity, and support it with all their artifice and power. It reminds one of what Aristophanes mentions of a like fraud practised by the priests of Plutus, and thus described by him:—

> Ἔπειτ' ἀναβλέψας, ὁρῶ τὸν ἱερέα,
> Τοὺς φθοῖς ἀφαρπάζοντα καὶ τὰς ἰσχάδας
> Ἀπὸ τῆς τραπέζης τῆς ἱερᾶς. μετὰ τοῦτο δὲ
> Περιῆλθε τοὺς βωμοὺς ἅπαντας ἐν κύκλῳ,
> Εἴποῦ πόπανον εἴη τι καταλελειμμένον.
> (Plut. act. iii. scen. 2.)

Ver. 23. There was a great dragon whom the Babylonians worshipped.] By the dragon we are to understand a serpent, which unaccountable sort of worship prevailed much in the early times. That the Babylonians had images of serpents in the temple of Belus, Diodorus Siculus informs us. We may observe, that the serpent has all along been the common symbol and representation of the heathen deities. (See Jul. Firmic. de Errore Prof. Rel. p. 15.) But serpents were not only mere symbols and hieroglyphics, but real objects of worship themselves, and had religious worship paid them by the ancient heathen, as appears from the passage before us, from the book of Wisdom, xi. 15. and other writers. It is well known that the Romans, upon a great plague, sent to fetch a serpent that was worshipped at Epidaurus; the serpent came, or rather the devil brought it, and it placed itself in an island on the Tiber, where it was worshipped as a god propitious to the Roman people, A. U. 462. (See Val. Max. i. 8. Ovid Metamorph. lib. xv.) The arrival of this serpent is beautifully delineated upon a coin of Antoninus Pius in Montfaucon. Supplement. vol. v. cap. 1. tab. 26. What Ælian says is much closer to our purpose, ἐν Μελίτῃ τῆς Αἰγύπτου δράκων ἐστὶ, κ. τ. λ. i. e. there was a serpent worshipped in Egypt, in a village called Melita, which lived in a tower, and had attendants, and officers, and a priest: a table was kept for it, and provisions served up to it; every day meal mixed with honey was put into a cup for its use, which was all eaten and gone the next day. (De Animal. lib. xi. cap. 17.) It seems as if the devil took a pride to be worshipped under that form, to insult perhaps fallen man, if we may indulge conjecture. Grotius out of several ancient authors has made it appear, that in the old Greek mysteries it was usual to carry about a serpent, crying Εὔα, the devil thereby, as it may seem, expressing his triumph in the unhappy deception of our first parents. (See Orig. cont. Cels. lib. vi.) And probably the story of Ophioneus among the heathen, was taken from the devil's assuming the form or body of a serpent in his tempting of Eve. That from his success at that time he should be encouraged to assume often the like figure to deceive her posterity, is not to be wondered at. But one cannot conceive what mankind could at any time find in such a hideous creature as a serpent is, worthy of their adoration. But if man in Paradise, in a state of innocence, and with that high degree of light and perfection that he was then possessed of, preferred the voice of a serpent to that of God, and thought he could be more happy in listening to the artful suggestions of such a monster, than the gracious commands of his Creator, what wonder is it, if one meets with marks and traces of that fatal blindness spread far and near among dark and unenlightened people, and even whole nations, as the Babylonians here mentioned, paying religious adoration to serpents and crocodiles?

Ver. 27. Then Daniel took pitch, and fat, and hair, and did seethe them together, and made lumps thereof.] The composition or materials which Daniel made use of to burst this dragon, had not in themselves any natural or specific power to effectuate that, or to kill him; but being crammed, say Messieurs of Port-Royal, into a throat naturally strait, they stopped the respiration or breath, and so suffocated it. Josephus Ben-Gorion gives a very different account of its destruction, as we have it translated from the Hebrew by the learned Selden: "Abiens vero Daniel a conspectu regis paravit instrumenta ferrea instar pectinum, quibus lina repurgantur, et conjunxit ea interius, tergum conjungens tergo; aculei autem eorum extra prominebant per circuitum limati et acuti, quibus undique adhibuit varias ciborum species, præsertim adipem, pingue-dinem, et alias res pingues. Lituram quoque sulphuris et picis apposuit ei, quibus fomentis absconditi sunt aculei ferrei et dentes illi serrati, habuitque formam demensi (Ebraice Mincha, quod est munus Deo oblatum): cumque Daniel illud projecisset in rictum draconis, suscepit ipsum draco, et devoravit eum, desiderio animæ suæ; at ubi descendit ad interiora ventris ejus, dissolvebatur adeps, et pinguedo a ferreis aculeis, et ingrediebantur acumina serratorum dentium in viscera draconis, atque perforabant ea, et illico cœpit draco sentire ingentem dolorem, corruensque mortuus est sequenti die." (Ben-Gorion, lib. i. cap. 10. apud Seld. Syntag. 2. de Belo et Dracone, cap. 17.)

Ver. 28. They conspired against the king, saying, The king is become a Jew.] i. e. The king seems, like the Jews, to have conceived a dislike and abhorrence of idols, as appears plainly from his permitting the overthrow of our national one: or they might imagine him to be turned Jew, or Jewishly inclined, from the great favour so lately shewed to that people, in setting them at liberty; or, lastly, they might conclude so from the particular esteem and regard shewed to Daniel. Grotius departs from the common interpretations, and quite transposes the sense, and, instead of the common rendering, The king is become a Jew, makes the meaning to be, A Jew is become king, Ἰουδαῖος γέγονεν βασιλεὺς (not ὁ βασιλεὺς, as the present reading is); i. e. Daniel assumes the supreme power, he acts as absolutely as the king, his power and sway over him are so great, as to persuade him to do as he pleases; he hath destroyed Bel, and slain the dragon, &c.

Ver. 31. Who cast him into the lions' den.] Some, from that single circumstance of Daniel being here said to be cast into the lions' den against the king's inclination, contend, that this is the same story with what is related Dan. vi. 19. with some addition of circumstances in the beginning, and want of others in the end: but there are many reasons against this opinion—as, that Daniel in this story is said to be six days in the lions' den, but in the sacred one to have remained there but one night. Secondly, The apocryphal history mentions, that it happened in Cyrus's reign, whereas the text of Daniel says expressly, that it was in the reign of Darius. Thirdly, The accusation and the matter on which Daniel is said to be cast into the lions' den are very different; the one being for his putting up his petition to the true God three times a-day, the other for destroying Bel and the dragon. It seems, therefore, most probable to suppose, that different facts and times are meant, and that either the prophet Daniel was twice cast into the lions' den, once under Darius, because he prayed to his God, contrary to the king's express command, and again under Cyrus, upon occasion of the killing this dragon; or that a different Daniel from the prophet so called is here spoken of.

Ver. 32. And they had given them every day two carcasses and two sheep.] The margin very properly renders two slaves, i. e. two prisoners condemned to death. As it is an ordinary mode of speech to use body for the whole man, so the Greeks often put σώματα for persons. Slaves in particular are called σώματα, Rev. xviii. 13.

Ver. 33. There was in Jewry a prophet called Habacuc.] St. Jerome thinks the prophet here mentioned to be the Habakkuk among the minor prophets, that he was at this time in Judea, where Nebuchadnezzar had left the meaner sort of people to till and cultivate the land; but if this be the same person, whose book we receive as canonical, he must have lived a long time, for he prophesied either before or at least in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar the Great. But Eusebius and others contend for the different Habacuc, whom they suppose to be the writer of this short history, as also of that of Susanna, and they ground their opinion on an ancient title or inscription in some of the Greek copies prefixed to the history of Bel, which runs thus, προφητεία τοῦ Ἀββακοὺμ, υἱοῦ τοῦ Ἰούδα, ἐκ φυλῆς Λευΐ. Prophetia Abbakum, filii Judæa, de tribu Levi. After which the first words of the book are, Ἄνθρωπός τις ἦν ἱερεὺς, ὀνόματι Δανιὴλ, υἱὸς τοῦ Ἀβδὰ, συμπότης τοῦ Βασιλέως τῆς Βαβυλῶνος. And from this title they conclude, that the facts here recorded relate not to Daniel the prophet, but to another Daniel, a priest, and of a different extraction, and the history to be wrote likewise by another, and not the canonical Habakkuk. (See Sexti Senen. Bibl. Sacr. et Du Pin. Eccl. Hist. vol. i.) It may be asked, and the question is natural enough, Why that Being, who is confessedly almighty, should choose to employ help so far distant, for the relief of a faithful distressed servant, as that here mentioned; viz. the sending a prophet express from Judea to Babylon for that purpose, when it was so easy and ready to have administered sustenance to Daniel by any of the faithful that were in the city itself, or near the place of his confinement, or even to have supported him without any nourishment at all, as he did in a miraculous manner his servant Moses for forty days together. But though it does not belong to or even become us, to search too curiously into the hidden reasons of God's counsel, yet we may be assured, that he acted herein with the same consummate wisdom, which is the standing rule of his providence; and in particular there seems to have been this weighty reason for this expedient, for hereby the Jews that remained in Palestine would receive great comfort and assurance, and be encouraged in their religious trust and confidence, as by Habacuc they would be informed both of Daniel's strong faith and God's remarkable protection and deliverance of him on that account. And without doubt it must afford great consolation to them, as well as to the rest of their distressed brethren, to be assured by this so signal an instance of his goodness, that the God of Israel still thought of, and had a regard for his chosen people, however dispersed, or in what manner soever persecuted and distressed; and probably would draw this or the like inference in their own favour,—that if he stopped in a manner so miraculous the mouths of the lions to save a faithful servant, he might as easily calm the fury of their enemies when he pleased; and that succour, which by the prophet of Jewry he administered to a distressed prophet, they might look upon as a pledge and earnest of a future recovery and reunion of all their captive brethren, who, though reduced to the last extremity like Daniel, ought not to set up their rest at a foreign Babylon, nor fix there their settlement, nor expect thence their comfort and refreshment, but aspire after their native land, and thence only wait for their sustenance and relief.

Ver. 36. Through the vehemency of his Spirit.] Greek, Ἐν τῷ ῥοίζῳ, in stridore; and according to Scapula, it hath no other signification. The Syriac has, Viribus Spiritus Sancti. The Arabic, Adjuvante Spiritu suo. Junius, impetu Spiritus ejus; i. e. Domini, according to the margin.

It should seem from hence, that by the Spirit is meant the Holy Ghost, to whom the inspiration and conduct of the prophets is commonly ascribed in Scripture. Who might do this, either immediately by his own power, or by an angel, or by a vehement and strong wind. The Greek seems to countenance the last: such transportations of the prophets having been usual long before this time. (See 1 Kings xviii. 12. 2 Kings ii. 11. 16. Ezek. iii. 12. 14. Matt. iv. 1. Acts viii. 39.)

Ver. 38. And Daniel said, Thou hast remembered me, O God.] It is observable, that Daniel, without paying any regard, or speaking to the prophet who brought him this sustenance, immediately addresses himself to God, whose minister Habakkuk was. But it may be asked, How it happened that Daniel was so late in his acknowledgment, as now first to make this grateful and pious confession, and that upon so small an occasion in comparison as an unexpected dinner brought to him? The miracle of the seven hungry lions, who notwithstanding offered no hurt or violence to him, was it not a proof far stronger and more illustrious, that God does not forsake those that seek and love him, and called it not for an earlier and louder acknowledgment? I answer, that we are not to imagine that Daniel omitted the tribute of his thanksgiving, for the vouchsafement of that far greater mercy, nor can it indeed be inferred or concluded from this passage; but this new testimony which God gave him of his goodness, by the service and ministry of a prophet, sent to him from such a distance for his refreshment, drew from him this other explicit declaration of his loving-kindness. His answer shews a heart full of the most grateful sentiments, and if life be more valuable than meat, we may be assured he was not only thankful, but in a greater degree, for the preservation of the former, being the more important blessing. "One is at a loss (say Messieurs of Port-Royal) which most to admire, either the composure of Daniel himself, eating what God had sent him in the midst of the lions, or the tameness of the lions, almost famished with hunger, suffering him to do so, and not offering any violence to him, when they saw him eating before them." An event the most unusual and surprising, but arising probably from that respect and awe which God had impressed upon these savage beasts for the person of Daniel. Not that they were sensible themselves of any merit or superior goodness in Daniel, as some have whimsically imagined; but their seizing with so much fury upon his accusers shews that their sparing him was miraculous.

Ver. 42. Cast those that were the cause of his destruction into the den.] i. e. Those that intended his destruction. There is no mention here of the accusers' wives and children being involved in the same punishment, as is mentioned Dan. vi. 24. which shews the occasion to be different, though it is observable, that the Vulgate closes this fragment, or little history of Bel, with that decree of Darius, (vi. 26.) That men should tremble and fear before the God of Daniel. However this be, we may draw the following useful reflection from the sentence passed on his accusers, "That if in imitation of this prince, those who falsely accuse others were exposed to the same punishment they endeavoured to inflict, as both the civil and canon laws do require, the world would be soon purged from the mischiefs of falsehood and perjury, nor should we see innocence so often oppressed by calumny and slander."

THE TWO BOOKS OF THE MACCABEES.

THERE are often reckoned four books of Maccabees; the two first I shall have only occasion to speak to. The third contains a miraculous deliverance of the Jews, who were exposed, in the amphitheatre at Alexandria, to the fury of elephants. This book, which is to be found in all the Greek editions, is, without reason, called the third book of Maccabees, since it does not speak of them in the least. If this history be true, it ought to have been placed the first of all, as what is mentioned there happened about fifty years before the passages that are related in the other two books. (See Du Pin's Bel. Dissert. Eccl. Hist. vol. i.) The fourth, containing the history of John Hyrcanus, is rejected as still more apocryphal, and probably was taken from the book or memoirs of his actions mentioned 1 Macc. xvi. 23, 24. The two books of the Maccabees, known and distinguished by that name, were not written by the same person, as the learned conclude from the style, and a different manner of counting the years; the one follows the Jewish account, the other that of Alexandria, which begins six months later. The first is generally thought to have been wrote by a Hebrew originally in that language, as the phrase of it is plainly Jewish, or rather in Syriac, which was the vulgar tongue in Palestine in the time of the Maccabees, and afterward translated into Greek, and is by some attributed to Josephus, or Philo, by others to the synagogue, or the Maccabees themselves. The other is supposed to be wrote originally in Greek, begins its history a great deal higher than the first, and is an abridgment or epitome, by what author it is uncertain, of a work wrote by Jason, a Jew of Cyrene, as appears from the preface of that book, which begins chap. ii. 23. The book itself is opened by two letters of the Jews at Jerusalem to their brethren in Egypt, and added by the author of this abridgment. The two books together contain the history of the Jews, or the state of the church under the third monarchy, which was that of the Greeks, comprising about forty years, from the death of Alexander the Great to that of Demetrius Soter, and they conclude about one hundred and thirty years and upwards before the coming of our Saviour. There is a great chasm in the Jewish history, occasioned by the loss of their books; for scarce one book written in the Hebrew tongue, since prophecy ceased, escaped the general calamity that befel the Jewish writings. Those that were retrieved by Judas Maccabeus, (2 Macc. ii. 13, 14.) from the ravage of Antiochus, or were written afterward, which were not a few, (see Prol. to Ecclus.) all perished under Titus's dispersion, or Adrian's persecution; on this account, and the obscurity occasioned by this calamity, Eusebius says he can go no farther than Zerubbabel in his catalogue with any certainty, as there was no sacred volume to be depended upon, from the return from the captivity to our Saviour's time. (Demonst. lib. viii.) During their captivity, indeed, the prophets Ezekiel and Daniel give us an account of many particulars relating to their history, as does Tobit likewise at Nineveh, Esther and Mordecai at Shushan. After the captivity we have the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, whose present work probably is but an abridgment of those writings or commentaries of his mentioned 2 Macc. ii. 13. since the passage quoted in the Maccabees is not to be found there. With Nehemiah ended the history of the Jews contained in the canonical books of the Old Testament. As Nehemiah died after the year of the world 3563, and the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes began A. M. 3829, from the one to the other there was a distance of two hundred and sixty-six years, which interval between Nehemiah and the Maccabees, for want of records, annals, and other proper helps from sacred or profane history, may well be expected to be dark and obscure. In the time of the Maccabees, care seems to have been taken to record all remarkable events which happened in that country; the author of the first book quotes at the end of that work the memoirs of the pontificate of John Hyrcanus, (1 Macc. xvi. ult.) which makes it probable that he wrote from the annals of that time. The author of the second says, (ii. 14.) that Judas made a collection of the historical accounts of his nation, which had been dispersed during the war. And in fact great use is to be made and much light is afforded from the apocryphal writings, chiefly the books of the Maccabees, for carrying on the third of the Jewish history. Next to the books of Maccabees, we are beholden to Josephus, Philo Judeus, and such Greek and Latin writers as would vouchsafe to take notice of them, for farther insight into their history. This then is the first use I shall mention of the books of the Maccabees; viz. in some measure to fill up the chasm of the Jewish history from the ceasing of prophecy. Secondly, No history is of like use to explain the book of Daniel, and what is contained therein relating to the Jews, and their great enemy Antiochus Epiphanes, on which account the fathers have always set a great value on these books. In them most of the particulars of the great revolutions mentioned by that prophet are so unfolded and explained, that even the very time and number of days which are there set down accord most strictly to truth and the evidence of fact. The first book in particular is a key to the mysteries in the eighth and eleventh chapters of that prophecy, respecting the horn by which the sanctuary was profaned. From thence it appears that that horn was Antiochus, whose great wickedness and wantonness in shedding blood, and the abomination introduced by him into the holy place, fully answer that character. The like use may be made of these books for explaining other parts of the Holy Scripture, as particularly 1 Macc. x. 88, 89. which, with other passages in this grave writer, whosoever, says the very learned Dr. Jackson, " will compare with the ninth of the prophet Zechariah, will perceive there may be good use of books not canonical for the right understanding of sacred writings most canonical, and that these books, though apocryphal, do not deserve to be left out in any new impressions of our Bibles." (Tom. ii. p. 844.) To which I must add what another judicious writer says on the occasion, " That without all doubt all the world could not recompense the loss of the books of the Maccabees, and the use of them for understanding the prophets; so inestimable is the benefit of them to that purpose." (Thorndike's Epilogue, p. 210.) Thirdly, God having withdrawn his prophets, many and great revolutions happened to the Jewish state, and the church of God underwent very severe and heavy persecutions both from the Greeks and Romans, in which the Maccabees in particular signalized themselves; the account of which times, and of their conduct on the occasion, we must take from these books; and therefore they are to be valued, and of the church not unprofitably used, says St. Austin, for those glorious instances recorded in them of persons suffering such horrible persecutions with a remarkable patience for the testimony of God's religion, and thereby encouraging others to undergo cheerfully the like trial of sufferings. Fourthly, There are some scattered remains in these books as well as the other apocryphal ones, which have preserved many notions of the ancient Jews in the interval between the days of Christ and the last prophets; and in particular their belief of a future resurrection, and the hope which the Jews conceived and entertained of the Messiah that was to come, whom they speak of sometimes as a prophet or priest, sometimes as a king, sometimes under the character of two of these offices joined together. (See 1 Macc. iv. 46. xiv. 41.) But notwithstanding the usefulness of the books of the Maccabees in these respects, it must be acknowledged, and is very apparent, that there are great errors, and often accounts different and even contradictory to be found in them, especially the second, arising probably either from ignorance of the Greek and Roman history, or national prejudice, and an immoderate partiality in favour of the Jewish nation. A learned writer has been at the pains (see Raynold's Prælect. vol. i.) to select such passages as are inconsistent with and contrary to the account given by approved authors and historians of particular facts and occurrences, and sets down among others, as instances of carelessness at least, the following passages, 1 Macc. i. 6. where it is said, that Alexander, before his death, divided his kingdom among his honourable servants: but the writers of this history say otherwise; the account generally received is, that after the death of Alexander, his dominions were parted among divers of his princes and captains, and after a short time fell into the hands of four, as is also intimated, Dan. viii. 8. Chap. xv. 16. it is said of the Romans, that they committed their government to one man, or magistrate, every year; whereas it is well known, that at that time there were annually two consuls chosen at Rome, and for three hundred years before. Lib. ii. ii. 4, 5. the ark is said to be hid, and concealed by the prophet Jeremiah, which could neither happen before the taking of the city, for Jeremiah was then in prison; nor after its being taken, for the Chaldeans would scarce have suffered so valuable a part of the spoils as the tabernacle, the ark, and the altar to be taken away, and secreted from them. And what follows after, that God would, upon the future return of that people, discover where Jeremiah had hid these, once so famous in Solomon's temple, is no less false, as it is certain the material furniture of that superb temple was all destroyed with it. The two books also often contradict one another in their relation of memorable events; as, lib. i. vi. 13. 16. it is said that Antiochus perished through great grief in a strange land, which is thought by some to be confirmed from Dan. viii. 25.; but, lib. ii. i. 16. he is said to have been slain in the temple of Nanea, by throwing stones like thunderbolts upon him and his company; and, ix. 28. to have ended his days miserably in the mountains, by an incurable and invisible plague in his bowels. Judas Maccabeus is said, lib. i. ix. 3. 18. to have been slain in battle, anno 152. but, lib. ii. i. 10. he is represented as writing a letter or epistle, anno 188. thirty-six years after his death. Again, lib. i. iv. 36. he is said to have purified the temple before Antiochus's death; but, lib. ii. x. 2, 3. it is mentioned as done two years after his death. Nor will it be sufficient to say that these two years are to be reckoned from the profanation of the temple, and not from Antiochus's death, for even thus will it not be consistent with the first book; for it appears from thence, that the purifying the sanctuary was three years after its profanation; for the profanation was on the fifteenth day of the month Chasleu, anno 145. lib. i. i. 54. and the purifying was on the twenty-fifth day of the same month, anno 148. lib. i. iv. 52. There are also some instances, particularly in the second book, which are contrary to the canonical Scriptures, and of dangerous consequence to be recommended as precedents, or to stand upon record uncontradicted in history; as lib. ii. xii. 44, 45. Judas Maccabeus is commended for praying for the dead, and making an offering or reconciliation in their behalf, that they might be delivered from sin: Bellarmine from hence takes occasion to confirm the doctrines of purgatory and prayers for the dead; (De Purgat. lib. ii. cap. 3.) but it appears plainly from the context, that Judas's prayer was not for the relief of the dead, but that the guilt and punishment of the trespass committed by some wicked ones who had displeased God, and perished in their sins, might not be imputed to, or transferred upon, the living. The rendering of the Vulgate here, and its inference, are both faulty, Sancta ergo et salubris est cogitatio pro defunctis exorare, ut a peccatis solvantur. The Greek has nothing like it, nor can any such doctrine be founded upon it. Herein lies the fallacy of that version; it joins those words, It was a good and holy thought, which manifestly is spoken of what went before, to the sentence that follows after; though the Greek, by a full stop, quite distinguishes it from this last sentence. Nor will the syntax of the present Greek text ever allow it to belong to it. There is a like mistake, and for the same purpose, two verses above, ver. 43. where the Vulgate reads, Duodecim millia (it should be duo) drachmas argenti misit Hierosolymam offerri pro peccatis mortuorum sacrificium. But the Greek barely is, προσαγαγεῖν περὶ ἁμαρτίας θυσίαν, as even the Roman edition of 1587, published by the order of Sixtus Quintus himself, expressly reads, without any notice or mention of the dead: nor is that version less faulty in rendering the Greek adverb ἀστείως, by religiose. It is most probable, that Judas thought of nothing less than purgatory in this action, for the money sent to Jerusalem was for a sin-offering, to expiate, or take away, the guilt from the rest of the people. And it is observable, that this sum was a general contribution, according to the appointment, Lev. iv. 13. So that upon the whole, what was here done by Judas, was not for the sake of the deceased soldiers, but for the safety and preservation of the remainder that were living, that the judgment of God might not overtake the rest. Lib. ii. xiv. 41, 42. Razias is commended for laying violent hands on himself, and is said to die manfully. But this whole account seems a fiction. That a man should fall on his sword first, then leap down from a wall into the midst of his enemies; that they should make way for him, where he fell amongst the thickest of them; that he should rise up again in anger, but in such a condition that his blood gushed out like spouts of water; that he should run through the midst of the throng notwithstanding; and standing upon a steep rock when his blood was now quite gone, should pluck out his bowels, and take them in both his hands, and cast them among the crowd; and even at his last gasp should have the use of his understanding so perfect, as to call upon God to restore him those bowels again; these are circumstances too odd and romantic to gain any credit to this story. It would be almost endless to instance in the several faulty particulars of the second book; but of all others, i. 18. to the end of that chapter, excepting the prayer itself, is the most unwarrantable, which the learned reader may see exposed with great strength and reasoning, by consulting Raynold. de Libr. Apocryph. tom. ii. Præl. 133, 134. But notwithstanding this mixture of dross, there is a fund of valuable treasure still remaining. Lastly, It cannot but be observed, that the series of these books is very much disturbed, that not only the same facts are frequently related in both, but the order of time is not truly preserved: it may not be amiss therefore, that these books may be perused with more pleasure and profit, to refer the reader to Wells's Histor. Geogr. of the Old Testament, vol. ii. where he will find the several chapters in each set down according to the true series of the Jewish history.

A

THE TWO BOOKS OF ESDRAS.

THAT which is called the first, or, according to other accounts, the third book of Esdras, the author of which is not known, but supposed to be a Hellenist Jew, inserts an odd narration, in the third and fourth chapters, of three young men that were of Darius's guard, contending for the reward of a problem or sentence, propounded by every one of them. The arguments, it must be confessed, are weighty, and very proper on the occasion; but it is obvious that the writer makes these candidates to prescribe, as it were, to the king, what gifts and rewards he shall bestow on them in token of victory: and besides, the rewards themselves are too magnificent for such a contest, and more proper to be bestowed on a general, who had gained a signal victory, or conquered divers provinces. His design in this narrative seems to have been, to embellish the account of Zerubbabel, by a circumstance so honourable to him as the prize, and, at the same time, entertaining enough to the reader. I conceive it to be a traditionary story, as the true Ezra takes no notice of it, founded probably upon truth, but mixed with some fabulous circumstances. In different parts of the book there is a summary repetition of the two last chapters of the second book of Chronicles, and of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. But one cannot excuse the author for injudiciously inserting several particulars from them, to give an air of truth to his relation, and to make it more credible. But against its authority there are the following material objections: 1. When the Jews, by the permission of Cyrus, returned to Judea, this writer makes their governor, or conductor, to be Sanabassar; whereas, according to the true Ezra, Zerubbabel was their conductor. 2. He places the reconsecration of the altar, and the renewing the sacrifices in the second year of Darius; whereas, the canonical book of that name fixes it in the reign of Cyrus, (iii. 1.) and in the seventh month. 3. If Darius, when he permitted the Jews to return with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem, to rebuild their temple, wrote to his officers beyond the Euphrates in their favour, as this writer represents it, would they have had the assurance to demand of them by what authority they engaged in the work? Did they not know the king's orders, and were not they themselves obliged to furnish them with materials? Or would Zerubbabel have had any occasion to have recourse to the decree of Cyrus to rebuild their temple? 4. He makes Zerubbabel to be one of the guard about the king's (Darius) person at Babylon, when he confessedly was, at that time, at Jerusalem. (Ezra ii. 2.) 5. He represents Darius, (iv. 46.) as engaged by a solemn vow, before his advancement to the kingdom, to rebuild their temple: if this was the case, what need was there to search the archives with such diligence for Cyrus's decree for that purpose? 6. He distinguishes Nehemiah from the Tirshatha, making two separate persons of them; whereas, the latter is only a name of office. (Nehem. viii. 9.) 7. He contradicts both Scripture and himself, when he says, iv. 44. 57. that Zerubbabel entreated Darius to send to Jerusalem the holy vessels, which Cyrus had intended to have sent, as if Cyrus had not executed that design, contrary to what the true Ezra, and even himself says, vi. 18, 19. 8. He charges the Edomites with burning of the temple, at the same time that he mentions Jerusalem being taken by the Chaldeans. 9. He says, that when Darius gave leave to the Jews to return, he ordered them to be escorted for their greater safety by a thousand horse, as if a number so inconsiderable could be a safeguard for fifty thousand persons. Lastly, Where he does agree with the canonical books, he quite confounds the order of time and events; and, after all his pains to adjust his account to that of the true Ezra, he betrays his inability for so nice an undertaking, and has fallen into faults so gross, that the church has deservedly rejected this book as uncanonical, and unworthy to be read in its service. I have the rather taken notice of these, as well as those respecting the books of Maccabees, to acquit myself of a promise, (see Pref. to Comm. on Ecclus.) to make some strictures and observations upon particular passages in them. As to the second book of this writer, it must be confessed there are in it lofty sentiments, beautiful similes, ancient traditions, the appearance at least of a prophetic spirit, and a surprising close resemblance of many passages in the New Testament; but the following objections are made against it: 1. The genealogy of this Pseudo-Esdras, placed at the entrance, differs from that, 1 Esdras viii. 12. and from that in the true Ezra, vii. 1, 2. which has induced the learned to conclude that they are different persons. 2. It is said, (i. 11.) that God scattered the people of two provinces, even of Tyrus and Sidon, in favour of his people returning from Egypt, of which there is no confirmation in Scripture. And a little after, (ver. 22, 23.) two very different facts are confounded: Moses is made to work the miracle of sweetening the water at the brook Arnon, (Numb. xxi. 16.) which was wrought only on the waters of Marah. (Exod. xv. 25. 39, 40.) The author enumerates the twelve minor prophets, though Haggai, Zachary, and Malachi, whom, according to a rabbinical conceit he calls an angel of the Lord, prophesied after the captivity, and their times agree not with that of this writer. It is moreover observable, that he places them not according to the order in the Hebrew canon, but follows that of the LXX. or Greek Bibles. Chap. ii. 33. he introduces his having received a charge from the Lord upon Mount Horeb, abruptly, without any authority, connexion, or reason, except it be to insinuate and countenance a notion of his inspiration. Chap. iv. 35. 41. mention is made of souls departed in a state of grace, being kept in chambers or secret storehouses, till the day of judgment, agreeably enough to Apoc. vi. 9, 10. which has been objected to, as seemingly countenancing the doctrine of purgatory; and it must be confessed the catholics have so applied it, but without reason, as nothing is therein said or intimated of their being detained there by way of punishment, or to be purified by it. Chap. iii. 6. we have another rabbinical conceit of Eden, or the earthly Paradise, being planted even before the earth itself came forward, or was made. Chap. vi. 49. it is said that God, on the fifth day, created two animals of an enormous bigness, one called Enoch, the other Leviathan, and as the seventh part would not contain them both, he separated them, and put the former into a dry place, wherein there were a thousand mountains, and the Leviathan he reserved in the sea, to furnish an entertainment for his people at the coming of their Messiah. This is also another rabbinical whim, which the author borrowed from the Talmudists, who have likewise abused Gen. i. 20, 21. and Psal. ciii. 26. to the same fanciful purpose. (See Raynold's Prælect. xxvii. vol. i.) What he mentions, xiii. 40, 41. about the ten tribes being carried by God beyond the Euphrates, which divided itself for their passage, into a farther country, where never mankind dwelt, into a region called Arareth, that they might there keep their statutes without danger or disturbance, from thence to return at the latter time by a like miraculous stopping of the waters; I say, though these tribes are allowed to be in being, in what country it is uncertain, yet their passage both ways in the manner described is scarce credible. It seems a fond persuasion, arising from national prejudice, that God will never cease to do miracles in behalf of his chosen. Chap. xiv. 11. he makes ten parts and a half of the world, dividing it into twelve, to be in his time already past, and therefore, according to his account, the world should have been at an end above one thousand seven hundred years ago. It is computed, that from the creation of the world (for I see no reason to begin the account at the deluge) to the time of Esdras were about three thousand four hundred and seventy years, and therefore after five hundred years more, or the time of our Saviour's birth, or at least of his death, the period should have been completed, and this world have had an end. Chap. ii. 43. mention is made of a young man of high stature, taller than all the rest, crowning those that have confessed the name of God, called also, ver. 47. the Son of God: to confirm the same legend, and to give the more credit to this fable, are these words inserted, vii. 28, 29. My Son Jesus shall be revealed with those that be with him, and they that remain shall rejoice within four hundred years; after these years shall my Son Christ die, and all men that have life. This and many other passages speak so plainly of Jesus Christ, his coming, office, death, &c. that if this book had been known and received as authentic among the Jews, it seems almost impossible that any Jew should remain unconverted. From a number of parallel passages to those in the New Testament, which a learned hand has digested columnwise (see Lee's Dissert. on 2 Esdras), it seems necessary to conclude, either that Jesus Christ and his apostles copied from hence, or that this writer transcribed largely from the other. It seems most probable, that the author was a Jew converted to Christianity, who, in hopes of converting others, composed this work under the name of a writer, for whom the Jews had the highest esteem. And there seems good reason to conclude, that the author lived in the times of the first heathen persecutions, from many passages encouraging faith, and a spirit of constancy and persecution; as may, I think, be inferred also from some circumstances in the visions themselves, (see chap. xiii.) some of which have been thought to have been taken from Ezekiel's visions, Daniel's prophecies, (see Dan. vii. 7.) who, as from the mouth of God, is called his brother, (xii. 11.) or St. John's Revelation. But I forbear to enter or remark upon these, as acknowledging my ignorance of their true design, which the learned themselves are so much divided about. What a great critic (Scaliger) observed of Calvin, that he was wise in not writing on the Apocalypse, admonishes me not rashly to attempt the visionary part of this book, who have neither sufficient reading nor judgment to discern the scope and intendment of mystical and prophetic writings.

I cannot conclude without blessing the goodness of God for enabling me to put the finishing hand at length to these sheets, and am glad likewise to embrace this opportunity of acknowledging my obligation to those right reverend and reverend persons, who have occasionally favoured me with their learned assistance in the course of this work.

TO

MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

MADAM,

AMONG the laws that God gave by the hand of Moses, one was, that the king who should rule over his people should have continually before him a copy of the law, and that he should read in it all the days of his life, that, having learnt to fear the Lord his God, and to observe the words of his law, he might prolong his days in his kingdom. And when he made Joshua the captain of his host, and the governor of his people, he spake thus to him, The book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate in it day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written in it; for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and thou shalt have good success. (Josh. i. 8.) King David made these testimonies his delight and his counsellors; and because public affairs employed him in the daytime, he made them his study in the night; and thus he became wiser than his enemies, and of more understanding than all his teachers.

It therefore having pleased the Divine Providence, to the great joy and satisfaction of the whole nation, to appoint your Majesty the governor of his people, and the nursing-mother of his church; the law of Christ contained in the New Testament, must be both the rule of your Majesty's government, and of the obedience of your subjects.

We hope that God hath raised up your Majesty to be, as Queen Elizabeth was formerly, a signal blessing to this nation, and a great advancer of its happiness; a bulwark to the protestant religion, and a scourge and terror to its enemies: and that if any thing hath hitherto been wanting, to render us a truly religious, and so a happy people, and a glorious church, your Majesty is reserved to put the finishing hand to that blessed work; which, by rendering this law of Christ, as David did the law of Moses, your counsellor and your delight, you will most happily perform.

Having, therefore, with as much diligence as I could, finished this Commentary on the New Testament, I humbly lay it at your Majesty's feet, as being the defender of the faith contained in it; in which my only design was, to be a poor instrument to promote the glory of God, and the good of others.

May your Majesty's regard to this sacred law, by which you also must be judged, be such, that it may prolong your days in your kingdom, make your way prosperous, and your affairs successful: that as it was said of the immortal Elizabeth, that "in wisdom and the happiness of her reign, she exceeded all that went before her;" so your Majesty may exceed her in wisdom to govern, in length of days, successful undertakings, great ministers, and obedient subjects, to the joy of all your people, and the support of all your allies.

May your Majesty's study of this royal law of love, this gospel of peace, this perfect bond of unity, direct you to promote the peace and union of your subjects, and excite your zeal to allay the heats, and silence the unhappy contests, which, to the scandal of religion, and the great reproach of the church, have been of late so warmly prosecuted, and so perniciously fomented, that as the first Christian emperor,* born in your Majesty's dominions, finding the clergy accusing and condemning one another, did by his wisdom, his powerful persuasions, and his mild behaviour, reduce them all to a happy union, and entire concord in all things; so may this be the great felicity of your reign in the present, and your lasting character and glory in succeeding ages.

And when you have made this church glorious, and this nation happy, by your auspicious reign; after a length of days, in which you have governed to the glory of God, and to the welfare of your people, may you enter late upon the Christian recompence of all your labours, that crown of glory which fadeth not away. So prayeth,

* Euseb. de Vita Constant. lib. iii. cap. 13.

Dread Sovereign,

Your Majesty's most faithful

And most humbly devoted subject,

DANIEL WHITBY.

PREFACE

TO THE READER.

COURTEOUS READER,

THOUGH what I offer to thy perusal is the result of fifteen years' study, yet have I found it deficient in two things especially;

I. In an exact and particular account of all the places mentioned in this Commentary, and especially in the Acts of the Apostles; and this defect I have endeavoured to supply by a map of them drawn by a kind friend of great ability in those matters, and by an Alphabetical Table of them, with some brief remarks relating chiefly to the New Testament.

And finding a Chronology of the New Testament done to my hand by a very exact and learned prelate of our church, from which my Commentary no where differs; I have added that also for the reader's use.

II. Whereas it may be deemed a defect in this Commentary, that I have said nothing of the two great controversies concerning the genealogy of St. Luke;

First, Whether Cainan did originally belong to it, or indeed ought to do so;

Secondly, Whether St. Luke intended there to give us the genealogy of Joseph from Nathan, as St. Matthew had given it from his brother Solomon; or rather the genealogy of the Virgin Mary from her father Heli, as is of late imagined;

I do ingenuously confess, with venerable Bede,* that I declined these controversies, and more especially the first, propter ingenii tarditatem, for I had seen this controversy handled with exact judgment, and great variety of learning, by the reverend Dr. Mills upon the place; and knowing that I must not be permitted to blow upon his book, I despaired of doing it so well as he hath done, and so declined the doing it at all, till that very valuable book should be made public; which being not yet done, I shall present the reader with my present thoughts upon the two forementioned questions:

First, Whether Cainan was originally in the genealogy of St. Luke, or ought to be accounted a part of it? And because the decision of this question depends much upon another, whether this Cainan (who is not to be found in the Hebrew copies, either in the tenth or eleventh chapters of Genesis, or in 1 Chron i. or in any of the Jewish Targums, or owned by any Jewish writer of that time) was to be found in the exactest copies of the seventy interpreters from the beginning, or rather was wanting in the first and the best copies of the Septuagint, as well as in all Hebrew copies; I shall begin with the discussion of that controversy. And that he was not originally there, or was designedly put in there, will be made probable from these considerations:

1. That Josephus declares that Shem had only five sons, (Σήμῳ πέντε γίνονται παῖδες, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7.) and not six, as he must have had if Cainan were his son. He adds, that Abraham* was the tenth from Noah, and that Berosus, who lived before the seventy interpreters, spake of him as of one born δεκάτῃ γενεᾷ,† in the tenth generation from the flood. Eupolemus in Eusebius‡ asserts the same thing; and Philo§ adds, that as Noah was the tenth from Adam, so Abraham was δέκατος, the tenth from Noah; whereas, if Cainan be to be reckoned betwixt Arphaxad and Salah, Abraham must be the eleventh generation from the flood. Whence it is easy to collect, That neither the Jews of Jerusalem, nor of Alexandria, though they used the Greek version, owned this Cainan; but by their received computation that Abraham was the tenth from Noah, and was born two hundred and ninety-two years after the flood, must exclude him: and that, seeing both Philo and Josephus usually follow the Septuagint in other matters, and yet so plainly depart from them in this, we have cause to believe that they, who thought this Cainan was not to be inserted betwixt Arphaxad and Salah, found him not so inserted in the exactest copies of the Septuagint, or knew that he was put in by design.

2. The Chronicon of Eusebius gives a particular account of the sons of Shem from Africanus, from the Septuagint and from the Samaritan translation: and this account runs thus,—Arphaxad,‖ being a hundred and thirty-five years old, say Africanus and the Septuagint, a hundred and thirty, saith the Samaritan translation, begat Salah. And Theophylus,¶ who understood only Greek, and so must have his account from the Septuagint, says, Arphaxad being a hundred and thirty-five years old, ἐτέκνωσε Σαλὰ, begat Salah, taking no notice of Cainan in the Greek; though he is inserted into the Latin translation: whence also we may reasonably infer that Theophylus, Africanus, Eusebius, living among the Jews, the one at Antioch, the second at Nicopolis, the third at Cæsarea in Palestine, either found him not in the exacter copies of the Septuagint, or found reason to believe he should not have been there. Moreover, St. Jerome, in his book of Hebrew traditions, saith, The sons of Shem were Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram, and that Arphaxad begat Selah, making no mention of Cainan: whence also I infer, he either did not find him in the Septuagint, or thought he should not have been there; but rather, that as the Septuagint added so many hundred years to the account, which Moses had given of the age of the world before and after the flood, so also did they designedly add this Cainan to swell up the account, and make it to accord the better with the large computations given of it by the Egyptians and Chaldeans. Add to this,

3. That as this Cainan is not to be found in all the Old Testament, either in the Targums, or in any version besides that of the Septuagint, nor in the Samaritan, the Vulgar, the Syriac, or Arabic, so neither is he to be found in the recapitulation of these genealogies, 1 Chron. i. in any copies of the Septuagint, save only that of Alexandria. Now, if the authors of these versions had believed that Moses had put in this Cainan in Genesis, why do they always leave him out, both there and in this recapitulation? And why is he left out in the translation of the Septuagint in this recapitulation? This, as it seems to intimate that the translation of this recapitulation was made by another hand from that which gave us the Greek version of the five books of Moses, so also to confirm the truth of the remark made by Procopius Gazæus,* that the Hebrew hath it thus; Arphaxad begat Salah, and that, " quæ deinde in medio ponuntur obelisco notata visuntur," the Cainan put between them in some copies of the Septuagint was marked with an obelisk, or with a note of reprobation.

Now hence it follows, that St. Luke could have no reason to insert this Cainan into his genealogy, because he found it in the Septuagint, it being not found in the Samaritan version, though it follows the Septuagint in speaking of the age of Arphaxad, Salah, and others, before they begat children, nor in the copies of the Septuagint, owned by Philo or Josephus, who follow them in other matters, and being noted with a mark of reprobation, where it was found, to intimate that it was designedly put in by them.

But then the Jews must have had a considerable objection against the veracity of St. Luke, had he so plainly added to their Scriptures, and their most ancient Targums, and their received genealogies, which surely must agree with their own Scriptures. And seeing neither the Alexandrian Jews, nor their own priest Josephus, nor any other Jew we read of, owned this Cainan in our Saviour's days, it must be a great stumbling-block to them to see that owned by a writer pretending to Divine inspiration under the New Testament, which two of their inspired writers so plainly had disowned and reprobated.

Moreover, the two first Christian authors which designedly give us an account of this matter, are, Theophylus, bishop of Antioch, and Julius Africanus, bred up at Alexandria, and living afterward at Emmaus, or Nicopolis, in Palestine; and they both shew, by their chronology, that they owned not this Cainan, though doubtless neither of them could be ignorant of what St. Luke had said concerning him, seeing the latter hath a set discourse of the difference, which seemed to be betwixt the genealogies of St. Matthew and St. Luke; and, therefore, had St. Luke canonized this Cainan, and rendered him authentic in his genealogy, they could not (we may reasonably suppose) have thus varied from what this evangelist had delivered, without some mention of St. Luke, or some reason assigned, why they thus differed from him. And,

Thirdly, Irenæus,† who also lived in the second century, not only saith, that the genealogy of St. Luke containeth seventy-two generations; for that this is the true reading appeareth against Isaac Vossius, not only from the note of Mr. Grabe upon the place, but also from the reason following: viz. That this was done, according to the seventy-two languages of all nations, which Christ recapitulated in himself; this being, as Mr. Grabe there notes, the received opinion, that the languages then used in the world were seventy-two. Now, if you so compute this genealogy as to exclude (ver. 24.) Matthan and Levi, and (ver. 26.) Cainan, or to exclude Jesus and Adam, as St. Peter doth Adam and Noah, when he saith, 2 Pet. xi. 5. that Noah was the eighth from Adam, the generations mentioned in this genealogy will be just seventy-two, whereas if Cainan be inserted, they must be seventy-three or seventy-five.

But then how this Cainan should so come into the text of St. Luke as to be found, though not in all MSS. there being several, saith Grotius,* which owned him not, yet in all versions from the Greek, is very difficult to conjecture; though, if we may credit able critics, it neither is without example nor without probability that it might be so.

It is not without example; for if we may credit the great Bochart,† some like unskilful hand, instead of Jacob, who bought the field near Shechem, (Gen. xxxiii. 18, 19.) hath put in Abraham; (Acts vii. 16.) which criticism being allowed, the whole difficulty of that text is removed, and the disagreement of it with the records of the Old Testament is taken away.

Nor doth it want its probability; for, seeing the Christians generally from the second century went into that false opinion, that the translation of the Septuagint was made by Divine inspiration, as you may read in the preface to St. Matthew, they finding this Cainan in the vulgar editions of the Septuagint, might put him in the margin, and afterward insert him into the genealogy of St. Luke. Nor will this lessen the authority of the New Testament in other places, in which we cannot have the like reason to suspect any alteration.

To proceed now to the second question, Whether St. Luke gives us the genealogy of Joseph from Nathan, as Matthew had given it from his brother Solomon, viz. the genealogy of Joseph from Heli his legal father, or rather the genealogy of Mary from her father Heli? To which I answer by these considerations:

First, That an account of a genealogy, which gives the plain and literal sense of the author's words, deserveth much to be preferred before another, which puts a manifest force upon them. Now if you make this of St. Luke a genealogy not of Joseph, but only of the Virgin Mary by her supposed father Heli, you put a manifest force upon his words; for then Christ was ὡς ἐνομίζετο υἱὸς Ἰωσὴφ τοῦ Ἡλὶ, as was supposed the son of Joseph, who was the son of Heli, must be thus filled up, ὄντως δὲ τῆς Μαρίας τῆς θυγατρὸς τοῦ Ἡλὶ, but was indeed the son of Mary, the daughter of Heli. Now is it probable, that if St. Luke had intended to signify all this to his reader, so exact a Grecian, as he was, should have done it so obscurely, and so unintelligibly from his words, that totius antiquitatis opinio, the whole stream of antiquity, saith Maldonate,‡ should, with a full consent, follow the contrary opinion of Africanus, that this was the genealogy of Joseph by his legal father, according to which interpretation the sense of St. Luke's words is plain and literal? Add to this, that the words ὢν ὡς ἐνομίζετο may be well rendered thus, being as the law allows, or in the sense of the law, the son of Joseph, (as I shall prove in the note upon these words, οὗ ἐνομίζετο προσευχὴ εἶναι, Acts xvi. 13.) Now thus Christ was assuredly the son of Joseph, all law allowing the fruit of the wife's womb, if it be male, to be reputed and called the son of the husband,* and then St. Luke will accord exactly with St. Matthew in declaring Christ to be the son of Joseph, because he was the husband of Mary, ἐξ ἧς, of whom was born Jesus called Christ. (Matt. i. 16.)

* In Gen. xi.

† " Propter hoc Lucas genealogiam, quæ est à generatione Domini nostri ad Adam, Septuaginta duas generationes habere ostendit,—significans quoniam ipse est qui omnes gentes—et universas linguas—in semetipso recapitulans est." (Lib. iii. cap. 33.)

* In locum. † Hieroz. lib. ii. p. 436. ‡ On Matt. i. 16.

And, secondly, Whereas it is said that the genealogy of Joseph is nothing to the purpose, since that will not avail at all to prove that Christ was of the seed of David; I answer, that this objection seems neither true nor well grounded.

1. It is not true, for both the evangelists do in effect declare that they intended only to give us the legal or supposed genealogy of Christ from Joseph, by virtue of his being the husband of Mary, of whom Christ was born; and, therefore, though Matthew says, Jacob begat Joseph, he does not say, and Joseph begat Jesus, who is called Christ; but only that he was the husband of Mary, of whom Christ was born; and Luke saith he was, as was supposed, or in construction of law, the son of Joseph: if then all this be nothing to the purpose, both these inspired writers must have been moved by the Holy Ghost to write that which was nothing to the purpose. Again, it was taken for granted by all the Jews, that Joseph was as truly the father of Christ, as Mary was his mother, as we learn from Matt. xiii. 55. Luke iv. 22. John vi. 42. what then could be more to the purpose of the authors of these genealogies, than to prove that, according to their apprehensions of him, he might be, yea he must be, the son of David, as Joseph was? especially since they well knew the Jews would never grant, or aver, to invalidate this argument, that Christ was miraculously born of a virgin, since that must prove he was the Son of God, and their Messiah, and so by certain and avowed consequence the son of David.

2. I add, That this objection seems not to be well grounded; for though it be commonly supposed, these genealogies were designed to prove, that Jesus was the son of David according to the flesh, I see no cogent reason to believe or grant that supposition: for,

1. It is certain that these genealogies could never be designed to prove that which they do not prove, for then these sacred writers must have failed in their design; if then they do not prove this, but only that Jesus was the son of Joseph by being the son of his wife Mary, they could not be designed to prove more. Moreover, the genealogy of St. Matthew could never prove this to the Jews, unless they owned that Mary was of the family of David: and if this was then owned by the Jews, what need was there to prove that to them, which so infallibly followed from it, that the fruit of her womb was of the same family? The genealogy of St. Luke doth not prove it, because there is not one word of Mary, or any other woman in it; nor would the express saying in it, that Mary the mother of Jesus was the daughter of Heli, prove it, unless they owned her so to be; which, had they done, (as the proof of this to them would have been needless, so) why is it that the kindred of our Lord delivered a contrary tradition to this? Why do Africanus, Eusebius,* Epiphanius,† St. Jerome,‡ all born or living in Palestine, run into that opinion which is so inconsistent with it, viz. that Joseph himself was only in construction of law the son of Heli? Why is it that none of the ancient Christians ever owned it? To oppose against this tradition and unanimous consent of Christians, an impious and lying vision of the Talmud of a doubtful construction, as Dr. Lightfoot confesseth, is as if I should oppose to the tradition of all Christians, that our Saviour was born of a virgin, the blasphemous tales of the same Talmud,§ that Mary was a whore, and that Christ was the bastard of one Pandeira.

2. There was no need to prove this by genealogies, because it was more fully and demonstratively done by those miracles to which our Saviour still appealed, as the great evidence that he was the Messiah promised to the Jews; for the Jews owned this as evident from Scripture, by saying, Hath not the Scripture said, That Christ cometh of the seed of David? (John vii. 42.) Hence, say the scribes and pharisees dogmatically, Christ is the son of David. (Matt. xxii. 42.) Nor was any thing more notorious to the Jews; whence the blind men cry out, Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on us, Mark x. 47, 48. so doth the woman of Canaan, Matt. xv. 22. so did the multitude, singing at Christ's entrance into Jerusalem, Hosanna to the son of David, Matt. xxi. 9. 15. Wherefore, those miracles which demonstrated Christ was the true Messiah promised to the Jews, must as effectually prove to them, that he was the son of David according to the flesh.

3. The Jews confessed that Mary was the mother of Jesus, (Matt. xii. 46. xiii. 55. John vi. 42.) and that Joseph was his father; if, therefore, they had then certain genealogical tables of the family of Joseph and Mary, they must sufficiently shew to them of what family Christ was; if they had not, why do St. Matthew and St. Luke appeal to them to prove the family of Joseph? Hence doth St. Peter, in his discourse to the men of Israel, take this for granted, That Christ was the fruit of the loins of David, Acts ii. 30, 31. and St. Paul twice asserts it, Rom. i. 3. 2 Tim. ii. 8. Nor do we find that this assertion met with the least contradiction from the mouth of scribe or pharisee, or any other Jew; for though they say, Doth not the Scripture teach, That Christ cometh of the seed of David, and out of the town of Beth-lehem? (John vii. 42.) they say not one word against our Saviour's being the Christ upon the first account, and thereby tacitly confess, that they could not deny it, but only doubt he was not of Beth-lehem, but came out of Galilee, whence arose no prophet, (ver. 41. 52.) Indeed, all that the latter Jews say against this, they argue from these very genealogies, as being either not sufficient to prove it, or inconsistent the one with the other.

Add to this, first, That it is certain from the Scripture, to the Christian, that Mary, of whom Christ was born, was of the family of David; for thus the angel speaks to her, Luke i. 31, 32. Thou shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Jesus, and the Lord shalt give him the throne of his father David: now she must be a daughter of the house of David, of whose son David was the father. The inspired hymn of Zacharias declares, that God, by giving them this son of Mary, had raised up for them a horn of salvation in the house of his servant David, (ver. 69.) This son of Mary was therefore of the house of David. Secondly, All the fathers, saith Maldonate,* do with one mouth assert, That Joseph and Mary were of the same tribe and family; and this the Jews never gainsaid, though they must, by their genealogical tables, know the truth or falsehood of it. Now this being once granted, nothing could be farther wanting, when it was proved that Joseph was the son of David, to prove, if that were the design of these sacred writers, that our Lord sprang from Abraham and David according to the flesh; nor is it to be wondered, that they should rather give us the genealogies of Joseph than of Mary, if either of them proved the same thing; and genealogies among the Jews were never made from women, but always from the men.

* Τὰ γὰρ ἐκ γυναικὸς τέκνα χωρὶς πατρὸς τετίμηται, υἱὸς ἐστιν ἐξ ἀνάγκης τοῦ ἀνδρὸς καὶ τῆς γυναικός, οἱ τρόποι βούλεται θεὸς εἶναι υἱὸν τῷ ἀνδρί, ἢ διὰ συναφείας, ἢ χωρὶς συναφείας. (Pseudo Just. qu. et resp. qu. 133.)

* Euseb. H. Eccl. lib. i. cap. 7.

And, lastly, Whereas it is represented (in opposition to the account which Africanus, and from him all the ancients, give us of the conciliation of these genealogies) as a thing highly improbable, and even next to impossible, that at so great a distance of time, as was from Solomon and Nathan to Jacob and Heli, that Jacob and Heli should be brethren; I answer, That as none of the ancient Christians, who generally followed Africanus, perceived this impossibility, so doth Africanus† himself sufficiently clear his opinion from it, by saying, as it were in answer to it, That the families from Solomon and Nathan were so mixed, partly by second marriages, partly by raising up the name of the dead, (according to the law, Lev. xxv. 24, 25. Ruth iv. 5.) and partly by raising up seed to the dead, (according to the law, Deut. xxv. 5.) that we may reasonably conceive the same persons might be brethren in both.

CONCERNING

AND OF

CONTENTS.

§. I. The general proposition, that the apostles and evangelists indited these Scriptures by the assistance of the Holy Ghost. This proposition is explained by a comparison of this assistance with the gift of prophecy vouchsafed to the penmen of the Old Testament. §. II. How far this assistance is asserted, as to an inspiration of suggestion, and as to an inspiration of direction. §. III. No slips of memory, no determination of matters of practice from human wisdom only, without the intendence or direction of the Holy Spirit, no arguments that are inconclusive, must be admitted in these sacred writings. §. IV. This Divine assistance is proved, (1.) From what they do assert concerning their own writings, doctrines, and directions. §. V. (2.) From the assistance of the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to them. §. VI. (3.) From our Lord's promise to lead them by this Spirit into all truth. §. VII. (4.) From the end for which they were indited, to be a rule of faith and manners to all ages. §. VIII. (5.) From the testimony of the Christians of the first ages, who still owned and received them as such. §. IX. In confirmation of the truth of Christianity it is alleged, (1.) That if a Messiah was to come from Judea at that time, according to the general expectation of the east, he must be our Messiah. (2.) That no reasonable person, who was not the true Messiah, would have undertaken to fulfil the prophecies of the Old Testament concerning the Messiah. (3.) That none but the true Messiah could accomplish the things declared in the New Testament to be the characters of the Messiah. §. X. Secondly, This is argued from what is said in the New Testament, of what Christ, and what his apostles, and those who believed in him, should do in his name; where is shewed the vanity of all that is offered by way of comparison of what was done by others, with what was done by Christ and his disciples; and also of the pretence, that Christians did the things which they performed by the art of magic. §. XI. Thirdly, From the truth and certainty of our Lord's resurrection from the dead. §. XII. and XIII. Fourthly, From the manifold predictions of our Lord, exactly verified; and especially from those which concerned the destruction of Jerusalem, and the judgments which should come upon the Jewish nation for their infidelity.

THAT these sacred writings may have their due effect and influence upon us, I shall endeavour, as well as I am able,

First, To establish their Divine authority: whence it will follow,

Secondly, That the doctrines and instructions delivered in them, are to be owned as the rules and doctrines of our Lord, and so are necessary to be believed and practised by all that bear the name of Christians. My first assertion therefore is,

§. I. That the apostles and evangelists indited these Scriptures by the assistance of the Holy Ghost, and that, as the immediate succeeding ages did, so we at present securely may, rely upon them as a rule of faith. And here I shall consider,

1. How this assistance may fitly be explained.
2. How far it is necessary or reasonable to assert it.
3. What evidence may be offered to confirm it.

For explication of this Divine assistance, let it be considered,

1. That prophecy is sometimes represented as the word of the Lord, and he is said to speak to the prophet; and, suitably to this metaphor, some illustration of the assistance of the Holy Spirit may be made from the analogy it bears to human conversation, thus: That as we convey our thoughts one to another by such words as, by the organs of hearing, make such a motion on their brain to whom we speak, as gives them an idea of the words we utter, and by them of the things which by those words are signified; and so it is the impression made upon their brain, which doth communicate our thoughts to them; so, when it pleaseth God to reveal his will to any person, it seemeth only necessary that he talk inwardly with them, that is, that he make such a motion on their brains as giveth them a deep and clear idea of that which he intendeth to make known unto them; only the impression must be then made in such a manner and degree, and with such circumstances, as may make it certain to the inspired person, that it derives from God. Now seeing, when we hear the voice of any one, or receive a letter from him, we may be certain from the knowledge we have of his voice, or his hand-writing, that it is he indeed, who speaks or writeth to us: we may very well conceive, that God can easily give such distinctive marks of what he inwardly speaks to us, or writes upon the tables of our hearts, as shall enable us to discern what he imprints upon them, from any impression that shall otherwise be made upon them.

* On Matt. i. 16.

† Συνιπτλάκη γὰρ τὰ γένη—ἀναστάσιν ἀτέκνων, καὶ δευτερογαμίαις, καὶ ἀναστάσει σπερμάτων, ὡς δικαίως τοὺς αὐτοὺς ἄλλοτε ἄλλων νομίζεσθαι. (Apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. 7.)

2. Sometimes the prophet is in Scripture styled a seer, and his word a vision; and then the parallel, or the analogy, runs thus: As we see, by virtue of a light reflecting the species of things upon the retina of the eye, and thence deriving a peculiar motion to, and making a distinct impression on, the brain; so may the prophet be supposed to see what God reveals unto him, by a like motion of the Holy Spirit made upon his brain concerning it. And as it is as easy to propose a material object to the view, as to describe it by our words, so must it be as easy for God to dart such an impression or inward light upon the brain of the prophet, or spiritual man, as shall give him a more bright and sensible idea of things, than if he did perceive them by the ear, or even view them by the eye. And as we more exactly discern a sensible object by the view, than we know it by a description of it without that view; so the Jews say, that prophecy במראה in vision, is more excellent than that which comes only בחלום by dream, or in a dream, in which we seem to hear one talking with us.

Now though this impression may be sufficient to convince the prophet and inspired person, that his revelation did indeed derive from God: yet, since this revelation was intended not for himself, but for the use of others, he, with the revelation, must be enabled by some convincing proof, to evidence to those who were concerned to embrace it, that he was sent indeed by God with such a message to them. Now of this they only could be satisfied by some outward marks or notes, of which they, by their senses, were enabled to judge; viz. the miracles wrought for confirmation of his testimony, or some prophetical prediction of something future and contingent, exactly verified in the event. And thus, saith the apostle, was their preaching confirmed to the world; God bearing witness to them, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his will. (Heb. ii. 4.)

The ways of prophecy, under the Old Testament, seem to be comprehended under these four heads; viz. either the prophets received their revelation in a dream or trance, or in a vision, or by a voice from heaven, or by the secret suggestions of the Holy Ghost.

Now some of the apostles had their visions either by day, as Peter; for an ecstacy fell upon him, and he saw the heavens opened, and he heard a voice saying to him, Arise, Peter, kill and eat; (Acts x. 13.) and this is called ὅραμα, a vision, ver. 17. and by this, saith he, God taught me to call no man common or unclean, ver. 28.—or by night; thus a vision of the night was seen by St. Paul, and a man speaking to him in the vision of the night. (Acts xvi. 9.) They had also the Spirit speaking to them; for the Spirit said to Peter, Behold, three men seek thee. Arise therefore, and go with them, nothing doubting: for I have sent them. (Acts x. 19, 20.) And sometimes they had visions and revelations of the Lord, either by way of rapture to them, (2 Cor. xii. 2.) or of converse with them; as when Christ said to St. Paul, My grace is sufficient for thee, (ver. 9.) Here then are three kinds of revelation granted to the apostles; but then these things were mostly occasional and accidental to them, in respect of their apostolical function.

Only the case of the apostle Paul must here admit of an exception; for it being necessary for an apostle, that is a witness of Christ's resurrection, to have seen the Lord risen from the dead, according to those words, Am I not an apostle? have I not seen the Lord? (1 Cor. ix. 1.) and for an apostle, not of man, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, (Gal. i. 1.) to receive his message immediately from the Lord Jesus, Christ speaks thus to him, I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of those things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee: (Acts xxvi. 16.) which words contain a promise of an immediate instruction from Christ in his apostolical function. Whence this apostle declares, confirming that his declaration with an oath, The gospel, which was preached by me, was not after man; for I neither received of man, neither was I taught it (by man), but (only) by the revelation of Jesus Christ. (Gal. i. 11, 12.) He therefore had his message from Christ, as Moses had from God, Christ speaking to him mouth to mouth, &c. (Numb. xii. 7.)

But yet that which enabled them for the inditing of these writings, as a rule of faith to all succeeding ages, was the internal and powerful assistance of the Holy Spirit.

§. II. To proceed then to the second inquiry, How far it is necessary or reasonable to assert the Divine assistance of the Holy Spirit, or his inspiration to these sacred writers. To this I shall answer, by premising a distinction of the Jews, between those sacred writers who were prophets, properly so called, and the chetubim, or holy writers, who penned their compositions by the assistance of the Holy Ghost.

To the prophets, properly so called, they ascribe an immediate suggestion and representation in their fancy and imaginations of the things which they delivered as from the mouth, and in the name of God, he keeping still alive upon them the images and resemblances of the visions which they saw, till they were penned, and imprinting on their memories the messages which they delivered by his command to the people. Hence, when the roll of Jeremy was burnt, he was enabled to dictate again to Baruch the same words, (xxxvi. 32.) And this I believe to be true, concerning all the visions they declare they saw, and all the messages they deliver with this preface, Thus saith the Lord, or The word of the Lord came to N. N. saying; but I do not think it necessary, with reference to the historical things related in the writings of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, which the Jews style the former prophets, or with respect to the historical relations contained in the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, &c.

To the chetubim, or holy writers, who penned their writings by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, they ascribe,

1. An impulse from God to write or compose them, but such as left them to the use of their own words, and to the exercise of their reasons.

2. A superintendency of the Holy Spirit over them, and a Divine assistance still cleaving to them in those compositions, so that they should not be obnoxious to any error or mistake in what they did indite; that assistance, which they ascribe to their prophets, by latter writers is called "an inspiration of suggestion;" the second, or the assistance of the chetubim, "an inspiration of direction" only.

And this assistance was thought inferior to that of prophecy, not as to the certainty of the revelation, or the subject matter, but only as to the degree and measure of it; for, because there was in these compositions no visum prophetium, i. e. no vision exhibited, nor did they speak in this high strain, Thus saith the Lord, therefore they thought they were not to be styled prophets, in the proper acceptation of the word. And I conjecture that it is for this latter reason only that they put the prophet Daniel not among the prophets, but the hagiographi, or sacred writers; because he never useth these expressions, Thus saith the Lord, or saith, The word of the Lord came unto me; since otherwise in visions he was scarce inferior to any of the other prophets. Nor is it easy to conjecture in what this way, whether of revelation, or Divine assistance, and inspiration by the Holy Ghost, should be inferior to the former. For,

First, Sure it is no disparagement to this way, that persons acted by it do not express themselves in * parables, similitudes, and riddles, but use a more familiar language, and appear in a more simple undisguising dress, and so more advantageously condescend to the capacity of the reader. Nor,

Secondly, That it doth not act so much on the † imagination and the fancy, but is principally seated in the higher and purer faculties of the soul, which is the second difference assigned between them. Nor,

Thirdly, That it chiefly ‡ moveth the inspired person to dictate matters of true piety and goodness, of virtue, wisdom, and prudence; these differences, if assigned truly, seem to me to be advantages of this assistance, above that which usually was afforded to the ancient prophets, rather than tokens that it was really inferior to the inspiration they enjoyed.

And this will be more evident, if we compare this assistance of the Holy Spirit with that gradus Mosaicus which the Jews generally account the highest or supreme degree of prophecy, and is recorded in these words, If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known to him in a vision, and will speak to him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all my house. With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold. (Numb. xii. 6—8.) Whence the Jews gather these several excellences of the prophetic gift of Moses above what was vouchsafed to the other prophets; viz.

First, That all other * prophets prophesied by dream or by vision, but Moses prophesied when he was waking, and standing. Now this also did the spiritual person, moved by the Holy Ghost.

Secondly, That other † prophets prophesied by the hand of an angel, and therefore saw what they saw in ‡ parables and dark speeches; but Moses spake immediately from the mouth of God, and without parables or dark speeches; and so also did the spiritual person speak under the gospel dispensation, not by any angel, but by that Spirit which searcheth the deep things of God; not in parables and dark riddles, but with great plainness of speech.

Thirdly, That all the prophets were afraid, and troubled, and fainted, but Moses was not so: nor was it so with our apostles. Moreover there was strength, say they, in Moses to understand the words of the prophecy; and so was there also in the prophets to understand the revelations of the Spirit. So that you see this way of assistance gave to the penmen of the New Testament all these prerogatives of Moses above the other prophets; and so I know not why it should be reckoned inferior to their way of prophecy, upon those very accounts for which the way of prophecy vouchsafed to Moses is preferred above them, especially if we consider that St. Peter lays this as the true foundation of their credibility, that they spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. (2 Pet. i. 21.)

But it is of no great moment to insist on this comparison, since the sacred writers of the second order, styled hagiographi, are said to be so far attended with the Divine assistance in their compositions, as that they could not be obnoxious in them to error or mistake in what they writ, which is abundantly sufficient to render all their compositions a certain and unerring rule of faith, in what they have delivered as the object of it.

To proceed then to the consideration of the distinction hinted before; viz. of inspiration by suggestion, and inspiration of direction only. I say, then,

First, That where there is no antecedent idea or knowledge of the things written for the good of others, to be obtained from reason, or a former revelation, an inspiration of suggestion must be vouchsafed to the apostles, to enable them to make them known unto the world. But where there is an antecedent knowledge of the things to be indited, it can only be necessary that God should either immediately, or by some special occasions, excite them to indite those things, and should so carefully preside over and direct their minds whilst writing, as to suggest or bring into their memories such things as his wisdom thought fit to be written, and should not suffer them to err in the delivery of what was thus indited in his name, or as apostles of God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ. And therefore,

Secondly, In all their revelations of mysteries, or things which could not otherwise be made known to them, either by natural reason or antecedent revelation, they must be acknowledged to have had them by an immediate suggestion of the Holy Spirit. Hence of these things the apostle says negatively, that the natural man (who only judges of things by his natural reason) cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned; (1 Cor. ii. 14.) i. e. they, being mysteries, can only be discerned by the revelation of the Spirit; and positively, that they speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the wisdom hid from former ages, which eye had not seen, nor ear heard, nor had it entered into the heart of man to conceive; (1 Cor. ii. 7.) and that because God had revealed these things to them by his Spirit, (ver. 9.) they having received the Spirit of God, that they might know the things which are freely given to us of God, (ver. 10.) Thus was the mystery of the calling of the gentiles into an equality of privileges with the believing Jews made known unto them; for God by revelation (saith St. Paul) made known to me the mystery of Christ, which in other ages was not made known as it is now revealed to his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, that the gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel: (Eph. iii. 3—6. i. 9. vi. 19. Col. i. 26, 27. ii. 2. iv. 3, 4.) so they knew the mystery of the recalling of the Jews; (Rom. xi. 25, 26.) the mystery of the resurrection, i. e. the quality of the bodies to be raised, and the order of it, with all the other special circumstances mentioned 1 Cor. xv. 1 Thess. iv. and the apostacy of the latter times; for the Spirit speaketh expressly (saith the apostle), that in the latter days men shall depart from the faith. (1 Tim. iv. 1.) This inspiration of suggestion must also be allowed to St. John, the author of the Revelation; for he speaking only what was represented to him in visions, or by angelical discourses or apparitions, must have that assistance which suggested these ideas to him. But,

Thirdly, As for those things which they did know already, either by natural reason, education, or antecedent revelation, they needed only such an assistance or direction in them as would secure them from error in their reasonings, or in their confirmation of their doctrines by passages contained in the Old Testament; and therefore a continual suggestion must be here unnecessary. And indeed one great work they had upon their hands, both in preaching the gospel and writing these gospels and epistles, being to convince the unbelieving Jew, or to confirm the wavering Jew, or rectify the errors of the Judaizing Christian, the gift of knowledge of the Scriptures of the Old Testament was very necessary to them, and therefore is deservedly reckoned among the primary gifts of the Holy Ghost; and being so, we have reason to believe, that either the Holy Ghost suggested to their memory those Scriptures which they used in these sacred writings to convince them, or else presided so over them as not to suffer them to make any inferences from them which were not agreeable to the true intent and meaning of them; though, at this distance of time, we may not always be able to discern the strength and clearness of the consequence. And,

Fourthly, In writing the historical parts of the New Testament, or matters of fact relating to themselves or others, it is only necessary, that what is there delivered as matter of fact should truly be performed, as it is said to have been done; but it is not necessary that they should be related in that order of time in which they were performed, unless that also be affirmed of them; for this must be sufficient to assure us of the truth of what they thus delivered.

Moreover, in writing the discourses contained in these books, it is not necessary that the very words should be suggested or recorded in which they were first spoken, but only that the true intent and meaning of them should be related, though in diversity of words. Though the promise made to the apostles by our Lord, that the Holy Spirit should bring to their remembrance, πάντα, all things which he had said unto them, John xiv. 26. doth fairly plead for this exactness in what they have delivered of our Saviour's sermons; it being scarce imaginable their memory, without Divine assistance, should exactly give us all that was spoken in such long discourses.

And hence we may account for the objections against this Divine assistance, arising from the seventh of the Acts; for though I have shewed in the note on ver. 15, 16. that there is no real mistake in the words of the protomartyr, yet were it granted, that there is an error in his account of the sepulchres of the patriarchs, yet that affects not the authority of St. Luke at all, provided he exactly hath related what was then said by St. Stephen, who was not chosen to be a penman of the Holy Scriptures.

Lastly, From what is thus discoursed, it may appear, that I contend only for such an inspiration or Divine assistance of the sacred writers of the New Testament, as will assure us of the truth of what they write, whether by inspiration of suggestion, or direction only; but not for such an inspiration as implies, that even their words were dictated, or their phrases suggested to them by the Holy Ghost. This in some matters of great moment might be so, St. Paul declaring, That they spake the things which were given them of God in the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, 1 Cor. ii. 13. if that relate not to what the Holy Ghost had taught them out of the Old Testament. But that it was not always so is evident, both from the consideration that they were hagiographers, who are supposed to be left to the use of their own words, and from the variety of the style in which they write, and from the solecisms which are sometimes visible in their compositions; and more especially from their own words, which manifestly shew, that in some cases they had no such suggestions from the Holy Ghost, as doth imply, that he had dictated those words unto them. For instance, when St. Paul declares his will or purpose to do what he was hindered by the providence of God from doing; as when he saith to the Romans, When I go into Spain, I will come to you, xv. 24. I will come by you into Spain, ver. 28. For though he might, after his enlargement, go into the west, where St. Clemens* saith, he preached; and even into Spain, as Cyril,† Epiphanius,‡ and Theodoret § say he did; yet it is certain he did not designedly go to Rome in order to an intended journey into Spain. And when he saith to the Corinthians, I will come to you when I pass through Macedonia, 1 Cor. xvi. 5. and yet confesseth in his second epistle, 2 Cor. i. 15—17. that he did not perform that journey; for it is not to be thought that the Holy Ghost should incite him to promise, or even purpose, what he knew he would not perform. This also we learn from all those places in which they do express their ignorance or doubtfulness of that which they are speaking of; as when St. Paul saith, I know not whether I baptized any other: (1 Cor. i. 16.) and again, τυχὸν παραμενῶ, perhaps I will abide, yea, and winter with you: (1 Cor. xvi. 6.) and when St. Peter saith, by Sylvanus, a faithful brother, as I suppose, have I written to you: (1 Pet. v. 12.) for these words plainly shew, that in all these things they had no inspiration or Divine assistance. This, lastly, may be gathered from all those places in which they only do express their hope, and that conditionally, of doing this or that—as in these words; I hope to see you in my journey: (Rom. xv. 24.) I will come unto you quickly, if the Lord will: (1 Cor. iv. 19.) I hope to stay some time with you, if the Lord permit: (1 Cor. xvi. 7.) I hope in the Lord Jesus to send Timothy quickly to you; (Phil. ii. 19. 23.) and I trust that I myself also shall come quickly: (ver. 24.) these things I write, hoping to come to thee quickly, but if I should tarry that thou mayest know how to behave thyself in the church of God: (1 Tim. iii. 14, 15.) I hope by your prayers to be given to you: (Philem. 22.) This will we do if the Lord permit: (Heb. vi. 3.) I hope to come to you: (2 John 12. 3 John 14.) For, (1.) Spes est incertæ rei nomen, the word hope implieth an uncertainty, whereas the Holy Spirit cannot be uncertain of any thing; nor can we think he would inspire men to speak so uncertainly. And, (2.) There can be no necessity or even use of a Divine assistance to enable a man to express his hopes, seeing all men do by natural reflection know them.

§. III. And having thus declared what I do allow, I now proceed to shew what in this matter I cannot admit of:—

First, Then, I can by no means grant any slips of memory in the compilers of these sacred books of the New Testament; for though these are allowed by * some in matters of small consequence, as they are pleased to style them, yet is it of great consequence that we do not own them: for, if you grant they have thus slipped at all, by what rules can we be assured they have not slipped above a hundred times, or even in most of their historical relations? For instance, if St. Matthew could slip in citing the words of the prophet Jeremiah, by mistake, for the words of Zechariah, Matt. xxvii. 9. why not also in citing the words of the prophet Isaiah, or of any other prophet? If one of those sacred writers might be subject to these slips, why not all? If once, why not often? And can we think it no prejudice to the Divine authority of these sacred writings, that they should so oft be subject to false citations, and produce false stories, contradicting the truth of the Old Testament? Would not this yield a great advantage against our rule of faith, both to the unbelieving Jews, and to the sceptics and antiscripturists, which too much abound among us? Nor,

Secondly, Can I grant that the apostles determined any matters of practice merely from rules of human prudence, without the guidance and direction of the Holy Spirit; it is pretended, this is done by St. Paul in these words, To the rest speak I, not the Lord: (1 Cor. vii. 12.) and again in these, Concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord, but I give my judgment or advice, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be found faithful: I judge therefore this to be good for the present necessity: (ver. 25, 26.) and a third time, She is happier if she so remain, after my judgment, and I think also that I have the Spirit of God, (ver. 40.) This is not, saith one,* spoken with the authority of a teacher sent from God, or an apostle, but in such a style as implies only an ordinary assistance, such as any pious skilful pastor may expect.

Ans. To this I answer, 1. That what the apostle speaks of here, from ver. 12. to the 24th seemeth to be no slight matter, but of great importance to the good of societies, and to the honour of Christianity; for sure it would have been a signal blemish to the Christian faith, should it have tended to dissolve the bonds of matrimony, or given men or women licence to quit that sacred tie purely because they were termed Christians. And hence we find that the apostle had taken special care to prevent this imputation every where, by ordaining the very same thing in all other churches, which he here prescribes to the Corinthians. Though then he who had said before, To the married speak not I, but the Lord, 1 Cor. vii. 17. because that case had been particularly decided by Christ, Matt. xix. 9. says afterward, To the rest say I, not the Lord; he says not this to intimate that this direction only was given by him as a man using his natural reason, only to direct them to what he thought best, but not as delivering the mind of Christ, for he had before declared the contrary, by saying, We have the mind of Christ, (1 Cor. ii. 16.) and after doth it in these words, If any man think himself a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord; (xiv. 37.) but only to declare our Lord, in his discourse of divorce, had not decided the case "de imparibus conjugiis," of the marriage of a believer with an infidel, but had left this to the decision of those apostles to whom he had promised the assistance of the Holy Ghost to lead them into all truth. (John xvi. 13.)

Ans. 2. In the words cited with relation to the case of virgins, though the apostle owns he had no particular commandment of the Lord, as he had in the case of married persons, yet doth he say sufficient to convince us, that he advised in the matter not only as a man assisted by his natural reason, but also as one assisted by the Spirit of God: for,

First, Though, saith he, as to this, I have no particular command, I give my advice in it as one who hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be found faithful (in the discharge of my apostolical office). Now this, saith he, is all that is required of a minister of Christ, and steward of his mysteries, that he be found faithful in administering the grace of his apostleship. (1 Cor. iv. 12.) And this fidelity was still attended with the power of Christ, assisting them, as appears from these words, I thank Jesus Christ our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry. (1 Tim. i. 12.) So that this phrase doth not imply that the apostle had only an ordinary assistance in this advice, such as any skilful pious pastor may expect. And this is still more evident in those words, She is happier if she so abide after my judgment; and I think I have the Spirit of God (enabling me to form that judgment); for they who say, this is not spoken with the authority of an apostle, or a teacher sent from God, seem not to have considered that the apostle was writing to them who are apt to question his apostleship, and required a proof of Christ speaking in him; (2 Cor. xiii. 3.) and to them it was proper to say, Whatsoever you may conceive of me, I suppose I have the spirit of God, i. e. the spirit of wisdom, and knowledge to enable me to make this advice. Moreover, the words δοκῶ ἔχειν may be rendered, I have the spirit of God; so in this epistle, ὁ δοκῶν εἶναι φιλόνεικος is, he that is contentious, (xi. 16.) and εἴ τις δοκεῖ προφήτης, if any man be a prophet. (See the note there.) Nor,

Thirdly, Do I grant that St. Paul any where implies that he doth not always use the best arguments, but sometimes such as are best fitted to the capacities and notions of those he writes to; for if so, by what rules shall we be able to distinguish betwixt his arguments on which we may safely rely, as being absolutely true, and those which only are accommodated to the notions of those with whom he had to do? St. Paul doth indeed say, ἀνθρώπινον λέγω, I speak after the manner of men, or what is common to men, because of the infirmity of your flesh; (Rom. vi. 19.) but he speaks not this by way of excuse for not using the best argument he could in this affair, but he speaks this by way of illustration of his argument, or exhortation. The sense which the ancients put upon these words is this, τῇ φύσει μετρῶ τὴν παραίνεσιν, I frame my exhortation with a due consideration of the infirmity of your flesh, requiring only that you should do that service now to God, which you have formerly done to sin. I rather think the apostle discourseth to this effect: In this discourse of their being servants formerly to sin, and their obligation now to be servants to righteousness, I speak that which all natural men must have had experience of by reason of the infirmity of the flesh, and of which they may thence take a just idea, requiring only that as they have formerly yielded their members instruments to sin, so they would now yield them instruments to righteousness.

As for the arguments they use ad hominem, as they are very few, so is it only requisite that they should truly be convincing upon the principles which such men owned and received, there being nothing more intended by them, than to convince them, that such an inference doth naturally follow from their principle, and that they must either quit the tenet or admit the inference. For instance, when the apostle saith, Else what shall they do who are baptized for the dead? 1 Cor. xv. 29. he is there disputing against some of the Corinthians, who said, There is no resurrection of the dead. Now here he all along disputeth ad hominem, and on supposition; as, v. g. Then is Christ not risen from the dead: (ver. 13.) Then are we false witnesses of God: (ver. 15.) Then is your faith vain: (ver. 17.) Then they that sleep in Christ are perished: (ver. 18.) Then are Christians of all men the most miserable, (ver. 19, &c.) All which suppositions are really false, but then they follow from the foresaid tenet of those Corinthians; so that all this discourse is only an argument ab absurdo. But that the apostles any where use such arguments ad hominem, as proceed only on such principles as were generally admitted in their age, without considering whether they were true or false, I utterly deny.

§. IV. Having thus premised these things for the right stating and explication of the controversy, I proceed to lay down the arguments, which prove, that in these writings the apostles were assisted and preserved from error by the Spirit of God, and therefore were enabled to deliver to us an unerring rule of faith.

And, first, I argue for the Divine assistance of the inditers of these sacred records, from what they do assert concerning their own writings, and what they say touching the declarations made, the doctrines delivered, and the directions given in them. And,

As for the writers of the gospels, St. Luke declares, he writes his gospel to Theophilus, that he might know the certainty of those things in which he had been instructed; and St. John declares, his gospel was written, that they might believe that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God: now it is plain, that neither Theophilus could be certain of the truth of what he had been taught by any writing, which was not absolutely certain in itself; nor could others be induced by what St. John had written, to believe that Jesus was the Christ, unless they could be certain that he spake the truth throughout his gospel. Now if we do consider how many things contained in the beginning of St. Luke's gospel, he must have by hearsay; and how many long discourses, both he, St. Matthew, and St. John, deliver, as spoken by our Lord and others; of which we can have no assurance, after so many years before the writing of them, on the mere strength of human memory, so as to ground an article of Divine faith upon the very words in which they are delivered—we must be forced to conclude, that, upon this account, we cannot depend upon the very letter and minute circumstances of every discourse related by them, unless, according to Christ's promise, they had the assistance of the Holy Ghost to bring these things to their remembrance: wherefore this promise is made to them in very general and comprehensive terms; viz. The Holy Ghost shall bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you. (John xiv. 26.) And then there being nothing considerable in St. Mark, which is not also in St. Matthew or St. Luke, or both, the certainty of all that is contained in them, must make us also certain of the truth of what St. Mark delivers in his gospel. Moreover, the word spoken and indited by them, is styled the word of God: Men, saith the apostle, could not believe the gospel unless they heard it preached to them; nor could they hear it preached, unless some were commissionated to preach the gospel; for faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God: (Rom. x. 14—17.) and, for this cause (saith he) thank we God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth the word of God: (1 Thess. ii. 13.) I am made a minister of Christ (saith he), according to the dispensation of God which is given to me, to fulfil (i. e. fully to preach) the word of God. (Colos. i. 25.) 2. It is called the commandment of God; for my gospel, saith St. Paul, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, is made manifest, and according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known unto you for the obedience of faith; (Rom. xvi. 25, 26.) which faith is always built on a Divine testimony. And again, If any man be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord. (1 Cor. xiv. 37.) 3. It is declared to be the wisdom of God, 1 Cor. i. 24. for we preach Christ to you that are called, both Jews and Greeks, the power of God, and the wisdom of God; we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even that wisdom which God hath revealed to us by his Spirit. (1 Cor. ii. 7. 10.) 4. It is the testimony of God; for I come not to you (saith he) in excellency of speech, declaring to you the testimony of God. (1 Cor. ii. 1.) 5. It is the gospel of God: for St. Paul styles himself the minister of Jesus Christ to the gentiles, ministering the gospel of God to them: (Rom. xv. 16.) We preach (saith he) the gospel of God freely: (2 Cor. xi. 7.) We were bold to preach to you the gospel of God; we were willing to have imparted to you not the gospel of God only, but also our own lives, (1 Thess. ii. 2. 8, 9.) even the glorious gospel of the blessed God committed to my trust. (1 Tim. i. 10.) 6. It is the gospel of Christ; for I come (saith he) to Troas to preach Christ's gospel: (2 Cor. ii. 12.) We sent Timotheus, our fellow-labourer in the gospel of Christ. (1 Thess. iii. 2.) 7. It is the mystery of his will: (Eph. i. 9.) The mystery of God the Father, and of Christ: (Col. ii. 2.) The mind of Christ, made known to the apostles: (1 Cor. ii. 16.) and the word of Christ which must dwell richly in believers. (Col. iii. 16.)

Now sure it cannot rationally be conceived, that the apostles should be ignorant of that assistance by which they were enabled to indite these records; if then they were assured of that assistance of the Holy Spirit, which they challenged, then must the gospel, which they both preached and indited, be received as the word of God and Christ, the mind of Christ, the gospel of God and Christ, the mystery of God the Father and of Christ, the commandment and the testimony of God; which is the thing I am concerned to make good; and then it highly must concern all persons to be mindful of the commandments of the apostles of our Lord and Saviour. (2 Pet. iii. 2.) If they had no such assurance of the assistance of the Holy Spirit, they grossly did impose upon the world, in thus pretending, that they preached the gospel by the assistance of the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven. If they were not assured that in those writings they delivered only those doctrines, which God required all men to believe, those precepts he required them to do, they must be very confident, in daring to make this the preface to some of their epistles, Paul an apostle, according to the will and the commandment of God; (1 Cor. i. 1. 2 Cor. i. 1. Eph. i. 1. Col. i. 1. 1 Tim. i. 1. 2 Tim. i. 1.) and saying with so much assurance, If any be a prophet, let him acknowledge that the things I write unto you are the commandments of God: (1 Cor. xiv. 37.) and much more, in declaring to all Christians thus; We are of God: he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us: by this we know the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error. (1 John iv. 6.) For this seems equal to what their Master himself said in the like words, Why do ye not believe me? He that is of God heareth the words of God: you therefore hear them not, because you are not of God. (John viii. 46, 47.) Yea, they must be false witnesses of God, by styling human writings, the word, the gospel, the command, the testimony, the mind, the mystery, of God and Christ, and by requiring others to receive it, not as the word of man, but as the word of God, even that word by which they must be judged at the last day: (Rom. ii. 16.) which again runs as high as those words of Christ, The word that I have spoken, shall judge him that believeth it not at the last day. (John xii. 48.)

If here it be replied, that these things are rather said of the gospel which they preached, than of the gospels and the epistles which they writ: I answer,

First, That St. Peter saith of all St. Paul's epistles, that they were written according to the wisdom given to him, (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16.) even that wisdom which he styles the wisdom of God, and ascribes to the apostles in the general, saying, We speak the wisdom of God, &c. (1 Cor. ii. 6, 7.) that St. Paul himself requires all spiritual persons to acknowledge the things he writ unto them were the commandments of the Lord.

Secondly, I ask, whether the doctrines of faith and rules of life, delivered in the gospels and epistles, be not as much a part of the gospel, or the law of Christ, as any thing they preached? If they be a part of it, all these assertions must equally be true of their gospels and epistles written, and their sermons preached: if they be not, where shall we find, and how shall we be assured, that we have the gospel of our Lord; since we know nothing of it but from what is left on record in that New Testament, which contains all we have left of their preaching after the Spirit, promised to lead them into all truth, was fallen upon them? Or, why did all Christians, of that and the succeeding ages, depend upon them as their rule of faith? Moreover, that the apostles were assisted as fully by the Holy Ghost in what they writ as in what they preached, will be apparent from the consideration of their office, they having this assistance as being Christ's apostles, his ambassadors, the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. Now in the preface to their epistles, they take care to let the reader know, they who sent these epistles were apostles and ministers of Christ, according to the will and the commandment of God, (2 Tim. i. 1.) for (declaration of) the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus, for the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging the truth which is after godliness. (Tit. i. 1.) If therefore they had this assistance, because they were the ministers of Christ, the teachers of the Jew and gentile, in faith and verity; men who received grace and apostleship from Christ to the obedience of faith, and had the word of God committed to them according to the commandment of our God and Saviour; and they were truly discharging their office as well when they indited as when they preached the gospel;—they must be equally assisted in both.

This, lastly, will be evident from the consideration of the common end and design both of their writing and preaching: for the reason why this assistance attended them in preaching was, the benefit and edification of the church, the building her up in her most holy faith, the perfecting the saints, the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man; for to this end, Christ gave some, apostles; some, prophets and evangelists. (Eph. iv. 11—13.) Now, do not all these reasons equally belong to their writings? Were they not also intended and used for these very ends in all succeeding ages of the church? Did they not in them write the same things which they had preached, because this was for their safety? (Phil. iii. 1.) that, after their decease, they might have these things always in remembrance, (2 Pet. i. 15.) and that they might be mindful of the commandments of the apostles of our Lord? (iii. 1, 2.) Had they not the promise of the Spirit to assist them in their preaching, that they might guide their hearers into all truth? and, doth not the same reason hold more strongly for their writings, partly, because they were to remain when the apostles were dead, and could not be consulted, as they might be whilst living, when any scruple did arise touching their doctrine, and to serve for the instruction, not of one age only, as their preaching did, but of all ages of the Christian world? And, indeed, their preaching without writing, could not have answered the design of propagating the Christian faith to future ages; experience having taught us, that what is handed only by tradition to us, is subject to the greatest change and innovations: it being the pretended traditions of the Jewish church, which corrupted and made void the commandments of God, (Matt. xv. 6.) and the pretended traditions of the Romish church, which have turned their Christianity into a system of superstition and idolatry: for, as it is truly observed by Origen,* That which only is delivered by word of mouth, quickly vanisheth, as being of no certainty. So that if our blessed Lord designed the continuance of his gospel to the end of the world, he also must design the assistance of his apostles in the writing of it.

Now from this argument we may return an answer to that cavil, which some have made against the inspiration of the writings of the New Testament, That we meet not in them, as we do frequently in the Old, these words, Thus saith the Lord, or, The word of the Lord, by such or such a prophet. For,

1. We meet not with these words in all the chetubim, or the hagiographa, which yet all the Jews acknowledge to be written by the assistance of the Holy Ghost. Moreover, our Lord speaks of prophets sent by him, Matt. xxiii. 34. which implies, that they must be assisted in delivering their message by the Holy Ghost, as the prophets were.

2. When we meet with it in the prophets of the Old Testament, it is chiefly, if not only, when these prophets have a message from the Lord to the people; and when Christ sends his message to the seven churches, we find words of like import still repeated; viz. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; (Rev. ii. 7. iii. 22.) which whole phrase occurs not elsewhere, but only in the Revelation, or the words of the prophecy of St. John.

3. It is surely of like import to say, This I write to you by the word of the Lord: (1 Thess. iv. 15.) The word you received from us, is not the word of man, but of God; (ii. 13.) and I who preach it am his minister to fulfil the word of God: (Col. i. 35.) The word made known unto you for the obedience of faith, is the command of the everlasting God: (Rom. xvi. 25, 26.) The things I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord. (1 Cor. xiv. 37.) For the phrase ἐν λόγῳ Κυρίου, is the phrase used by the prophets of the Old Testament; viz. the prophet said unto him, ἐν λόγῳ Κυρίου, by the word of the Lord, Smite me, 1 Kings xx. 35. see xiii. 1, 2. 5. 9. 32. and equivalent to it are these sayings. In fine, we read of John the Baptist, that the word of God came to him, and he went forth preaching the baptism of repentance; (Luke iii. 2, 3.) which is the very phrase used of the prophets of the Old Testament. (See the note there.) Seeing then our Lord hath taught us, that though he was the greatest of the prophets before Christ, yet the least of the prophets in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he; (Matt. xi. 11.) can we reasonably conceive, that this forerunner of the Messiah should speak the word of God, as did the prophets of the Old Testament; and that the prophets and apostles of the New Testament, on whom the Holy Ghost descended, to enable them to teach the mind of Christ to all future ages of the church, should not speak and write what they delivered as the rule of faith by the like Divine assistance?

§. V. Arg. 2. They who, when they indited these writings, were assisted by the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of truth, indited these records by Divine assistance; for the things God spake to his servants, the prophets, are styled the things which I commanded ἐν πνεύματί μου, by my spirit. (Zech. i. 6.) But the apostles were thus assisted; this they in terms, or by just consequence, assert. For St. Peter saith of them all in general, that they preached the gospel by the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. (1 Pet. i. 12.) And, is not this as much as he said of the prophets of the Old Testament, when he declares, they spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost? (2 Pet. i. 1.) St. Paul asserts, in the same general expressions, that those great things belonging to the gospel, which neither eye had seen, nor ear had heard, nor heart was able to conceive, God had revealed to them by the Spirit: (1 Cor. ii. 10.) that they had received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, that they might know the things which were freely given to Christians of God; and that these things they taught not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual, (ver. 12, 13.) In which place, the very design of the apostle is to prove against the Greek philosophers, how unreasonable it was to reject the gospel; because it came not in the way of demonstration to human reason, but by way of revelation from God, and so requireth faith; as of necessity it must do, since it contained such things concerning the design of Christ's salutary passion, his resurrection, ascension, and a future judgment at the general resurrection, which no natural man could know by the utmost improvement of his human reason; and such discoveries of the council of God concerning man's justification, as depended upon his good pleasure, which was known only to that Holy Spirit, which searcheth all things, even the deep things of God. It is this Spirit, saith he, that we have received, and by this Spirit hath God revealed these things unto us, and we accordingly do teach them to the world, not in the words which human wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing the revelations made to us by the Spirit, with the revelations made to the prophets in the Old Testament by the same Spirit, and finding that the revelations made to us do far exceed what was discovered to them; for, what the eye of those prophets had not seen in vision, nor their ear heard in dreams, nor can the heart of man conceive without a revelation, even these things hath God revealed to us by his Spirit. Thus did they speak the word of God in demonstration of the Spirit: whence he declares, that if any man despise their testimony or instructions, he despiseth not man only, but God also, who had given them his Spirit, (1 Thess. iv. 8.) they being not sufficient for this work of themselves, but their sufficiency was of God; who, by this ministration of the Spirit, had made them able ministers of the New Testament. (2 Cor. iii. 5, 6.) And thus, saith he, that God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness (and who illuminated the prophets, by shining upon their imaginations and their understandings), hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. (2 Cor. iv. 6.) In his Epistle to the Ephesians, he declares, that the mystery of Christ was made known to him by immediate revelation, and not to him only, but to the rest of the apostles and prophets of the New Testament; For God (saith he) hath made known this revelation to us the apostles and prophets by the Spirit. (Eph. iii. 3. 5.) And hence he speaks to the Corinthians in this language, If any man be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things I write unto you are the commandments of God. (1 Cor. xiv. 37.) Here then the argument runs thus:

They, who had a like assistance to that of the prophets under the Old Testament, must write by the direction of the Holy Ghost; for holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, and the Scripture they indited was of Divine inspiration; and their words are cited in the New Testament, as spoken by the Holy Ghost: but the apostles had a like assistance; for in the words now cited, they style themselves apostles and prophets; they challenge a like illumination, or shining of God upon their hearts, a like revelation of their gospel by the Holy Spirit; and they pretend to teach it to others in words taught them by the Holy Ghost. In all which sayings they must be guilty of a false testimony concerning God, and must impose upon the church of Christ, if no such assistance of the Holy Spirit was imparted to them.

§. VI. A third argument for the infallible assistance of the apostles in delivering the truth of the gospel to posterity is taken from our Saviour's promise to them, he having engaged,

First, To send the Comforter to be for ever with them, in these words: I will ask the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, to be for ever with you: (John xiv. 16.) and to be always with them when they were executing his commission to make disciples in all nations, teaching them to observe whatever he had commanded them. (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.)

Ye (saith he) shall be my witnesses of these things; and that you may be qualified to be so, Behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you. (Luke xxiv. 48, 49.) Hence I infer, That they had always the assistance of the Holy Spirit with them in the discharge of their apostleship.

Secondly, he adds, That this Spirit that should thus abide with them, was the Spirit of truth, which the world could not receive. (John xiv. 16, 17.) Now why doth he choose to characterize him by this epithet, but to inform them, that they might expect from him the certain knowledge of that whole doctrine they were, as his apostles, to declare unto the world, and leave to future generations as the rule of faith? That this is, indeed, the reason, we learn from these following words, (ver. 26.) But the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father shall send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all things which I have said unto you; i.e. the things I have commanded you to teach, he shall faithfully bring to your remembrance; and as for those many things I have to say unto you, which now ye cannot bear, he shall teach them all. That this is the true import of this promise, we learn from the ensuing words, (xvi. 12, 13.) I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now: but when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all truth, and he shall shew you things to come. He shall guide you into, and therefore shall secure you from erring from, or going out of the way of truth: he shall thus guide you into all truth, which it concerns you, as his apostles, to deliver to the Christian church, or any of her members to know, in order to the performance of their duty, or the obtaining the end of their faith, the salvation of their souls. Hence, then, first, we may be sure, that all the sermons or discourses of our Lord to his disciples, recorded in the evangelists, are faithfully delivered by his apostles, as to the sense and genuine import of them; for, otherwise, the Holy Spirit did not bring to their remembrance all things which he had said unto them, but suffered them to record some of his sayings otherwise than he had delivered them; nor were they faithful in execution of the charge committed to them, which was to teach all nations all things which he had commanded them. Secondly, Hence also we may rest assured, that what the apostles taught in any of the epistles directed to the Christian churches, they taught by the direction and guidance of the Holy Spirit; for since they were indited by them, as the apostles of the Lord, for the instruction of the church of that and the succeeding ages, if the Spirit of truth did not guide them into all truth, but suffered them to err in the composing of them, then was not this promise of our Lord fulfilled unto them; no, not then, when they undertook to be teachers of the church in faith and verity, and so were more especially concerned to have this guidance of the Holy Spirit. Moreover, Christ declares, that he who heareth them, heareth him; (Luke x. 16.) he that receiveth them, receiveth him. (Matt. x. 40.) Now to receive the apostles even as Christ Jesus, (Gal. iv. 14.) no man could be obliged, unless they were entirely assisted by the Spirit promised to lead them into all truth, in the discharge of their apostleship. And this seems plainly to be the import of Christ's addresses to his Father, (John xvii. 17.) Sanctify them in or by thy truth, thy word is truth; for he himself was sanctified by the Holy Spirit to his prophetic office; (Luke iv. 18. John x. 36.) so must they, who were apostles and prophets sent by him, (Matt. xxiii. 34. Luke xi. 49.) and therefore he saith, As the Father hath sent me, so send I you: receive the Holy Ghost; (John xx. 21, 22.) and prays, that they may have the same Spirit, that the world might believe, and know the Father had sent him; and had loved them, as he had loved him, (xvii. 21. 23. see the note there.)

§. VII. Arg. 4. These sacred records, which were indited to be a standing rule of faith throughout all ages of the world, the gospel contained in these Scriptures being made known to all nations for the obedience of faith, (Rom. vi. 26.) they must in all things propounded in them to our faith contain a Divine testimony, or a revelation of the will of God. For as human faith depends upon the testimony of man, so Divine faith is that which depends on the testimony of God: and as obedience to men consists in doing the will of men, so our obedience to God consists in conformity to the will of God. Again, if we must all be judged by this law of liberty; (James ii. 12.) if Christ at the last day will judge the secrets of men's hearts; (according to the gospel of St. Paul, Rom. ii. 16.) if he will come in flaming fire, taking vengeance of all that obey not his gospel—then must this gospel and this law of liberty be a rule of faith until Christ's second coming; for, upon that account alone, can men be bound under this dreadful penalty, to yield obedience to it, and be judged by it.

§. VIII. Arg. 5. lastly, That the apostles and writers of the books of the New Testament were assisted both in their preaching and writing by the Spirit of God, the Christians of all ages from the beginning do attest. St. Clemens,* in his epistle to the Corinthians, saith, That the apostles delivered the gospel to us from our Lord Jesus Christ, and Christ from God; and that being filled with the Spirit, and having the word of God committed to them, they went out preaching the kingdom of God. He adds,† That the Scriptures are the true words of the Holy Spirit: and that St. Paul writ to them by the Spirit, touching himself, and Cephas, and Apollos. Polycarp‡ tells his Philippians, That none could attain to the wisdom of St. Paul, who had writ epistles to them; by looking into which they might be built up in the faith delivered to them. In Justin's§ time the gospels were known by the name of Εὐαγγέλια, both to Jew and gentile; and they were read in their assemblies as the holy prophets, as being writ by men μεστοῖς πνεύματος ἁγίου, full of the Divine Spirit. (Dial. cum Tryph. p. 226, 227.)

Irenæus‖ informs us, That the Lord of all things gave to the apostles authority to preach the gospel, and that by them we have known the truth, that is, the doctrine of the Son of God; to whom he said, He that heareth you heareth me: that this gospel they preached, and after, by the will of God, committed to writing, to be the foundation and pillar of our faith; and adds, That all the apostles knew the truth by revelation as well as Paul: for as St. Paul was an apostle not of men, neither by men, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, so were they.¶

Theophilus declares the consent there is betwixt the things spoken by the prophets, and in the gospels, because they both spake by the same Spirit.

Clemens†† of Alexandria, speaking of the woman who anointed our Saviour's feet with ointment, saith, This may be a symbol, τῆς διδασκαλίας τῆς κυριακῆς, of our Lord's doctrine; for the feet anointed with sweet smelling ointment, signify θείην διδασκαλίαν, the Divine doctrine; for the apostles, partaking of the Holy Spirit, betokened by the ointment of sweet odour, are the feet of our Lord anointed. The apostles are, with him, the disciples of the Spirit. And, we may well call them prophets (saith he), the prophets and apostles being both acted by one and the same Spirit.‡‡ And, we who have the Scriptures are taught of God, being instructed by that Son of God.§§ He adds, that the Scriptures which we have believed are ἐξ αὐθεντίας αὐτοκρατορικῆς, established by God's authority; (Strom. iv. p. 475.) and that the Psalmist said, περὶ πάσης γραφῆς τῆς καθ' ἡμᾶς, of our whole Scripture, Hear my law, O my people! And the apostle, We speak the wisdom of God among them that are perfect. (Strom. v. p. 557.)

Origen‖‖ is most express, that the sacred books are not the writings of men, but proceed from the afflatus of the Holy Ghost, and came to us by the will of the Father through Jesus Christ; To them (saith he) that believe this, and adhere to the canon of the heavenly church of Jesus Christ, by succession from the apostles, we shall shew the appearing ways, viz. of distinguishing betwixt the spirit and the letter. It becomes us (saith he)¶¶ to believe, that in the Holy Scripture there is not one tittle void of the wisdom of God; for the prophets spake, receiving from his fulness; and there is nothing in prophecy, or the law, or the gospel, or the apostles, which is not from the fulness. He adds, That there is nothing unequal or distorted in the oracles of God, but a sweet harmony of the old Scriptures with the new, of the legal Scriptures with the prophetical, the evangelical with the apostolical. He adds, that,††† We must either say as the infidels do, that because they are not useful, they are not divinely inspired; or as the faithful do, that because they are profitable, they also are divinely inspired. In particular, he places the gospels in the number of writings,‡‡‡ ἐν πάσαις ἐκκλησίαις Θεοῦ πεπιστευμένων εἶναι Θείων, received as Divine by the whole church of God, and that they are στοιχεῖα τῆς πίστεως τῆς ἐκκλησίας, the principles of the church's faith. But it is needless to cite more passages from the fathers of the first three centuries, since by them they are constantly styled,§§§ The Divine Scriptures, the oracles of God, the wisdom of God, the voice of God, the Divine oracles; they say, that all the Scriptures are the perfect and well-tuned organ of God, giving from differing sounds one saving voice to those who are willing to learn.

Secondly, They add, That* both the prophets of the Old, and the writers of the New Testament, spake by one and the same Spirit, the Holy Spirit, by the providence of God, through the Divine Word, enlightening these ministers of truth, the prophets and the apostles.

Thirdly, They not only read those writings from the beginning, on the Lord's day, for the instruction of the people, but made their † inferences and exhortations from them to all Christian duties, and very early made their comments on them.

Fourthly, They proved all their ‡ doctrines from these Scriptures, and thence inferred, that they retained the true rule of faith, because they delivered only what was consonant to the doctrine contained in the evangelists, and the epistles of the apostles, as is evident from all their writings.

Fifthly, From these Scriptures of the New Testament, they remonstrated against and confuted all the § heretics which arose in those times, declaring, That they were later than those apostles who delivered to them the rule of faith, and that they taught things contrary to, or alien from, the doctrine delivered by the apostles of our Lord.

Lastly, That the Scriptures of the New Testament were divinely inspired, was a truth so received by all Christians, that even some of the heretics durst not deny it; and they who did, were looked upon as infidels, says Origen, and others. Thus, speaking of the disciples of Theodotus Coriarius, who corrupted the Scriptures, What wickedness, saith an ancient author, is this? ‖ For either they believe not the Holy Scriptures to be divinely inspired, and then they are infidels; or they pretend to be wiser than the Holy Ghost, and then they are mad, or possessed.

Now if persons so near the times of the apostles, that some of them conversed with them, some of them were themselves inspired with spiritual gifts, some of them were acquainted with the immediate successors of the apostles; if the churches which received these writings from the very hands of the apostles, and kept still the original, or the authentic copies of them, did so unquestionably receive them as inspired writings, and own them as the rule, pillar, and ground of their whole faith; if they read them together with those writings of the prophets, which were on all hands owned as the word of God; proved from them all the doctrines of the Christian faith; received them as the perfect rule of Christian duty; confuted all heresies and erroneous doctrines from them; and represented those as infidels who questioned or denied their inspiration by the Holy Ghost;—they doubtless must be well assured that they were delivered to them as such by the apostles, or the sacred penmen of them; and then, what reason can these latter ages have to question what was so universally acknowledged by those who lived in that very age in which those books were written and sent to the churches of Christ; or who received them under that character from men, who in that very age had owned them as written by the conduct and assistance of the Spirit of God?

§. IX. Having thus established the Divine authority of these sacred records of the Christian faith, I should proceed to shew,

1. The truth and certainty of the Christian faith.

2. The seasonableness and the necessity of that revelation. Upon which two heads I have gathered so many observations as cannot be comprised in a preface, and my eyes failing, I cannot promise that I shall ever perfect that great work. I therefore shall at present only mention some few peculiarities concerning the Lord Jesus, and the doctrine taught by him, and propagated through the world by his disciples, which may conduce to the establishment of the truth of the Christian faith. And,

First, It may deserve to be considered, that if a Messiah were to come when our Lord did, he could be no other than our Jesus; for even the Jews pretend not that any other, who assumed that title, was the Messiah promised to them.

Now that a Messiah was, according to the prophecies of the Old Testament, to come about that time, we learn from the raised expectation of him, not only in the whole Jewish nation, but also through all those eastern nations among whom they were dispersed; for they were then expecting that the kingdom of God should immediately appear; (Luke xix. 11.) they were looking for the consolation of Israel. (Luke ii. 38.) Their own Josephus* doth confess there was a prophecy found in their Scriptures, ὡς κατ' ἐκεῖνον καιρὸν, that about that time one of their country should reign over the earth, and that this animated them, πρὸς πόλεμον, to enter upon the war against the Romans; and that† πόλλους βασιλεῖαν ὁ καιρὸς ἀνέπειθε, the time persuaded many to take upon them the title of king: and as their Messiah is by the prophet Haggai styled, the Desire of all nations, ii. 7. so we find the wise men of the east, at the birth of our Jesus, coming to inquire, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? (Matt. ii. 2.) For, as Suetonius‡ doth inform us, a constant and an old opinion had obtained, that about that time, "Judææ profecti rerum potirentur," that some from Judea should obtain the government. It was, saith Tacitus,§ another Roman historian, a persuasion which had obtained among many, that this thing was contained "antiquis sacerdotum literis," in the ancient writings of the priests. And this opinion was so rooted in the Jewish nation, viz. that their Messiah was to come about that time, that when they rejected our Jesus, they fell into one of these two opinions, either that their Messiah was then come, and lay concealed, according to the words of the Targum on Micah iv. 8.* or, that the time of his coming was deferred by reason of their sins; both which opinions are hinted by Trypho,† in his Dialogue with Justin Martyr, declaring, that "either Messiah was not yet born, or at least it was not known where he was." This therefore is the first thing peculiar to our Jesus;

That no other pretended prophet ever came at a time when there was such a general expectation, arising from a long succession of pretended prophecies both among Jews and gentiles, that such a prophet was then to come into the world.

Secondly, Consider, that whoever came into the world as a Messiah, must come as the Messiah of the Jews, because no other nation did expect or pretend to the promise of a Messiah. Moreover, whoever came as the Messiah of the Jews, must at the least pretend to answer the characters of their Messiah, plainly delivered by the prophets of the Jews in their authentic records; because, they being by the Jews received as Divine oracles, they could admit no person as their promised Messiah, who answered not those characters.

Thirdly, No man of reason, besides the true Messiah, would have pretended to have answered these characters, or could have long supported that pretence, they being such as required he should open the eyes of the blind, unstop the ears of the deaf; that he should make the lame man leap as the hart, and the tongue of the dumb to sing: (Isa. xlii. 7. lv. 5, 6.) and yet that he should be despised and rejected, (Isa. liii. 3.) should pour out his soul unto death, and be numbered with the transgressors: (ver. 12.) that after this he should rise again; for his life was not to be left in the grave, nor was his body to see corruption: (Psal. xli. 10.) and then he was to erect an everlasting kingdom, so that the heathen should be given to him for his inheritance, and the utmost parts of the earth for his possession: (Psal. ii. 8. xxii. 27.) he was to famish all the gods of the earth, so that all the isles of the heathen should worship the true God; (Zeph. ii. 11.) and from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, his name should be great among the gentiles; (Mal. i. 11.) and that a kingdom, and dominion, and glory, should be given to him, so that all people, and nations, and languages, should serve him: (Dan. vii. 14.) so that if Christ were not an ideot, he must be the Messiah promised to the Jews.

Fourthly, No man besides the true Messiah, were he ever so willing, could have answered those characters which the Scriptures of the New Testament have represented as the characters of the Messiah delivered in the Old Testament; for he was, say these writers of his life, to be born of a pure virgin, (Matt. i. 22, 23.) of the seed of David, and in the town of Beth-lehem; (John vii. 42.) he was to be betrayed by one that did eat bread with him, (John xiii. 18.) and to be delivered up to the chief priests, and elders, and scribes, and by them to be condemned, and given up to the gentiles; he was to be mocked, scourged, spit upon, buffeted, and crucified by them; (Mark x. 33, 34. Luke xviii. 31—33.) to have his hands, feet, and heart, pierced; (John xix. 37.) to rise again the third day; (Luke xxiv. 46.) to ascend into heaven; (ver. 26.) to draw all men after him; (John xii. 32.) to cast the devil out of his kingdom; (ver. 31. xvi. 11.) to baptize them, who believed in him, with the Holy Ghost; (Matt. iii. 11. Acts i. 5.) and to erect his own kingdom by the preaching of the gospel through the then known world. (Matt. xxiv. 14. xxvi. 13.) Here then are these things peculiar to the holy Jesus:

First, That it was never foretold by any prophet of the Jews, or by any pretended prophet of the gentiles, that such a man should be born at such a time, in such a city, who should do great miracles, and yet should be despised, and rejected, condemned, and die as a deceiver, by the means of those very persons to whom he came, and among whom he did his miracles; and who should after three days rise again, and then be owned as the Lord and Saviour of the world through all the earth.

Secondly, Much less was it ever known that any one, pretending to be a prophet, laid the foundation of the truth of his pretensions upon his being despised and rejected, and even crucified as a deceiver by them to whom he was sent, and among whom he performed all his miracles, and upon what should be done by others at his death, as to the manner and the particular circumstances of it, and upon what should not be done to him when dead, though it were usually done to others dying as he did; and,

Thirdly, Upon what he would do after his resurrection, not by himself, but by the preaching of others in his name, to draw those very people to an acknowledgment of him, and make himself to be adored and owned as their Lord and Saviour throughout all nations. Maimonides,* I confess, informs us of one who appeared in Arabia in the twelfth century, pretending to be the forerunner of the Messiah, and upon that account to act by a Divine commission, of whom the king of Arabia, demanding a sign or a miracle in proof of his commission, he answered, "Cut off my head, and I will rise again, and live, as before;" this the king did, and the imposture ended with his life, no man pretending that he ever rose again; whereas the resurrection of our Jesus was not attested only by the twelve apostles, by five hundred witnesses, by St. Paul, a bitter enemy of the Christian faith, converted to it by the appearance of this Jesus to him; but the truth of it was presently believed by many thousand Jews who lived upon the place, where they had seen him crucified, and many myriads of gentiles, who gave so firm a credit to it, that they confirmed it with the loss of life and all the comforts of it.

Fourthly, As for the characters of the Messiah delivered in the gospels, and the great works he promised that his disciples should perform, it seemeth necessary to suppose that almost all these things were done before they were indited. For the tradition of the church runs thus,—that St. Matthew wrote his gospel eight, St. Mark ten, St. Luke fifteen, St. John thirty-two years after our Lord's ascension: and therefore, had not the things contained in these writings being performed before, they must have ministered to all considering persons a strong objection against the truth of what they saw recorded in them. For instance, had not the apostles been filled with the Holy Ghost before, they could not have begun their testimony, the Lord having engaged that they should be endued with power from on high, not many days after his own ascension, and commanded them to stay at Jerusalem till this was accomplished. Had not believers, which then were very numerous, been both enabled and accustomed to cast out devils, heal diseases, and to speak with tongues, it would have been natural to inquire why the Lord's promise was not made good to them. There could have been no truth in all the acts of the apostles, had they not been before enabled to do the greatest wonders, even such as had not been performed by our Lord; viz. the conversion of thousands by one sermon, the giving of the Holy Ghost by imposition of hands, the healing diseases by their shadow, and by clothes sent from them. But yet let these things be as false as any infidel can imagine, since they are all recorded of our Jesus by his own witnesses, and are contained in those histories, which they delivered to the world as the true records of his words and actions, they must stand bound to make them good, and persuade all believers they were certain truths, or be convinced from their own words that their Jesus failed of what he promised and foretold, and therefore was not a true prophet.

* "Tu autem Christe Israelis, qui abscondituses propter peccata cœtûs Sion, tibi venturum est Regnum." Vide Buxtorf. cap. 50. p. 720, 721.

* Epist. ad Judæos Marsilienses.

Now peruse the records of all nations, and shew me one impostor who ever did pretend that such things should be done by his disciples after his death: or what disciples of the most subtle cheat ever obliged themselves by such experiments to testify the truth of what their master did pretend to? And if never any impostor in his wits, or, if not one abettor of them, ever pretended to such things, we have great reason to believe this Jesus and his followers were no impostors. Should any one have said, when Christ was nailed to the cross, that many thousands of his bloody murderers should in a few days become his converts, and venture all their present and eternal interests upon the truth of his pretended resurrection; should they have said that throughout all the Roman empire he should be owned as that King to whom all power both in heaven and earth was given, and as that Jesus who alone could give salvation; should they have added that all this should be done in spite of all the powers of wit and policy, of eloquence and of the sword, the interests and lusts, the superstitions and corrupt opinions, and the reputed wisdom of mankind, by a few mean unskilful men, who were the hatred and derision of the place they lived in, because God would bear witness to their doctrines by mighty signs and wonders, and distributions of the Holy Ghost; I say, should a thing seeming so extravagant have been then vented, it would surely have passed for an idle brain-sick dream, as little to be heeded as that twelve cripples should besiege, storm, plunder, and destroy, the strongest and best-peopled city. And yet the apostles in effect not only said much more, but so confirmed their sayings, as that the records in which they were contained have ever since obtained as the faith of Christians, and been the rule of their whole lives.

§. X. Let us pass on to the consideration of the miracles performed by the holy Jesus. Now they are represented in these records;

First, As exceeding many, even so many that the chief priests and pharisees, who bore the greatest disaffection to him, are forced to confess, this man doth many miracles, insomuch that if we let him alone all men will believe on him, (John xi. 47, 48.) and the multitude cry out, When Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than this man hath done? (John vii. 31. see note on John xxi. 25.)

Secondly, His miracles, as they were very many, so were they also very great and powerful, and so assuredly performed by the finger of God; even Herod styles them mighty works. (Mark vi. 14.) Nicodemus, when he had only begun to do them, acknowledges that no man could do such works as he did, except God were with him. (John iii. 2.) And he himself saith, If I had not done among the Jews those works which never man did, they had not had sin. (John xv. 24.)

Thirdly, The apostles do with great confidence avow to Jew and gentile, that this Jesus had done great wonders to confirm his doctrine, and that this was a thing well known to them, and by these sayings they converted those that heard them: thus in that sermon of St. Peter's, which added to the church three thousand souls, Jesus of Nazareth is said to have been a man approved among them by miracles, wonders, and signs, which God did by him in the midst of them; for which he presently appeals to their own consciences, saying, This ye yourselves know. (Acts ii. 24.) And the same apostle appealeth in like manner to the knowledge of this by the centurion and his friends, saying, Ye know the thing done throughout all Judea; how Jesus being anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power, went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with him. (Acts x. 37, 38.) Now here these things may be observed;

First, That these records, contained in the first three gospels, being writ, saith tradition, within fifteen years after our Lord's ascension, or at the least before that destruction of Jerusalem, of which they all speak as future, and before which it is probable they died; many of those nine thousand who were miraculously fed with a few loaves and two little fishes, and many who were healed in every city where Christ and his disciples came, must be surviving witnesses of the truth or falsehood of these writings.

Secondly, That notwithstanding this, we find not one thing delivered by them, as done by Christ or his apostles, either among Jew or gentile, which they ever proved, or even declared, to be false; we find indeed in these records the pharisees declaring that he cast out devils by Beelzebub, (Matt. ix. 34. xii. 24.) and saying in their own writings, that* "By virtue of the name Shem Hamephorash, which he stole out of the temple, he raised the dead, and walked upon the waters, and cured the lame, and cleansed the lepers." The wiser heathens, Celsus, Porphyry, Hierocles, and Julian, confessed that our Lord did miracles, that he healed the blind and the lame, and cast out devils; but then they add, that he did these things "by that art of magic, which he had learnt from the Egyptians, and by some names of powerful angels he had learnt in Egypt," and the same they affirmed of his disciples: The Christians (saith Celsus†) seem to prevail, δαιμόνων τίνων ὀνόμασι, καὶ κατακλήσεσι, by virtue of the name and invocation of some demons. And because St. Paul was more especially enabled by mighty signs and wonders and gifts of the Holy Ghost to make the gentiles obedient in word and deed; (Rom. xv. 18, 19.) Julian‡ says of him, that he did ὑπερβάλλειν πάντας παντα χοῦ τοὺς πώποτε γόητας, καὶ ἀπατεῶνας, exceed every way all the cheats and jugglers which ever were. Which by the way demonstrates, that neither the malicious Jew nor subtle heathen was ever able to confute the facts contained in the gospels or the Acts; for had they been able to have shewn the falsehood of them in one point, they would have had no cause to fly unto this artifice, it being sufficient for their purpose to have shewed the falsehood of any thing delivered in these records of the Christian faith; whereas they only did pretend to balance the miracles of Christ and his apostles, and the cures performed by them (as Pharaoh did the miracles of Moses), by opposing to them the miracles done by Pythagoras and Apollonius; and the cures done by their gods and the heathen exorcists. Now here consider,

First, That Christ not only did these miracles himself; but whilst he was with them he sent out first the twelve, and after them the seventy disciples, to heal all manner of diseases, and cast out devils in his name. (Matt. x. Luke x.)

Secondly, He engaged his truth, that, after his departure from them, his apostles should do greater works than these, because he went unto the Father. (John xiv. 12.)

Thirdly, He promised, that these signs should follow them that believed, in his name they should cast out devils, heal diseases, and speak with new tongues. (Mark xvi. 17, 18.)

In answer to what the heathens offer to invalidate the strength of this argument,

1. It is confessed that both Jews and heathens pretended to the power of casting out devils, as truly as the Christians did, and both had their exorcists for that very purpose; but then we find not one of them who ever promised, or pretended, that those who would believe in them, should do this in their name, as did our Jesus; not one who ever attempted to silence them at their oracles, and expel them from their temples, and force them to confess, before those very men who worshipped them as gods, that they were but devils; and yet from Theophilus to Eusebius, i. e. from the second to the fourth century, the Christians triumph in this argument, and promise, upon pain of death, to extort this confession from them, and speak of it as a thing known even to the very heathens, "hæc omnia sciunt plerique, pars vestrum, ipsos dæmonas de seipsis confiteri," that the devils are forced by us thus to confess what they are, must know, and even some of you, saith Minutius; "credite illis quum verum de se loquuntur, qui mentientibus creditis," you, who believe their lies, believe them speaking thus the truth against themselves, saith Tertullian.

2. It is confessed that many heathens did plead, in answer to the Christians triumphing in the gift of healing conferred upon the meanest Christians by their Lord, that their gods also did, "multorum hominum morbos, valetudinesque sanare," heal the diseases of many, but never any sent their disciples, as our Jesus did his apostles, and afterward the seventy disciples by two and two, through all the cities of Judea, or any other country, to cure all diseases in his name, as it is recorded in St. Luke's gospel, wrote within fifteen years after the thing was done, and so whilst myriads of Jews were living to testify the truth or falsehood of this thing; yea, many who had actually been healed by them. Never did any promise, as our Saviour did, that they who would believe in him should do the same, and that his own apostles should do greater works than he. Never did any enable others to bestow this gift upon believers by imposition of their hands, or by baptizing them in his all-powerful name, as the apostles did. This then is such an eminent demonstration of the truth of Christian faith as hath no parallel.

3. It is confessed that many of the heathen magi pretended to work many miracles. And hence Pythagoras, by Porphyry and Jamblichus; Apollonius Tyanæus, by Hierocles, and Apuleius, and others, are compared to our Jesus; but then,

First, All their pretended miracles were done to none, or evil purposes, as being done to establish the barbarous, obscene, and foolish rites of heathen superstition, which was the grand design of Apollonius, and also of Pythagoras, who taught all men, saith Jamblichus, τὸ μένειν ἐν τοῖς πατρώοις ἔθεσι καὶ νομίμοις, to continue in the rites and customs of their country; and this we learn from his Golden Verses: and consequently it is certain that a holy God could never countenance what was so opposite both to his nature and his honour; but it was the concernment of the devil thus to endeavour to confirm that brutish and idolatrous worship by which his kingdom was upheld and propagated, and to oppose the prevalence of the Christian faith: whereas the miracles of Christ and his apostles were all salutary and highly beneficial, and were designed to advance the knowledge of the true God upon the ruins of idolatry, to turn men from Satan to God; to teach them to excel in purity and virtue, in piety to God, in truth and justice, charity and mercy, towards others, and so was worthy of the concernment of a pure and holy God, as being the most lively transcript of his own perfections.

Secondly, All the great things ascribed to these persons have suddenly been blasted, and they like comets have blazed for awhile to the amazement of the world, and presently have set in darkness; which is a pregnant evidence that they derived from the prince of darkness, and only feigned a commission from that King of heaven, who neither wanteth power nor wisdom to accomplish his designs; whilst Christianity was like the rising sun, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. St. Paul informs the church of Rome and Colosse, that in the space of thirty years the gospel had been preached throughout the world, and brought forth fruit in every nation, on which account it quickly did obtain the name of ἡ κρατοῦσα διδαχὴ, or the prevailing doctrine, as Porphyry and Julian do confess. Now surely to abolish all idolatry, to reform the vices of the world, and to enable a few illiterate persons by mighty signs and wonders, by admirable gifts and dispensations of the Holy Ghost, to subdue the world to the belief of the whole Christian faith, and to the worship of a man, condemned by his own nation as a false prophet, and a malefactor, as the God and Saviour of the world, must be a vain attempt, though managed by the most subtle and improved impostor. But,

Thirdly, None of these persons ever pretended to transmit this power, which they vaunted of, to any other person, as our Saviour did; or to leave behind them those who, by like actions, should attest the truth of what they did deliver in his name, or suffer for the cause they owned. The demon in the statue of Apollonius did for a little while, by uttering oracles, persuade men to worship Apollonius as a god; but the same author* adds, that God αὐτὸν τὸν δαίμονα ἐφίμωσε, καταργήσας αὐτοῦ τὰς μαντείας, struck dumb this demon, making void or abolishing his oracles; whereas this power was not only imparted by our Lord to his apostles, and promised to those who should believe in him, but also was, by the imposition of the hands of these apostles, or by their baptism in the name of Jesus, conferred upon them, and promised to them; as in those words of Peter, Repent, and be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and ye shall receive the Holy Ghost. And hence Arnobius, having summed up the miracles our Jesus did, adds, That he not only did them by his power, but, which was more sublime, " multis aliis facere sui nominis cum adjectione permisit," empowered many others to do them in his name: nor did he any of those miracles which raised astonishment in others, which he enabled not his little ones, and even rustics to perform. And then he triumphs over the heathens thus, What say you, O ye stiff and incredulous minds, " alicuine mortalium Jupiter ille Capitolinus hujusmodi potestatem dedit?" did ever that Jupiter whom the Romans worship in the Capitol give the like power to any mortal? and then most rationally concludes, that to transfer this miraculous power to a man, and give authority and strength to a creature, to do that which by their power alone can be done," super omnia sitæ est potestatis," is an evidence of one whose power presideth over all things, and who hath all the creatures at his beck.

And, lastly, To the pretence that Christ and his apostles did all their miracles by magic arts; I will not answer as Origen doth to Celsus, that all who ever did converse with Christians know this to be a lie, not any of them finding that they ever used, but that they constantly abhorred, these arts; nor yet inquire with Arnobius, " potestis aliquem nobis demonstrare, ex omnibus illis magis qui unquam fuere per secula, consimile aliquid Christo millesima ex parte qui fecerit?" Nor will I represent it as an absurdity, to think our Lord could learn these arts in Egypt, when he was but two years old: nor will I ask, whether these Christians were assisted in these arts by good or evil spirits, it being as improbable that evil spirits should promote Christianity to the destruction of their kingdom, as that good angels should promote a lie, or countenance a wicked cheat: I only ask, how came these Christians to convert the Egyptians, and even those magi from whom they are supposed to have learnt these arts? 2. Seeing the art of magic was then at the height in Ephesus, Samaria, Judea, and through the heathen world, by what means came those Christians, who by the heathens were still called idiots and mechanics, to be so dexterous in these infernal arts, that all the skill and learning of the world could neither equal nor detect their subtilty? Seeing the Jews swarmed both in Ephesus and Egypt, why did none of them ever attain to the like skill; how is it that none of the Egyptian sorcerers did ever contend with Christ or his apostles, as they did of old with Moses, or manifest these sleights to the deceived world, with which they were so well acquainted? How is it that those many who did desert the Christian faith, did never once confess their skill in magic, or discover one book, or one instruction they had learned from Christ or his apostles, to produce such wonderful effects? Lastly, the apostles and first Christians could not be deceivers, but others who did embrace, and successively promote and spread their doctrine, must know that they were so, and be instructed in the same arts of falsehood by them, for they could never propagate their cheats without great falsehood and hypocrisy, nor prevail on any that were not willing to be their confederates, and learn their artifices for the imposing of this faith on others. Now how incredible is it that so many myriads, throughout three ages in which these miracles were done, should all conspire in an unprofitable and known lie, from whence they did and could reap nothing but loss and poverty, persecutions, imprisonments, and death, and not one single person be induced to divulge the cheat, let any reasonable person judge; especially if we consider, that the only motives which Christianity did offer to engage men to perseverance in that faith, were the inward consolations of the Holy Spirit, and a future recompense; neither of which could belong to, or reasonably be expected by, men, who knew themselves promoters of a vile pernicious lie.

Hence, therefore, we may argue thus; they who neither had, nor could have, any motive to believe, continue in, promote, or suffer for the Christian faith, besides the inward consolations of the Holy Ghost, and the expectations of the blessings promised in the life to come, cannot reasonably be supposed to be wilful cheats: the reason is, because the Spirit of God could not give any inward consolations to those who were promoting a notorious falsehood by infernal arts; nor was it possible that they who knew they used these arts, should expect on that account to be for ever happy in the enjoyment of that holy God, who loveth truth in the inward parts, or to be raised by him to an inheritance undefiled. Seeing then even the light of nature and reason of mankind assure us, that not one of, much less all, those myriads which believed Christianity, could do it without any motive; since the light of Scripture doth assure us they could then have no other motive to believe, than those of the internal consolations of the Holy Spirit at present, and the hopes of a blessed resurrection to eternal life; seeing, thirdly, the attributes of God and the nature of the Holy Ghost assure us, that they who propagated an imposture by magic and infernal arts, or by delusions, should never have these inward consolations of the Holy Ghost, or expectations of eternal happiness, as the reward of their impostures or delusions, it is impossible they should be cheats.

In fine, the wonders which accompanied our Saviour's death, were as remarkable and glorious as were the actions of his life: for when the traitor Judas came to apprehend him, he did but say unto them, I am Jesus, and straightway both the traitor, and all that did attend him, were stricken down to the ground; (John xviii. 6.) and when Peter had stricken off the ear of Malchus, he healed it with a touch: (Luke xxii. 51.) even when he hung upon the cross, and when he had given up his spirit, the heavens were overspread with darkness at noon-day, which is a thing observed by the very heathens, and from their records handed down to us; the earth quaked, the rocks split, the veil of the temple was rent, the graves were opened, and many that were dead arose, and came into the city, and appeared to many. (Matt. xxvii. 51—53.) Now we read nothing of this nature concerning either Pythagoras, or Apollonius, though Philostratus tells us, that Apollonius died not, but was translated into heaven.

§. XI. Again, as our Lord frequently foretold, that being dead, after three days he would rise again, so have we certain demonstration that he arose accordingly, from the consideration of the persons engaged to attest it, and the absurdity of thinking they should all conspire to attest a lie: for,

1. The dead body of our Lord could not continue in the grave after three days; for had it visibly lain dead there after that time, this had been sufficient to have proved our Saviour a false prophet, because he promised so oft that he would rise again the third day; (Luke xxiv. 46. Acts x. 40. 1 Cor. xv. 3.) yet if our Lord was not then risen from the dead, his body must continue there, or be conveyed thence by somebody.

2. It is not reasonable to believe that persons unconcerned for this Jesus, or who believed not well of him, should remove his body thence, since no man can imagine why they should attempt it, or what motive they could have to do it; and therefore this never was pretended or affirmed by Jew or gentile. Moreover, either they did this without acquainting Christ's disciples of their enterprise; and then how easy was it for them, by producing the dead body, to confute the testimony of his disciples, and how unlikely was it that these disciples would have begun to testify a thing which might, for any thing they could know to the contrary, be presently confuted by producing that very body they said was risen from the dead? or, secondly, they acquainted Christ's disciples with the fact, became confederates with them, and engaged to conceal the body; and then, upon the strength of this confederacy and promise must depend all the hopes which Christ's disciples had, that they should be successful in this testimony, and not be proved cheats by ocular demonstration. Now is it reasonable to conceive that in this matter they should trust to the fidelity of those men, who, in this very business, in which their silence could alone befriend them, were the worst of cheats? It is, lastly, more incredible, that persons of this temper should still go on to stifle and conceal the matter, and not be tempted by the pleasure of the thing, the service they might do to their religion, the hopes of a considerable reward, or by the hatred of a cheat so gross and palpable, to manifest the shame and infamy of those who forged it. Or,

3. His dead body within that time must be conveyed from the sepulchre by Christ's disciples, as the Jews said it was. Now against this vain pretension of the Jews we have the strongest evidence imaginable, the evangelists and sacred writers having so contrived this testimony, that it was incredible they should attempt, and, in the nature of the thing, impossible they should effect it, had it been a lie, or a contrivance of those men, who had their Lord's dead body in their hands.

For, first, The testimony they delivered was this, That the same Jesus whom the Jews had crucified as a false prophet, was declared to be the Son of God by the resurrection of his body from the dead. Now it hath been shewn, note on 1 Cor. xv. 35. that the resurrection of the dead was by the gentiles deemed a thing incredible. The resurrection of that very person whom the Jews had so lately condemned, and crucified as an impostor, was that which they of all men would be most unwilling to believe, seeing it was a testimony, which not only did acquit this Jesus from all the calumnies and false aspersions of the Jews, but also pronounced their greatest rabbi's an evil brood of hypocrites, fools, and blind serpents, and vipers, a wicked and adulterous generation, a devilish, damned crew, nay, their whole nation guilty of the most horrid crime that could be charged upon man, even the murder of the Lord of life, and which assured them there was no salvation to be hoped for but from that very person whom they had taken, and by wicked hands had crucified and slain, and that all power both in heaven and earth was given to him: and therefore it was not to be expected it should gain credit among Jews, or gentiles, unless it was confirmed by the greatest miracles.

Secondly, As our Lord often told, not only his disciples, but the Jews also, that he would shortly return to his Father; that he should ascend up where he was before, (John vi. 62.) and go to him that sent him; (John vii. 33, 34.) that within awhile, they should see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of Power, (Matt. xxvi. 64.) and that he would come in the glory of his Father, and reward every man according to his works: so doth this testimony declare, that he was now exalted to the right hand of God, and that God had made him Lord of all things; (Acts ii. 36.) that he had exalted him to be a Prince and a Saviour, (Acts v. 31.) nor was salvation to be expected by any other; (Acts iv. 12.) and, lastly, that by his resurrection he had demonstrated, that he was to be the judge of the quick and the dead. (Acts xvii. 31.) Now it seemed foolishness both to Jew and gentile, that such a one, who seemed to them to be without all form or comeliness, all outward splendour or grandeur, one branded for a rebel and impostor by his own nation, and as such condemned by so great a power, should be declared to be the Son of God, the Lord of all things, the author of salvation to all men, the sovereign object of their adoration. And,

Thirdly, As an immediate consequence of this, it was a testimony which never could be owned in any part of the whole heathen world, but they must thereupon renounce all the religion established among them by law and custom, discard the gods, which they and their forefathers had so long worshipped, as devils and dumb idols, and own the God of Israel as the only true God, submit to those doctrines of the holy Jesus, which required them so entirely to renounce their sinful pleasures, which were so grateful to the flesh, and those vices which they had so long indulged, and henceforth live a life of highest purity and separation from the pleasures and enjoyments of this world, to be employed in acts of self-denial and mortification, in taking up the cross, and suffering patiently the worst of temporal evils, only in hopes of future blessings from a crucified Jesus, and a reward to be conferred upon them by him, after a more incredible resurrection of their bodies from the grave. Now it is certain from reason and experience, that a new doctrine, which stands obnoxious to a great many prejudices both of the judgment and affections, and which contains many things that seem to render it incredible to the one, and many more which render it unpleasant to the other, is most unlikely to prevail upon the world, in opposition to all other doctrines. (2.) That men are not easily induced to reject those principles which they received from their education, but still are backward to admit new faith, to confess their errors, and condemn themselves, and pass hard sentences upon the state of their beloved friends, relations, and ancestors. (3.) That men are naturally wedded to their lusts, and bear a passionate affection to the pleasures and enjoyments of the world; and therefore, that which suddenly prevails upon them to renounce them all, must be of greater power, and of more prevailing efficacy, than the temptations of the world. (4.) That it is not easy to prevail upon the world to quit a present and important interest, only in hopes of future good, or to expose themselves to the worst of sufferings in confirmation and pursuance of those hopes, without the most concluding grounds of hope, much less in contradiction to them. (5.) That men of the lowest birth and education, and such as were great sufferers both in their reputation and their persons, were men unlikely to prevail upon persons of all sorts and conditions whatsoever, to quit their religion, and their habitual lusts, their worldly interests, and their alluring pleasures, and their espoused tenets; much more their lives and dearest relatives, and to expose themselves to those evils which are most contrary to the desires of human nature, and to the designs of mere natural men.

Again, They tell us, they were sent to preach this testimony to all nations, and to baptize them into the faith thus preached, to publish it to the Jews, Samaritans, and to the uttermost parts of the earth. (Acts i. 8.) Now, could they convert great numbers of all nations from darkness unto light; persuade them to discard their own religion they had so long embraced; quit all the worship and the rites they had received from their forefathers; renounce all the evil customs and manners they had so long indulged in; only to worship and expect salvation by one condemned by his own nation, where his pretended miracles were wrought, as a false prophet and a vile impostor? They were to turn them from the power of Satan unto God, and therefore, were to destroy that strong man armed, to overthrow his kingdom, to stop the mouth of his oracles, destroy his temples and his worship, to cast out devils where they came, and make his kingdom fall like lightning: now could they convert those nations, whose languages they understood not, without the gift of tongues; which, if they wanted, they must stand mute among them, without one word to say in propagation of this testimony? How could they work so great a change upon them, or prevail with them to suffer so much, as their converts by their own confession were obliged to do, for the sake of this their testimony, without the greatest evidence, that what they told them was a certain truth? and how could they afford this evidence to any, without a confluence of miracles to confirm their sayings? Hence,

Fourthly, They so often tell us, that their Lord promised to enable them, in confirmation of this testimony, to work greater miracles than he himself had done, (John xiv. 12.) and that they who believed this testimony should be enabled to heal the sick, to cast out devils, and speak with new tongues; that for the propagation of this testimony, he would give them a mouth and wisdom, which all their adversaries should not be able to gainsay, that they should have no need when they were before princes and rulers on the account of this testimony to premeditate; because the Holy Ghost would teach them in that hour what to say: (Luke xii. 12. xxi. 15.) that he promised that they should be enabled for this work by the power of the Holy Ghost descending on them, and convincing the world of their sin, who believed not in him, and of his righteousness, because he went unto the Father; and of a future judgment, because the prince of the world should by them be condemned, and cast out of his kingdom. (John xvi. 8—11.) They introduced him, praying to his Father, that they might thus be assisted by this Holy Spirit, that the world might believe that he had sent him, (see the note on John xvii. 21—23.) and promising the Holy Ghost to them that would believe in him. (John vii. 37—39.) Whence it must necessarily follow from their own words, that they must have received this miraculous assistance, and these distributions of the Holy Ghost, for confirmation of this testimony; or else that Jesus, whose resurrection they proclaimed, must be a false prophet. Hence it is evident beyond all contradiction;

First, That a power of doing mighty miracles, and of exercising and distributing the gifts of the Holy Ghost to believers, was absolutely necessary, in places where they came, for confirmation of this testimony, and planting any Christian church in any nation; it being absolutely necessary, to make this testimony effectual, that both the apostles, who gave in this testimony, and they who did believe it, should be assisted by the power of miracles, and be endowed with the miraculous gifts and distributions of the Holy Ghost; and yet, Secondly, It is as certain, that if this Jesus was not risen, or, being risen, had failed in all his promises of such miraculous assistance, that his disciples could have no motive to begin this testimony, or never could be able thus to confirm what they affirmed.

1. They could have then no motive to begin this testimony; for if he were not risen, or if he had failed in all these promises, they must conclude him an impostor; and then what motives could they have to publish him the Saviour of the world, who, after he had called them to leave all, and follow him, and made such ample promises unto them of judging the twelve tribes of Israel, (Matt. xix. 28.) left them so sadly in the lurch, exposed to shame and infamy? How could they hope by mighty signs and wonders, by gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, great and numerous, to give in evidence to his resurrection (as they confidently pretended they were empowered to do), had he been still reserved under the power of death, and only by his own or others' arts removed from his sepulchre? How is it, that they never thought within themselves,—He could not save himself, and whence shall we expect salvation? He could not by his miracles of power and goodness prevail upon one nation to believe his doctrine; and can we, though destitute of all that power which resided in him, think to reduce the world into obedience, or to impart the Holy Ghost to others, when we ourselves have the spirit of delusion only? Who can imagine, were this so, they would have said so boldly at the first entrance on this testimony, to men, who wondered at them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of the Lord Jesus, and you shall receive (these gifts of) the Holy Ghost; for the promise (of the Holy Ghost, recorded by the prophet Joel) is (made) to you and to your children, and to as many as the Lord your God shall call; or say so confidently before the Jewish Sanhedrin, their mortal enemies, We are witnesses of these things, and so is the Holy Ghost which God hath given to those that believe, (Acts v. 32.) if there were no such thing? Nor,

2. Could they confirm their testimony by any miracles or Divine assistance; for if their testimony were a lie, they had no reason to expect the least assistance for the propagation of it, but had just reason to conceive, that all the powers both in earth and heaven should be engaged to confound it; for sure they could expect no help from him whom they declared to be risen, if in their consciences they knew he was still under the power of death; they rather had great reason to expect that God should cross them in those designs which they profanely vented in his name, making him witness to a lie; they could not hope to be assisted by the powers of darkness, seeing their doctrine did so plainly tend to the subversion of Satan's kingdom; they could not rationally hope, that either Jew or gentile would befriend them in the promotion of a cheat, which they were concerned both in interest and honour to detect: what therefore could embolden them to enter upon the propagation of this cheat, in opposition to all the powers both of heaven and earth?

To strengthen this argument, let us consider the success of this testimony; our Lord had declared, that after he had been lifted up, he would draw all men after him, (John xii. 32.) and that then his kingdom, from a small beginning, should increase as a grain of mustard seed, and be like leaven leavening the whole lump. (Luke xiii. 19. 21.) Accordingly we find that this testimony, when it was first declared to the world on the day of Pentecost, prevailed at one sermon over three thousand, and at another on five thousand of those very persons who had seen him crucified, to believe that he was risen from the dead. He sent them forth to preach this doctrine to the world, with a promise that he would be with them. (Matt. xxviii. 20.) And accordingly it is said, they went forth preaching this doctrine every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following; (Mark xvi. 20.) and that with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus; (Acts iv. 33.) and that God bare witness to the word of his grace, both with signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost: (Heb. ii. 4.) and of the truth of this, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles written to the churches planted by them, the miracles done by many myriads of Christians, and the gifts daily exercised in their assemblies, are a demonstration; yea, the speedy and wonderful success and prevalency of this testimony, confirms the truth of what they delivered; for if men were not then infatuated, how could it come to pass, that so great a part of the world as was so suddenly converted by their testimony, should without any proof or other evidence than the bare relation of such ignorant unlearned persons, give credit to their fiction; or that persons of all ranks and conditions should not only yield a firm assent to such a proofless fable, but readily should sacrifice their lives and fortunes to maintain that faith?

For farther demonstration of the truth of this testimony, let us reflect a little upon the persons commissioned by Christ to preach it to the world; and we shall find,

1. That they were persons who had no advantages of birth, wealth, or worldly interests, which might enable them to manage or promote this work, no wisdom to contrive, no policy to carry on such cunningly-devised fables, as being both according to their own report, and the objection of the heathen world, ἀγράμματοι, καὶ ἰδιῶται, illiterate and simple men; and is it easy to conceive, that men, so few, so meanly qualified as to condition, endowments, or ability of mind, without all supernatural assistance, should so skilfully contrive, so courageously maintain, and so successfully manage, such a story, as quickly to engage the faith of many myriads to yield a firm assent unto it?

2. They could have no motive from any worldly interests to propagate this lie throughout the world, but they had all imaginable reasons to decline it, if it were not true; for all those things which the allurements of the world can signify, they willingly abandoned for the sake of this one testimony, incurring both the loss of honour, pleasure, and of all worldly interests, in prosecution of it; nay, they declared, that this very Jesus, whose resurrection they attested, had foretold that this should be their portion, that in this world they should have tribulation, that they should be hated of all nations for his name's sake, that they should be delivered up to be afflicted, and even killed for this testimony: so that they could not possibly avoid those evils, but they must by so doing overthrow their own testimony, and prove this Jesus a false prophet; and much less had they reason to expect any blessings in the world to come for propagating such a lie by false pretences of Divine assistance, to the dishonour of Almighty God, and the destruction of so many myriads deceived by them. Since then the moralists conclude, that it is impossible for men to act without appearance of some good to be procured by that action; since love of life, and a desire of self-preservation, are common to us with the very brutes; and it is natural to them and us, to avoid misery and torments,—the apostles could not thus abandon all the enjoyments and expectations of the blessings both of this and of another world, and wilfully subject themselves to all the miseries and torments which creatures could endure, in propagation of a testimony from which they could expect no profit or advantage, but they must be bereft of common sense, renounce the natural instincts of mankind, and be in love with ruin and destruction. I confess, it is possible for men to lay down their lives for false opinions, provided they believe them to be true; but if the apostles were guilty of any cheat at all, they must be guilty of a known imposture, and so must sacrifice their lives for falsehood, i. e. for that from which they could expect no good at all; which seems so inconsistent with the principles of common reason and self-love, that nothing can be more incredible.

3. Consider that they continued constant in this testimony, and never could be moved by any checks of conscience, any hopes of gain, or any fears or sense of sufferings, to disavow this testimony, or to detect the falsehood of it. Now, that so many persons should persevere immoveably in an extravagant resolution to maintain a lie, so that no threats, no perils, no pains or troubles from without, no regret or dissatisfaction from within, should drive them from it, but that they should die with it in their mouths, is so incredible, that nothing can be more; it must be therefore truth alone that could uphold them steady in the profession of this thing; so unanimous a consent, so clear a confidence, so firm a resolution, so insuperable constancy and patience, nothing but the sense of truth could inspire them with, nothing but a perfectly good conscience could sustain. Consider,

4. That they were persons who professed to all their converts great sincerity in what they did, declaring, that they had renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, not handling the word of God deceitfully, but, by manifestation of the truth, commending themselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. Moreover, in their writings, they frequently condemned all falsehood, craft, hypocrisy; commanding us to lay aside all guile, hypocrisy; to put away all lying; to speak every man truth with his neighbour, denouncing hell and damnation against those who loved and made a lie: and yet, if they indeed promoted a cunningly-devised fable, they whom they spake and wrote to could not be ignorant of their hypocrisy and lying, when they spake so much of their own miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost received by believers, and of the gifts of healing, casting out of devils, and of tongues, promised and vouchsafed to them; for these things they still mention in their epistles directed to their converts, as things frequently done by and exercised among them. Now, if their converts did enjoy these admirable gifts, it is not to be doubted, but God himself, who is the only author of them, did set his seal to the apostles' testimony; if they did not enjoy them, they must then know that the apostles who made these promises, and who indited these epistles, were guilty of notorious untruths, and so could have no motive to believe, but rather to detest their doctrine.

5. Consider that the doctrine they delivered in the name of this holy Jesus, was such as highly tended to the promotion of piety and virtue in the world; for none, who are acquainted with this doctrine, can deny, that it doth evidently tend to the advancement of true goodness, righteousness, love, charity, peace, quietness, and mercy. Now, can it reasonably be conceived, that men should in the same design be guilty of the greatest virtue, and the greatest villany in the world; that the same men should die martyrs to the worst imposture, and the best institution in the world; that they should sacrifice their lives to the interest of holiness and virtue, and the credit of blasphemy and imposture? It is common, I confess, for men of bad designs to make very good pretences, but still they do this to carry on designs far different from their pretences: but we have shewed that the apostles could have no designs in propagating their doctrine, but that it should be believed; and, therefore, if they did not really design to make men believe the doctrines they taught for the advancement of the interests of piety and virtue, they could have no end at all in losing both their lives and fortunes to promote those doctrines; which contradicts the principles of human nature.

He then who doubts the sincerity of these assertors of our Lord's resurrection, must be forced to admit what is much more incredible, as being more repugnant to human nature and the course of things; viz. he must believe that persons, otherwise through their whole lives blameless, and strictly virtuous in their conversations, as the apostles were; men who appealed to their proselytes, how holily, and justly, and unblamably, they had behaved themselves amongst them, should yet, against the clearest dictates of their conscience, commit so great a villany as this imposture doth imply; that men, all whose discourses and demeanours did evidently tend to the advancement of God's glory, and the promotion of true goodness, should in their hearts defy God, and detest all goodness, as they must do if they were wilful cheats; that they, who otherwise did teach these doctrines, and practise those things, which shewed the greatest kindness and good-will to men, were only striving to abuse and betray them by false promises and hopes, into the worst of miseries; that men of so great wisdom as they shewed, both in their writings and the success of their attempts, should zealously drive on a vain and senseless project, with more unwearied industry labouring to maintain and disperse a lie, than any men besides did ever use for confirmation of the greatest truth: he must believe, that men in all respects so impotent, should be so strangely prevalent, without the least assistance, as to cause the world to run into them, that naked weakness should overthrow the strongest might, that pure simplicity should baffle even the sharpest wits, the subtlest policy, and deepest learning; that rude speech, void of all strength and ornament, should even force men to embrace an uncouth and unpleasant story, against the finest rhetoric backed with the force of truth. He must believe, that a crew of vile persons should so inseparably be linked together only by the bonds of fraud, no truth, no virtue, no real interest, uniting them, that nothing could untie the knot. Lastly, He must believe, that men of sense should, for no end, no visible advantage here, no future hopes, voluntarily embrace, and patiently endure, all that can be distasteful unto human nature, freely exposing themselves, they knew not why, to all the fury upon earth, and all the flames of hell; eagerly sacrificing their fortunes, credits, lives, and souls themselves, to the ghost of a condemned malefactor, and false prophet. And if so, why doth philosophy inform us, that self-preservation, the love of life and ease, is rooted in the very principles of human nature, and that it is not possible for any man deliberately to choose to be miserable, or to refuse to be happy, or not desire so to be? To conclude, if this relation were untrue, either the apostles were besides their senses when they did believe it, or besides their wits when they affirmed, and did endeavour to confirm, what they did not believe with loss of life and fortunes; and if so, what shall we say to that vast multitude of Christians, who, notwithstanding all temptations to the contrary, so readily embraced, so steadfastly believed, the doctrine of those men, who had so little reason to believe themselves?

§. XII. Let us consider, lastly, the predictions of our Lord, relating partly to his own disciples, and what they were to do after his resurrection, and partly to the Jewish nation, and what was to befal them for their infidelity, and their rejecting and condemning their Messiah. As for his disciples,

1. He promised and foretold, that not only the twelve apostles should be endued with power from on high, and should receive the promise of the Holy Ghost, but also that they who believed in him should be baptized with the Holy Ghost, should receive him, and be enabled by him to speak with tongues; (Matt. iii. 11. Mark xvi. 17, 18. Luke xxiv. 39. John vii. 37, 38. Acts i. 8.) and that this promise was admirably fulfilled, not only by the gifts of tongues and prophecy, conferred on the apostles at the day of Pentecost, and by their baptism, preaching, and laying on of hands on others, but by the gifts of prophecy, and tongues, with the interpretation of them, and by the gift of discerning spirits, and knowing things secret, exercised in all Christian churches, shall be fully proved in the preface to the Epistles, from §. I. to the sixth, and from the eleventh to the fourteenth.

2. He foretold that the kingdom of Satan should be cast down by them, and should fall like lightning before them, and said, Behold, I give you power over all the power of the enemy; (Luke x. 18, 19.) and how gloriously he fulfilled this promise, and made good this prediction, shall be fully demonstrated in the same general preface, §. X.

3. He foretold that the gospel of the kingdom should be preached by them throughout the world; (Matt. xxvi. 13.) yea, that it should be preached to all nations within the space of forty years, or before the destruction of Jerusalem; (Matt. xxiv. 14.) that the increase of his kingdom should be like that of a grain of mustard-seed, (Mark iv. 32.) and that he being lifted up would draw all men after him. (John xi. 32.) Which came to pass so wonderfully, that in the space of twenty-four years after Christ's passion, St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, saith, the sound of it was gone out into the uttermost parts of the world; (x. 18.) and in the Epistle to the Colossians, writ twenty-nine years after, that it was preached to every creature under heaven, (i. 6. 23.) We see (saith Clemens Romanus)* the world beyond the ocean, i. e. the British islands, subject to the commands of Jesus.—The contagion of this superstition (saith Pliny,† in his epistle to Trajan, writ in the close of the first century) hath spread itself not only over cities, but even villages and fields.—There is no rank of men (said Justin Martyr),‡ whether Grecians, or barbarians, or called by any other name, in which praise and thanksgivings are not offered up to the Father in the name of Christ crucified; so that a whole race of Christian nations seemeth (saith Origen)§ to be born at once; and who (saith he) will not admire the prediction of our Lord, when he sees it thus fulfilled in every nation under heaven, Greeks and barbarians, the wise and unwise, and all mankind being overcome by it, so that there is no kind of men by whom this doctrine is not received? (Lib. ii. p. 68, 69.)

The predictions which concerned the Jewish nation were these following:—

1. That the kingdom of God should be taken from them, and given to another nation bringing forth the fruits thereof; (Matt. xxi. 43.) and that the tongues which did belong to their peace, should be shortly hid from their eyes: (Luke xiii. 28, 29. xix. 42.) that many should come from the east, and from the west, and should sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God; but the children of the kingdom should be cast out: (Matt. viii. 11. 13.) and that all these things should come upon that generation. Accordingly, we find the apostle Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, sadly bewailing that spirit of slumber, which was come upon them, (Rom. xi. 8.) speaking of their rejection, (ver. 15.) the breaking of these branches off through unbelief, (ver. 19, 20.) their blindness, (ver. 25.) and saying, that God had concluded them all in unbelief.

2. Our Lord foretold, that Satan, cast out from them, should return with seven devils more wicked than himself; and that he did so, the history of Josephus will not suffer us to doubt: for he declares, that soon after our Saviour's time, they were become the worst of men. (See note on Rom. ii. 2.)

§. XIII. Lastly, The things which Christ foretold concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, and the calamities which shortly were to happen to that nation, were of that signal nature, and mentioned such various events, then future, and contingent, and yet were so exactly and so particularly fulfilled, as to afford us a most pregnant demonstration of the truth of Christ's prophetic office. And,

First, Our blessed Lord foretelleth the destruction of the Jewish temple, after it had stood well nigh five hundred years, in these words, Seest thou these great buildings; there shall not be left one stone upon another which shall not be thrown down: to complete which prediction, Titus commands his soldiers, saith Josephus,* τὴν τε πόλιν ἅπασαν καὶ τὴν νεὼν κατασκάπτειν, to dig up the foundations both of the temple and of the city; and both the Jewish Talmud † and Maimonides‡ add, that Terentius Rufus, the captain of his army, did with a ploughshare tear up the foundation of the temple, and so more signally fulfilled those words of Micah, iii. 12. Therefore shall Zion for your sakes be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest. And here two things seem worthy of our observation; viz.

1. The exact time when this was done; viz. on the same month and day on which it formerly was burnt by Nebuzar-adan, the captain of the king of Babylon, which therefore by Maimonides is styled the fatal day of vengeance; and which is by Josephus § reckoned to be a matter of just admiration, and a plain indication that this so happened by Divine appointment.

2. That this destruction and conflagration of the temple, happened against the will, command, and the endeavours of Titus to prevent it; for he calls heaven and earth to witness, that he would never violate that sacred place, unless the Jews compelled him so to do; yea, saith he, ‖ I will preserve your temple against your own wills: and when his own generals declared it necessary to destroy that temple, he answered, I will never suffer such a structure to be destroyed by the flames: and when the fire began to seize upon it, he calls, he beckoneth to, yea, he commands his soldiers to extinguish it, but they not hearkening to his commands, do animate one another to the burning of it: Thus, saith Josephus,¶ was the temple burnt against the will of Cæsar, God himself assisting with the Romans to the ruin of it; that so the words of Christ might be verified, He will send forth his armies and destroy those murderers, and burn up their city.

3. Observe, that they who had accused our Saviour and his disciples of polluting and of designing to destroy this temple, were the very men who did horribly pollute it with the blood of Jews and gentiles, and even forced the Romans to destroy it; they hastened the slow fire (saith their own Josephus††), and even drew it to the temple; the inflammation of it, saith he, had both the cause and the beginning of it from themselves. The providence of God still ordering matters so, that they should bring upon themselves those evils of which they falsely did accuse our Lord and his apostles.

Secondly, Our Lord foretells with like exactness and particularity the ruin of their famous city, declaring, (Luke xxi. 34.) that Jerusalem should be trodden down of the gentiles, until the times of the gentiles be fulfilled; and again, the days (saith he) shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and shall not leave in thee one stone upon another. (Luke xix. 43, 44.) Now, that the event completely answered to these plain predictions, is evident from their own historian, who doth expressly say, that* Titus having commanded his soldiers to dig up the city and the temple, this was so fully done, by levelling the whole compass of the city, except three towers, that they who came to see it were persuaded it never would be built again. The same historian† informs us, that when Vespasian besieged Jerusalem, his army compassed the city round about, and kept them in on every side; and though it was judged a great and almost impracticable work, to compass the whole city with a wall, yet Titus animating his soldiers to attempt it, they in three days built a wall of thirty-nine furlongs, having thirteen castles on it; and so cut off all hopes that any of the Jews within the city should escape.

Thirdly, Whereas our Saviour saith, Jerusalem shall be trodden down, πατουμένη, possessed, and trodden by the feet of the gentiles, this so exactly came to pass, that Vespasian,‡ (1.) commands the whole land of Judea to be sold to those gentiles that would buy it; and (2.) Hadrian,§ about sixty-three years after, makes a law that no Jew should come into the region round about Jerusalem, as Aristo Pellæus, who was himself a Jew, and flourished in the times of Hadrian, relates: thus, saith Eusebius,‖ it came to pass, that the Jews being banished thence, and there being a conflux thither, ἀλλοφύλου γένους, of aliens, it became a city and colony of the Romans, and was in honour of the emperor named Ælia. (3.) Jerusalem, saith Christ, shall be thus trodden down, or subject to the gentiles, till the time of the gentiles be fulfilled; that is, till, by conversion of the Jews unto the Christian faith, the fulness of the gentiles, to be converted to it, should come in with them; for blindness (saith the apostle) hath happened to the Jews, till πλήρωμα τῶν ἐθνων, the fulness of the gentiles shall come in, and then all Israel shall be saved, (Rom. xi. 25, 26.) and with them also the yet heathen gentiles; for if (saith he, ver. 15.) the casting away of the Jews was the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be to it, but even life for the dead? And again, if the fall of them were the riches of the world, (ver. 12.) and the diminishing of them the riches of the gentiles, how much more shall their fulness be the fulness of the gentiles? Now here it is especially observable, that Julian the Apostate, designing to defeat this prophecy of Christ, resolved on the rebuilding of the city and temple of Jerusalem in its old station, which was till his time left in its ruins, Ælia being built without the circuit of it; for in his epistle* to the community of the Jews, he writes thus, The holy city of Jerusalem, which you have so long desired to see inhabited, rebuilding by my own labours, I will dwell in. This he began, with an endeavour to build that temple, in which alone the Jews would offer up their prayers and sacrifices, but the immediate hand of Providence soon forced the workmen to desist from that unhappy enterprise. Ammianus Marcellinus,† a heathen, who lived in those very times, gives us the story thus,—That Julian endeavoured to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem with vast expenses, and gave it in charge to Alypius of Antioch to hasten the work, and to the rector of the province to assist him in it; in which work, when Alypius was earnestly employed, and the rector of the province was assisting, terrible balls of flames bursting forth near the foundations, with frequent insults, and burning divers times the workmen, rendered the place inaccessible; and thus the fire obstinately repelling them, the work ceased. The story is very signal and remarkable for many circumstances; as, v. g.

1. The persons that relate it—Ammianus Marcellinus, a heathen, Zemuch David, a Jew, who confesseth that Julian was "divinitus impeditus," hindered by God, in this attempt: Nazianzen and Chrysostom among the Greeks, St. Ambrose and Ruffinus among the Latins, who flourished at the very time when this was done: Theodoret and Sozomen, orthodox historians, Philostorgius, an Arian, Socrates, a favourer of the Novatians, who writ the story within the space of fifty years after the thing was done, and whilst the eye-witnesses of the fact were yet surviving.

2. The time when it was performed, not in the reign of Christian emperors, but of the most bitter enemies of Christians, when they were forced to hide, and had not liberty of speaking for themselves. Observe,

3. With what confidence the Christians urge this matter of fact against the Jews, as a convincing demonstration of the expiration of their legal worship, and of the certainty of the Christian faith against the heathen philosophers, inquiring,‡ what the wise men of the world can say to these things; and against the emperor Theodosius,§ to deter him from requiring them to rebuild a synagogue, which had been lately burnt by a Christian bishop.

4. And, lastly, the unquestionable evidence of the thing.

This, say the Christians,* all men freely do believe and speak of, it is in the mouths of all men, and is not denied even by the atheists themselves; and if it seem yet incredible to any one, he may repair for the truth of it both to witnesses of it yet living, and to them who have heard it from their mouths; yea, they may view the foundations lying still bare and naked;† and if you ask the reason, you will meet with no other account besides that which I have given; and of this all we Christians are witnesses, these things being done not long since in our own time. So St. Chrysostom.

Thirdly, Our blessed Lord is as express and circumstantial in the prediction of the miseries which should befal that sinful nation. For,

1. He in the general foretells that their calamities shall be so great as to admit no parallel; There shall be (saith he) great tribulation, such as never happened from the beginning of the world to this (present) time. (Matt. xxiv. 21.) Which words‡ Josephus seems to have transcribed, when he saith, that never any nation was more wicked, μήτε πόλιν ἄλλην τοιαῦτα πεπονθέναι, nor ever did a city suffer as they did. He was no stranger to the history of the destruction of the old world by water, or of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire from heaven, or to the sufferings of his own nation under Antiochus Epiphanes, and yet he scruples not to say, that§ all the miseries which all mankind had suffered from the beginning of the world, were not to be compared with those the Jewish nation did then suffer.

2. Our Saviour adds, that in those days the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers of heaven shall be shaken. (Mark xiii. 14.) These, I confess, are metaphorical expressions, occurring often in the prophets, but still in the same sense; viz. to signify an utter desolation, and terrible havoc and destruction brought upon a nation: for in this language the prophet Isaiah speaks of the destruction of Babylon, saying, (xiii. 9, 10.) The day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it: for the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light, the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine: of the destruction of Idumea he speaks thus, (xxxiv. 2. 5.) The indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, he hath utterly destroyed them, he hath delivered them to the slaughter, the mountains shall be melted with their blood, and all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heaven shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down as the leaf falleth from the vine: the destruction of Egypt is represented by Ezekiel in these words, (xxxii. 7, 8.) I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark, I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light, and the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee: this therefore (saith Maimonides*) is a proverbial expression, importing the destruction and utter ruin of a nation; the sun darkened or turned into blood, and the stars falling, or disappearing (saith Artemidorus†), import the destruction of many people. Now in this sense it is almost incredible which their historian relates of the destruction of the Jews; for he informs us that eleven hundred thousand perished in that siege;‡ and it is still more incredible which their Talmud and other Jewish writers mention of this slaughter, which Hadrian's§ army made of them fifty-two years after, when they rebelled under Barchochebas, and were besieged in the city Bitter, the most modest computation being quatuor mille myriadas, and the most extravagant, octoginta mille myriadas. And yet our Saviour having farther said, that wherever the carcass was, i. e. the nation of the Jews, rejected now and loathed by God as a dead carcass, there would the eagles, i. e. the Roman army, be gathered together, to prey upon them; (Matt. xxiv. 28. Luke xvii. 37.) they were accordingly harassed and destroyed throughout the Roman empire; when, saith Josephus, the Romans had no enemies left in Judea, the sense and danger reached, πολλοῖς καὶ τῶν ἀπωτάτω κατοικούντων, too many of them living the remotest from it; for many of them perished at Alexandria,‖ at Cyrene, and in other cities of Egypt, to the number of sixty thousand, in all the cities of Syria; in a word, Eleazer¶ in Josephus, having reckoned many places where they were cruelly slaughtered, concludes thus, μακρὸν ἂν εἴη νῦν ἰδίᾳ περὶ ἑκάστου λέγειν, it would be too long to speak of all these places in particular.

Again our Saviour adds, that they should be led captives into all nations; (Luke xxi. 24.) accordingly Josephus doth inform us, that the number of their captives was ninety-seven thousand, that of them Titus sent many to Egypt, and most of them he dispersed into the Roman provinces, and so exactly fulfilled this prediction.

Fourthly, Our Lord foretells the many signs preceding this destruction, declaring that there should be Φοβητρὰ, fearful events, or sights, earthquakes, and signs from heaven, (Luke xxi. 11.) Now to omit the frequent earthquakes which happened in other places in the times of Claudius and Nero, Josephus†† doth inform us, that there happened in Judea and Jerusalem, an immense tempest and vehement winds, with rain, and frequent lightnings, and dreadful thundering, and extreme roarings of the quaking earth, which manifested to all, that the world was disturbed at the destruction of men, and that these prodigies portended no small mischiefs. Josephus* had a select chapter of the manifest signs of their approaching desolation, which Tacitus,† a Roman historian of that age, doth almost thus epitomise; Armies seemed to meet in the clouds, and glittering weapons were there seen; the temple seemed to be in a flame, with fire issuing from the clouds, and a Divine voice was heard, that the Deity was quitting the place, and a great motion as of his departing: these seem plain tokens of God's departing from them, of the burning of the temple, and their own desolation, by the Roman army. Josephus adds what Tacitus doth also touch upon, that the great gate of the temple, which twenty men could scarcely shut, and which was made fast with bolts and bars, was seen αὐτομάτως ἀνεῳγμένη, to open of its own accord, to let in their enemies; for so their wise men construed the omen, saith Josephus. He farther saith,‡ a sword seemed to hang over the city, and a comet with its fiery tail pointed down upon it for a whole year, which plainly seemed to portend their ruin by the sword. And that§ before the sun went down, there were seen in the clouds armies in battle array, and chariots compassing the country, and investing the cities; a thing so strange (saith he), that it would pass for a fable, were there not still men living to attest it: so expressly have we an account of the fearful sights, and signs from heaven, mentioned by our Lord, and of the sign of the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, μετὰ δυνάμεως καὶ δόξης, with a glorious host, or with power and glory; according to our Lord's prediction, Matt. xxiv. 30.

Secondly, Our Lord proceeds to say, that false Christs and false prophets should arise, and that many should come in his name, saying, I am Christ, and should deceive many. (Matt. xxiv. 5. 11. Mark xiii. 6. 21, 22. Luke xxi. 8.) False Christs are they who falsely would pretend to be the Christ or the Messiah promised to the Jews: now such were, 1. Simon Magus,‖ who declared that he was the person who among the Jews appeared as the Son of God, and was conceived to have suffered in Judea; and¶ he prevailed for a time to deceive some with his magical operations. 2. Dositheus, contemporary with him, who said he was the Christ foretold by Moses, and the Son of God, and he also found disciples; and is by Origen reckoned among them, who performed wonderful things: from these, saith Hegesippus, came false Christs and false prophets: there arose, saith Hippolytus,†† some saying, I am Christ, as Simon Magus, and the rest, whose names I have not time to reckon up: and these all, saith Irenæus,* "magias perficiunt, exorcismis et incantationibus utuntur," use magical operations, exorcisms, and incantations. Our Lord also foretold of another that should come in his own name; (John v. 43.) that is, without authority from God, and be received by the Jews as their Messiah: accordingly Barchocheba did actually thus come, as appears both from the event and destruction of him and his followers by Hadrian's army; and by the confession of the Jews, who, when they found themselves deceived by him, called him Bar Choziba, the son of a lie. And that he was generally received by them, we learn from their own histories, declaring that their great R. Akiba, who had twenty-four thousand disciples, said, at the sight of him, Behold, this is the Messiah; and that then the Jews in the city Bitter crowned him, and chose him for their king, and shook off the Roman government, killing an innumerable multitude of Greeks and Romans, in Egypt, Alexandria, Cyprus, and thereabouts; until Trajan sent Hadrian against them, who slew more of them, say they, than Titus had done in the preceding wars. (See Buxtorf, in voce Bar Choziba.)

As for the false prophets† Josephus tells us of an Egyptian false prophet and magician, who gathered together about thirty thousand of the Jews, whom he had deceived; and of one Theudas‡ a magician, who, declaring himself a prophet, deceived many; of another prophet,§ who bid them go into the temple, where God would shew them manifest signs of a deliverance; adding, that there were then πολλοὶ προφῆται, many prophets, who taught them even to the last to expect help from God. Our Saviour had foretold, that they should then say, Behold, he is in the desert; (Matt. xxiv. 26.) pointing to the very place where these false Christs and prophets should appear; or whither they should lead their followers. Accordingly, Josephus‖ saith, that many impostors and magicians persuaded the people to follow them into the wilderness, where they promised to shew them manifest signs and wonders done by God; pretending a Divine impulse, and promising deliverance from evils, if they would follow them into the wilderness.

Thirdly, Our Lord foretells, that his gospel should be first preached throughout the world, i. e. throughout the Roman empire, styled οἰκουμένη, or in all places whither the Jews were dispersed; for, saith he, The gospel of this kingdom shall be first preached in all the world for a witness to all nations, and then shall the end come. (Matt. xxiv. 14.) Accordingly St. Paul declares of them, who preached the gospel of peace, that their sound had gone forth into all the earth, (Rom. x. 18.) and their words, εἰς πέρατα τῆς οἰκουμένης, to the ends of the earth. He tells the church of Rome, that their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world. (Rom. i. 8.) The church of Colosse, that the truth of the gospel was come, not to them only, but to all the world, and preached to every creature, (i. 6. 23.) St. Clemens,* who was bishop of Rome in the twelfth year of Domitian, saith, That the nations beyond the ocean were governed, ταῖς ἐπιταγαῖς τοῦ Δεσπότου, by the precepts of the Lord. Origen† speaks of the Christians as of a nation born all at once. Eusebius‡ saith, The word of God shone suddenly upon the world as a ray of the sun, and was on that account styled by the very heathens, ἡ κρατοῦσα διδαχὴ, § the prevailing doctrine; and the Christians, by Julian the apostate, are styled οἱ κρατοῦντες, the prevailing sect. (Misopog. p. 99.)

Fourthly, He mentions the especial care he would then have of his own faithful servants, declaring, that they who endured to the end should be saved, (Matt. xxiv. 13.) and that not one hair of their heads should perish; (Luke xxi. 18.) i. e. that none of them should be involved in that ruin, which was to come upon the unbelieving Jews: accordingly, Eusebius‖ and Epiphanius¶ have left it upon record, that before the beginning of the war, when the city was ready to be taken, the disciples of our Lord were admonished by an angel, or by an oracle, to depart from the city, and to fly beyond Jordan, to the city Pella, in the region of Perea, where they were preserved. This refers to the time when Cestius came to Jerusalem, and took the lower city, and, saith Josephus, might have taken the upper city, and have presently put an end to the war; and so punctually agrees with our Lord's premonition, When you see Jerusalem compassed about with armies, and the abomination of desolation standing where it ought not; viz. in the holy city, then let them that are in Judea flee to the mountains. (Matt. xxiv. 15. Mark xiii. 14. Luke xxi. 20, 21.) But that the Christians might have time to fly and be preserved, he suddenly quits the siege without any visible cause, and so gives the Christians leave to depart: and even Josephus notes, that then many fled out of the city as from a sinking ship; and, of that number, doubtless the Christians made a part. That they then fled into the mountains, may also be observed from Josephus; for of Perea, whither they are said to fly, he saith, that it was ἔρημος καὶ τραχεῖα τὸ πλέον,†† mostly mountainous and a desert; and, being beyond Jordan, and under the government of king Agrippa, was free from war.

Lastly, Our Saviour fixed the period of time within which all these things should happen, in these words: Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away until all these things be fulfilled. (Matt. xxiv. 34.) Accordingly, they were all fulfilled within forty-two years after they had been spoken. In fine, he hath specified the very reason why all these things should come upon Jerusalem; viz. because she knew not the time of her visitation, and the things which did belong unto her peace: (Luke xix. 42. 44.) because she killed the prophets, and stoned them that were sent unto her: (xiii. 34.) because they killed the Son of God. (Matt. xx. 38.) This hath been gathered by the primitive fathers; first, From the continuation of this desolation, by which wrath seemeth to be come upon them to the uttermost: for whereas they wandered in the wilderness but forty years, and their captivity in Babylon continued but seventy years, since the rejection of our Jesus, they have been visibly cast off by God for sixteen hundred years and upwards. Secondly, From the nature of the punishments they suffered; for God having so long time laid waste that temple to which their worship was confined, and was the place in which he dwelt among them, and from which he blessed them, and so deprived them of those sacrifices by which they made atonement for their sins, and were purified from their uncleanness, and banished them out of the land of promise, hath by these dispensations fully shewed, that he no longer doth allow that way of worship, which was confined to that nation and that temple. Thirdly, From the consequences of these judgments, and from their ignorance of any time of respite and deliverance from them. For, God by his prophets was pleased to foretell the measure and duration of their former judgments, and when they should give place to mercy; that their Egyptian thraldom should expire in two hundred and fifteen years after their going down to Egypt; that after seventy years they should return from Babylon, that three years and a half would work deliverance from the more cruel fury of Antiochus Epiphanes; but of their deliverance from the calamities they now lie under, by any other way than that of turning to the Lord, there is no word of prophecy. In a word, they are utterly deprived of their Schechinah, their prophets, and all the other tokens of God's peculiar presence with them; after this sin, God did entirely desert them, and transfer his Holy Spirit, his prophets, his revelations, his miracles, to those assemblies, which embraced that Jesus as their saviour, whom they had wickedly condemned as an impostor; which shews their church and temple were destroyed to give place to Christianity. Moreover, that, after their rejecting our Messiah, they were by God appointed to destruction; they, who were the great promoters, or were eye-witnesses of the war, which brought upon them these calamities, were forced to confess: Eleazar,* one of their great captains, declared, That God had established this decree against them, that they should not live; that he had laid a necessity upon them, that they should die, and that they might not only conjecture, but even know, by what they suffered, that God had condemned his once beloved nation to destruction. Josephus† is frequent in this observation: when Cestius besieged them, he might have taken the city (saith he), and put an end to the war, but that διὰ τοὺς πονηροὺς ἀπεστραμμένος ὁ Θεὸς, God, being angry with them for the wicked, hindered it. When he was persuading them to yield to the Romans, he concludes thus;‡ Why do I persuade them against their fate, καὶ τοὺς ὑπὸ Θεοῦ βιάζομαι κατακρίτους σώζειν, and strive to save them, who are condemned of God; for, who knows not the writings of the old pro-

We Christians cannot doubt, but that these dreadful judgments came upon them on this account.

This also may be farther argued from the exactness of the parallel betwixt the punishments which they inflicted on the holy Jesus, and those they after suffered for so doing; and betwixt the crimes, for which they did condemn our blessed Lord, and those which they themselves were after guilty of, and for which tremendous judgments fell upon them. For,

1. Whereas they by their clamours to Pontius Pilate crucified the Lord of life, they many of them perished by the same kind of death; for many Jews of the equestrian order, and of Roman dignity, were treated thus by Florus, § saith their own historian; and Titus crucified so many of them, that he at last could find no more crosses for their bodies.

2. They crucified him at the feast of the Passover; and being the true paschal Lamb, he expired at the very hour when the paschal lamb was to be slain; but then their own Josephus ‖ hath observed, that at that very feast the whole nation was enclosed in Jerusalem, and that the war compassed the city when it was thus stuffed with men, and so the slaughter of them became incredibly great. God's providence, which he styles fate, so ordering matters (saith Eusebius), ¶ that at that time, when they had crucified the holy Jesus, they, being shut up all as in one prison, should receive the punishment of that iniquity.

3. They not only chose a thief, a murderer, and a seditious person, before Christ, but also crucified him between two thieves; and many of them (saith Josephus) were miserably harassed and destroyed by the λῃστρικὸν τάγμα,  band of thieves which rose up among them And when Felix had destroyed these thieves, then (saith he) there sprang up among them ἕτερον εἶδος λῃστῶν, another kind of thieves, called the Sicarii, who slew many of their fellow Jews at broad day, in the middle of the city, and especially at the feasts; and these thieves also were seditious as well as murderers, threatening death to them who obeyed the Romans; and of them, one Jesus was the leader.

4. They condemned our Lord as worthy to die, (Mark xiv. 64.) and they themselves were forced to confess, that God had condemned their whole nation to death, as hath been proved before.

5. They say of Christ, We have a law, and by our law he ought to die; (John xix. 7.) and they were so infatuated as to conceive, that by their law they ought to die rather than yield to the Romans. Josephus* doth himself confess it, saying to Vespasian, I am not ignorant of the Jewish law, καὶ πῶς στρατηγοῖς ἀποθνήσκειν πρέποι, and how our commanders ought to die; and when he refused to die with his companions, they cry out, Ὦ πατρῷοι νόμοι! † What is now become of our laws! Eleazar exhorting them to kill themselves rather than fall into the hands of the Romans, cries out, Ταῦθ' ἡμᾶς οἱ νόμοι κελεύουσι, ‡ Our laws command us to do this.

6. They condemned him as an enemy to Cæsar, and they themselves all perished for that crime; for Josephus, speaking of the sect of Judas Gaulonites, who allowed μόνον ἡγέμονα καὶ δεσπότην Θεὸν, and chose rather to die than acknowledge Cæsar, he saith, § they laid the foundation of all the calamities which fell upon their nation; they indeed instigated the people, and even forced them to that war by which they were destroyed.

7. They condemned him as a false prophet, and a deceiver of the people; and their own ‖ Josephus often testifies, that their false prophets and deceivers were the very causes of their ruin.

8. They laid their accusations against him and his followers, as persons who profaned, and who designed to destroy their temple; and they themselves, as hath been shewn already, first horribly profaned it with the blood of Jews and gentiles, and then forced the Romans to destroy it; they hastened the slow fire (saith Josephus), and even drew it to the temple.

9. They thought it expedient he should be put to death, lest the Romans should come and take away their place and nation; and this expedient brought upon them those very Romans who took away their temple and their city, sold πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν, their whole land, saith Josephus, ¶ and would not suffer them so much as to come into Judea, or to the ruins of Jerusalem. Josephus  doth inform us, that they had a prophecy that one of their country should then reign over the whole earth; that this caused many to take upon them to be kings, and animated the people to that war, which brought this ruin on their nation.

Lastly, They rejected that Jesus, who came with the glad tidings of salvation to them, and would not hear him preaching the words of life unto them; and they were forced, about seven years together, to hear another Jesus sounding forth continually, σκυθρωπὴ ἡ κληδὼν, Sad is the omen which I bring from God unto you. Josephus, speaking of the dreadful prodigies, or, as he styles them, τῶν τοῦ Θεοῦ κηρυγμάτων, God's warning of their approaching desolation, concludes with this as τὸ πάντων φοβερώτερον the most terrible of all; that four years before the war, when the city was in peace and plenty, one Jesus began at the feast of tabernacles to cry, Φωνὴ ἐπὶ Ἱεροσόλυμα, καὶ τὸν ναὸν, φωνὴ ἐπὶ τὸν λαὸν πάντα, *a voice against Jerusalem and the temple, and against all the people; and thus he went about the city, crying day and night, and being whipped, so that his flesh was torn to the very bones, he neither wept nor begged mercy, but at every lash cried out, Αἲ, αἲ Ἱεροσολύμοις, Woe, woe to Jerusalem, the temple, and the people; and that, crying thus above seven years, he never waxed hoarse nor weary. Whence even Josephus† concludes thus; If any man considers, he will find that God by many ways shews to men the things which do belong to their peace, especially to our nation, but that they perish through their own madness and their wilful sins. Now hence we learn,

That Christ was certainly a prophet sent from God, even that prophet, who, according to the predictions of all the Jewish records, was to come into the world: against many other proofs brought to confirm this truth, the sceptics of our age object, that they are founded on records made by the followers of Christ, or the professors of Christianity; and so by persons who might be tempted, in honour of their Lord, and for the credit and advantage of Christianity, to magnify the things which they related. But here the argument is almost wholly built upon records and testimonies of Jews and gentiles, the two great enemies of Christian faith, and so will not admit of this evasion. Will they then say, as Porphyry did of the prophecies of Daniel? Surely the book was written after the things were done. It is manifest from history, that the three Evangelists, who writ the history of these predictions of our Lord, were dead before the desolation of Jerusalem; which surely is sufficient to exclude that only refuge they can fly unto.

PREFATORY DISCOURSE,

CONCERNING

AND THE

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW IN PARTICULAR.

CONTENTS.

§. I. The tradition of the church from the beginning of the second century shews that the gospels, then received, were only the four Gospels which we own. §. II. The other gospels mentioned in church history do not invalidate, but rather strengthen, this tradition, they being only mentioned after these were received, and that as gospels not authentic, not received by the church, or as composed by heretics. §. III. Other considerations offered to strengthen this tradition. §. IV. That these gospels have been handed down to future generations uncorrupted in the substantials of faith and manners. §. V. Concerning the Gospel of St. Matthew it is inquired, whether it was originally writ by him in Hebrew or in Greek; reasons to suspect the tradition, That it was first writ in Hebrew only, and afterward translated into Greek; First, From what is delivered by the chief authors of it. §. VI. Secondly, From the tradition itself. §. VII. An objection answered.

CONCERNING the authority of the four Gospels,* unquestionably owned as sacred scriptures indited by those apostles and evangelists whose names they bear; and the reason why they, and they only, have obtained to be received as the authentic records of what our Saviour did, and spake, let it be noted,

First, That Irenæus† informs us concerning Polycarp, that he was made bishop of Smyrna by the apostles, and conversed with many who had seen the Lord. Now from him Victor Capuanus‡ cites a passage, in which we have the names of these four Gospels, as we at present do receive them, and the beginning of their several Gospels.

Secondly, That Justin Martyr,§ who, saith Eusebius,‖ lived μετ' οὐ πολὺ τῶν ἀποστόλων, not long after the apostles, shews that these books were then well known by the name of Gospels, and as such were read by Christians in their assemblies every Lord's day; yea, we learn from him that they were read by Jews, and might be read by heathens; and that we may not doubt that by the memoirs of the apostles, which (saith he) we call Gospels, he meant these four received then in the church, he cites passages out of every one of them, declaring that they contained the words of Christ.

Thirdly, That Irenæus,¶ in the same century, not only

Johannes autem ad Ephesum constitutus, qui legem tanquam ex Gentibus ignorabant, à causa nostræ redemptionis Evangelii sumpsit exordium, quæ causa ex eo apparet quod filium suum Deus pro nostra salute voluit incarnari. Lucas vero à Zachariæ sacerdotio incipit, ut ejus filii miraculo nativitatis et tanti prædicatoris officii divinitatem Christi Gentibus declararet; unde et Marcus antiqua prophetici mysterii competentia adventum Christi declarat, ut non nova sed antiquitùs prolata ejus prædicatio probaretur." ¶ "Tanta est autem circa Evangelia hæc firmitas, ut et ipsi hæretici testimonium reddant eis, et ex ipsis egrediens unusquisque eorum conetur suam confirmare doc-cites them all by name, but declares that there were neither more nor less received by the church, and that they were of such authority, that though the heretics of his time complained of their obscurity, depraved them, and lessened their authority, saying, they were written in hypocrisy, and in compliance with the errors of those to whom they wrote, and with whom they conversed, yet durst they not wholly disown them, or deny them to be the writings of those apostles whose names they bore. Moreover, he cites passages from every chapter of St. Matthew and St. Luke, from fourteen chapters of St. Mark, and from twenty chapters of St. John.

Fourthly, That Clemens of Alexandria,* having cited a passage from the gospel according to the Egyptians, informs his reader, that it was not to be found in the four Gospels received by the church.

Fifthly, That Tatianus,† who flourished in the same century, and before Irenæus, wrote συνάφειαν τίνα καὶ συναγωγὴν τῶν εὐαγγελίων, a catena, or harmony of the gospels, which he named, τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων, the gospel gathered out of the four Gospels. And that the apostolical constitutions name them all, and ‡ command that they be read in the church, the people standing up at the reading of them.

Sixthly, That these Gospels, being written (saith Irenæus) by the will of God, to be the pillars and foundation of the Christian faith, the immediate successors of the apostles, who, saith Eusebius,§ did great miracles by the assistance of the Holy Ghost, as they performed the work of evangelists in preaching Christ to those who had not yet heard the word, made it their business, when they had laid the foundation of that faith among them, τὴν τῶν θείων εὐαγγελίων παραδιδόναι γραφὴν, to deliver to them in writing the holy Gospels.

§. II. The mention of other gospels bearing the names of other apostles, or of gospels used by other nations, is so far from being derogatory from, or tending to diminish the tradition of the church concerning these four Gospels, that it tends highly to establish and confirm it, as will be evident from these considerations:—

First, That we find no mention of any of these gospels till the close of the second century, and of few of them till the third or the fourth century; i. e. not till long after the general reception of these four Gospels by the whole church of Christ. For Justin Martyr and Irenæus, who cite large passages from these four Gospels, make not the least mention of any other gospels mentioned either by the heretics or by the orthodox.

Secondly, They who speak of them in the close of the second, or in the following centuries, do it still with this remark, that the gospels received by the tradition of the church were only four, and that these belonged not to them, nor to the evangelical canon, v. g. Clemens of Alexandria‖ is the first ecclesiastical writer who cites the gospel according to the Egyptians, and he doth it with this note, that the words cited thence, are not to be found in the four Gospels. In the same book he cites another passage quoted by the heretics, as he conjectures from the same gospel; but then he adds, these things they cite οἱ πάντα μᾶλλον ἢ τῷ κατὰ ἀλήθειαν εὐαγγελικῷ στοιχήσαντες κανόνι, who had rather follow any thing than the true evangelical canon. (Ibid. p. 453. D.) Origen* is the next that makes mention of them, and he doth it with this censure, that they were the gospels not of the church, but of the heretics; among these he reckons, the gospel according to the Egyptians, the gospel of the twelve apostles, the gospel according to St. Thomas and Matthias, and others; but, saith he, there are only four, from whence we are to confirm our doctrine, nor do I approve of any other. Whence we may learn, that though he often cites the gospel to the Hebrews, which, saith St. Jerome, was the same with that according to the twelve apostles, and the gospel according to St. Peter, yet he approved of none of them.

Eusebius† is the next ecclesiastical writer who speaks of other gospels; viz. The gospel according to St. Peter, St. Thomas, and Matthias, and also of the acts of Andrew, St. John, and other apostles; but then, as Origen had told us, that the heretics only had them, so he saith, that they were published by them, and that they had no testimony from those ecclesiastical persons, who continued down the other gospels in a succession to them, and that the doctrine contained in them was much different from the catholic doctrine; whence he concludes, that they are the inventions of heretics, and are not so much as to be ranked among spurious books, but are to be rejected as wicked and absurd. And,

First, To begin with the gospel of St. Peter; it was, saith Eusebius, published by the heretics, and is by no means to be placed among the catholic gospels: it is manifest (saith Serapion),‡ that we received it not from our ancestors, but those who learnt and read it, were the Docetæ, and the Marcionites, who sprang from them: it was the gospel used by the Nazarenes, saith Theodoret.§

Secondly, The gospel according to St. Thomas, mentioned by Origen and Eusebius, was, saith St. Cyril,‖ the work not of St. Thomas the apostle, but of another Thomas, who was a Manichean heretic; on which account he desires all Christians not to read it.

Thirdly, From the same heretics proceeded the gospel according to St. Philip, saith Leontius.* It was the fiction of the Gnostics, saith Epiphanius.†

Fourthly, The gospel of Matthias was, as Clemens of Alexandria intimates,‡ the work of the Basilidians, or Carpocratians.

Fifthly, The Proto-Evangelium of St. James is first mentioned by Pope Innocent the First,§ among the gospels feigned by Lucius the heretic; this he doth in a decree, in which he condemns all these false gospels, and declares who were the authors of them.

Lastly, The gospel of the twelve apostles, according to St. Jerome, is the same with the gospel according to the Hebrews, of which we are to speak hereafter.

Seeing then these four Gospels were received, without all doubting or contradiction, by all Christians from the beginning, as the writings of those apostles and evangelists, whose names they bear, and they both owned and ‖ testified that they were delivered to them by the apostles as the pillars, foundations, and elements, of their faith, and Divine writings, even by those who preached that very gospel to them, which in these writings they delivered, or rather by that God that enabled them to preach, and directed them to indite these Gospels for that end: (2.) seeing they were delivered by the immediate successors of the apostles to all the churches they converted or established, as a rule of faith: (3.) seeing they were read from the beginning, as Justin Martyr testifies, in all assemblies of Christians; and that not as some other ecclesiastical writings were in some assemblies upon some certain days, but in all Christian assemblies on the Lord's day, and so must early be translated into those languages, in which alone they could be understood by some churches; viz. the Syriac and Latin: (4.) seeing they were generally cited in the second century for the confirmation of this faith, and the conviction of heretics, and the president of the assembly exhorted those who heard them to do and imitate what they heard: (5.) seeing we never heard of any other gospels till the close of the second century, and then heard only of them with a mark of reprobation, or a declaration that they were ψευδεπίγραφα, falsely imposed upon the apostles, that they belonged not to the Evangelical Canon, or to the gospels delivered to the churches by succession of ecclesiastical persons, or to those gospels which they approved, or from which they confirmed their doctrines, but were to be rejected as wicked and absurd, and the inventions of rank heretics; all these considerations must afford us a sufficient demonstration, that all Christians then had an unquestionable evidence that they were the genuine works of those apostles and evangelists, whose names they bore, and so were worthy to be received as the records of their faith. And then what reason can any persons of succeeding ages have, to question what was so universally acknowledged by those, who lived so near to that very age in which these Gospels were indited, and who received them under the character of the holy and divine Scriptures?

§. III. And yet even to this general and uncontrolled tradition we may add farther strength from these considerations;

First, That since our Jesus was a prophet, or a teacher sent from God, he must have left unto his church some records of his Father's will; this king Messiah being to reign for ever, must have some laws by which his subjects must be for ever governed; this Saviour of the world must have delivered to the world the terms on which they may obtain the great salvation purchased by him; or he must be in vain a Prophet, King, and Saviour; and so some certain records of those laws and those conditions of salvation must be extant. Now unless these Gospels, and other scriptures of the New Testament, contain these laws, they must be wholly lost, and we must all be left under a manifest impossibility of knowing, and so of doing his will, and of obtaining those blessings he hath promised to them that do it. For to say tradition might supply the want of writing, is to contradict experience; since the traditions of the Jews made void that word of God they had received in writing, and then how reasonable is it to believe they would have much more done it, had no such writing been delivered? Moreover, our blessed Lord spake many things which were not written; he taught the multitude by the sea, Mark ii. 13. beyond Jordan, Mark x. 1. in the synagogues of Galilee, Luke iv. 15. at Nazareth, ver. 22. at Capernaum, ver. 31. out of Simon's ship, Luke v. 3. and very often in the temple, John vii. 14. viii. 2. He interpreted to the two disciples going to Emmaus throughout all the Scriptures the things concerning him, Luke xxiv. 27. He discoursed to his disciples after his resurrection, touching the things of the kingdom of God, Acts i. 3. St. John assures us there were exceeding many miracles that Jesus did which were not written, xx. 30. Now whereas all those miracles and sermons which were written are entirely preserved, and firmly believed, tradition hath not preserved one miracle or sermon to us which was never written, and therefore can be no sure record of the doctrine or the laws of Christ. In a word, it is evident, that even the church catholic hath lost a tradition delivered to her by St. Paul; for, in his Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, ii. 5, 6. he saith, I told you these things (concerning antichrist) when I was with you, and now ye know what letteth, or hindereth, his appearance; he also intimates in this epistle, and by his exhortation to hold fast these traditions, ver. 15. that they were of great moment to be known, and be retained; and yet these traditions have neither been retained by the Roman nor by the catholic church; and it is confessed by Anselm,* and by Esthius on the place, that though the Thessalonians knew it, yet we knew it not; so that the tradition which the church received from this apostle touching this matter, is wholly lost; how therefore can she be relied on as a sure preserver, and a true teacher of traditions, which hath confessedly lost one of great moment deposited with the Thessalonians, and the primitive church?

Secondly, That it was necessary that the Christian doctrine or revelation should be preserved in some writing, may fairly be concluded from the Holy Scriptures; for if St. Paul thought it necessary to write to the church of Rome, to put them in remembrance of the grace given to them, (Rom. xv. 15.) as also to send to his Corinthians in writing, the things they had heard, and did acknowledge, (2 Cor. i. 13.) and to write the same things which he had taught to his Philippians: (iii. 1.) if St. Peter thought it needful to write to the Jewish converts, to testify to them that it was the grace of God in which they stood, (1 Pet. v. 12.) and to stir up their sincere minds by way of remembrance, that they might be mindful of the commands of the apostles of our Lord and Saviour, (2 Pet. iii. 1, 2.) though they at present knew them, and were established in the truth; (2 Pet. i. 12, 13.) and St. Jude to write to the same persons, to mind them of the common salvation: (ver. 3.) if the beloved evangelist closeth his gospel with these words, These things were written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, and, believing, might have life through his name; surely these persons could not but think it necessary that the essential doctrines of Christianity should be written; and yet we are sure they only have been written in those gospels and other scriptures contained in the canon of the books of the New Testament: and therefore we cannot reasonably doubt of their authority. Add to this,

That the apostles, and that Holy Spirit who did assist them in the inditing of these gospels for the church's use, could not be wanting in causing them to be transmitted to those Christians for whose use they were indited; because they could not be wanting to pursue the end for which they were indited: for they being therefore written that they might know the certainty of those things in which they had been instructed, (Luke i. 4.) and partly to engage them more firmly to believe that Jesus was the Christ, they must very early commit them to those churches for whose sake they were written.

Thirdly, It is evident that the immediate succeeding age could not be ignorant of what was thus delivered to them by the church from the apostles, as the pillar and the ground of faith; nor is it easy to conceive that either they would have thus received them, had the apostles given them no sufficient indication of them, or that they would have been esteemed so presently the charters of the Christian faith, had not the apostles delivered them unto the churches under that character.

Lastly, We have good reason to suppose, that the providence of God, which was so highly interested in the propagation of the Christian faith, and making of it known to the world, would not permit false records of that faith to be so early and so generally imposed upon the Christian world.

§. IV. From the same tradition we, with the strongest evidence of reason, may conclude, that these four gospels, and the other Scriptures received then without doubt or contradiction by the church, were handed down unto them uncorrupted in the substantials of faith and manners. For,

1. These records being once so generally dispersed through all Christian churches, though at a great distance from each other, from the beginning of the second century. 2. They being so universally acknowledged and consented to by men of curious parts and different persuasions. 3. They being preserved in their originals in the apostolical churches, among whom, saith Tertullian,* "authenticæ eorum literæ recitantur," their original letters are recited; it being not to be doubted but they who received the originals from the apostles, and who had authentic copies of them given to them by their immediate successors, would carefully preserve them to posterity. 4. They being multiplied into divers versions almost from the beginning, as we may rationally conclude; because the church of Rome, and other churches which understood not the original Greek, being founded in the apostles' days, could not be rationally supposed to be long without a version of those Scriptures which were to be read by them in public and in private. 5. They being esteemed by them as "digesta nostra," their law books, saith Tertullian,† "libri deifici deificæ Scripturæ," books which instructed them to lead a Divine life, say the martyrs, and believed by all Christians to be θεῖαι γραφαὶ, divine Scriptures, saith Origen,‡ and therefore as the records of their hopes and fears. 6. They being so constantly rehearsed in their assemblies by men whose work it was to read and preach, and to exhort to the performance of the duties they enjoined. 7. They being so diligently read by Christians, and so rivetted in their memories, that Eusebius§ mentions some who had them all by heart. 8. They being, lastly, so frequent in their writings, and so often cited by Irenæus, Clemens of Alexandria, and Origen, as now we have them, it must be certain from these considerations that they were handed down to succeeding generations pure and uncorrupt.

And indeed these things render us more secure, that the Scriptures were preserved entire from designed corruption, than any man can be that the statutes of the land, or any other writings, histories, or records whatsoever, have been so preserved; because the evidence of them depends upon more persons, and they more holy, and so less subject to deceive, and more concerned that they should not be corrupted, than men have cause to be concerned for other records; and so we must renounce all certainty of any record, or grant that it is certain these are genuine records of the Christian faith. Moreover, this supposed corruption of the word of God, or substitution of any other doctrine than what hath been delivered by the apostles, could not be done by any part or sect of Christians; but they, who had embraced the faith and used the true copies of the word of God in other churches of the Christian world, must have found out the cheat; and therefore this corruption, if it were at all affected, must be the work of the whole bulk of Christians; whereas it cannot rationally be supposed, that the immediate succeeding ages should universally conspire to substitute their own inventions for the word of God, and yet continue steadfast in, and suffer so much for, that faith which denounced the severest judgments against them who did corrupt this word; or, that so many men should, with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, avouch the gospel, and at the same time make such a change even in the frame and constitution of this doctrine, as made it ineffectual both to themselves and their posterity; nor can it reasonably be thought, that they should venture upon that which, were the gospel true or false, must needs expose them to the greatest evils whilst they continued abetters of it. Lastly, that these sacred records of the word of God have not been so corrupted as to cease to be a rule of faith and manners, we argue from the providence of God; for nothing seems more inconsistent with the wisdom and goodness of God, than to inspire his servants to write the Scriptures for a rule of faith and manners for all future ages, and to require the belief of the doctrine, and the practice of the rules of life plainly contained in it, and yet to suffer this divinely-inspired rule to be insensibly corrupted in things necessary to faith or practice. Who can imagine that that God, who sent his Son out of his bosom to declare this doctrine, and his apostles by the assistance of the Holy Spirit to indite and preach it, and by so many miracles confirmed it to the world, should suffer any wicked persons to corrupt and alter any of those terms on which the happiness of mankind depended? This sure can be esteemed rational by none but such as think it not absurd to say, that God repented of his good-will and kindness to mankind in the vouchsafing of the gospel to them; or that he so far maligned the good of future generations, that he suffered wicked men to rob them of all the good intended to them by this declaration of his will: for, since those very Scriptures which have been received as the word of God, and used by the church as such from the first ages of it, pretend to be the terms of our salvation, Scriptures indited by men commissionated from Christ, and such as did avouch themselves apostles by the will of God, and his command for the delivery of the faith of God's elect, and for the knowledge of the truth which is after godliness, in hope of life eternal, they must be in reality the word of God, or Providence must have permitted such a forgery, as rendereth it impossible for us to perform our duty in order to salvation; for if the Scripture of the New Testament should be corrupted in any essential requisite of faith or manners, it must cease to make us wise unto salvation, and so God must have lost the end which he intended in inditing it. The objections which the papists make on account of the various lections, I presume are fully answered by Dr. Mills; and can be answered by him alone, since others must not be allowed to blow upon his learned book upon that subject.

§. V. And this is all, which I think necessary to be said, concerning the four gospels in the general. I proceed now to the consideration of that great question, Whether the gospel of St. Matthew was by him writ in Hebrew, or in the Syriac language, and only was by others afterward translated into Greek?

Mr. Du Pin * informs us, that all the ancients with one consent assure us that he wrote in Hebrew; Papius, St. Irenæus, Origen, Eusebius, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, St. Jerome, St. Austin, St. Chrysostom, the author of the Latin Commentary on St. Matthew, which is ascribed to St. Chrysostom, and the author of the Synopsis of the Scripture, which bears the name of Athanasius, are a cloud of witnesses, who depose that St. Matthew wrote his gospel in Hebrew: but then he adds, That the original Hebrew of the gospel according to St. Matthew was lost; and after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, becoming useless, there was no care taken to preserve it. And saith, p. 36. It is certain that the Greek version we have is as ancient as the times of the apostles, that it was published from the beginning of the church in all Christian nations, that it was looked upon as good as an original by the Greeks and Latins, that it was preserved without any alteration, and always looked upon as authentic and canonical, whereas the original Hebrew continued not long the same that it was left by St. Matthew.

Now as for this cloud of witnesses, I shall, first, consider the chief of them apart, and then discourse of this supposed tradition in the bulk. Now,

The first witness is Papias, that man of fables, saith Eusebius,* who voucheth, that St. Matthew writ his oracles in the Hebrew tongue, ἡρμήνευσε δὲ αὐτὰ ἕκαστος ὡς ἠδύνατο, and every one interpreted them as he was able; from which words it is evident, that he knew nothing of any authentic version of this gospel approved by the apostles, and looked upon as authentic and canonical by the church; for after that, every one could not be left to interpret the Hebrew as he could. He also plainly in this passage doth suppose, that the Hebrew copy of St. Matthew was neither then lost nor adulterated and corrupted by additions, defalcations, or interpolations, or must own that every one then used a copy so corrupted; and if he could be ignorant or mistaken in matters of so great importance, why might he not be so in saying, this gospel was first written in a language he understood not?

Irenæus† is the second witness who saith, that St. Matthew put forth his gospel among the Hebrews, τῇ ἰδίᾳ διαλέκτῳ αὐτῶν, in their own tongue; and that the Ebionites used "eo Evangelio quod est secundum Matthæum," that very gospel according to St. Matthew, which was writ in Hebrew; this he saith twice,‡ without any intimation that it was interpolated or corrupted by them. Now here, saith the learned Mr. Grabe,§ the Nazarenes and Ebionites easily imposed upon Irenæus, and other fathers who understood not the Hebrew tongue. But after more mature consideration of the matter, he saith, He thinks with Irenæus, that the Ebionites did use the gospel of St. Matthew, though not entire and uncorrupted, and finds, that Eusebius and St. Jerome, and our modern writers, were mistaken in making the gospel to the Hebrews which the Nazarenes used, and the gospel which the Ebionites abused, one and the same. And yet Epiphanius ‖ expressly saith of the Ebionites, they used only the gospel of St. Matthew, and called it the gospel according to the Hebrews, as it truly is. So that either Eusebius, Epiphanius, and St. Jerome, must be mistaken in this matter, which is sufficient to invalidate their testimony, or Irenæus must be himself mistaken ; and then he much more might be so in speaking of a language that he understood not.

Origen* is the third witness who indeed saith, That the first gospel was writ by St. Matthew, and that he gave it to the Jewish converts composed in the Hebrew tongue; but he doth not say, it was written either first, or only in that tongue: thus therefore I am willing to compound the matter, that the gospel of St. Matthew, being written for all nations in the Greek, as a tongue common to most of them, was also given for the use of those Jews who only understood their mother-tongue in Hebrew.

Eusebius† is the next witness who saith, That Matthew delivered his gospel to the Jews in their own tongue; but then that the gospel then retained in Hebrew, was indeed the gospel according to the Hebrews, or the same gospel of St. Matthew which the Ebionites used, and called the gospel according to St. Matthew, is plain from‡ comparing the words of Eusebius and Theodoret with those of Irenæus; though I confess Theodoret seems to make a distinction betwixt the Ebionites,—who held that our Lord was born of Joseph and Mary, who used the gospel according to the Hebrews; i. e. that gospel of the Nazarenes from which, saith Epiphanius,§ they had cut off the genealogy of St. Matthew,—and the Ebionites, who held that Christ was born of a virgin; and saith they used the gospel according to St. Matthew: and yet of this distinction Irenæus saith nothing, and Eusebius plainly contradicts it, such a confusion and conflict are there among the ancients in this matter, Eusebius‖ proceeds to tell us, that they of the Jews who received Christ, chiefly embraced τὸ καθ' Ἑβραίους εὐαγγέλιον, the gospel according to the Hebrews; and that Hegesippus, a man of the first succession from the apostles, cited passages¶ ἐκ τοῦ καθ' Ἑβραίους εὐαγγελίου, from the gospel according to the Hebrews. Now these things shew, that though he knew this gospel contained many things, which were not in the Greek copy of St. Matthew, yet was it free from any additions which did corrupt the faith; for otherwise he could not have spoke so honourably of Hegesippus, or so mildly of those other Christians which made use of it: and therefore though he saith that some put the gospel according to the Hebrews amongst the books contradicted, as they did also the Revelation of St. John; yet by saying this, he plainly insinuates, that other ecclesiastical writers owned it; nor doth he rank it among τὰς ἐν ὀνόματι ἀποστόλων πρὸς τῶν αἱρετικῶν προφερομένας, the scriptures introduced by the heretics under the name of the apostles, as he doth the gospels of St. Peter, St. Thomas, and Matthias, as knowing, what St. Jerome doth assure us, that it was called, or esteemed by most men, the gospel according to St. Matthew.

Epiphanius†† is another witness, who saith, The gospel of St. Matthew was writ in Hebrew; but then he adds, that the Nazarenes had the fullest copy of it, and kept it till his time, as it was first written in the Hebrew tongue. Now be it, as Mr. Grabe and Petavius affirm, that in this he was deceived by them, and that it was the fault of it to be so full; yet as this shews that it passed then under the name of St. Matthew's gospel, so doth it also shew, how easy it was for these witnesses to be imposed on in this matter.

St. Jerome* is another witness, that the gospel of St. Matthew was writ in Hebrew words and letters: and then he adds,

First, That it was (in his time) uncertain who translated it into Greek.

Secondly, That the very manuscript was till his time preserved in the Cæsarean library, gathered by Pamphilus the martyr; and that the Nazarenes, who used it at Berœa, gave him the liberty to transcribe it, and that this very book was by most thought to be the gospel according to St. Matthew.

Thirdly, That the scriptures cited in this gospel, both in the person of the evangelist and of our Lord, were exactly according to the Hebrew, and not according to the Septuagint, as it might reasonably be expected it would be in a Hebrew gospel, written for the use of them who only owned the Hebrew Bible as authentic.

Fourthly, That he himself not only transcribed it from the Cæsarean copy, but after turned it into Greek and Latin.

Fifthly, From this Hebrew gospel, he cites these passages; First, The mother of our Lord and his brethren said to him, John the Baptist baptizeth for the remission of sins, let us go and be baptized of him; and he answered, In what have I sinned, that I should go and be baptized of him? Secondly, The man who came to Christ with the withered hand was a mason, and said to Christ, I am a mason, who get my living by my labour; I pray thee heal me, that I may not be constrained to beg. Thirdly, That the apostle James had sworn, after he had received the sacrament from the hands of Christ, that he would not eat bread till he had seen Christ risen from the dead; and that therefore our Lord appeared to him. Fourthly, That in this gospel it was reckoned amongst the highest crimes, to make sad the heart of our brother. Fifthly, That in this gospel it was said, not only that the vail of the temple was rent at our Lord's death; but also that the lintel over the temple being very great was broken. In fine, he saith, That Jesus being come out of the water, the source of the Holy Ghost descended upon him, rested on him, and said to him, My Son, I expected you in all the prophets, to the end, that being come I might rest upon you; for you are my Rest, and my first-born Son, who reigns for ever. Now this is the only place which seems to vary from the doctrine of the church; and this Origen expounds. (Com. in Job, p. 58. D.) The other fathers which seem to avouch this tradition come too late, and are not considerable enough to be examined apart: I therefore shall only make some remarks on what St. Jerome hath delivered. And,

First, Whereas he says, It was uncertain who translated this gospel of St. Matthew, writ in Hebrew, into Greek; hence we observe, that there is little reason to depend on what later writers have said on this matter; and therefore Mr. Du Pin freely confesses, p. 36. That whereas it is said in the abridgment of the Scriptures ascribed to Athanasius, that it was made by St. James, bishop of Jerusalem; by Theophylact* is ascribed to St. John; and by Anastasius the Sinaite, is ascribed to St. Luke and St. Paul; all this is spoken without ground.

Secondly, Whereas he says, This was the copy which the Nazarenes and the Ebionites used, and that most persons did esteem it the gospel, and the authentic copy of St. Matthew: hence it must follow, that they had then a copy, which then passed commonly under the name of the gospel according to St. Matthew.

Thirdly, Whereas he citeth from this gospel many passages, which are not, as he cites them, to be found in the gospel of St. Matthew approved by the church; hence it must follow, they had added to St. Matthew's gospel many things from tradition which were not recorded in the authentic gospel of St. Matthew; and this seems probably to be the thing Eusebius intended, when he said, that Hegesippus cited many things from the Hebrew gospel, and from the unwritten traditions of the Jews; so that this gospel according to the Hebrews, seems not to me, as Mr. Grabe† and Du Pin do conjecture, to have been a gospel wholly different from that of St. Matthew, writ or translated by him into Hebrew for their use, as were, saith Epiphanius,‡ the gospel of St. John, and the Acts of the Apostles; but only the gospel of St. Matthew used by the Ebionites, who denied that Christ was born of a pure virgin, and therefore struck out the genealogy of St. Matthew; and the same gospel used by the Nazarenes, with many additions they had received from tradition, and upon that account placed by many ecclesiastical writers among the writings contradicted, and in those matters in which it differed from the Greek and authentic copy, was of no authority in matters which concerned the Christian faith.

§. VI. To proceed therefore to the consideration of this tradition in the bulk, let it be noted,

First, That this is a tradition that an inspired apostle wrote a large gospel by the afflatus of the Holy Ghost in Hebrew, and yet that Providence which hath preserved all the other canonical books both of the Old and of the New Testament in their original languages, and that church which hath handed down all the other books of the New Testament, even those which are comprised in one single chapter in the same language, have suffered the original of this large gospel to be lost within forty years, saith Mr. Du Pin, after it was written; as if it had been only written to be buried in the tomb of Barnabas, according to the tale of Theodorus Lector* in the sixth century; or to be carried by St. Bartholomew† unto the Indians, on that account more fortunate than other Christians; and yet unfortunate in this, that when they had it, they understood not a word of it; whence, even Du Pin saith, there is no appearance of truth in that story, p. 32.

Secondly, It is a tradition of a gospel written in Hebrew by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, for the use of the converted Jews; and yet, after the destruction of Jerusalem, it became useless, saith Du Pin, and so no care was taken to preserve it: yea, it was a gospel written for their use, and to supply the absence of St. Matthew; and yet, as far as doth appear, none of them ever had, or used it, unless it also was the gospel according to the Hebrews; for the converted Jews used that gospel, saith Eusebius; and Hegesippus appears, saith he, to have been one of the Jewish converts; because he cites all his passages out of the gospel according to the Hebrews: the Ebionites, say Eusebius, Epiphanius, and Theodoret, used only the gospel according to the Hebrews; this was the gospel, saith St. Jerome, which the Nazarenes read, and which both they and the Ebionites used: and yet this gospel is put among the books contradicted by Eusebius. It is of no authority to prove any matter of faith, saith Origen,‡ and may be received or not. To avoid these consequences, Du Pin and Mr. Grabe contend, that the gospel according to the Hebrews was distinct from the gospel according to St. Matthew; but this is evidently to contradict the testimonies of Irenæus and Theodoret, who say, the Ebionites used the gospel of St. Matthew; and of Epiphanius, who says, they used the gospel according to the Hebrews, and called it the gospel according to St. Matthew; and of St. Jerome, who saith, it was by most reputed the gospel according to St. Matthew. It was not indeed the true authentic gospel of St. Matthew, received without contradiction by the church, for that was only the Greek copy; it was not a copy of St. Matthew's gospel, free from additions and interpolations, which they had put into it from tradition, which is all that the arguments of Du Pin and others prove; but yet, I say, it was that very gospel which the Nazarenes read, and which was kept in the Cæsarean library as the gospel according to St. Matthew, and which the Ebionites used as such; nor can any man prove from antiquity, that either the Christian fathers knew of, or that the Jewish converts ever used, any other Hebrew gospel according to St. Matthew.

Epiphanius indeed saith,* That the Nazarenes had the gospel according to St. Matthew, πληρέστατον Ἑβραιστὶ, most full in Hebrew, and that they had preserved it from the beginning, as it was writ in Hebrew, till his time: but Petavius† truly notes, that this was his mistake, that gospel not being pure, but depraved, and was indeed no other than the gospel according to the Hebrews; and that this was so, is evident, partly from his own confession, that for any thing he knew to the contrary, the Nazarenes had cut off from it the genealogy from Abraham to Christ; and partly from the additional passages so often cited by St. Jerome from that gospel, which the Nazarenes read and used: and this also confutes another salvo, which some have invented by a distinction, which, without ground, they make betwixt the gospel according to the Hebrews, and the gospel according to the Nazarenes.

Now from what I have thus discoursed, I argue thus, Either the gospel of St. Matthew, supposed to be originally written in Hebrew, contained in it the passages cited from the gospel of the Nazarenes, or the gospel according to the Hebrews, or it did not; if it did not, then it is certain, that the gospel retained in Hebrew by the Nazarenes and Ebionites, as the gospel according to St. Matthew, was not the same with his original gospel. Then, secondly, Seeing St. Jerome twice informs us, that it was the very authentic copy of St. Matthew, and was by most judged to be so; and Eusebius saith, that this gospel according to the Hebrews was only by some rejected, as also was the Revelation of St. John; it follows, that most Christians as to the matter must be then mistaken.

But if the original gospel of St. Matthew did contain these passages, then it is certain, that the Greek copy approved by the apostles, and received by the universal church, cannot be the true or authentic gospel of St. Matthew, seeing it must be then deficient in many things contained in the true Hebrew gospel; and so it must be granted, that the apostles approved, and the church received, a gospel, which wanted many passages contained in the original, according to St. Matthew, written by the assistance or inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

Thirdly, It was written in Hebrew, saith this tradition, for the use of the circumcision; and yet it was not written by St. James, the bishop of the circumcision, nor by St. Peter, or St. John, the apostles of the circumcision, but by St. Matthew, the publican; yea, it was written in Hebrew for them for whom both their own bishop, and these apostles of the circumcision, wrote in Greek.

Fourthly, It was written, saith this tradition, by the direction of the Holy Ghost, and interpreted, saith the pretended Athanasius, by James the brother of our Lord; saith Anastasius Sinaita, by St. Luke; by St. John, saith Theophylact, upon hearsay; and all of them without ground, saith Du Pin, p. 36. It is unknown by whom it was translated, saith St. Jerome; it was not translated (saith Papias), but every one interpreted it as he could; and yet that of Baronius * is certain, that if the Hebrew alone was the original of St. Matthew, we cannot say the Greek is the true copy of St. Matthew, but by our assurance that it agrees with the original. Now if it were not at all translated, as Papias saith, or were translated only by an unknown hand, as St. Jerome saith; or if we have only one single person of a later date, who ascribes this version to an apostolical person, and he both doth it without ground, and is contradicted by two, who attribute this version to another,—can this be any sure foundation that we have any copy which agrees with the original?

It is said, indeed, that the apostles approved of the Greek version; I answer, that they and the whole church approved of the Greek gospel of St. Matthew, I believe; but what single authors, say they, approved of any version? yea, what author before St. Jerome and the false Athanasius speaks of any version from the Hebrew? All antiquity cite this gospel according to the Greek, and speak of the gospel according to the Hebrew as a thing not of authority, or not received without contradiction; but I know not one who saith the gospel used by the church was a version from the Hebrew; and from this long silence, and from the discord and ungrounded sayings of those single witnesses, who after the fourth century speak of a version, I conclude the Greek, we now have, was no version, but the original gospel of St. Matthew, written by him for the use of the whole church of God; and that the Hebrew copy, if he wrote any, was written for the use of the circumcision only: so that it being in the hands of the Jews only, and understood by them alone, and they being, saith Justin Martyr,† the worst sort of Christians, i. e. retainers of Judaism with Christianity, and they in whose hands the gospel chiefly was, being Nazarenes and Ebionites, might, from the traditions which obtained among them, add to it, or from their principles be induced to change and to corrupt it. Or,

Lastly, To speak freely what I conceive most probable, as the canonical books of the Old Testament were written originally in Hebrew, but when the pure Hebrew became unintelligible to the vulgar, and when the dispersion of the Jews had distinguished them into Hebrews, which used their mother-tongue, and Hellenists, who understood only the Greek tongue, the Chaldee version was used in the synagogues of the Hebrews, and the Greek by the Hellenists; so this distinction continuing after Christ's ascension, some of the Scriptures, written originally in the Greek for the use of both Jew and gentile, were translated into the mixed Hebrew; and as they had, saith Epiphanius,‡ the gospel of St. John and the Acts of the Apostles in Hebrew; so had they before the gospel of St. Matthew turned into the same language, and perhaps with the same liberty of making additions to it from tradition, which we find in the Chaldee paraphrast, and the translation of the Septuagint; which version the primitive Christians among the gentiles, who were ignorant of that language, finding in their hands, they from the likeness of the thing, and the pretensions of the Jews, might think it an original written for their use. Thus some of them upon the same account inform us, that the epistle to the Hebrews was first written in Hebrew, and was translated into Greek by Clemens, or St. Luke;* and yet that in this matter they were mistaken, we learn from St. Jerome,† telling us for certain, that the whole New Testament, excepting only the gospel of St. Matthew, was first writ in Greek. For,

First, St. Jerome and Epiphanius are the only persons who speak of this authentic Hebrew gospel, kept till their time by the Nazarenes, which that it was not the original gospel of St. Matthew hath been fully proved.

Secondly, St. Jerome saith of this Hebrew copy, which he received from them and translated into Greek and Latin, that the citations contained in it, when the evangelist spake in his own person, or in the person of our Lord, were exactly according to the Hebrew, and not according to the Septuagint; and yet it is certain this is not true of the Greek copy we now have, as appears from ii. 6. 18. iii. 3. iv. 15. v. 21. 31. 43. xi. 10. xii. 20, 21. xiii. 14. xv. 8, 9. xxvi. 31. xxvii. 9.

§. VII. If it be here objected, that by calling in question a thing so generally asserted by so many fathers, I weaken the tradition of the church concerning the canon of the Scriptures, and other matters handed down to us by tradition;

I answer, That I have sufficiently obviated this objection in a particular discourse‡ upon this subject, in which I have shewed what traditions are to be received, and what may rationally be questioned, and that we have sufficient ground from reason to rely on the tradition of the canon of the Old and the New Testament.

Secondly,§ I have shewed that the fathers have been imposed upon by the Jews in other things received from them by tradition, and asserted by more testimonies of ancient fathers than are avouched to prove that the gospel according to St. Matthew was first written in Hebrew; as v. g. First, In the story of the cells of the Seventy, in which they who translated the Old Testament are said to have been severally placed; or, as Epiphanius will have it, two together, when they translated the Old Testament from Hebrew into Greek, and yet by inspiration, or prophetical impulse, to have performed this translation all in the same words; these things, saith Justin Martyr,‖ we report to you gentiles, not as fables, or feigned stories, ἀλλὰ παρ' αὐτῶν ἐκεῖ ὡς τὰ πάτρια παρειληφότων ἀκηκοότες ταῦτα παραγγέλλομεν, but as a received tradition delivered to us from the inhabitants of the place. The same traditions, touching the cells, is delivered as certain by Irenæus,¶ by Clemens of Alexandria, (Strom. 1. p. 342.) by Cyril of Jerusalem, and by Epiphanius, (de Ponderibus et Mens. p. 160—162.) and by St. Austin. (De Civ. Dei. lib. xvi. cap. 42, 43.)

And as all these fathers confirm the story of the cells, and consequently speak of this performance as done, θείᾳ δυνάμει κατ' ἐπιπνόιαν Θεοῦ, ἐκ πνεύματος ἁγίου, by the power and afflatus of the Holy Spirit, or by that Spirit who spake these things by the prophets; so doth Tertullian* speak, "de sententiæ communione," of their conspiring in their sentiments: Eusebius† saith, that it was θεοθὲν οἰκονομηθεῖσα ἑρμηνεία, an interpretation ordered by God: it was done by them, saith St. Hilary,‡ "spirituali et cœlesti scientia," with spiritual and heavenly knowledge: μὴ δίχα τῆς θείας ἐπιπνοίας, not without Divine inspiration, saith Theodoret:§ and this they say by reason of the great sympathy which was in their interpretation; and yet Bellarmine‖ saith, that in this the Jews imposed on Justin Martyr, and the succeeding fathers might give credit to Justin. Du Pin,¶ that it is a fiction of the Jews, and that it is well known how frivolous and uncertain these pretended popular traditions are, and especially among the Jews: father Simon saith, we must not here so much consider what the fathers said, as what reason they had to say so; and that St. Jerome†† gives them all the lie. And to the other pretence of their inspiration, he answers, (p. 115.) "de rebus sibi incognitis quidquam certi definire non potuerunt," they could say nothing certain of things unknown to themselves, and therefore could say nothing certain in the case before us.

Secondly, The appearance of Elias the Tishbite in person, before the second coming of Christ, is delivered by the fathers unanimously as a tradition of the church; but this they did partly from the tradition of the Jews, partly from the mistaken sense of the words of Christ, and partly from the authority of the Septuagint, without all ground, as hath been fully proved. (Treat. of Trad. chap. 5. from §. 1. to §. 5.)

Thirdly, They generally taught, for four centuries together, that the good angels, styled the sons of God, Gen. vi. were transported with the love of women, and begat of them giants and evil spirits; this is taught by Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Clemens of Alexandria, and Athenagoras, in the second century; by Tertullian, Minucius, St. Cyprian, and Methodius, in the third; by Lactantius and Sulpicius in the fourth; and this they did from the traditional interpretation of the Jews recorded in Josephus‡‡ and in Philo,§§ and in the first book of Enoch, de Egregeris: and yet in the fifth century the authors of this opinion are represented by Chrysostom‖‖ and Theodoret, as stupid teachers of fables and blasphemers,¶¶ as hath been proved: and if in these things the fathers were so easily imposed on by the Jews, why might they not be imposed on likewise in saying that the gospel according to St. Matthew was written in a language that they understood nothing of, and of which they could say nothing certain from their own knowledge?

Notwithstanding, if any man like not this opinion, he may compound the matter with the fathers thus, that St. Matthew might deliver that gospel which he wrote as well in Hebrew to the Jews who understood that language only, as in Greek to the Hellenistic Jews and to the gentile converts. And since it is agreed on all hands that he left Judea to preach to the gentiles, what is more reasonable than to conceive he left that gospel he had preached to them, and wrote by the assistance of the Spirit, as a rule of faith to all nations, in a language which those nations understood?

THE NEW TESTAMENT.

ΤΗΣ καινῆς διαθήκης ἅπαντα, all the books of the New Testament.] It is observed by the Rev. Dr. Hammond,* that this title refers to the "consent of the catholic church of God, and the tradition which giveth testimony to these books, as those, and those only, which complete the canon of the New Testament; and the word ἅπαντα, all, signifies as in the titles of other authors, ἅπαντα τὰ διδόμενα, all the books which have been written, and by God's providence derived to the church, so as to be received into the canon, or into the number of writings which were confessedly indited by the apostles and disciples of Christ." I cannot indeed find, that this title is of any considerable antiquity; but the more ancient title of ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη, the New Testament, prefixed to these books, doth plainly intimate the full and general persuasion that in these books was comprised that whole new covenant, of which the blessed Jesus was the mediator, and the apostles were the ministers and the dispensers; and then surely they must contain all that is requisite for Christians to believe, or do, in order to salvation; or in order to their performance of the conditions, on which salvation in this new covenant is tendered; there being nothing which can be deemed a more necessary and essential part of the new covenant, than the conditions upon which salvation is to be obtained by it.

And that the ancients thus conceived of these books, is evident from the other title of the rule and canon of Scripture, given to them, even from the time of Irenæus,† who styles the Scriptures τὸν ἀκλινῆ τῆς ἀληθείας τὸν κανόνα, the invariable rule of truth. A canon, saith Phavorinus, is a perpetual rule, a measure that cannot be false, πᾶσαν πρόσθεσιν, καὶ ἀφαίρεσιν μηδαμῶς ἐπιδεχόμενος, and which by no means admits of any addition to it, or subtraction from it. A canon and a rule, saith St. Basil,‡ if it want nothing to make it truly such, οὐδεμίαν προσθήκην εἰς ἀκρίβειαν ἐνδέχεται, admits of no addition to the exactness of it; for addition belongs to that which is somewhat deficient, or imperfect; whereas (saith he) if rules and canons be imperfect, they do not well deserve that name. To a canon, saith G. Nyssen,* belongs ἡ τελειότης, such perfection as hath nothing wanting, or abounding; and therefore of the canon of Scriptures, he asserts that it is κριτήριον ἀσφαλὲς τῆς ἀληθείας ἐπὶ παντὸς δόγματος, an infallible rule of truth in every doctrine. Upon those words, As many as walk by this canon, (Gal. vi. 16.) Theodoret saith, He calls the doctrine propounded by him a canon, as having μήτε ἐλλεῖπον τι μήτε περιττὸν, nothing wanting or superfluous: and upon those words, Philip. iii. 16. Let us walk by the same canon, Chrysostom† saith, A canon neither admits of addition nor diminution, otherwise it loseth the property of a canon. Elsewhere,‡ he saith, That it is easy to judge of the controversies in religion, having the Scripture for our canon. Theodoret,§ on the place, saith, The apostle calls the preaching of the gospel the canon; adding, that a canon is a boundary of right, wanting nothing. Œcumenius saith, The apostle speaks of faith; for as to a canon, or rule, if you add any thing to it, or diminish from it, the whole is spoiled; so is it with respect to faith. So that in the judgment of the fathers, the Holy Scriptures being the rule and canon of faith, no article of faith can be wanting in them, or ought to be added to them. Hence also, by just consequence, we infer the perspicuity of Scripture in all the necessary articles of Christian faith, and rules of life; for a perfect canon must as well be plain as full: a rule by which I am to regulate my actions and my faith must be clear; for if it be not plain and intelligible, I cannot, by attending to it, know what I am obliged to believe and do: and therefore Chrysostom saith, There needs not much inquiry where there is a rule to which all things must be adapted; but it is easy to perceive who takes wrong measures. (Hom. 35. in Acta Apost. tom. iv. p. 800.)

WITH ANNOTATIONS.

CHAP. I.

1. THE book of the generation [1] of Jesus Christ, (who was according to the flesh, Rom. ix. 5.) the son of [2] David, *(*Acts ii. 30. and) the son of Abraham, (is on this wise.)

2. Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob begat Judas and his brethren, [3]

3. And Judas begat Phares, and Zara [4] of Thamar, [5] and Phares begat Esrom, and Esrom bagat Aram,

4. And Aram begat Aminadab, and Aminadab begat Naasson, and Naasson begat Salmon,

5. And Salmon begat Booz of Rahab, [6] (the harlot,) and Booz begat Obed of Ruth (the Moabitess), and Obed begat Jesse,

6. And Jesse begat David the king, [7] and David the king begat Solomon of her that had been the wife of Uriah, [8]

7. And Solomon begat Roboam, and Roboam begat Abiah, and Abiah begat Asa,

8. And Asa begat Josaphat, and Josaphat begat Joram, and Joram begat Ozias, [9]

9. And Ozias begat Joatham, and Joatham begat Achas, and Achas begat Ezekias,

10. And Ezekias begat Manasses, and Manasses begat Amon, and Amon begat Josias,

11. And Josias [10] begat Jechonias and his brethren, about the time they were carried away into Babylon;

12. And after they were brought to Babylon, Jechonias begat Salathiel, and Salathiel begat Zorobabel,

13. And Zorobabel [11] begat Abihud, and Abihud begat Eliakim, and Eliakim begat Azor,

14. And Azor [12] begat Sadoc, and Sadoc begat Achim, and Achim begat Eliud,

15. And Eliud begat Eleazar, and Eleazar begat Matthan, and Matthan begat Jacob,

16. And Jacob begat Joseph, [13] the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ.

17. So [14] all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations, and from David till the carrying away into Babylon are (reckoned up by me) fourteen generations, and from the carrying away into Babylon to Christ (inclusively) are (also) fourteen generations.

18. Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise (or after this extraordinary manner); when as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child (by the power) of the Holy Ghost (overshadowing her, Luke i. 45. of which thing Joseph knew nothing).

19. Then Joseph her (espoused) husband being a just man, and (therefore one, who durst not retain her, whom he esteemed an adulteress, and yet being) not willing to make her (whom he loved) a public example, was minded to (give her a bill of divorce, and so to) [15] put her away privily.

20. But while he thought on these things, behold the (an) angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy (espoused) wife (though found with child), for that which is conceived in her is (not the fruit of whoredom or adultery, but) but of the Holy Ghost.

21. And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus (i. e. the Saviour), for he shall save his people from their sins.

22. Now all this was done (by the Holy Ghost overshadowing this virgin), that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet (Isaias), saying, (vii. 14.)

23. Behold a virgin [16] shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and [17] they shall call his name (or his name shall be called) Emmanuel, which being interpreted, is, God with us.

24. Then Joseph being raised from sleep (and perceiving that the dream was from God), did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him, and took unto him (Mary) his wife.

25. And (but he) knew her not [18] until she had brought forth her first-born son, and he called his name Jesus.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. I.

[1] Ver. 1. ΒΙΒΛΟΣ ΓΕΝΕΣΕΩΣ, the book of the generation.] i. e. As the Syriac well expresses it, the writing, narrative, or rehearsal of the generation or birth, (ver. 18.) of Jesus; for though the word γένεσις is elsewhere of that latitude, as to comprise also the history of our Lord's life, and death, and resurrection; yet it is here to be restrained to the birth of Christ, as appears, first, from the parallel phrase, αὕτη ἡ βίβλος γενέσεως ἀνθρώπων, this is the book or the rehearsal of the generation of men from Adam to Noah. (Gen. v. 1.) Secondly, From the design of the apostle here, which is to set down the descent of Christ from Abraham, and his alliance to king David by his father Joseph: and, thirdly, from the eighteenth verse, which, after this narrative of it, proceeds to shew the manner of his birth, by saying, Now ἡ γένεσις the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise.

[2] The son of David, the son of Abraham.] i. e. The son of both, as Alibamah the daughter of Anah (and), the daughter of Zibeon. (Gen. xxxvi. 2.) This sense being most suitable to the design of the apostle, which is to prove Christ was the son of both, and that in him were fulfilled the promises made to both. And David is first named; first, because the promise to him was fresher in memory, more plain, and more explicit; God had promised to Abraham in general words, that in his seed should all the families of the earth be blessed. (Gen. xii. 3. xxii. 18.) And that this seed was Christ, we learn from the apostle Peter, Acts iii. 25, 26. and from St. Paul, Gal. iii. 16. But to David God promised, that in his seed would he establish the throne of his kingdom for ever; (2 Sam. vii. 16.) that his seed would he establish for ever, and build up his throne to all generations. (Psal. lxxxix. 4.) Now this being a promise, that of the fruit of his body he would raise up Christ to sit upon his throne, (Acts ii. 30.) was more suitable to the notions of the Jewish nation touching the king Messiah, and to their inclinations. The prophets also prophesy of him, as one to sit upon the throne of David for ever, (Isa. ix. 7.) that he shall be a righteous branch raised up to David, and a king that shall reign and prosper, in whose days Judah shall dwell safely, (Jer. xxiii. 5, 6.) that they should dwell in the land for ever, and David shall be their prince for ever. (Ezek. xxxvii. 24, 25. see Isa. lv. 11. Amos ix. 11.) Accordingly, the angel speaketh of one who should reign on the throne of his father David, over the house of Jacob for ever. (Luke i. 33.) And the Jews pray to him thus, Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on us; (Matt. ix. 27. xv. 22. xx. 30.) and make their acclamations to him thus, Hosanna to the son of David. Others add, that Abraham is put after David, because the apostle was to begin his catalogue from Abraham.

[3] Ver. 2. Καὶ τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς αὐτοῦ, and his brethren.] Perhaps interpreters might save themselves the trouble of giving a reason of many things contained in this catalogue, by saying, St. Matthew here recites it, as he found it in the authentic copies of the Jews, who doubtless had preserved some known and approved genealogy of their descent from Abraham, the father of their nation, in whom they so much gloried, and from whose loins they expected the promised Messiah. Thus, for instance, when it is said, Salathiel begat Zorobabel, it may be sufficient to justify the apostle in this, that the Jews do still represent Zorobabel not as the son of Pedaiah, but of Salathiel. So we read of Zorobabel, the son of Shealtiel, Nehem. xii. 1. Hag. i. 12. 14. ii. 21. 23. Ezra iii. 2. 8. v. 2. Josephus* likewise says, the captain of the people was ὁ Σαλλαθιήλου παῖς Ζοροβαβήλος, Zorobabel the son of Salathiel; and with great reason must he follow the sentiments of three persons of so great authority, as Ezra, Nehemiah, and the prophet Haggai, the contemporaries of Zorobabel. So also may we say, that the kings left out in this genealogy were therefore omitted by St. Matthew; because he found them omitted in the genealogy used by the Jews, and that these words and his brethren, are added as being also added in their genealogy. But to omit this, his brethren may be added to comfort the dispersed tribes, which were not yet returned out of captivity, as Judah was, in their equal interest in the blessing of the seed of Abraham, they being all adopted children of God, which is not true of Ishmael or Esau, the brethren of Isaac and Jacob: moreover, these brethren of Judas might well be mentioned, as being patriarchs, heirs of the promise, and heads of that people, whence the Messiah was to proceed; and therefore Stephen also speaks thus of them, Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob begat the twelve patriarchs, Acts vii. 8.

[4] Ver. 3. And Zara.] Mentioned with Phares, as being born at the same time, and striving with him for primogeniture, Gen. xxxviii. 28—30.

[5] Of Thamar.] It is observed here by some, that only four women are mentioned in this genealogy, till he comes to Joseph, and all of them noted for some infamy, as Thamar for incest, Rahab for being a harlot, Ruth for heathenism, Bathsheba for adultery; nor were they thus mentioned because sinners, to teach us that Christ came to save such, or to be born of such; for, why then were the three descents of Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah, omitted? but because in them only that law was departed from, which was given generally to the heirs of the promised blessing, that they should take them wives of their nearest kindred; and perhaps to obviate the cavils of the Jews against the mean condition of the mother of our Lord, their ancestors being descended of women whose qualities rendered them meaner than she was.

[6] Ver. 4. Of Rahab.] That Rahab was married to some prince of Israel, the tradition of the Jews assures us; but whereas, in contradiction to St. Matthew, they say, that she was married to Joshua; this is said in flat opposition to their own tradition, that Rahab was the mother of eight priests and prophets; for Joshua was neither of the tribe of Judah nor of Levi, but of the tribe of Ephraim. (Numb. xiii. 8.) That Rahab was one of the idolatrous nations with which they were forbidden to marry, (Exod. xxxiv. 16. Deut. vii. 3.) hinders not this marriage of Salmon with Rahab, she being first made a proselyte of justice; the reason of that law being this, lest they should tempt them to idolatry; which reason ceased, when they once owned the God of Israel; whence we find that Boaz married Ruth, (iv. 13.) and thought himself obliged so to do, and David married Maachah, the daughter of the king of Geshur. (2 Sam. iii. 3.) But here seems to be a great objection both against Salmon and against Obed, how it can be true, that only Boaz, Obed, and Jesse, should intercede betwixt Salmon and David, when the time betwixt them must be at least three hundred years in the mildest computation; and so Salmon must be one hundred years old when he begat Boaz, Boaz as old when he begat Obed, and Obed as old when he begat Jesse; whereas it is looked upon as miraculous, that Abraham at one hundred years should beget Isaac, Gen. xvii. 17. xxi. 5. To this objection it may be answered from the Targum upon Ruth, that these three were men of an extraordinary character for justice and piety; Salmon is styled Salmon the just, of whom it is said, that his works and the works of his children were very excellent; that Boaz was a righteous person, by whose righteousness the people of Israel were delivered from the hands of their enemies, and by whose prayers the famine ceased from the land of Israel; that Obed served the Lord with a perfect heart, and that he begat Jesse, in whom was found no iniquity or corruption, for which he should be delivered to the angel of death, and he lived many days, and only died at last by reason of the sentence passed upon Adam for eating the forbidden fruit. God therefore might vouchsafe to men of such extraordinary piety, a longer life than ordinary, and strength to beget children in their old age. Thus Caleb at eighty-five, and Moses at one hundred and twenty, had not their natural strength abated; (Deut. xxxiv. 7. Josh. xiv. 11.) whereas Abraham's body was then dead. (Rom. iv. 19.) Dr. Alix saith, there were but three hundred and sixty-six years from the first of Joshua to the birth of David; and this is certain, because from the going of the children of Israel out of Egypt, to the building of the temple in the fourth year of Solomon, passed four hundred and eighty years. Now if you add to three hundred and sixty-six, the forty years the children spent in the wilderness, the seventy years of David's life, mentioned 2 Sam. v. 4. and the four years of Solomon, they make exactly four hundred and eighty years: he therefore supposes that Salmon begat Boaz, when he was ninety-six years old; Boaz begat Obed, when he was ninety years old; Obed, when he was ninety, begat Jesse; and Jesse, when he was eighty-five, begat David.

[7] Ver. 6. David the king.] To whom the promise was made to the king Messiah, to stablish his throne for ever, Ezek. xxxvii. 25. and from him the kingdom is styled the house of David, and the kingly throne, the throne of the house of David, Psal. cxxii. 5.

[8] Of her that had been the wife of Urias.] To shew that that crime of David being repented of, was so far from hindering the promise God made to him, that it pleased God by this very woman to fulfil it.

[9] Ver. 8. Joram begat Ozias.] It is certain, from the history of the Kings and Chronicles, that Ozias was the son of Amaziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 1. Amaziah of Joash, xxiv. 27. Joash of Azariah, xxii. 11. Azariah of Joram, ver. 1. But according to the language of the Hebrews, and their maxims relating to this matter, the children of children are reputed the children not only of their immediate parents, but of their ancestors, and these ancestors are said to beget those who are removed some generations from them: so Isaiah saith to Hezekiah, xxxix. 7. Of thy sons which shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away; and they shall be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon; which prediction was fulfilled only in the days of Jechonias, long after the days of Hezekiah. But the great question here is, Why Azariah, Joash, and Amaziah, are left out of the catalogue of the kings of Judah? To this it is answered, 1. Negatively, that the reason could not be because they were great sinners, since Manasseh and Amon, who were greater sinners, were retained in this catalogue, ver. 10. It therefore may be said,

First, That the Jews had their tabulæ censuales, in which the stems of the kingly family of David were written; and in these catalogues these three kings might be left out. That even to the time of Christ, they had such tables even of their families and tribes, is evident from Josephus,* who, having given us the genealogy of his family, saith, Τὴν μὲν οὖν τοῦ γένους ἡμῶν διαδοχὴν, ὡς ἐν ταῖς δημοσίαις δέλτοις ἀναγεγραμμένην εὗρον, οὕτως παραπίθεμαι. I give you this succession of our family as I found it written in the public tables; and if so, the Jews, not the apostle, are to account for this omission. Secondly, It is no new thing to find the like omissions in the books of the Old Testament; thus Cain and his whole posterity are omitted in the book of Chronicles; Simeon is omitted in the blessing of Moses, Deut. xxxiii. for his cruelty at Sychem. The writer of the book of Chronicles reckons up all the sons of Jacob; but in the account of their posterity, he omits the account of Zebulun and Dan; and when he begins with the sons of Judah, he omits Zarah, 1 Chron. ii. 3. iv. 1. The penman of the books of Samuel, when he recounts the worthies of David, omits Joab, because of his bloodiness to Amasa and Abner. In the book of Ezra, there are reckoned from Seraiah to Aaron, only sixteen generations, (chap. vii.) whereas, in the book of Chronicles, from Aaron to the same Seraiah, are reckoned twenty-two, (1 Chron. vi.) so that six must be omitted in Ezra: so that there is no more reason to suspect the evangelist, than the Jews have to question their own Scriptures on this account. But still it may be inquired, why these three in particular are omitted: and to this it is answered, (1.) That the omitting these three, cannot in the least concern the chief design of the apostle, which was to shew, that Jesus was of the lineage of David; now by passing from Joram to Ozias, he keeps still in the same line, and so sufficiently shews that Jesus was of the house and family of David. (2.) The reason why these three are passed by rather than others, seems probably to be this, That they are the posterity of Joram an idolater, and one who married the daughter of Ahab, (2 Kings viii. 18.) and so was joined to an idolatrous family, and by this provoked God to have destroyed his family, had he not preserved it, because of the covenant made with David, 2 Chron. xxi. 7. God therefore cuts off all these three, omitted here, by an unnatural and untimely death, to punish the idolatry of this king, and of the house of Ahab in his posterity to the third generation, according to his threat in the second commandment; and for this reason, these three kings might be here passed over in silence. It is by others farther said, That St. Matthew finding the generations in the first period exactly fourteen, he passed over some in his second account, to make that to answer to the first; but this will by no means please Mr. Cl. who first, against all reason, talks of ten omitted out of the number of fifty, to make the divisions into fourteens; and then adds a bold conjecture, "That St. Matthew met with a genealogical book of David's family that was defective, and accidentally observing there three classes of fourteen generations between these three great periods of time, viz. before the setting up of the regal government, during its continuance, and after its fall, was thereby moved to make such a division in the account of Christ's lineage, which he would not so much as have thought of, if he had made use of an entire book; nor, saith he (in the name of his friend), is it to be wondered, that a genealogical book should be corrupted, because a very great and considerable error, that had perplexed the ancients, had crept into the eleventh verse of St. Matthew's text itself." Now as for his imaginary error in the eleventh verse, I shall account for it there; but to make a divine author assisted by the Holy Ghost, as St. Matthew was always esteemed by all Christians, in a matter of so great import as the true descent of the Messiah, take up with a defective and corrupt book, and give to all Christian ages a catalogue thus liable to the exception of the Jews, because he accidentally did light on such a one, and knew not of a better, is plainly to accuse the ignorance, suspect the care, and weaken the authority, of this great apostle; it had therefore been better to have concealed this wild conjecture of his friend, than to have offered it to an age unhappily disposed to depreciate the sacred writings.

[10] Ver. 11. Ἰωσίας δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰεχονίαν, καὶ τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς αὐτοῦ. And Josias begat Jechonias and his brethren.] Against this it is objected, That Josias did not beget Jechonias, who was the son of Jehoiakim; and to this it is answered, That Jechonias, in the eleventh verse, is not the same person with Jechonias, ver. 12. but is indeed Jehoiakim, the son of Josias, and his first-born. For though the people of the land made Jehoahaz, the second son of Josias, king after his father, yet that the kingdom by birthright belonged to Jehoiakim is evident; because Jehoahaz was only twenty-three years old when he began to reign, and reigned but three months: whereas Jehoiakim, who immediately succeeded after his deposition, was twenty-five years old when he began to reign. (2 Kings xxiii. 31. 36.) Hence Josephus * saith of Pharaoh-Nechoh, who made him king, and changed his name from Eliakim to Jehoiakim, Πρεσβυτέρῳ αὐτοῦ ἀδελφῷ ὁμοπατρίῳ ὄντι τὴν Βασιλείαν παραδίδωσι. He gave the kingdom to Eliakim, his eldest brother by the same father. Hence doth St. Matthew take no notice of Jehoahaz, because he reigned only three months, and that by usurpation of the kingdom. That this first Jechonias was indeed Jehoiakim, is proved, first, From these words, Josias begat Jechonias and his brethren; now Jehoiakim indeed had two brethren begotten by Josias, viz. Jehoahaz, who reigned before him, and Zedekiah, who reigned after him; and therefore being kings, were fit to be thus mentioned by St. Matthew: but it appears not that Jechonias, the father of Shealtiel, had any brethren; and if he had, they must be begotten not by Josias, but by Jehoiakim his father; nor is there any reason why they should be thus mentioned, ver. 12. when then we read, that Josias begat Jechonias and his brethren, this can belong to none but Jehoiakim: and when we read that Jechonias begat Salathiel, this must be understood of Jechonias the son of Jehoiakim; for this agrees with the Old Testament, 1 Chron. 15—17. Secondly, This interpretation makes up the fourteen generations exactly in the second and third series; whereas, they who make Jechonias, ver. 11, 12. to be the same person, leave only thirteen in the second series, if Jechonias be added to the third; or in the third, if he be reckoned to the second: when therefore the apostle saith, by way of inference, So all the generations from David, until the carrying away into Babylon, are fourteen generations, (ver. 17.) he leads us to this interpretation, because this would not be true, were Jechonias, ver. 11. and Jechonias, ver. 12. one and the same person. Thus Jerome † saith expressly, that in evangelio secundum Matthæum secunda τέσσαρα δέκας in Joacim desinit filio Josiæ, tertia incipit à Joacim filio Joachim. And again, Sciamus Jeconiam‡ priorem ipsum esse quem et Joachim, secundum autem filium, non patrem.

Obj. If it be here objected, that they carry both one name, and so must be one person;

Ans. It is answered, first, That the names in the original differ very little, the one being יהויקם, the other יהויקין, which difference is so little, that both are translated by the Septuagint, Ἰωακεὶμ, so is Jechonias translated, Jer. lii. 31. twice. So Josephus * saith, that Nabuchodonosor, Ἰωάχιμον interfecit, et Ἰωάχιμον τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ κατέστησε βασιλέα, slew Joachim, and made Joachim his son king: and Clemens of Alexandria, that after Ἰωακεὶμ who reigned eleven years, ὁ ὁμώνυμος αὐτοῦ Ἰωακεὶμ τρίμηνον βασιλεύει, Joachim of the same name reigned three months. To this add that of Irenæus, lib. iii. cap. 30. that in the account St. Matthew gives of the generation of Jesus Christ, Joseph, Joachim et Jechoniæ filius ostenditur.

Obj. Through the whole chapter, the person who is first said to be begotten and then to beget is the same person, it therefore seemeth reasonable to think it so here.

Ans. So also it is here; for it is expressly said, that Josias begat Jechonias, i. e. Joachim and his brethren; i. e. he begat also Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim, named also Jechonias, and these three continued to reign till the captivity, at which time Jechonias was carried away into Babylon; and after they were brought to Babylon, Jechonias begat Salathiel. But here comes in a fresh objection, that God had sworn Jechonias should be childless (Hebrew, stripped or naked), a man that shall not prosper in his days; for no man of his seed shall prosper sitting on the throne of David. Now hence it appears, first, That the Hebrew, עירי from the root ערר or ערד, may as well signify, stripped, solitary, naked, rooted up, as childless; and accordingly it is rendered by the LXX. ἐκκηρυκτὸς, an abject, abdicated person. Secondly, He might be thus childless, or stripped of his offspring, by his children dying before him, as well as by his having none. And, thirdly, This sense is certain both from the preceding words, He and his seed are cast out into a land which they know not, (v. 28.) and from the reason following, for none of his seed shall prosper. And lastly, from 1 Chron. iii. 17. where his sons are reckoned Assir and Salathiel.

Obj. It farther is objected, that whereas it is here said, that Salathiel begat Zorobabel, he was indeed the son of Pedaiah, the son of Salathiel or Shealtiel, 1 Chron. iii. 19.

Ans. To this I have already answered, That St. Matthew here follows the style of the Old Testament, and of the Jewish writers, in which Zorobabel is still called the son of Salathiel. Secondly, Were he not the immediate son of Shealtiel, but of Pedaiah, yet is this suitable to the language of the Jewish nation, to count the grandson the son of the grandfather: thus Sarah is called the daughter of Terah, Gen. xx. 12. as being the daughter of Haran, the son of Terah; and the same with Iscah; (Gen. xi. 28, 29.) Thus Laban is called the son of Nahor, Gen. xxix. 5. as being the son of Bethuel, who was the son of Nahor: (xxiv. 47.) and Jehoram is called the father of Jehoash, 2 Kings xii. 18. as being the father of his father Ahaziah; and Maacah, the daughter of Abishalom, is said to be mother of Asa, 1 Kings xv. 10. because she was his father's mother, (ver. 2.) Considerable here is the observation of Mr. Whiston, first, That there is no other instance in this genealogy, but what speaks of a truly natural generation. Secondly, That in all other places of the Old Testament,

* Antiq. lib. x. cap. 6. p. 336. † In Dan. i.
‡ In Matt. i.

* Antiq. lib. x. cap. 8.

Salathiel is said to have begotten Zorobabel; and therefore we have cause to follow the Alexandrian MS. which, in the place of the Chronicles cited, makes not Pedaiah, but Salathiel the father of Zorobabel; or to say, that Salathiel might have one son of that name, and Pedaiah another; or lastly, that Pedaiah begat Zorobabel of the wife of Salathiel, and so he was the natural son of Pedaiah, but the legal son of Salathiel. So the bishop of Ely.

[11] Ver. 13. Zorobabel begat Abiud.] Against this it is objected, That among the sons of Zorobabel reckoned up, 1 Chron. iii. 19. there is no mention of Abiud.

Ans. To this it is answered, first, That it is not evident, that Zorobabel in Matthew and in Chronicles is the same person, and then he in St. Matthew may be the son of Salathiel the brother of Pedaiah. Secondly, That Abiud is mentioned in Chronicles under the name of Meshullam, it being certain that many persons in the Old Testament, and especially about the time of their captivity, had other names in Babylon than what were used in their own land: and it is the ingenious conjecture of Dr. Lightfoot, that this son was called Abiud, in remembrance of his father's glory; and Meshullam, either in memorial of Solomon, the glory of whose house was transferred to him, or from the significancy of the word, which importeth requited: for whereas Jechonias was called Shallum, that is, finished; because the race of Solomon ended in him, when a recompence of the failing of that is made, by the succession of Salathiel in its stead, well might Zorobabel, in whom it first appeared, call his son Meshallam, or requited.

[12] Ver. 14.] Here it is required, whence St. Matthew had this genealogy, there being nothing of it to be found in Scripture.

Ans. I answer, from the authentic genealogical tables kept by the Jews, of the line of David; for, it appears from the taxation mentioned Luke ii. that they had genealogies of all their families and tribes, since all went to be taxed, every one to his own city; (ver. 3.) and Joseph went to Beth-lehem the city of David, because he was of the house and lineage of David: and this is certain, touching the tribe of Levi; because their whole temple service, the effect of their sacrifices and expiations, depended on it: and therefore Josephus being a priest, not only confidently depends on these genealogical tables for the proof of his descent, ἄνωθεν ἐξ ἱερέων, in a long series from priests; but adds, that *all their priests were obliged to prove, ἐκ τῶν ἀρχαίων τὴν διαδοχὴν, their succession from an ancient line; and if they could not do it, they were to be excluded from officiating as priests, and that in whatsoever part of the world they were they used this diligence: and again, Christ being promised as one, who was to proceed out of the loins of David, and therefore called the son of David, it was absolutely necessary, that the genealogy of the house and lineage of David should be preserved, that they might know that their Messiah was of the seed of David, according to the promise. Hence the apostle saith to Timothy, Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David, was raised from the dead: (2 Tim. ii. 8.) and Eusebius† from Africanus saith, according to the version of Ruffinus, "Omnes Hebræorum generationes descriptæ in archivis templi secretioribus habebantur," That all the successions of the Hebrews were kept in the secret archives of the temple, and thence they were described, ἐκ τῆς βίβλου τῶν ἡμέρων, from their ephemerides, by the kinsmen of our Saviour. It therefore doubtless was from these authentic records that St. Matthew had his genealogy, for otherwise he would have exposed himself to the cavils of the Jews: and hence the author to the Hebrews represents it as a thing evident to the Jews, that our Lord sprang out of Judah. (Heb. vii. 14.)

[13] Ver. 16. Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus.] It was necessary that the genealogy of Jesus should be deduced from Joseph; because it was so generally received by the Jews, that Jesus was the son of a carpenter, (Matt. xiii. 55.) the son of Joseph: (John vi. 42.) so that if Joseph had not been acknowledged to have been of the tribe of Judah, and of the family of David, they would not have failed to have objected this as a just prejudice against all Christ's pretences to have been the Messiah; wherefore the Divine wisdom was pleased to direct this apostle, to remove that stumbling-block. Secondly, It was also necessary, by reason of that received rule among the Jews, that the family of the mother is not called a family; and it was not fit that St. Matthew in this matter should recede from the constant rules and customs of that nation, the families being always preserved and continued in the males of Israel, and all their genealogies being reckoned from them.

Obj. But still it may be said, that Joseph being not the natural, but the reputed father of the holy Jesus; this cannot be sufficient to prove, that Jesus came from the loins of David, (Acts ii. 30.) or was the fruit of his body according to the promise. (Psal. cxxxii. 11.)

Ans. To this it is answered, that Joseph and Mary were of the same tribe and family; and therefore by giving us the genealogy of Joseph, the apostle did at the same time give us the genealogy of Mary, and consequently of Jesus the son of Mary, and shew that he was of the seed of David. Hence several of the ancients, inquiring why Jesus was conceived of a virgin espoused, and not of one perfectly at liberty, say, this was done, that by the family of Joseph the family of Mary might be shewn; and this will be made highly probable from Scripture, and from history. For though those words, (Luke i. 27.) The angel Gabriel was sent to a virgin, espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David, and the virgin's name was Mary, do not prove this of themselves, because it may be Joseph and not the virgin, who is said to be of the house of David; yet may they also be translated thus, To a virgin of the house of David, espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, and the virgin's name was Mary; and this translation is confirmed from the following words of the angel to her, Thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bear a son, and the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David; she therefore, who conceiveth this son, must be of the house of David: and this is farther proved from the taxation mentioned, Luke ii. 3—5. Whence it appears, (1.) That all went to be taxed, women as well as men; for Joseph with his espoused wife Mary went up to be taxed; which troublesome journey she, who was so near the time of her travail, would not have taken, had it not been necessary. (2.) That every one, men and women, went up to their own city to be taxed, (ver. 3.) (3.) That Joseph went up to Beth-lehem, the city of David, to be taxed, because he was of the house and lineage of David, (ver. 4.) Since therefore Mary went up to Beth-lehem with him to be taxed, she must do it for the same reason, because she also was of the same house and lineage. Add to this, that Domitian having given out a command to destroy all that could be found of the house or family of David, some, descended from Judas the brother of our Lord, were brought before him,* ὡς ἐκ γένους ὄντας Δαβὶδ, as being of the family of David, which they freely owned. (See more upon this subject in the bishop of Bath and Well's Demonst. of the Messias, part ii. chap. 13.)

* Lib. i. contra. Ap. p. 1036.

† Eccl. Hist. lib. i. cap. 6.

A new and strange opinion is advanced by Mr. Whiston, That this genealogy was chiefly designed to shew that Christ was born at Beth-lehem, only because it is inquired thus by the Jews, (John vii. 42.) Hath not the scripture said, that Christ should be born in the town of Beth-lehem where David was? But,

First, Hath not the same scripture as expressly said, That he was to be of the seed of Abraham and David? Can therefore any man reasonably imagine, that a genealogy beginning thus, The generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham, should not be primarily designed to prove he was the son of David, and of Abraham.

Secondly, The second chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke do indeed prove that Jesus was born in Beth-lehem, because they do expressly say it; but this genealogy saith nothing of it: and therefore, abstracted from them, it proves nothing of it: and can it be the chief design of this long genealogy to prove that which it doth not prove at all, and which is only proved from what follows in another chapter, and in another evangelist? And,

Thirdly, The very last clause of this genealogy, That Joseph was the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ, is all that can relate to Christ's being born in Beth-lehem; and all that goes before is evidently impertinent to that matter, and therefore can have no subserviency to that design: whence we may rest assured, that it was not intended by the Holy Ghost for such an end, seeing he never could design to prove a thing by an account of any thing impertinent, and which hath no relation to it.

[14] Ver. 17. Πᾶσαι οὖν αἱ γενεαὶ, so all the generations.] It is here observable, that the apostle saith of the generations from Abraham to David, that they were in all fourteen; but when he comes to the second interval, he does not say as before πᾶσαι αἱ γενεαὶ, the fourteen mentioned by him were all the generations of that interval, as knowing that for good reasons he had omitted three belonging to that interval; but only that the whole number of those which he had named was fourteen, as really they were. Secondly, That in every one of these several intervals, they were under a several and distinct manner of government, and the end of each interval produced some alteration in the state; in the first they were under judges and prophets, in the second under kings, and in the third under Asmonean priests; the first fourteen brought their state to glory in the kingdom of David; the second to misery in the captivity of Babylon; and the third to glory again in the kingdom of Christ. The first begins with Abraham, who received the promise, and ends in David, who received it again more clearly. The second begins with the building of the temple, and ends in the destruction of it. The third begins with their peeping out of misery in Babel, and ends in their accomplished delivery by Christ.

[15] Ver. 19. Λάθρα ἀπολῦσαι αὐτὴν, to put her away privily.] That is, to give her a bill of divorce privately into her hand, or into her bosom, before two witnesses only; this he was minded to do, saith the text, because he was a just man, that is, a strict observer of the rites of his nation, saith Mr. Selden,* who held it infamous to retain an adulteress; and this was all he could do, for though the law required that a married woman found lying with a man should die, i. e. be strangled, say the Jews; and an espoused virgin for the same crime was to be stoned, (Deut. xxii. 22—24.) yet neither was Joseph certain that she was guilty of this crime after the espousals, nor had he two witnesses of the fact, without which she could not be subject to the punishment by the Jewish canons, though she might be divorced after espousals, without proof, by witnesses or otherwise, of such defilement: thus, in the judgment of Dr. Lightfoot and Mr. Selden, δίκαιος ὢν, a just man, here retains its proper signification. (See note on Rom. iii. 26.)

[16] Ver. 23. Ἡ παρθένος ἐν γαστρὶ ἕξει· a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son.] That the Hebrew alma is duly rendered παρθένος, a virgin, we prove against the Jews, (1.) From the authority of their own Septuagint, who so rendered it above three hundred years before St. Matthew wrote his gospel. (2.) From the derivation of the word alma from עלם, to hide, or cover; for virgins, according to the custom of the eastern nations, were kept in secret apartments from the company of men as recluses; whence, by the author of the books of the Maccabees, they are styled αἱ κατάκλειστοι τῶν παρθένων, the virgins that were shut up: (2 Macc. iii. 19.) and by Philo, Σαλαμευομέναι παρθένοι, the virgins kept in chambers. (Orat. in Flacc. p. 757. A.) And, (3.) This promise is made as a sign or miracle, to confirm the house of David in God's promise, made to him of the perpetuity of his kingdom: now what sign or miracle could it be, that a woman should be with child after the ordinary manner? Where is the sign or wonder in this? Had no more been intended, what need was there of those words, The Lord himself shall give you a sign? What need of that solemn notice, Behold! there being nothing new or strange in all this?

[17] Καὶ καλέσουσι τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἐμμανουήλ· and they shall call his name Emmanuel.] Here is,

First, A verb personal put for an impersonal: they shall call his name, for, he shall be called: so Gen. xvi. 14. therefore קרא the pit was called. Exod. xv. 23. therefore קרא, the name of the place was called Marah. Isa. ix. 6. ויקרא and his name shall be called Wonderful. So also, Jer. xxiii. 6. this is the name אשר יקראו by which he shall be called: (See Ainsw. in Gen. xvi. 14. and Neh. ii. 7. Isa. xliv. 7. Mic. ii. 4. Amos iv. 2. 4.) So in the New Testament, Luke xii. 20. Thy soul shall be required of thee, ἀπαιτοῦσι. Chap. xvi. 9. δέξωνται ὑμᾶς, you may be received. (See Dr. Ham. there.) Note,

Secondly, That in the Scripture-phrase to be called, and to be, is the same thing; so, My house shall be called a house of prayer, Isa. lvi. 7. i. e. is, or shall be so. Luke xix. 46. Isa. ix. 6. His name shall be called Wonderful, i. e. he shall be a wonderful person. And Jer. xxiii. 6. he shall be called the Lord our Righteousness, i. e. he shall be so. This being so, it is no objection against the application of these words to Christ, that he did not bear this name, if really he was God with us, which is the import of it. And Philo* having said, Ἰησοῦς δὲ σωτηρία τοῦ Κυρίου, that the word Jesus signifies the salvation of God; he that is called Jesus, must in effect be called Emmanuel.

* Hegesip. apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 19, 20.

* Ux. Heb. lib. iii. cap. 23.

Obj. And whereas the Jews farther object, that this promise, being made to Ahaz as a sign, must have relation to a child born in his time, and therefore not to our Jesus born above seven hundred years after his death,—

Ans. This objection is founded on a mistake; this promise or sign being not given to Ahaz, who refused to ask a sign, Isa. vii. 12. but to the house of David, according to the following words, Hear ye now, O house of David, the Lord himself will give you a sign: now the house of David being then in great danger of being cut off and extinguished, (ver. 2.) because the kings of Israel and Syria were come against them; the promise of a Messiah, who was to be of the seed of David, and to sit upon his throne, was a great security that the house of David should not be extinguished, and so a proper remedy against those fears. It is inquired farther, whether this name given to Christ, be any certain argument of his Divine nature, as it seems to be, for Christ is called אל גבור, the mighty God, Isa. ix. 6. Now he who is properly called El, and is also really Emmanu, with us, he must infallibly be that Emmanuel, who is God with us. But to this the Socinians answer, That God is said to be a God with us, when he gives us some special tokens of his grace and favour to us, as Josh. i. 5. Jer. i. 8. Acts xviii. 10. Rev. xxi. 3. Since then Christ came to be our Jesus, to save us from our sins, and give us life eternal, he may well on that account be called Emmanuel, seeing God, by sending him to us for these great ends, was, in the most signal manner, present with us: and therefore it is first said, his name shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins; and then it is added, that this was done that it might be fulfilled, which was spoken by the prophet, His name shall be called Emmanuel.

They add, that divine names are given to things and places on the account of things done or to be done there; the place in which Abraham offered Isaac, is called Jehovah-jireh, the Lord hath seen, Gen. xxii. 14. the place where Jacob wrestled with God, Penuel, Gen. xxxii. 30. the place in which God appeared to him, Bethel, Gen. xxviii. 19. the altar which Moses built, Jehovah-nissi, Exod. xvii. 15. the city of Jerusalem, Jehovah-shammah, the Lord is there, Ezek. xlviii. 35. This divine name therefore, say they, might in like manner be given to Christ; because of the great things God designed to do by him for us.

[18] Ver. 25. Ἕως οὗ ἔτεκε τὸν υἱὸν αὐτῆς τὸν πρωτότοκον, till she had brought forth her first-born son.] The person that first opens the womb being in Scripture styled the first-born, whether any other birth did follow or not; as in those words, Sanctify to me all the first-born, i. e. whatsoever openeth the womb, Exod. xiii. 2. xxxiv. 19. it cannot from this word be gathered, that the blessed Virgin had any other offspring.

But then it is not so easy to answer to the argument taken from these words, He took unto him Mary his wife, but he knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born; for to know his wife in the Scripture-phrase, still signifies to cohabit with her as a wife. (See Gen. iv. 1. 17. 25. xxxviii. 26. Judg. xix. 25. 1 Sam. i. 19.) Secondly, Joseph was a just man, and tenacious of the Jewish rites; wherefore it being certain, that the marriage duty * was by the law, and by the canons of the Jews, to be paid by the husband to the wife, Exod. xxi. 10. and the angel having commanded him to take her as his wife, without any intimation that he should not perform the duty of a husband to her, it is not easy to conceive he should live twelve years with her he loved so well, and all that while deny that duty, which by the law was not to be diminished when the wife was less beloved: and whereas it is said, that the words ἕως οὗ, he knew her not until, &c. do not imply he knew her afterward; because the like expression is used, when it cannot be concluded that was done afterward, which was said not to be done till then; it seemeth evident, that scarce any of the places cited seem truly parallel to this. For, 1. Most of them speak of a thing not done afterward; because it could not be done as when it is said, Michal had no child till the day of her death. (2 Sam. vi. 23.) Samuel came not to see Saul till the day of his death. (1 Sam. xv. 35. so Job xxvii. 5. Isa. xxii. 14.) Or, because the cause ceased afterward, as when it is said, Gen. viii. 7. The crow returned not till the waters were dried up; there was no reason for his returning afterward; and when Christ saith, Matt. xxviii. ult. I will be with you (teaching all nations) to the end of the world; i. e. to the end of teaching them. So when God said to Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 15. I will be with thee, I will not leave thee till I have done that which I have spoken to thee of; if that refers to the blessing promised to his seed, that it should inherit the land of Canaan, he could not leave him afterward, he being long before that with God, and so it is an instance of the first kind; or, if it refers to his being with him going down to Padan-Aram, till he had brought him safe from thence; then the reason of that promise ceased after his return: or, lastly, because the reason of the thing still remains, as when it is said of the sepulchre of Moses, No man knoweth of it to this day. (Deut. xxxiv. 6.) For the same reason, no man doth, or without a revelation will, know of it for ever; whereas, certain it is, that it was not impossible in the nature of the thing, for Joseph to know his wife after she had brought forth her first-born. And, secondly, The reason why he should know her at all, being, because she was his wife, that reason ceased not after the birth of her first-born; nor did she conceive any second son of the Holy Ghost; and so the reason why he knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born, remained not. I therefore conclude with St. Basil,† that till she had brought forth her first-born, her virginity was necessary, that a virgin might conceive, and bear a son, τὸ δὲ ἐφεξῆς ἀπολυπραγμώτατον τῷ λόγῳ τοῦ μυστηρίου καταλείψομεν, but what she was afterward let us leave undiscussed, as being of small concern to the mystery.

CHAP. II.

1. NOW when Jesus was born in Beth-lehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men [1] from (Arabia in) [2] the east of Jerusalem.

2. Saying, [3] Where is he that is born king of the Jews? for we have seen his star (being) in the east, and [4] are come (thence) to worship him.

3. When Herod the king had heard these things, he (knowing that the Jews were then expecting Messiah their king to rule over them, and throw down all other kingdoms) was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him.

4. And when he had gathered all the chief priests and scribes of the people together, he demanded of them where (i. e. in what place) Christ (their expected Messiah and King) should be born.

5. And they said unto him, (he is to be born) In Beth-lehem of Judea: for thus it is written by the prophet (Micah; saying, v. 2.)

6. [5] And thou Beth-lehem in the land of Judah, art not (to be reputed) the least among the princes (or thousands) of Judah: for out of thee shall come a governor, that shall rule my people Israel (and this shall render thee truly great).

7. Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men, (he) inquired of them diligently, what (was the exact) time (at which) the star appeared (to them?)

8. And (having done this) he sent them to Beth-lehem, and said (to them), Go, and search diligently for the young child, and when ye have found him, bring me word again (Gr. tell me of it), that I may come and worship him also; (though his intention was not to worship, but to destroy him, ver. 16.)

9. When they had heard the king (say this), they departed, and, lo, [6] the star, which they saw (or had seen, being) in the east (of Judea), went before them till it came, and stood over (the house) where the young child was (i. e. till coming over the house where the child was, it stood still).

10. (And) when they saw the star (again thus conducting them to, and then standing over, the house where the child was), they rejoiced with exceeding great joy (for the Divine conduct).

11. And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and (they) [7] fell down, and worshipped him: and when they had opened their treasures, they presented to him gifts, (viz.) gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.

12. And being warned of God in a dream, that they should not return to Herod, they (in obedience to the Divine command) departed into their own country, another (and more private) way.

13. And when (or after) they were departed, behold the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying (to him), Arise, and take the young child, and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word (that thou with safety mayest return): for Herod will seek (after) the young child to destroy him.

14. And when he arose (from his bed), he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt:

15. And was there until the death of Herod, that (by his abode there) it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, (Hosea xi. 1.) saying, [8] Out of Egypt have I called my Son.

16. Then [9] Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wroth, and sent forth (his officers), and (they having received commission from him so to do) slew all the children that were in Beth-lehem, and (in) all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according (or even) to the time, which he had diligently inquired of the wise men.

[10] 17. Then was fulfilled (by another more eminent completion) that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, (xxxi. 15.)

18. In Ramah (near to Beth-lehem) was there a voice heard (of), lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not (i. e. because they were dead).

19. But when Herod was dead, behold an angel of the Lord appeareth in a dream to Joseph (being then) in Egypt,

20. Saying (to him), Arise, and take the young child, and his mother, and go (back) into the land of Israel: for they are (he is) dead which sought the young child's life.

21. And he (accordingly) arose, and took the young child and his mother, and came into the land of Israel.

22. But when he heard that Archelaus did reign in Judea in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither: notwithstanding (Gr. but), being warned of God in a dream (so to do), he turned aside into the parts of Galilee (where Herod Antipas was seated, from whom there was less apprehension of danger).

[11] 23. And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, He shall be called (by way of reproach) a Nazarene.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. II.

[1] Ver. 1. ΜΑ'ΓΟΙ, wise men.] Though the Greek word signifies magicians, yet seeing in the ancient times that word was not appropriated to that evil sense which now it bears, but generally signified men of wisdom and learning, skilled in the knowledge of things natural and divine; and more especially in that sort of learning which relates to the sun, moon, and stars, as we learn from Porphyry,* Apuleius,† Dio Chrysostomus,‡ and others: and, seeing the evangelist seems to have given them that name, not as a note of infamy, but as an honourable title; therefore doth our translation style them wise men, such as the old Greeks named σοφοὶ, the sages of their time. The Arabians of the east, especially the sons of Teman, being renowned for wisdom. (1 Kings iv. 30. Jer. xlix. 7.)

As for the dignity and number of these men, the tradition of the Roman church saith, that for number they were three, and all of royal dignity: hence in their office for Epiphany, they apply that of the Psalmist to them, The kings of Arabia and Saba shall bring gifts: but had they been of so great quality, we cannot reasonably think the evangelist would have omitted a circumstance of so great moment, both for their honour and our Lord's; we also should, in likelihood, have had some mention of their royal train and equipage, and all Jerusalem would have been moved as much to see them come, as they were at the hearing their question: Herod would likely have received them with more respect, and not have let them go alone to Beth-lehem; much less would he have laid upon them his commands to return back and give him an account of the child found. This therefore is an instance of the uncertainty and vanity of the traditions of that church.

[2] Ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν, from the east.] Hence the opinion of some, that the wise men came from Chaldea, a country renowned for magicians and astrologers, may be confuted; because the ancient prophets, who foretold the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, tell us, that they lay not east, but north of Jewry, and came from thence upon them. Hence they are called the families of the north, and an evil breaking out of the north, Jer. i. 14, 15. a people coming out of the north country, Jer. vi. 22. (See Joel ii. 20.) It is therefore more probable they came from Arabia, which was, saith Tacitus,* the bound of Judea eastward: and hence, in the Scripture, the Arabians are sometimes called the men of the east. So Judg. vi. 3. The children of the east came up against them, that is, the Arabians. Job i. 3. This man was the greatest of all the men in the east. Moreover, the gifts, which these men offered, were the native commodities of Arabia; the gold of Sheba in Arabia, Psal. lxxii. 15. Frankincense and myrrh of the same place, according to that of the poet, "Molles suathura Sabæi." Add to this, that much of Arabia was in the land of Canaan; whence David and Solomon, to whom the promise of having the land of Canaan was made good in its full extent, dilated their dominions over these countries, even to Euphrates; and they, who lived there, were of the seed of Abraham. Now it is more likely, these first-fruits of the gentiles should be brought to do homage to the King of the Jews, from a country which did as much to David and Solomon, the types of Christ, than from a foreign nation, and to conceive, that they were of the seed of Abraham rather than of another race. Nor is it to be wondered, that the magi should be said to come from the east, since Porphyry† informs us, that Pythagoras went into Arabia to acquire wisdom: and Grotius here cites Ptolemy, saying, That Arabia was "magorum sinus," the receptacle of the magi: and Pliny‡ saith, this art "toto terrarum orbe, plurimisque sæculis valuit," obtained through many ages in the whole world; that it prevailed in most nations, "et in oriente regnum (l. regum) regibus imperet," and in the east ruled over kings of kings. (See Examen Millii here.)

[3] Ver. 2. Ποῦ ἐστὶν ὁ τεχθεὶς Βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων, εἴδομεν γὰρ αὐτοῦ τὸν ἀστέρα; Where is he that is born King of the Jews, for we have seen his star?] Here the inquiry is, How these men could know that this was his star, or that it signified the birth of a king? Most of the ancients§ answer, That they learned this from these words of Balaam, (Numb. xxiv. 17.) There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall arise out of Israel, and shall smite through the princes of Moab, and destroy all the children of Seth; and Edom shall be a possession to him. But evident it is, that these words speak not of a star that should arise at any prince's birth, but of a king, which should be glorious and splendent in his dominions, as stars are in the firmament, and who should vanquish and possess those three nations as David did. Moreover, from this text, they might have as rationally expected to have seen a sceptre as a star; it being as expressly said, a sceptre shall arise out of Israel, as that a star shall come out of Jacob. Add to this, that we know of no record in which this prophecy was preserved, but the books of Moses, which these nations neither read nor believed. Others do therefore say, these wise men were by a revelation, or by an angel, told the meaning of this star: and one among the ancients cites an apocryphal history, saying,* This star appeared in the form of a child, holding a cross in his hand, and telling them, that Christ was born, and that they should go to Jerusalem to worship him. But these conjectures are all sufficiently confuted by this one consideration, That the wise men give not this as the reason of their coming, that they had seen an angel, a vision, or had a revelation of this matter, but that they had seen a star. For the true resolution therefore of this question, let it be considered, That Tacitus† and Suetonius‡ inform us, That through the whole east it was expected, that about that time a king was to arise out of Judea, who should rule over all the world. Nor could it well be otherwise, since from the time of the Babylonian captivity, we find the Jews dispersed throughout all the provinces of the Persian monarchy, (Esth. iii. 8.) and that in numbers sufficient to gather themselves together, and to defend themselves against their enemies in those provinces, (Esth. ix. 2. 16.) and many of the people of the land became Jews. (Esth. viii. 17.) And after their return into their land they increased so mightily, as that they were dispersed throughout Africa, Asia, and many cities and islands of Europe; and, as Josephus saith, wherever they dwelt, they made many proselytes to their religion. (See the note on James i. 1. and on 1 Pet. i. 1.) These wise men therefore living so near to Judea, the seat of this prophecy, and conversing with the Jews, i. e. among them who were every where expecting the completion of it at that time; they being also skilled in astrology, and seeing this star or light appearing in Judea, might reasonably conjecture, that it signified the completion of that celebrated prophecy touching the king of Jewry; over the centre of which land, they, being in the east, then saw it hang. And sure it was a better way to read this lesson to them, by setting this light upon the very place where the king that it betokened was born, rather than in the east part of heaven, where it might seem to denote something among the Indians or other eastern nations, rather than among the Jews. The learned Dr. Alix saith, the Jews believed that there were prophets in the kingdom of Saba and Arabia, they being of the posterity of Abraham, by Keturah, as you may learn from the note of the bishop of Ely, on Gen. xxv. 2, 3. and that they prophesied, or taught successively in the name of God, what they had received by tradition from the mouth of Abraham.

And so when Solomon was exalted to the kingdom, these Sabeans said, perhaps he is the Messiah, and therefore came to him; for this he cites Bereschith Rabba Moses Haddarson, cap. 25. B. Now if this tradition continued with them to these times, as in all likelihood it might, seeing, as Philostorgius relates, οὐκ ὀλίγον πλῆθος Ἰουδαίων αὐτοῖς ἀναπέφυρται, a considerable number of the Jews was mixed with them; here is a more plausible account, both of the coming of the Arabian magi, and of their faith in the king Messiah. What this star was, see note on ver. 9, 10.

[4] Καὶ ἤλθομεν προσκυνῆσαι αὐτῷ, and are come to worship him.] Here the inquiry is, when they came to Jerusalem, whether within thirteen days after the birth of Christ, as the received time of celebrating the Epiphany imports, and as most Christians have from the fifth century supposed; or, whether they came only in the second year of Christ's age, as some conjecture from these words, ver. 16. Herod sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Beth-lehem, and all the coasts thereof, from two years old, and under, according to the time that he had diligently inquired of the wise men. For resolution of this question, observe, That it seems evident, from comparing St. Matthew and St. Luke, that the wise men came within forty days after our Saviour's birth; for St. Matthew expressly saith, they found Christ at Beth-lehem; whereas St. Luke informs us, that when the forty days of his mother's purification were accomplished, they brought the child to Jerusalem to present him to the Lord; and after that we never read of their return with him to Beth-lehem, and therefore have no reason to presume they did so, (Luke ii. 22.) but on the contrary we are told, that when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee to their own city Nazareth, (ver. 39.) Arabia then being so near unto Judea, that much of it belonged to the land of Canaan, the wise men having also their swift dromedaries to ride upon, and the same cause to say as did the shepherds, when the light shone from heaven upon them, Let us now go and see this thing which is to come to pass, (Luke ii. 15.) I see no reason why these wise men might not come within the compass of these days to Jerusalem, and so no certain ground to think this festival hath been misplaced by the church.

Obj. Against this it is said, That immediately after these wise men's departure, the angel appeared to Joseph, (ver. 13.) and dispatched them to Egypt; which could not be before the time of Mary's purification, for then they went up to Jerusalem, (Luke ii. 22.) and so not to Egypt; nor after their return from Egypt, could they go up to Jerusalem for this end; for the text saith expressly, that Joseph then was afraid to go into Judea, and therefore receded to Nazareth; nor could they go up to Jerusalem after the departure of the magi, for that had been to cast themselves into Herod's hands at Jerusalem.

Ans. But (1.) the text doth not say, That the angel appeared to Joseph immediately after the departure of the wise men, but only that ἀναχωρησάντων αὐτῶν, he did so, they being returned, leaving the time indefinite: seeing therefore there is a necessity of saying, the angel appeared a considerable time after their departure, I therefore conjecture, that he appeared to Joseph with this message, being not at Beth-lehem, but at Jerusalem or at Nazareth, and that thence he fled into Egypt.

(2.) I add, that going to Jerusalem after the magi were departed, when the days for the purification of his mother came, could not be casting themselves into the hands of Herod; because he knew nothing of this being the child they came to worship; and so, they staying there so little time, might be as safe there as elsewhere. Nay, had Herod known which personally was the child they worshipped, why should he slay all the young children in Beth-lehem without distinction? As to the second objection from ver. 16. see what may be answered to it in the note there.

But, after all, I confess there is one circumstance that seems to make it probable, that the angel spake to Joseph to depart from Beth-lehem into Egypt; whence it must follow, that after the purification of the Virgin-mother, they returned to Beth-lehem; viz. that Herod's seeking to destroy the child, is assigned as the cause of this flight. Now we find not, that he ever made or designed any other attempt to destroy him, than by slaying the young children at Beth-lehem. But to this the answer is easy; That Simeon having made such an honourable mention of this child at his appearance in the temple, as of the Lord's Christ; (ver. 26.) and Anna the prophetess speaking of him as such, to all that looked for redemption in Jerusalem, (ver. 38.) where perhaps Herod stayed for the answer of the wise men; this must render Christ's stay at Jerusalem, or in Herod's jurisdiction, very dangerous; and so might give occasion to the message of the angel to Joseph, to depart thence quickly with him into Egypt, lest Herod hearing this fame of him should attempt to slay him. Moreover, Herod might have inquired what children might have been born in Beth-lehem in the time of the enrolment, whose parents lived elsewhere, and so might have come to the knowledge of this supposed son of Joseph: and this might make it necessary that he should fly with him into Egypt.

[5] Ver. 6. Καὶ σὺ Βεθλεὲμ, γῆ Ἰούδα, οὐδαμῶς ἐλαχίστη εἶ ἐν τοῖς ἡγεμόσιν Ἰούδα· And thou Beth-lehem, in the land of Judah, art not the least among the princes of Judah.] These words are cited from Micah v. 2. where, according to the original, they run thus, Thou Beth-lehem-Ephratah, though thou art little among the thousands of Judah. And to make them agree perfectly with St. Matthew's version, observe,

First, That Beth-lehem-Ephratah and Beth-lehem-Judah, are both names of the same town, as appears from these words, And Rachel died, and was buried in the way to Ephratah, which is Beth-lehem; and it is called Beth-lehem-Judah, Judg. xvii. 7. xix. 2. in these words, And the husband of Naomi was a man of Beth-lehem-Judah, Ruth i. 1. Yet of Boaz, who married Ruth, to raise up seed unto him, it is said, Do thou worthily in the house of Ephratah, (Ruth iv. 11.) and it is so named to distinguish it from another Beth-lehem in the tribe of Zebulun, mentioned Josh. xix. 15. Here also David's father lived, and he himself was born. (1 Sam. xvii. 12. John vii. 42.) Note,

Secondly, That the thousands of Judah, and the princes or governors of Judah, are in sense the same; for thousands are mentioned in allusion to the custom of the Israelites, of dividing their tribes into thousands, over every one of which thousands was a prince or chief: (Exod. xviii. 25. 1 Sam. x. 19.) so that to say, among the thousands or princes is all one. Note,

Thirdly, That the Hebrew word צָעִיר, which is rendered little, Micah v. 2, signifies also great, or of great note and esteem. Hence R.Tanchum renders the place thus, Thou shalt be chief, prince, or ruler, among the thousands of Judah: so קרן מצעירה, the little horn, Dan. viii. 9. is rendered by the LXX. κέρας ἰσχυρὸν, and by the Arabic, cornu forte, a strong horn. So Jer. xlviii. 4. צעיריה his little ones, is in the Chaldee, sultanum, his rulers; and, Zech. xiii. 7. הצערים is rendered by the LXX. ποίμενες. (See MSS. Alex. by the Syriac, superiors.)

[6] Ver. 9. Καὶ ἰδοὺ ὁ ἀστὴρ, ὃν εἶδον ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ, προῆγεν αὐτοὺς· And, behold, the star which they saw in the east went before them, till coming over the place where the child was, it stood.] Hence it is evident, this star could not be one of the heavenly orb, but only some new and extraordinary appearance, seated only in the air: (1.) Because it actually did, and was designed to shew the place of Christ's nativity, the very house of his abode, which no celestial star could do: because they never hung over one country more than another, and much less over any certain place. (2.) Because it moved so as they do not, by intervals, moving sometimes, and sometimes standing still; whereas they move perpetually, their motion also is from east to west, whereas the motion of this star was from north to south. It therefore seems probable this seeming star appearing to the wise men of the east, might only be that glorious light which shone upon the Beth-lehem shepherds when the angel came to impart unto them the tidings of our Saviour's birth; for that this light was exceeding great, is clear from that expression which styles it the glory of the Lord; that it was a light from heaven hanging over their heads, the Greek assures us; that "emicuit ex alto," it shone upon them from on high, the Latin saith. Now we know that such a light at a great distance appeareth like a star, or at least after it had thus shone about the shepherds, it might be lifted up on high, and then formed into the likeness of a star. This body of light, or another like it, when they journeyed to Jerusalem, was formed into the likeness of that star they had formerly seen, and went before them in the air to Beth-lehem, and then sunk down so low as to point out the very house where the babe lay. And if this should be so, the star the wise men saw must have appeared to them the very day of Christ's nativity; for of the light appearing to the shepherds, St. Luke informs us, (ii. 8. 11.) that it was then seen the very day and night of Christ's nativity.

[7] Ver. 11. Καὶ πεσόντες προσεκύνησαν αὐτῷ, καὶ προσήνεγκαν αὐτῷ δῶρα, χρυσὸν, καὶ λίβανον, καὶ σμύρναν, and falling down they worshipped him, and when they had opened their treasures, they presented to him gifts, gold, frankincense, and myrrh.] Of the import of the word προσκυνεῖν, to worship, and that it doth as well signify civil as religious worship, even when it is performed by prostration, see the notes on Matt. viii. 2. But though this word will do us no service against the Socinians, it is worthy our observation, that the Christians from the beginning, either from this adoration, or the gifts offered, did collect even then that Christ was God, or at the least that both were fitly given to him, as being truly God, whatever the wise men might think of him. Thus Justin Martyr* teacheth that Christ being God, could not receive the Holy Ghost as wanting him, or his assistance; and saith, of this we have a testimony from the magi of Arabia, who, as soon as the child was born, came and worshipped him. Irenæus* saith, the wise men, by the gifts they offered, shewed who he was that was worshipped; offering myrrh, because he was to die for mankind; gold because he was a king, whose kingdom should have no end; and frankincense, because he was God. Tertullian† saith, they honoured him with these gifts, "quasi Deum et regem," as a God and king: and when Celsus laughed at the wise men as προσκυνοῦντες ἐπὶ νήπιον, ὡς Θεὸν, worshipping Christ whilst an infant, as God; Origen‡ answers, that they brought gifts to him compounded, as it were, of God and man; gold, as an ensign of his kingly power; myrrh, as to one that was to die; and frankincense, as to a God. It also may deserve to be observed that Kimchi on those words of Isaiah, lx. 6. All they of Sheba shall come, they shall bring gold and incense, &c. saith, They shall bring them for an offering to the king Messiah.

[8] Ver. 15. Ἐξ Αἰγύπτου ἐκάλεσα τὸν υἱόν μου, Out of Egypt have I called my Son.] This is cited from Hos. xi. 1. and not from Numb. xxiv. 8. for the words in Numbers are the words of Balaam, whom the evangelists would not cite by the honourable name of a prophet without any distinction from the prophets sent by God to the Jews; nor doth he say, as Hosea doth word for word, I have called my Son out of Egypt.

Secondly, Note that it cannot be truly said, that these words are by St. Matthew mentioned as belonging to Christ only by way of application or accommodation, though the Holy Ghost, who spake them by the prophet, intended not they should be again fulfilled in him: for this cannot answer what is here said by St. Matthew, that Christ was called out of Egypt, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet; for certainly these words can import no less than that the calling of Christ out of Egypt, was by God intended as a completion of these words, and that till he was called thence, they had not their full and ultimate completion. Note,

Thirdly, That Israel was a type of Christ, as being by God called his Son, his first-born, Exod. iv. 22. and God bearing the relation of a father to Israel, Jer. xxxi. 9. hence Israel is put for Christ, Isa. xlix. 3. in these words, Thou art my servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified; and what is in the Hebrew, Behold my servant, whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth, Isa. xlii. 1. is in the Chaldee, My servant the Messiah; and in the Greek, Jacob my servant, and Israel mine elect: now as a prophetical prediction is then fulfilled when what was foretold is come to pass; so a type is then fulfilled when that is done in the antitype, which was done in the type before. Note,

Fourthly, That the words run in the time past, Out of Egypt have I called; and that not only because this is the way of prophetical predictions, to speak of those things as already done, which shall be as certainly accomplished, as if they were already done; but because they had already been fulfilled in the type. Note, Fifthly, That St. Matthew cites only these words of Hosea, Out of Egypt have I called my Son, as words to be fulfilled in Christ, and not any more, making Israel a type of Christ only in this regard, that they were called out of Egypt, as he was to be so; so that it doth not hence follow, that any other words in this prophecy are to be referred to Christ, and so no argument taken from the following words, which do not belong to him, can be of any validity to prove that these do not, which here the Holy Ghost applieth to him. Nor is it any objection against what hath been said, that the Jews could not understand this intendment of these words, for they were not concerned to understand it till the completion of these words in Christ; and then sure they who abounded with mystical interpretations of the law and the prophets, could not reasonably object against this application of these words to God's calling his own Son out of Egypt. The Jews have no cause to blame the evangelist for ascribing these things to the Messiah, which, in their literal sense, belong also to the people of Israel, it being the manner of their nation so to do. So the author of Midrash Tehillim, on Psal. ii. 7. saith, The mysteries of the king Messiah are declared in the law, the prophets, and the hagiographa. In the law, as it is written, (Exod. iv. 22.) Israel is my Son, even my first-born. Hence R. Nathan, in Schemoth Rabba, on those words speaks thus; As I made Jacob my first-born, as I said, Exod. iv. 22. so have I made the Messiah my first-born; as it is said, Psal. lxxxix. 28.[1] I will make him my first-born, higher than the kings of the earth. And since God delivered this people out of Egypt, with respect to the Messiah, who should be born of them, those places, which do immediately respect the people of Israel, may well be thought to have a farther respect to that Messiah, who was to be born of them.

[9] Ver. 16. Then Herod —— sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Beth-lehem, and in all the coasts thereof, ἀπὸ διετοῦς καὶ κατωτέρω, κατὰ τὸν χρόνον, ὃν ἠκρίβωσε παρὰ τῶν Μάγων, from two years old and under, according (or even) to the time that he had diligently inquired of the wise men.] Hence some infer that it must have been above a year after our Saviour's birth, that the wise men came to Jerusalem, or that they gave an account to Herod of the appearance of the star; for why else should Herod slay the children from two years old and under? And why is he said to have done this according to the time that he had learnt exactly from the wise men? but this seems not certain from these words; for (1.) διετίζειν is only to live a year: thus of some wasps Aristotle* says, οὐ διετίζουσι, they live not a whole year, but all die in the winter, and the like he saith of the fish polypus; and in Hesychius and Phavorinus, he is διετὴς who lives, δι' ὅλου τοῦ ἔτους, a whole year; and if so, these words may be rendered from a year old and under; even so much under as κατὰ τὸν χρόνον, even to the time of the appearance of the star, of which time he had diligently inquired; and if the words will admit of this construction, it is evident they afford no semblance of an argument, that the wise men came above a year after our Saviour's birth. But let διετὴς signify two years, yet if κατὰ τὸν χρόνον refer not to it, but only to the word κατωτέρω under, even so far under as to, or according to, the time of the star's appearing, we cannot from these words collect, how long it was after Christ's birth before these wise men came to Jerusalem. There is little account to be given of the actions of a tyrant, who slew three of his own sons, and it is reasonable to conceive he would endeavour to make sure work, and so might be induced to slay all born in Beth-lehem, a year before and more, even to the time of the star's appearing to declare the birth of this King; thus, though the Jews had told him from the oracle, that Christ was to be born in Beth-lehem, he is not content to slay the infants there, but shed their blood in all the coasts thereof.

It is much admired why Josephus, who relates his murder of some youths when he was only governor of Galilee, and the cry of their mothers for justice against him for it, should yet say nothing of the slaughter of these infants. But Josephus* being only born in the first year of Caius, and the thirty-eighth of Christ, and writing his History of the Jewish Wars in the fifty-sixth† year of his age, and this slaughter of these infants being not likely to be preserved in the Jewish records, it is not so much wonderful, that he who wrote ninety-four years after the fact was done, should make no mention of it. It is sufficient that it is preserved in Macrobius,‡ who saith, that when Augustus had heard, that among the children, which under two years old Herod the king had slain in Syria, his own son was one, he passed this joke upon him, It is better to be Herod's hog than his son; though it must also be confessed that Macrobius is mistaken in the circumstances of this story.

[10] Ver. 17. Τότε ἐπληρώθη τὸ ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ Ἱερεμίου τοῦ Προφήτου, λέγοντος, 18. Φωνὴ ἐν Ῥαμᾷ ἠκούσθη, &c. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by the prophet Jeremiah, saying, A voice was heard in Rama, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they were not.] Here note (1.), that it is not here said as ver. 15. ἵνα πληρωθῇ, this was done that it might be fulfilled, but τότε ἐπληρώθη, i. e. then that happened which gave a more full completion to those words of Jeremy, and so a greater occasion to Rachel to weep for her children than before, which the providence of God foreseeing, his Spirit might have a reference to it in these words. For, (1.) Rachel being dead so long before the captivity, she may as well be introduced weeping here as there. (2.) The slaughter of the Beth-lemites might well be styled the slaughter of her children, she being buried there, (Gen. xxxv. 19.) and the Beth-lemites being descended from her husband and her own sister. (3.) The slaughter of the innocents being not restrained to Beth-lehem, but extended to all the coasts round about, and Ramah being in the tribe of Benjamin, which sprang from Rachel, and not far from Beth-lehem, the voice of her weeping may be well said to be heard in Rama.

Secondly, Note, that this weeping for her children was, saith the prophet, chi ainnu, because they were not. (Jer. xxxi. 15.) Now the import of this phrase is this, they were dead, or taken away from the land of the living. (Gen. v. 24. xlii. 13. Psal. xxxix. 13. civ. 35. Jer. x. 20. xlix. 10. Lam. v. 7.) Accordingly, though the Jews then undoubtedly had embraced the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, yet saith the son of Sirach, (xvii. 28.) Praise perisheth ἀπὸ νεκροῦ, ὡς μηδὲ ὄντος, from the dead, as not being; and in that very chapter in which Josephus* asserts the perpetual duration of the soul; he saith, We have received from God our being, καὶ τὸ μηκέτι εἶναι πάλιν ἐκείνῳ δίδομεν, and to him we render again our not being; that is, as the context shews, we return that soul which he hath given us; and this being not literally true of her own children gone into captivity, from which, saith God, they shall come again to their own borders, (ver. 16, 17.) why should it be thought strange that so literal a completion of these words should also be referred to by the Holy Ghost?

[11] Ver. 23. Ὅπως πληρωθῇ τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ τῶν Προφητῶν, ὅτι Ναζαραῖος κληθήσεται, He dwelt in his own city Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled, which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene.] Here note,

First, That, because that is here said to be fulfilled, which was spoken by the prophets, τὸ ῥηθὲν, not that which was written, some here think it enough to say, there was among the ancient prophets a belief that the Messiah should be a Nazarene, and that this was delivered down by tradition. But I cannot acquiesce in this; for (1.) the foundation of this criticism is false, the phrase τὸ ῥηθὲν being used thirteen times in this gospel, and but once elsewhere in the New Testament; and it is always used of that which is written. It is twice so used in this chapter, ver. 15. 17. once i. 22. (See iv. 14. viii. 17. xii. 17. xiii. 35. xxi. 4. xxii. 31. xxiv. 15. xxvii. 9. and Mark xiii. 14.) (2.) How comes any one to know that any such tradition was delivered by the ancient prophets to the Jews, when they themselves know nothing of it; and therefore upon this account accuse St. Matthew as citing what was no where to be found? nor find I any of the ancient Christians, who mention this supposed tradition; but either say the apostle refers to some writings of the prophets, which were then extant, but are now lost, or to some writings not put into the canon, or some interpretations of their writings. Let it be therefore noted from St. Jerome,

Secondly, That St. Matthew doth not cite any particular prophet for these words, as he had done, i. 22. and here v. 15. 17. and in other places above cited, but only saith, this was spoken by the prophets in general,† "pluraliter autem prophetas vocans ostendit, se non verba de Scripturis sumpsisse, sed sensum," and thereby shews he took not the words from the prophets, but the sense only. Note, Thirdly, That all the interpretations, which refer this to Christ's being called Netzer, the Branch, (Isa. xi. 1. Jer. xxiii. 5.) or the Holy One, or one separated from the faults of mankind, fail in this, that they give no account how this was fulfilled by Christ's being at Nazareth; he being as much the Branch, the Holy One, when he was born at Beth-lehem, and before he went to Nazareth, as after.

Fourthly, Note therefore, that ὁ Ναζαραῖος, the Nazarite, was a name of infamy put upon Christ and Christians, both by the unbelieving Jews and gentiles. There was among the Jews a celebrated thief, called Ben Nezer, and in allusion to him, they gave this name to Christ. So Abarbinel saith, the little horn, mentioned Dan. vii. 8. is Ben Nezer, that is, Jesus of Nazareth. And this title of Nazarœan, both the Jews and the enemies of Christianity gave always by way of contempt to our Jesus, and that because he was supposed to come out of this very city; yea, his very going to dwell there, was one occasion of his being contemned, despised, and rejected, by the Jews. Thus when Philip saith to Nathanael, We have found Jesus of Nazareth of whom Moses spake: Nathanael answers, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? (John i. 47.) and when Nicodemus seemed to favour him, the Sanhedrin spake thus to him, Search and look, for out of Galilee ariseth no prophet. (John vii. 52.) Note, Fifthly, That most of the prophets speak of Christ as of a person that was to be reputed vile and abject, despised and rejected of men. Thus the Psalmist saith of him, For thy sake have I suffered reproach, shame hath covered my face, מוזר הייתי. I was an alien to my brethren, and a foreigner to my mother's sons; for the zeal of thine house hath eaten me, and the reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me. (Psal. lxix. 9, 10.) Isaiah saith of him, (liii. 3.) He was despised and rejected of men; he was despised, and we esteemed him not. Here then is a plain sense of these words; the angel sent him to this contemptible place, that he might thence have a name of infamy and contempt put upon him, according to the frequent intimations of the prophets.

At the close of this chapter, I think it proper to consider two new opinions of Mr. Whiston, who, in his Harmony of the Gospels, asserts,

First, That Herod slew the infants at Beth-lehem the same day that he cut off his son Antipater; that is, saith Josephus, but five days before his death.

Secondly, That Joseph fled into Egypt, and returned thence before the purification of the Virgin Mary in the temple at Jerusalem. Now, the second opinion is demonstratively false; for the Virgin-mother coming to Jerusalem with her offering, when the days of her purification were accomplished, (Luke ii. 23—34.) must come thither before her flight into Egypt, or not at all, seeing at their return from Egypt into the land of Israel, St. Matthew hath expressly told us, that Joseph was afraid to go into Judea, (ii. 22.) And that by a Divine admonition, he was diverted from any thoughts of doing so, and ἀνεχώρησε returned, or went back into Galilee to his own city Nazareth; and how absurd is it to imagine, that after his own fears, and the Divine admonition to the contrary, he should go on, not only into Judea, where Archelaus then reigned, (ver. 24.) but even to Jerusalem, where he continued till he took his journey to Rome? Nor is Joseph bid to return back into the land of Judea, but into the land of Israel; (Matt. ii. 20.) that is, as that message is farther explained, ver. 22, 23. into Galilee to his own city Nazareth.

Obj. But it is said, that he could not pass from Egypt to Nazareth, but through the land of Judah.

Ans. The way from Pelusium to Nazareth was by Gaza, Azotus, Joppa, and so on by the sea-side till you turn up to Nazareth. Now though in the division of the tribes, Gaza was added to the tribe of Judah, they did not possess it, but it was in Samuel's time a city of the Philistines, (1 Sam. vi. 17.) and was afterward by Pompey made a free city, and annexed to Syria; and though he in his journey might pass through either the city or the desert, he might not hear that Archelaus reigned till he got to Azotus in the tribe of Dan, and so might fear to go into Judea.

Obj. St. Luke saith, ii. 39. That when they had per- formed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee into their own city Nazareth.

Ans. First, This place seems rather to confute than to establish this assertion, as shewing that when the days of her purification were accomplished, they brought him not out of Egypt, but from Beth-lehem, to present him to the Lord; for, ver. 15. the shepherds go to Beth-lehem to see him; and, ver. 21. he is circumcised still at Beth-lehem, and then immediately it follows, ver. 22. that they brought him to Jerusalem to present him to the Lord; i. e. they brought him from Beth-lehem to Jerusalem; no other place of his abode, nor any intimation of his removal thence before, being mentioned.

Ans. Secondly, St. Luke having brought them up from Nazareth to Beth-lehem to be enrolled, he here informs us, that after this purification, they returned not to Beth-lehem, as some have imagined, to abide there, but that their future abode was their own city, in which they formerly had dwelt, but that nothing happened between this purification and their settled abode there, or that they fled not after from thence into Egypt, he saith not. All, therefore, that St. Luke saith may be true, though Joseph fled after this purification from Jerusalem, or from Nazareth into Egypt; but what St. Matthew saith cannot be true, if Joseph came with him from Egypt to Jerusalem before he went to Nazareth. In fine, as St. Luke saith nothing of their going any whither after the purification of the Virgin, but to Galilee, so he says nothing of their going any whither after Christ's circumcision, but to the temple at Jerusalem at the purification; so that the argument from St. Luke's silence can be no stronger for their flight into Egypt before, than after the purification.

Obj. 3. Had this flight and slaughter been deferred till after the purification, that was a thing so public, and attended with such public circumstances in the temple, that it was not possible for Herod to be ignorant of it.

Ans. First, He who makes this objection should have considered, that he earnestly contends that Herod was not then at Jerusalem, but at Jericho, under the extremity of his numerous distempers, and so there was no fear of his being instantly advertised thereof what was done in the temple; but to wave this, I answer, That Herod, though he was then at Jerusalem, neither repaired to the temple, into which he could have no admittance, nor troubled himself with any thing done there, unless it were done in a riotous, seditious manner, and much less with the talk of one old man and woman, not regarded that we read off, by any but Joseph and the Virgin-mother. We find another story published by the shepherds, of the appearance of angels, declaring that one Christ the Lord was born in that very city of David, which made all the people wonder at the things which they had spoken, and yet Herod takes no notice of it.

Ans. Secondly, Herod knew nothing either before or after, that this was the child the magi came to worship; for then, why should he slay all the young children about Beth-lehem without distinction, and so they staying there so little time, might be as safe there as elsewhere; though, lastly, the possibility that these things might come to his ear, or that his curiosity might move him to inquire what children were born at Beth-lehem during the time of the taxation, and removed thence to other places, was perhaps the occasion of the angel's being sent to Joseph to hasten his flight from Jerusalem, or Nazareth, into Egypt. For, whereas some imagine, that the text of St. Matthew seemeth to imply, that the angel appeared to Joseph immediately after the departure of the wise men; and, therefore, whilst he was at Beth-lehem, the text doth not enforce this inference, for it saith only that ἀναχωρησάντων αὐτῶν, they being returned; he did so, leaving the time indefinite. (See Woltzogenius on Matt. ii. p. 105—107.)

Arg. 2. Moreover, Josephus * saith expressly, that Herod had sent messengers to Rome concerning the conspiracy of Antipater before the disciples of Judas and Matthias attempted to pull down his eagle; for which, after examination and imprisonment for some time at Jericho, they suffered death upon the 3d of March, old style, and that these messengers returned with letters from the emperor but five days before his death. Now can any man imagine, they should spend nine months in such a journey to Rome and back again, which even in winter might be performed in less than two? And yet this evidently must be done, if Herod died not till the 25th of November following, and yet died in five days after their return.

It therefore is highly probable, and will appear so to any one who reads Josephus carefully, that Herod died some time before the Passover, which that year happened on the 5th of April, in which interval Archelaus might do all that was requisite to celebrate his father's funeral, and yet come to Jerusalem, as Josephus† saith he did, a little before the Passover. Now if his father died the 25th of November, he must spend four full months in celebrating his funeral; which sure must seem incredible to any, who considers that he was ἔχων τάχος, intent upon the quickest performance of his journey to Rome for confirmation of his royal dignity: for though in hereditary kingdoms, where the successor is proclaimed the same day that the king dies, and hath no competitor, these funeral solemnities may be deferred for some considerable time: yet seeing the validity of that will which made Archelaus king, depended absolutely upon the pleasure of the emperor, and a competitor was ready, and appeared as quick as he at Rome, to contest the matter with him by virtue of a former will, it cannot reasonably be thought that Archelaus would make so long a stay before he took his journey to Rome.

Obj. Against this argument it is objected, that the funeral could not be performed in so short a time, because the very journey from Jericho to Herodion was, saith Josephus, two hundred stadia, that is, twenty-five miles; and, saith the same Josephus, they went only eight stadia, i. e. one mile per diem, and so must be twenty-five days in going to Herodion.

Ans. First, This objection is upon this account highly improbable, that it must either find them a town at every mile's end, sufficient to contain so great a concourse as then attended on the corpse of Herod, or make them lodge many days in the open field or wilderness, in the winter-time, provided Herod died on the 25th of November.

Ans. 2. Secondly, It is built upon a false foundation; for though Josephus‡ doth expressly say, that Herodion was two hundred stadia distant from Jericho, i. e. the castle of Herodion was at that distance from it; he doth not say they went but one mile a day, but only that ἦσαν δὲ ἐπὶ Ἡρώδου στάδια ὀκτὼ,§ they came (viz. the first day) within eight stadia of Herodion; i. e. they came to the town there built by Herod, which was eight stadia from the castle, it being, saith he, a large town like a city, from which there was an ascent of two hundred marble steps to the Mammea, or place of his interment. This being so, I am of the opinion of Kepler,* Dr. Alix, and Langius, that all that Josephus mentions after the eclipse till the death of He- may be comprised within twenty or twenty-two days, which is the interval betwixt the 13th of March and the 5th of April, new style; especially if we consider that Eusebius† saith, that what was done after the 13th of March, was done παραύτικα παραχρῆμα, by the Divine vengeance very suddenly, till the time of his death.

Arg. 3. Thirdly, We are assured from Josephus,‡ that it was after the disease of Herod had been some time upon him, that Judas and Matthias moved their scholars to cut down the eagle Herod had placed upon the great porch of the temple, as being contrary to their laws, judging this time of Herod's distemper καιρὸς ἐπιτηδειότατος, the fittest time for the enterprise; and that they moved this the more confidently, upon a report that the king was dying; that when he sent to the principal men of the Jews to assemble about this matter, he was carried to them in a bed, ἀδυναμία τοῦ στῆναι, being so weak that he was not able to stand; that instantly after the 13th of March, he lay under such a complex of diseases that all men thought he could not live long, a violent inward fever burning up his bowels, attended with a boulimia, or perpetual voracity, which must needs feed his fever, ulcers in his bowels, cholic passions, an asthma, convulsions in all parts, a putrefaction in his scrotum breeding worms, so that he stank alive; and when presently he went to the hot baths at Callirhoes, he had there a deliquium, and was for some time dead, and had no hopes left of life, and was, saith Josephus, ἀπίων τοῦ βίου, even departing when he shut up the Jews in the Hippodromium at Jericho. Now can any man think he should live above eight months after this, and keep the Jews shut up there all that time, as he must have done if he had lived till the 25th of November following? especially if we consider that the next thing Josephus mentions of him is, that he endeavoured to stab himself with a knife, and then kills Antipater; who hearing this, attempted to escape from prison, and in five days after dies. Now is it reasonable to conceive, that an angel should be sent to command Joseph to fly into Egypt but seven days, as Mr. Whiston's computation hath it, before the death of Herod (when his whole body was full of torment, and his heart of grief, and his head full of other employments), to avoid Herod's future attempts to slay the child, when he might have been as secure any where in the land of Israel for so short a time, and could scarce get thither before his death?

Mr. Whiston indeed saith in answer to this, that there is no time set for the duration of the disease of Herod; but in opposition to this, Josephus§ expressly affirms, that he did εἰς νόσον ἐμπίπτειν, fall into his disease after the time that he had sent messengers with letters to Rome concerning the condemnation of Antipater; and that upon the receipt of an answer to them, he killed Antipater, and five days after died: allowing them two months for the going and return of his messenger, he must die within two months and five days after he fell sick, and so could not live from the 13th of March, when his disease increased, till the 25th of November.

Arg. 4. Fourthly, According to Mr. Whiston's opinion, Herod must be near eight months at Jericho before he died; for he went thither, saith Josephus, soon after the slaughter of Judas and Matthias, with their disciples, and there continued till his death; and yet the history of St. Matthew, especially according to his supposition, that it relates to what happened only two weeks and a few days before the death of Herod, plainly proves the contrary; for he informs us, that the wise men came to Jerusalem, adding that, at their coming thither, Herod was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him; that he inquired of the chief priests and scribes, whose residence was there, where Christ should be born; and of the wise men then at Jerusalem, what time the star appeared to them; and this, saith Mr. Whiston in his Harmony, p. 159. was a consultation at Jerusalem. From thence therefore he sends them to Beth-lehem; when therefore he bids them bring him word again when they had found the child, must he not bid them bring him word to Jerusalem, the place where he consulted with them? Must he not there expect them? When therefore, being frustrated of his expectation of their return thither, ἐξαπέστειλεν, he sends forth his officers to slay the infants of Beth-lehem; must not he send them from Jerusalem; and is not all this sufficiently intimated in their Divine warning, μὴ ἀνακάμψαι, not to return back to the place from whence they came to Beth-lehem? How therefore could it be that the wise men should come to him at Jerusalem but two or three weeks before he died? or, Why doth he now deny that Herod was then at Jerusalem, when he sent forth to slay the infants? Why also doth he say, in contradiction to his former self, I believe the famous and unexampled summons of all the chief of the Jews a little before Herod died in Josephus, was the very same summons mentioned in St. Matthew for the inquiry of the place where the King of the Jews was to be born upon the coming of the magi, and that by consequence the summons was to Jericho, and not to Jerusalem? Which is as great an instance of a man resolved to say any thing though never so improbable, δουλεύειν ὑποθέσει, to serve an hypothesis, which otherwise must fall, as can be offered: he is the first, and I believe will be the last, who ever entertained such a vain imagination. For, (1.) That the wise men came to Jerusalem, and that at their coming thither Herod was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him, the text saith expressly: and can it then be reasonably said, that Herod was not then at Jerusalem? (2.) The men shut up in the Hippodromium were the ἐπίσημοι καὶ ἀξιόλογοι ἀφ' ἑκάστης κώμης, the nobles of every village (who were then at court); nor was there one word said unto them when they were thus shut up. The men convened in St. Matthew were only high-priests and scribes, whose residence was at Jerusalem, and inquiry is made of them where Christ should be born. (3.) When Herod* was dead, Salome and Alexas sent these men home, ἐπὶ τοὺς ἀγροὺς, into the fields, or villages, to mind their own business, whereas the high-priests had no business to do there. And, (4.) Herod shut them up, ἤδη τελευτῶν, καὶ ἀπίων τοῦ βίου, when he was a dying, and ready to depart this life, saith Josephus: and was this a time for him to say to the wise men, Bring me word of the child, that I may come and worship him? In a word, there is not one word of St. Matthew's story in Josephus, or of the story of Josephus in St. Matthew; and can it then be reasonable to think they relate to the same thing? To conclude, this new opinion confounds the general doctrine of the fathers from Origen to Theophylact, that Herod fell into that disease which so tormented him, " ob cædem infantum," for the slaughter of infants, seeing, according to this opinion, he must have lain long under these torments, and had been ready to expire with them, before he did this fact, it being done, saith this opinion, but five days before his death. To come now to consider what Mr. Whiston offers to confirm his opinion;

First, He saith, that in the ancient account of the Jewish feasts and fasts, viz. in the Megillah Taanitz, we find the seventh day of the month Chisleu, which answers to our 25th of November, recorded for an anniversary holiday, because Herod the king, who hated the wise men, died on that day.

Ans. Dr. Alix in his answer to Bishop Usher concerning the true date of the death of Herod, saith, That had Bishop Usher seen this book, he would never have cited it; for it is not the Megillah Taanitz mentioned by the Mischna, but a late fabulous, ignorant author, not known to, and much less credited by, the Jews, who do not follow or agree with him in this matter, and who mentions a feast in the month Chisleu not known to the Jews, not extant in their calendar published by Mr. Selden, nor by Buxtorf, among their occasional feasts; and which would never have been permitted by Herod's family, who governed till the destruction of Jerusalem.

Mr. Whiston saith farther, that this is wonderfully confirmed by the circumstances of Herod just before his death; and by the words of Augustus concerning his barbarity to his children recorded by Macrobius, it appearing by Josephus, that Herod was in a strange fury and rage but a few days before his death.

Ans. Here the point in dispute is so plainly and so fully given up, that if Mr. Whiston will abide by his own words, it must be at an end: for it is evident from the words of Josephus, that he fell into this rage, or ἐξηγρίωσεν ἀκράτῳ τῇ ὀργῇ, was exasperated to the utmost rage, upon suspicion of the contempt of the Jews; and that he was confirmed in this suspicion by the following attempt of the disciples of Judas and Matthias; who thereupon are taken by one of Herod's captains,* examined by Herod, then sent to Jericho, and after consultation with the chief men of the Jews, they are slain on the 13th of March. If therefore Herod fell into his rage but a few days, yea even just before his death, it is certain that he must die soon after this 13th of March, as indeed he did, and therefore could not live till the 25th of November, that is, eight months after. He therefore elsewhere contradicts himself, i. e. saith, p. 154. That Herod burnt these men alive some considerable time before his death; though it is plain from Josephus, that he did it after that rage, which, saith he, happened just, or a few days, before it.

Secondly, To proceed to the words of Macrobius,† they run thus, When Augustus had heard that among the children within two years old, which Herod king of the Jews had commanded to be slain in Syria, his own son was killed; he said, It is better to be Herod's hog than his son. It is observable here:

First, That as Strauchius saith, There are not wanting men who look upon this story of Macrobius as a mere fiction; as also doth Grenobius in his notes upon these words; (1.) Because no Roman historian whatsoever, before Macrobius, who lived almost four hundred years after Augustus, nor any Christian writer, though both historians, commentators, and homilists, speak largely of the cruelty of Herod towards the infants of Beth-lehem, make any mention of this jest, which gives just reason to suspect it is a fiction; like to that other in Philo's book of Chronology, that Herod had then a son of two years old, begot by one Salome, of the line of David, whom he then slew. Or, (2.) We may say with Grotius,* That Macrobius finding that the Christians kept the solemnity of Innocents' day, when, saith Origen, " Horum memoria, ut dignum est, in ecclesia celebratur," the memory of these infants is deservedly celebrated in the church, he out of error applied the jest of Augustus to it.

Secondly, These words contain no testimony of Augustus about this matter; he only says, It is better to be Herod's hog than his son; and this he might say rather upon occasion of Herod's slaying his two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, against his advice, to which Dr. Alix refers this speech, than his slaying Antipater; which being done with his permission, he had no just occasion to pass this jest upon him for doing that which he himself allowed. Moreover, Antipater being slain by Herod but five days before his death, Augustus could not hear of it till he heard also of his death, and then it seems too late to pass this jest upon him; whereas Alexander and Aristobulus being slain long before, might give a just occasion for it. And he who contradicts the full assertion of so many fathers of the second and third century, saying, That our Saviour was baptized when he began to be thirty years old, as St. Luke also doth; may permit us to question the authority of Macrobius as to the occasion of a jest made four hundred years before, and mentioned by him alone.

Thirdly, It is evident, that if any son of Herod's was slain " inter pueros," among the infants of Beth-lehem, it could not be Antipater, he being neither slain among them, nor near Beth-lehem, but alone at a castle far distant from it. Nor, secondly, could he be slain at the same time with these infants; for it plainly appears from Josephus, that Antipater was slain soon after the eclipse, which happened on March 13. the infants, saith Mr. Whiston, were slain Nov. 20. Antipater was slain not long before the return of Archelaus to Jerusalem, the five days of his father's life and his funeral solemnity only intervening; and, yet we learn from Josephus,† that Archelaus came thither, ἐνστάσης τῆς τῶν ἀζύμων ἑορτῆς, the Passover being then at hand. Lastly, The infants were slain whilst Herod was at Jerusalem; for thence he sent forth to slay the children at Bethlehem, whereas he had left Jerusalem, and was gone to Jericho before he slew Antipater; though therefore it might so happen that Augustus might hear of the relation, or discourse of both these acts of cruelty at the same time; it is impossible that they should happen both at the same time.

CHAP. III.

1. IN those days (viz. in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, Luke iii. 1.) came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea, [1] (and about Jordan, Luke iii. 3.)

2. And saying, Repent ye [2] (and amend your lives): for the kingdom of heaven (i. e. of the Messiah) is at hand (that so ye may be prepared to receive the blessings of that kingdom).

3. (And this he did according to what was foretold of him;) For this (John) is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying, (xl. 3.) The voice of one crying in the wilderness (shall be this), Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight; [3] (and of whom God by Malachi had said, iii. 1. Behold I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me, Mark i. 2.)

4. And the same John (who thus cried) had his raiment of camel's hair, and leathern girdle about his loins [4] (as Elias, whom he represented, had); and his meat was locusts and wild honey. [5]

5. Then (after notice of his proclaiming the approach of the Messiah) went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan,

6. And were baptized of him, confessing their sins [6] (and promising the reformation of their lives).

7. But when he saw many of the [7] pharisees and sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, [8] who hath warned you to (make use of this means to) flee from the wrath to come? (if indeed you would escape it.)

8. Bring [9] forth therefore (then) fruits meet for repentance:

9. And [10] think (it) not (sufficient) to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say to you, That God (rejecting you) is able of these stones [11] (before your eyes) to raise up (such who believing as he did, shall be accounted by him) children unto Abraham.

10. And (to engage you so to do, consider that) now also is the axe laid to the root of the tree; therefore every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is (to be) hewn down, and cast into the fire.

11. I indeed baptize you (only) with water [12] (calling you by this rite) to repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, (being one) whose shoes [13] I am not worthy to bear (i. e. whose servant I am not worthy to be): he shall baptize you (who believe in him) with the Holy Ghost, and with fire (i. e. appearing in the emblem of fire).

12. (And he is one) whose [14] fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and he will gather the wheat (the sincerely penitent) into his garner; but the chaff (the wicked and the unbelievers) he will burn with unquenchable fire.

13. Then (while John was thus preaching and baptizing) cometh Jesus from (Nazareth of) Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him.

14. But John (being a prophet full of the Spirit from his mother's womb, Luke i. 15. and by the afflatus of that Spirit knowing who he was) forbade [15] (or would have hindered) him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee (with the Holy Ghost), and comest thou to me (to receive my water baptism)?

15. And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it behoveth [16] us to fulfil all righteousness (i. e. to own every righteous institution of God). Then he suffered him.

16. And Jesus, when he was baptized, [17] went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened to him, and (both) he (and John Baptist, John i. 32.) [18] saw the Spirit descending like (as) a dove (descends), and [19] lighting upon him:

17. And lo a voice (was heard) from heaven, saying, [20] This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. III.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ τῆς Ἰουδαίας, preaching in the wilderness of Judea.] Ἔρημος, a wilderness among the Jews, did not signify a place wholly void of inhabitants, but a place in which they were fewer, and their habitations more dispersed, than in villages and cities: hence we read of six cities with their villages in the wilderness, Josh. xv. 61, 62. that Nabal dwelt in the wilderness of Paran, 1 Sam. xxv. 1, 2. and Joab had his house in the wilderness, 1 Kings ii. 34.

[2] Ver. 2. Μετανοεῖτε· ἤγγικε γὰρ ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.] Of the repentance here mentioned, see ver. 8. But to treat here more largely of the kingdom of heaven mentioned here, and elsewhere frequently in the gospels, let it be noted,

First, That the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of God signify the same thing, as will be evident from the variation of the word: Blessed are ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of heaven, Matt. v. 3. The kingdom of God, Luke vi. 20. The kingdom of heaven is at hand, Matt. iv. 17. The kingdom of God, Mark i. 15. The least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than John, Matt. xi. 11. In the kingdom of God, Luke vii. 28. To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, Matt. xiii. 11. Of the kingdom of God, Mark iv. 11. So Matt. xix. 14. and Mark x. 14. The reason seems to be, because this kingdom is erected by the God of heaven; and in Scripture phrase it is the same to be from God and to be from heaven, Matt. xxi. 25. Luke xv. 18. And שמים Heaven is the name of God, Dan. iv. 26. and among the rabbinical writers frequently. (See Buxt. Lexi. Talmud. in voce.) Note,

Secondly, That the kingdom of heaven in the gospel sometimes unquestionably signifies that heavenly kingdom in which all pious persons shall enjoy endless felicity with God as their reward in heaven: as when it is said, Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven; (Matt. v. 10.) i. e. great is their reward in heaven, (ver. 12.) Not every one that saith to me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father, (Matt. vii. 21.) To the rest I will say in that day, I know you not, &c. (ver. 22, 23.) It is better to enter into the kingdom of heaven with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell, Mark ix. 46, 47. See Matt. xiii. 40. 43. xxv. 34. 46. Luke xii. 32,33. Note, Thirdly, That it very frequently in the gospel signifies the coming of the Messiah to erect his spiritual kingdom, or that evangelical state and government of the church he was to set up, with the benefits belonging to them, who should by faith in him become members of this kingdom, and would be governed by his laws; this is undoubtedly the import of the phrase, (1.) when the kingdom of God is said to be at hand, as here and Matt. iv. 17. x. 7. Luke x. 9. that the kingdom of God is near, Luke xxi. 31. that it was presently to be manifested, Luke xix. 11. that it was among the Jews, Luke xvii. 21. that it was come to them, Matt. xii. 28. that devout men expected it, Mark xv. 43. that the pharisees asked when the kingdom of God would come, Luke xvii. 20. and when Christ said, There are some standing here, who shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God come with power, Matt. xvi. 28. Mark ix. 1. Luke ix. 27. (2.) When it is said that Jesus preached the gospel of the kingdom of God, Mark i. 14. that from the days of John the Baptist the kingdom of God was preached, Luke xvi. 16. that Christ preached the gospel of the kingdom, Matt. iv. 23. ix. 35. that he preached the kingdom of God, Luke iv. 43. and spake to them of the kingdom of God, Luke ix. 11. that he sent his apostles to preach the kingdom of God, Luke v. 2. and told the Jews the kingdom of God should be taken from them, Matt. xxi. 43. (3.) This sense it also bears in almost all the parables which speak of the kingdom of God, as Matt. xiii. 11. 31. 33. 44, 45. 47. xviii. 1. 3, 4. xx. 1. xxii. 2. xxv. 1. (4.) It seems to bear this sense, when it is said the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than John the Baptist, Matt. xi. 11. that the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force, ibid. ver. 12. that to the disciples was given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, Matt. xiii. 11. see ver. 19. 52. to thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven: Matt. xvi. 19. when the mother of Zebedee's children asks for her two sons that they might sit on the right and left hand in his kingdom, Matt. xx. 21. This is that kingdom which the scribes shut men out from, Matt. xxiii. 13. which the scribe was not far from, Mark xii. 34. and of which it is said, Blessed is he who shall eat bread in the kingdom of God, Luke xiv. 15.

Fourthly, In other places I am yet doubtful whether it refer to the times of the preaching of the gospel, and the erecting of Christ's kingdom, or to the first and higher sense of the kingdom of heaven, as it imports the kingdom into which the righteous shall enter at the great day of recompence, viz. Matt. v. 3. 19, 20. vi. 33. viii. 11. xix. 12. 24. Mark x. 14, 15. 23—25. Luke xviii. 29. xxii. 29, 30.

[3] Ver. 3. Ἑτοιμάσατε τὴν ὁδὸν Κυρίου, εὐθείας ποιεῖτε τὰς τρίβους αὐτοῦ, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.] From these words compared with Mark i. 2. Mal. iii. 1. some prove that Christ is God, even the same in essence with the God of Israel, because the way of which Isaias speaks, (xl. 3.) is דרך יהוה or the way of Jehovah, the path which he requires to be made straight is the path τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν, of our God. And it is the God of Israel who saith, Behold, I send my messenger before my face, or before me. (Mal. iii. 1.) Now this messenger is by Christ himself declared to be John the Baptist, (Matt. xi. 10.) and he is said to be sent πρὸ προσώπου σου, before the face of Christ to prepare his way; (ibid. and Mark i. 2. Luke vii. 27.) this therefore, say some, is an evident proof that Christ is one God with the Father, and that in Christ God came, and was manifested in the flesh. But to this the Socinians answer two things, which seem to lessen the force of this argument, viz.

First, That the Baptist was sent before the face of God, but not of God only, but of Christ also, for he was sent to call the people to repentance towards God, and so he went before God to turn many of the people to the Lord their God. (Luke i. 16, 17.) He was also sent to bear witness to Christ, that all men might believe in him; (John i. 7.) and so he went before the face of Christ to prepare his way.

Secondly, They add, that this messenger may well be said to go before the face of God, as being sent before the face of this great prophet and ambassador of God, who therefore sustained his person, and was his image and representative in a more excellent manner than any prophet or any angel mentioned in the Old Testament; yea, say they, God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself; (2 Cor. v. 19.) which shews that Christ in a more perfect manner represented him, so that the messenger sent before Christ's face, might well be said to be sent before the face of God. For if he, who persecutes the members of Christ, persecutes Christ himself, (Acts ix. 4.) he that despiseth Christ's messengers, despiseth him, and he that despiseth him, despiseth also him that sent him, (Luke x. 16.) and he that lied to the apostles lied to God; (Acts v. 4.) and if he that received them, received him, (Matt. x. 40.) and he that shews an act of charity to his members, shews it to him; (Matt. xxv. 40.) then, in like manner, he that goes before God's great prophet and ambassador, may be said to go before God also. These answers must be confuted before we can depend upon the strength of this argument. (See also note on Luke iii. 4, 5.)

[4] Ver. 4. Εἶχε τὸ ἔνδυμα αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τριχῶν καμήλου καὶ ζώνην δερματίνην περὶ τὴν ὀσφὺν αὐτοῦ, &c. And this John had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins, &c.] It is very true as Ctesias, Apollonius,* and Ælian declare,† that some garments made of camel's hair were very soft and fine, and therefore worn by priests and noblemen; these, saith Paulus Venetus, in Tartary are called zambilottes, lib. i. cap. 63. and by us chamblets; but doubtless the garment of the Baptist was made ex villis, of the long and coarse hair of camels, that he might in habit, as well as in spirit and office, resemble Elijah, who was a hairy man, and girded with a girdle of leather about his loins. (2 Kings i. 8.)

[5] Ἡ δὲ τροφὴ αὐτοῦ ἦν ἀκρίδες καὶ μέλι ἄγριον, and his meat was locusts and wild honey.] That some locusts were clean meat we learn from these words, Lev. xi. 22. of these ye may eat, the bald locust after his kind. That locusts were a common meat, not only in the eastern and the southern parts, but even in Palestine itself, is fully proved by Bochartus, Hieroz. par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 7. Eustath. in Dionys. p. 37. and by Ludolphus in his Ethiopic History, and in his dissertation de Locustis: so that vain are all the criticisms to change the word ἀκρίδες.

λογούμενοι τὰς ἁμαρτίας αὐτῶν. And were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins.] In the river Jordan, Mark i. 5. (See note on ver. 16.) Of this confession of sins, Maldonate owns it could not be auricular confession, because that was not yet instituted: moreover, it was a confession of them not to John, but unto God, much less was it a confession of all their offences made secretly in the ears of John; for how could one man have sufficed for that work, when all Judea and Jerusalem went out unto him? but only a general confession that they were sensible of their sins, and so repaired to his baptism, professing their repentance for them; and such were the confessions we meet with in the Old Testament, (Ezra ix. Neh. ix. Dan. ix.) and that made by the high-priest on the day of atonement of all the iniquities of the children of Israel. (Lev. xvi. 21.) It was a confession not of those who had been baptized concerning sins committed after baptism, but of those who were to be baptized: and, lastly, it was not a confession required of them by the Baptist, but made freely of their own accord; in all which circumstances it differs from the auricular confession of the church of Rome.

[7] Ver. 7. Ἰδὼν δὲ πολλοὺς τῶν Φαρισαίων καὶ Σαδδουκαίων ἐρχομένους ἐπὶ τὸ βάπτισμα αὐτοῦ. And seeing many of the pharisees and sadducees coming to his baptism, &c.] That these pharisees and sadducees not only came to the place of baptism, but also actually were baptized by John, is proved, (1.) Because as much is said of them here, as of the multitude, Luke iii. 7. they came to be baptized, and of the publicans, ver. 12. ἦλθον βαπτισθῆναι, they came to be baptized. And the same admonitions and words are spoken to the multitude there, (ver. 7, 8.) as to the pharisees and sadducees here. Now the multitude and publicans were actually baptized; only observe, that many of them are said to come to his baptism not comparatively, as if but few refused, for St. Luke saith, (vii. 30.) that the pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God towards them, being not baptized of John; but absolutely, they being not a few who were baptized. Now from this example of the Baptist admitting this generation of vipers to his baptism upon their profession of repentance, and a desire to escape the wrath to come, we may learn that such professors may be admitted to the sacrament, as have been very bad, upon the like profession, provided we do warn them as the Baptist did these men, that as they domake profession of repentance and amendment, so they would be as careful to bring forth fruits worthy of repentance.

[8] Τίς ὑπέδειξεν ὑμῖν, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?] This is not, as Mr. Clerc conceives, a negative, or declaration that none had warned them to do this; for, doubtless, the prophets of the Old Testament, and their own consciences, must warn them to avoid impendent wrath: but it is a who of admiration, like that of St. Paul to the Galatians, Who hath bewitched you? iii. 1. where sure he did not intend to say that no man had done it: (see the like, Isa. xlii. 19. xlix. 21. liii. 1. lx. 8. lxiii. 1. Matt. xxi. 10. Luke v. 21. ix. 9. Rev. xiii. 4.) and is as if he should have said, How wonderful is it that such men should do things so alien from their temper and inclinations!

[9] Ver. 8. Ποιήσατε οὖν καρποὺς ἀξίους τῆς μετανοίας. Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance.] i. e. A change of the mind from the approbation or good-liking of sin, as seeing in it something we conceive desirable, to the aversion and alienation of the mind from it, as being convinced of the vileness and the destructive nature of it; and this is properly μετάνοια repentance, and to be thus affected is ἀνανεοῦσθαι τῷ πνεύματι τοῦ νοὸς ἡμῶν, to be renewed in the spirit of our mind; (Eph. iv. 23.) and because hence naturally follows a change of the will and the affections from love to the hatred of sin, and so from choosing to the refusal of it: hence it is well defined by Phavorinus, ἡ πρὸς τὸ κρεῖσσον ἐπιστροφὴ καὶ γνησία ἀπὸ πταισμάτων ἐπὶ τὸ ἐνάντιον ἀγαθὸν ἐπιστροφή, a conversion from our evil ways to the contrary good, or to that which is better; and because, where these ruling faculties are truly thus affected, we shall cease to do evil, and learn to do well, (Isa. i. 16, 17.) so that if we have done iniquity we will do it no more, (Job xxxiv. 32.) therefore it is styled μετάνοια ἀπὸ νεκρῶν ἔργων, repentance from dead works, (Heb. vi. 1.) and repentance to salvation is styled ἀμεταμέλητος, (2 Cor. vii. 10.) i.e. such as is not reversed by any voluntary returning to, or relapsing into, our former sins. And seeing God is unchangeably holy and righteous, and must for ever hate iniquity with a perfect hatred, it is certain from his very nature that he cannot be reconciled to, or have communion with, the sinner, till he cease from sin, and a change is wrought in his conversion from sin to righteousness; for a change there must be either in God or man: now since God's nature is immutable, it cannot be in him, and so of necessity must be in man. Now it is evident both from reason and experience, that confession of sins, a present sorrow for them, and displeasure against them, and a warm resolution to forsake them, is neither necessarily nor always attended with this change, and so that these alone cannot be fruits meet for repentance; and, oh! how necessary was this admonition for the men of that age, who, as Dr. Lightfoot notes, placed their repentance in a mere oral confession of their sins, as the schoolmen and some Latin fathers did in a mere groan; saying, Si ingemueris, salvaberis. And I wish this note were not as necessary for too many of our age.

[10] Ver. 9. Καὶ μὴ δόξητε λέγειν ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, πατέρα ἔχομεν τὸν Ἀβραάμ· And begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father.] There seems no necessity of making δοκέω here or ἄρχομαι Luke iii. 8. an expletive; for the sense runs clearly thus, When you are called to bring forth fruits meet for repentance, begin not to obstruct the efficacy of this admonition with those thoughts so common among you, that you are secure from wrath by being the children of Abraham. How prone they were to such vain imaginations you may learn, note on Rom. ii. 13. and from these words of Justin Martyr,* calling the Jews to repentance, and desiring them not to be deluded by their rabbins and masters, who told them, that though they continued in their sins, yet if they knew God, οὐ μὴ λογίζηται αὐτοῖς ὁ κύριος ἁμαρτίαν, God would not impute their sin to them. And conceiving that being Abraham's seed, though they continued in their disobedience to God, and in infidelity, the kingdom of heaven should be given to them.

[11] Ὅτι δύναται ὁ Θεὸς ἐκ τῶν λίθων τούτων ἐγεῖραι τέκνα τῷ Ἀβραάμ, for God is able out of these stones to raise up children to Abraham.] I see no reason for the interpretation of

* Ὑπολαμβάνοντες ὅτι πάντως τοῖς ἀπὸ τῆς σπορᾶς, τῆς κατὰ σάρκα, τῶν Ἀβραὰμ οὖσι, κἂν ἁμάρτωλοι ὦσι, καὶ ἄπιστοι, καὶ ἀπειθεῖς πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν, ἡ βασιλεία ἡ αἰώνιος δοθήσεται. Dial. cum Tryph. p. 369. cap. 370. D.

Clemens Alexandrinus* here out of these stones, that is, ἐκ τῶν λίθοις πεπιστευκότων ἐθνῶν, out of the gentiles who worshipped stones, or that of Jerome on the place, " Lapides Æthnicos vocat propter cordis duritiem," He calls the heathens stones for the hardness of their hearts, though almost all the ancients concur with them; unless perhaps it might be thought he pointed to the heathen soldiers standing there; the sense seems rather to be this, That God, who raised Adam from the earth, and children to Abraham from the dead womb of Sarah, can from these stones create such persons, whose faith shall render them more truly and acceptably the sons of faithful Abraham than you are. (See the note on Luke xix. 40.)

[12] Ver. 11. Ἐγὼ μὲν βαπτίζω ὑμᾶς ἐν ὕδατι εἰς μετάνοιαν, I indeed baptize you with water to repentance, &c.] They seem to be much mistaken, who think the baptism of John was for substance the same with that which afterward Christ did institute to admit disciples into the Christian church; for (1.) John neither did nor could baptize disciples in the name of the Holy Ghost, as the apostles did; because the Holy Ghost was not yet given, (John vii. 39.) and much less could he baptize them with the Holy Ghost, as here he saith Christ would, and yet Christ makes both these baptisms necessary to our entrance into the kingdom of God, John iii. 5. (2.) John did not baptize in the name of Christ, for had he done so, there could have been no doubt, whether he himself were the Christ, or not; (Luke iii. 15.) nor any occasion for the question, Why baptizest thou, if thou be not the Christ? (John i. 25.) He only admonished those he baptized in general, that they should believe in him that was coming after him. So that he baptized only those who as yet believed not in Christ; whereas the baptism instituted by Christ was in his name, and belonged only to them who believed in him. And, lastly, St. Paul baptizes them again, who had before received the baptism of John, to fit them for the reception of the Holy Ghost. (Acts xix. 6, 7.)

[13] Οὗ οὐκ εἰμὶ ἱκανὸς τὰ ὑποδήματα βαστάσαι, whose shoes I am not worthy to carry.] i. e. Whose servant I am not worthy to be. (See note on John i. 27. and Grotius here.)

[14] Ver. 12. Οὗ τὸ πτύον ἐν τῇ χειρὶ αὐτοῦ· Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and burn the chaff with unquenchable fire.] That which we render here a fan from Vannus, is, say Hesychius and Phavorinus, a sieve, in which they separate the wheat from the chaff. It is, say Didymus and Eustathius, (in Iliad. v.) τὸ λικμητικὸν, a winnowing instrument, by which they shake the grains together, ἀναχωρίζοντες τοῦ ἀχύρου, separating them from the chaff. Now the wheat or other grain thus cleansed, was put into the granary; to the chaff they put fire to prevent the winds blowing it back into the thrashing-floor, and that fire burnt on till it had consumed it, without being quenched; and to this practice do these words refer.

[15] Ver. 14. Ὁ δὲ Ἰωάννης διεκώλυεν αὐτόν. But John forbade him.] To the question, how the Baptist knew him to be the Christ before the Spirit descended on him, it is answered by almost all the commentators on the Gospel of St. Matthew, that John the Baptist being a prophet filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb, (Luke i. 15.) knew by the afflatus of that Holy Spirit, that he, who then came to him, was the person on whom the Holy Ghost should descend so plentifully, and on whom he should abide, that he might impart him to others, such matters being frequently imparted to prophets by an immediate intimation of the Holy Spirit. So Simeon being told that he should not die till he had seen the Lord's Christ, (Luke ii. 26.) had an afflatus declaring to him that our Lord was that Christ, (ver. 27. 32.) So Anna the prophetess being one of them who expected his coming, by a like afflatus, was moved to speak of him as the promised Messiah, (ver. 38.) So Samuel being told by God, that, on the morrow a man should come to him to be the captain over his people Israel, (1 Sam. ix. 15.) when Saul appears, hath another afflatus resembling that of the Baptist's here, viz. Behold the man of whom I spake to thee, (ver. 17.) and on whom thou mayest expect to see the signal promised. Thus, though Moses knew before from the mouth of God, and many other antecedent evidences, that he was by him designed to bring his people out of Egypt, yet God speaks thus to him, This shall be a sign to thee, that I have sent thee, when thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain. (Exod. iii. 12.) In a word, the Baptist being to preach, when he baptized with water, that another should baptize them with the Holy Ghost, God tells him, that of this he should see an evidence, by the visible descent of the Holy Ghost upon him, who from his fulness was to impart this Spirit to all true believers; and when our Saviour came to be baptized, tells him again, this was that very person.

[16] Ver. 15. Οὕτω γὰρ πρέπον ἐστὶν ἡμῖν πληρῶσαι πᾶσαν δικαιοσύνην, for so it becomes us to fulfil all righteousness.] i. e. To own every Divine institution, and so to shew my readiness to comply with all God's righteous precepts, and to justify God and approve his counsel, (Luke vii. 29.) and celebrate his wisdom in sending thee to prepare his and my way, by calling men to repentance, and by so doing to fit them for the blessings of my kingdom, and the avoiding of the wrath to come. So the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vii. cap. 22.) say, that Christ was baptized, not that he needed any purgation, ἀλλ' ἵνα καὶ Ἰωάννῃ ἀλήθειαν προσμαρτυρήσῃ, καὶ ἡμῖν ὑπογραμμον παράσχηται, but to testify the truth of St. John's baptism, and be an example to us.

[17] Ver. 16. Καὶ βαπτισθεὶς ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀνέβη εὐθὺς ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕδατος· And Jesus being baptized came up straightway out of the water.] The observation of the Greek church is this, That he, who ascended out of the water, must first descend down into it: *Baptism therefore is to be performed not by sprinkling, but by washing the body; and indeed it can be only from ignorance of the Jewish rites in baptism that this is questioned; for they, to the due performance of this rite, so superstitiously required the immersion of the whole body in the water, that if any dirt hindered the water from coming to any part of it, the baptism was not right, and if one held the baptized by the arm, when he was let down into the water, another must after dip him, holding him by the other arm that was washed before; because his hand would not suffer the water to come to his whole body.

* Ἀνίζη ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕδατος, δῆλον δὲ ὅτι κατίζη· ἰδοὺ οὖν κατάδυσις καὶ οὐ ῥαντισμός. Hieron. Patriarch. cap. περὶ μυστηρίων.

(See Lightfoot here, on ver. 6. and Selden, de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. ii. cap. 2. p. 14.) Note also that the divines hence infer, that baptism may rightly be received by, and administered to, a subject incapable of many of the chief ends of it, provided he be capable of some other end for which it was also designed. For Christ being without sin, could neither repent nor promise amendment of life; being the wisdom of the Father, he could be taught nothing; being the Christ, he could not profess he would believe in him that should come after him, that is, in himself. He therefore was baptized, to testify that he owned the Baptist, as one commissioned by God to do this office; and (2.) that by this rite he might profess his willingness to fulfil all righteousness; and (3.) that by this rite he might be initiated to his prophetical office, and consecrated to the service of God; though therefore, say they, infants can neither be taught nor believe, nor give the answer of a good conscience at baptism, yet may they be baptized. (1.) That they may by this ceremony be obliged to observe the laws of that Jesus, into whose name they are baptized, even as the circumcised infant, by virtue of that rite, became a debtor to observe the whole law of Moses, Acts xv. 5. Gal. v. 3. (2.) That by this rite they might enter into covenant with God, and become federate children of God, of which they are declared capable by Moses, Deut. xxix. 11. And so when by their parents that circumcision was neglected, they are said to have broken God's covenant, Gen. xvii. 14. And seeing parents might consecrate their children to God's service from the womb, as in the case of Samson (Judg. xiii. 5.) and of Samuel, (1 Sam. i. 11. 22. 28.) why might not God appoint that this might be done to children, by that only rite which he instituted under the old and the new covenant, for entering any into the number of his federal servants? And,

(3.) By this rite to consign unto them a right to the kingdom of heaven, and to a blessed resurrection; of which, if infants of believing parents are not capable when dying in their infancy, they are lost for ever. Now they all being the offspring of Adam, and therefore all obnoxious to death by reason of his sin, (Rom. v. 12.) they cannot be delivered from this death but by the grace of God, which Christ hath purchased, and promised to them only, who are made some way members of his body, and children of God: why therefore should we not conceive they should obtain this favour by that baptism, which is alone appointed by Christ for making any one a member of his body, (1 Cor. xii. 13.) and entering any one into the kingdom of God? (John iii. 5.)

[18] Καὶ εἶδε τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ καταβαῖνον ὡσεὶ περιστερὰν, and he saw the Spirit of God descending as a dove.] See the note on Luke iii. 22.

[19] Καὶ ἐρχόμενον ἐπ' αὐτὸν, and lighting upon him.] Here the Socinians object thus:

Obj. If Christ had been God as well as man, he could not have needed this descent of the Holy Spirit upon him, as being able by the Divinity residing in him, to do all those things for which the Holy Ghost can be supposed to descend upon him: "What is it (saith Crellius) that the high God could not do himself? or, what help could the Holy Spirit give unto him? If you say, his human nature needed the assistance of this Holy Spirit, how can that be; seeing it is supposed to be personally united to the Divinity, and to have the whole fulness of the Godhead dwelling in it? Or, why should Christ be rather said to cast out devils by this Spirit of God, than by his Divine nature; or to be endowed with wisdom, counsel, knowledge, fortitude, and the fear of the Lord by the Spirit, and not by his Divine nature?" (Woltzogen upon the place, and Crellius, de uno Deo Pat. b. i. §. 2. cap. 33.)

Ans. In answer to this objection it is to be observed, first, That the most ancient fathers have taken notice of it as a specious objection against the received doctrine of the Divinity of Christ, and have attempted to return divers answers to it; which is a demonstration, that the doctrine, that Christ was truly God, was then received by the church of Christ. Trypho, in his dialogue with Justin Martyr, asks this very question of the Socinians, Why Jesus Christ, whom Justin owned to be God, should have the Spirit resting on him, ὡς ἐνδεὴς τούτων ὑπάρχων, as needing his assistance? Justin Martyr * replies, That he accurately and prudently made this inquiry; this being a just cause of doubting in this case; and then he tells him, That the graces of the Holy Spirit, mentioned Isa. xi. 2. did not descend upon him, as if he needed them; but to testify they were to rest upon him, and be accomplished in him: so that these prophetical graces should no longer be in the Jewish church. Irenæus,† speaking of the same thing, saith, As to that nature by which Christ the word of God was man, the Spirit rested on him, and he was anointed to preach the gospel; "secundum autem quod Deus erat," but as he was God he knew all men, and what was in man, (John ii. 24, 25.) Now hence the answer to this argument is this, That Christ as God could not need this unction of the Holy Spirit, but as he was to execute the prophetic office, it was needful for him; because a prophet being not to speak in his own name, but in the name of God, and what he had suggested to him by the Spirit of God, this prophetic office was to be performed not by the Divine nature of our Lord, but by the afflatus of the Holy Spirit. (See to this effect the discourse in the preface to St. John.) It was also needful for the execution of his priestly office, that he by the Spirit sanctifying him from the womb, might offer himself a lamb without spot to God. (Heb. ix. 14.) So that in all the actions relating to his prophetic office, the Divinity of Christ must be supposed quiescent, and Christ must be said to perform his miracles, to confirm the doctrine which he delivered, by the Spirit of God, by which also he was assisted to speak the words of God: (John iii. 34.) and seeing all the orthodox allow, that the Divinity was quiescent in Christ till he was thirty years old, why may they not allow it was quiescent also after, in all the actions relating to the execution of his prophetical office here on earth?

Duoditius‡ indeed exclaims not against this hypothesis, but against the words of Irenæus, That Christ suffered ἡσυχάζοντος τοῦ λόγου, the Divine nature being quiescent, as if the Λόγος, or Divine nature, must be then a deserter of the human nature, as not assisting it in his agonies, calling this a portentous and impious opinion. But this is only a vain exclamation; for that Christ did not suffer because he wanted power to repel his enemies, or to deliver himself from death; but because he was willing to give up his life an offering for sin, and to obey his Father's command, to lay down his life for the sheep, (John x. 18.) and shed his blood for the redemption of mankind, is evident from this, That he who by a word struck back his adversaries to the earth, and by a touch healed the ear of Malchus; (John xviii. 6. Luke xxii. 51.) he that had power to reassume his life when he had laid it down, (John x. 18.) must sure have power to preserve his life, if it had pleased him so to do: shall we then say, Christ was a deserter of himself, because he was not pleased to do this? Does he not say, he could call for twelve legions of angels to deliver him? (Matt. xxvi. 53.) Must we then call him a deserter of himself, because he did not do it? Is it not plainly said, he had the Father dwelling in him, (John xiv. 10.) and had the Spirit without measure? (John iii. 34.) Shall we then say, the Father and the Spirit deserted him; because they, after all his cries, permitted him to suffer on the cross? If not, why should we say, the Divine nature did desert him; because it permitted him, according to the predictions of the prophets, and the counsel and decree of the Father, to suffer for the salvation of mankind, and would not rescue him from that death on which depended our redemption, sanctification, and salvation? (Heb. ix. 13. x. 9.)

[20] Ver. 17. Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητὸς, ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.] Here note, (1.) That this is introduced with an ἰδοὺ, behold! as being spoken in the audience of the Baptist, that he might testify this of him, that he was the Son of God. Note, (2.) That this voice was directed to Christ himself; and therefore, Mark i. 11. Luke iii. 22. the words run thus: Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased: i. e. thou art the person sanctified by this descent of the Holy Ghost upon thee to declare my will to the world, according to the prophecy concerning him, Isa. xlii. 1. and whose words and doctrine it therefore concerns all men to hear and obey, (Matt. xvii. 5.) as a person highly favoured by me, and commissioned to teach what he delivers in my name.

CHAP. IV.

1. THEN was Jesus led up of the Spirit [1] (with which he was filled, Luke iv. 1. farther) into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil (that we by his example might learn how to resist temptation).

2. And when he had (by a miraculous assistance) fasted forty days and forty nights, (and was, during that time, invisibly tempted of the devil, Mark i. 13. Luke iv. 2.) he was afterward an hungered. [2]

3. And when the tempter [3] came unto him, he said (Greek, and the tempter coming (then visibly) to him said), If thou be (indeed) the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread (to satisfy thy present hunger).

4. But he answered and said, It is written, (Deut. viii. 3. that) Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God (i. e. by any other thing which he shall appoint for his nourishment).

5. Then (when this temptation succeeded not) the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him upon a pinnacle of the temple,

6. And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, (Psal. xci. 11.) He shall give his angels charge concerning thee (to keep thee): and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone (incur any damage).

7. Jesus said unto him, It is written again (Greek, again it is written), Thou shalt not tempt [4] (i. e. distrust) the Lord thy God (as I must do, if after a voice from heaven, saying to me, Thou art my beloved Son, Mark i. 11. I should require any farther experiment of that matter).

8. [5] Again, the devil (being baffled in this second assault) taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and (there) sheweth him (in a landscape) all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; (in a moment of time, Luke iv. 5.)

9. And (he) saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me, (for they are given to me, &c. Luke iv. 6, 7.)

10. Then said Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, (Deut. vi. 13.) Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, [6] and him only shalt thou serve.

11. Then the devil (having ended all his temptations) leaveth him, (for a season, Luke iv. 13.) and, behold, angels came and ministered to him (food).

12. Now when Jesus heard that John was cast into prison, he departed (from Judea) into Galilee (to avoid the envy of the pharisees, John iv. 3. and to continue the preaching interrupted by John's confinement);

13. And leaving Nazareth, (by reason of their infidelity, Luke iv. 29.) he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea-coast, in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim:

14. That it might be fulfilled [7] which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, (ix. 1, 2.)

15. The land of Zabulon, and the land of Nephthalim, by the way of the sea beyond Jordan, (which is called) Galilee of the gentiles;

16. (Are) the people which sat in darkness, (but afterward) saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up.

17. From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say (to the people), Repent (ye): for the kingdom of heaven is at hand, (i. e. from the time of John's imprisonment, he began to preach upon that subject, ver. 23.)

18. And Jesus, walking by the sea of Galilee, [8] saw two brethren, Simon (afterward) called Peter, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea: (to wash it, Luke v. 2.) for they were fishers.

19. And he saith unto them, Follow me, and I will make you (to become) fishers of men (by gaining them to the faith, or bringing them within the net of the gospel).

20. And they straightway left their nets, and followed him.

21. And going on from thence, he saw other two brethren, (viz.) James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, (returned now to, and) in a ship with Zebedee their father, mending their nets; and he called them.

22. And they (also) immediately left the ship and their father, and followed him.

23. And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom (shortly to be erected), and healing all manner of sickness (es) and all manner of disease (s, which were) among the people.

24. And his fame went throughout all Syria: and they brought to him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatic, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them.

25. And there followed him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IV.

[1] Ver. 1. ΤΟΤΕ ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀνήχθη εἰς τὴν ἔρημον ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος, πειρασθῆναι ὑπὸ τοῦ διαβόλου. Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil.] By the Spirit, i. e. by that Holy Spirit, with which he was filled. (Luke iv. 1.) Now, doubtless, there must be some very great and good ends, why the Holy Spirit should thus move our Lord to repair into the wilderness for that end, amongst which, saith Theophylact, this was one, to teach us, that, when by baptism we have consecrated ourselves to God's service, we must expect temptation: and, (2.) to teach us in our Lord's example, how we may best and most effectually resist them, even by an unshaken faith, (1 Pet. v. 9.) and by the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. (Eph. vi. 17.)

[2] Ver. 2. Ὕστερον ἐπείνασε, And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward an hungered.] Hence we may learn how vain a thing it is, to institute or to pretend to keep a fast of forty days in imitation of this example of our Lord; for it is certain, that so great and so long abstinence is inconsistent with the frailty of our natures, and so can be no duty; it is also certain, that our Saviour felt no hunger all this while; for he was only hungry afterward, saith St. Matthew, and so his fasting was miraculous. Moreover, his fast was not intended to chastise or to subdue that body which never was irregular, or to prepare him for those spiritual duties, which by the unction of the Holy Ghost he was abundantly fitted for; and upon these accounts can give no precedent to our fasts, which should afflict the body, and are intended for the ends aforementioned. To conclude, hence our obligation to a more than ordinary temperance for forty days, is to place morality in numbers, and to introduce an endless heap of superstitious follies; for, by like reason, we must deem ourselves obliged to ride upon an ass, in token of our humility, or to renounce our title to our temporal estates, and throw away our money, to be like him who had not where to lay his head, nor could procure sixpence without a miracle. Better here is the note of Theophylact and others, that we are then especially to expect temptations when we are alone, and when we are in straits and exigencies, from which we see no ordinary way of deliverance; which was the case of Christ, he being hungry in the wilderness, and fed at last only by angels ministering to him.

[3] Ver. 3. Καὶ προσελθὼν αὐτῷ ὁ πειράζων, εἶπεν, And the tempter coming to him, said, &c.] From this and the first verse, where Christ is said to be led into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil, the Socinians raise two objections against the Divinity of Christ.

Obj. 1. If Christ were God why should he be thus tempted? Was it to shew, that God was able to sustain and overcome the temptations of the devil? Could there be any doubt of this? If it be here said, that he was only tempted as he was man; they still reply, That seeing his human nature was personally united to the Divine, it must be still superfluous to shew, that even his human nature, thus strengthened and assisted, should be able to resist and baffle the assaults of Satan; nor will his doing this by a Divine assistance afford us any comfort, who can expect no like assistance when we do grapple with the tempter.

Ans. To this I answer, That the ancient fathers were not ignorant of this objection, made, as it seemeth, by the Ebionites, the elder brethren of the Photinians and Socinians. And therefore Irenæus,* in answer to them, lays this for the foundation, That never any of the sons of Adam were ever in the Scriptures called God or Lord, but he who, "Præter omnes qui tunc fuerunt homines, Deus, et Dominus et Rex æternus, et unigenitus, et Verbum incarnatum prædicatum et à prophetis, et apostolis, adest videre omnibus, qui vel modicum veritatis attigerint," of all men then in being, was only by the prophets and apostles declared to be God and Lord, and the eternal King, and the only-begotten, and the Word made flesh, as they who have little insight into the truth may easily perceive: and these things (saith he) the Scriptures would not testify of him, " si similiter ut omnes, homo tantum fuisset," &c. had he been only a man as others were, but because he had an excellent generation from God the Father, and another in the womb of the Virgin; the Scriptures testify of him, both that he was one without form, and subject to sufferings, one that rid upon the foal of an ass, had gall and vinegar given him to drink, was despised of the people, and humbled himself to death: and also, that he was the holy Lord, the wonderful Counsellor, the mighty God, (Isa. ix. 6.) coming upon the clouds to be judge of all men. And having premised these things, he answers thus to the objection of the Ebionites, That† as he was man, that he might be tempted, so he was the Word, that he might be glorified; the Word being quiescent, that he might be tempted, crucified, and die. Which words, being preserved and cited by Theodoret, shew, that the latter fathers approved of this solution of this difficulty. Among the reasons assigned of our Lord's temptation, this is one, viz. the consolation of his members conflicting with the adversary of their souls, and that upon these two accounts: (1.) That he suffered being tempted, that he might afford suitable help to us when we are tempted; (Heb. ii. 17, 18. iv. 15, 16.) and, (2.) That we have the same Spirit in us which was in him, and who is greater than he that was in the world, (1 John ii. 14. iv. 4.) and so may combat him with the same weapons, and overcome him with the same assistance, by which he in his human nature did it. Now this ground of comfort will be wholly taken from us, if Christ did only overcome him by virtue of that nature by which he was ἀπείραστος κακῶν, incapable of being vincible by temptation. But, if with Irenæus we affirm, That the Divinity was then quiescent, and that he overcame him by virtue of the Spirit given to him, we, who have the same unction from the Holy One, may also hope to do it by his aid: and, since even the most orthodox do grant, that the Divinity in Christ was so quiescent for the space of thirty years, as to afford no specimen of its residence in him, why might it not be quiescent also in these things, which did particularly relate to his prophetic office here on earth, and to that grand exemplar in which we stand obliged to follow his steps. In a word, that our Lord could not be overcome of Satan, was the result of the union of the human nature to the Divinity; that he repelled all his assaults, might be, because he was anointed, and filled with the Holy Ghost.

* Lib. iii. cap. 21. p. 287.

† Ὡσπὶς γὰς ἦν ἄνθςωπος ἵνα πειρασθῇ, οὕτω καὶ Λόγος ἵνα δοξάσθη, ἡσυχάζοντος μὲν λόγου ἐν τῷ πειράζεσθαι, καὶ σταυροῦσθαι, καὶ ἀποθνήσκειν.

Obj. But the Socinians do still inquire, how a Spirit so wise and subtle as the devil is, should venture to assault, and should assay to tempt, the great God, especially to so vile an action as to fall down and worship him, seeing it is scarce imaginable he should not know it was impossible to succeed in this temptation, or that he should attempt a thing he beforehand discerned impossible to be effected?

Ans. To this, after a jocular reply, that this argument depends upon the modesty and other virtues of the devil, Bisterfield saith thus, That the malice of the devil hath oft prevailed upon him to attempt things very foolish and impossible; for what could be more so, than for a creature to attempt to be like God, or to annul the truth of the prophecies concerning Christ? What could be more pernicious to him than the death of Christ for the redemption of mankind, which yet he by all means did attempt, though it was impossible he should be held under the power of death? (Acts ii. 24, 25.) And hence Petavius retorts this argument upon the head of Crellius thus: Whatsoever Satan might conceive of Christ, he could not but certainly know from the Scriptures he was to be the Redeemer of mankind, and the author of salvation to them, that he should bruise his head, that he should sit upon the throne of David, to rule there for ever; and knowing this, he could not hope to prevail in his temptations of Christ, unless he could believe that he was able to reverse both the decrees and oath of God. To this the fathers add, (2.) That the devil was ignorant of this mystery, when he tempted Christ. Thus Ignatius saith, that the *virginity of Mary, καὶ ὁ τοκετὸς αὐτῆς, and he that was born of her, and the death of our Lord, were three mysteries concealed from Satan; where by ὁ τοκετὸς he cannot understand our Lord's nativity of the blessed Virgin, since in that very section he styles him, Θεὸν ἀνθρωπίνως φανερούμενον, a God appearing after the manner of a man. And Origen† observes, that "cum ab ipso diabolo tentaretur, nusquam confessus est Dei se esse filium," when he was tempted of the devil he had never confessed himself to be the Son of God. And since this was so great a mystery, that even angels desired to look into it, (1 Pet. i. 12.) and learned somewhat of it from the church, (Eph. iii. 10.) what wonder is it the devil either should not know or should doubt of it? All his temptations shew he looked upon our Saviour not as a God, but only as one who might be dear unto him; whence he assays to tempt him with the glories of the world. This argument doth therefore prove, not that our Saviour was not truly God, but only that the devil did not then know him so to be.

[4] Ver. 7. Οὐκ ἐκπειράσεις Κύριον τὸν Θεόν σου· Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.] It is here well noted by Dr. Hammond, that to tempt the Lord doth not in Scripture language signify, to presume too much on the Divine goodness, but rather to distrust his power, truth, or providence, after sufficient demonstrations and reasons given for our encouragement to depend upon them; and consequently to tempt God here must be, as it relates to Christ, to doubt whether he was the Son of God, after the voice from heaven had said unto him, (iii. 17.) Thou art my beloved Son: so the phrase signifies throughout the Old Testament. Thus, when the Jews murmur against Moses for the want of water, saying, Thou hast brought us out of Egypt to kill us, and our children, and our cattle, with thirst: Moses replies, Why do you tempt the Lord? (Exod. xvii. 2, 3.) and calls the name of the place Massah, i. e. temptation, because they tempted the Lord, saying (after he had dried up the Red Sea, and provided manna for them, and gone before them in the cloud, the symbol of his presence), Is the Lord among us, or not? doubting of his goodness to, protection over them, and presence with them, after so many signal evidences of these things; and to this relate the words here cited by our Lord from Deut. vi. 16. Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God; i. e. thou shalt not question his presence with thee, or distrust his providence, as ye tempted him in Massah. So again God saith, Because these men, which have seen my glory (in the cloud) and the miracles which I did in Egypt, and in the wilderness (after all these demonstrations of my presence with them, and of my power and readiness to rescue them from the hands of their enemies), have tempted me now these ten times; therefore they shall not (personally) enter into the land of promise. (Numb. xiv. 22.) Now thus they tempted him by not believing God could and would make good his promise of bringing them into that land, but thinking they should die by the sword of those giants which were in that land; (ver. 2, 3.) and therefore God speaks thus, How long will this people provoke me? How long will it be ere they believe me, after all the signs which I have shewed among them? (ver. 2, 3.) And to such instances of their distrust as these, refer those passages of the Psalmist; They tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel, not believing that his power was sufficient to do those things which he had promised, and shewed that he was able to perform; (Psal. lxxviii. 41.) for they thus limited and tempted him, because they remembered not his hand, nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy: how he had wrought his signs in Egypt, and his wonders in the field of Zoan, ver. 42, 43.; (see also ver. 18—20.) and this being spoken of them, when they turned back into Egypt, (ver. 41.) relates to the tempting of God, mentioned Numb. xiv. to the temptation, mentioned Exod. xvii. relates to these words, Psal. cvi. 14, 15. Though he had dried up the Red Sea for them, and saved them from the hand of their enemies, they soon forgat his works, and lusting in the wilderness, they tempted God in the desert: and to those in Psal. xcv. 8, 9. Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness: when your fathers tempted me, and proved me, (Gam. Rahu) though they saw my works; i. e. how I delivered them at the Red Sea, made bitter water sweet, and sent them bread from heaven. Whence the apostle's inference is this, (Heb. iii. 12.) Take heed there be not in you an evil heart of unbelief. So Judith viii. 12. Who are you that ἐπειράσατε τὸν Θεὸν, ye tempt God, by limiting him to such a time as five days, as if he could not help you, if he did it not within that time? (ver. 15.) this also is the import of these words of Ahaz, (Isa.

* Ep. ad Magn. §. 19. † Hom. 6. in Lucam.

vii. 12.) I will not ask a sign, neither will I tempt the Lord; as may be gathered by comparing them with the like words of Gideon, asking a sign of the fleece, Let not thy anger be hot against me (for being thus slow of belief), πειράσω δὴ ἔτι ἅπαξ, let me try or tempt thee yet once more; i. e. let me have this farther sign for confirmation of my weak faith. (Judg. vi. 39.) This also is the constant import of this phrase in the New Testament. So Acts xv. 10. Now therefore, (after God hath given so full a discovery of his receiving the uncircumcised gentiles, upon their faith, into his grace and favour, as the effusion of the Holy Ghost upon them, ver. 8.) why tempt you God, (by distrusting this testimony of his favour to them, and desiring still) to put this yoke (of circumcision) on their necks? (1 Cor. x. 9.) Neither tempt ye Christ the Lord, (by distrusting his readiness to support you under, and to give a happy issue from, your temptations, ver. 13.) as some of them (i. e. the Jews) tempted him, by saying, God had brought them out of Egypt to die in the wilderness, because they wanted bread and water, (Numb. xxi. 5.) and (therefore) were destroyed of serpents, (ver. 6.) Thus to tempt the Spirit of the Lord, (Acts v. 9.) is to question or distrust his wisdom, to discover what Ananias and Sapphira had concealed.

[5] Ver. 8. Πάλιν παραλαμβάνει αὐτὸν ὁ διάβολος. Again the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and shews him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them.] Mr. Clerc, in his note on the first verse, saith, "What is here related may more safely be conceived to have happened to Christ in a vision or dream, than really; it looks, methinks, very odd (saith he) that an evil spirit should be permitted to have such a power over our most holy Saviour, as to carry him through the air; and then this prospect of the kingdoms of the whole world could no more be shewed from a mountain than from a plain; for what can be seen from a mountain besides woods, fields, rivers, villages, and towns, which are not used in any language to signify the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them? This glory consisting rather in their splendid attire, guards and attendants, and their costly edifices." But this is a vain dream, and a vision of his own brain, and that which robs us of all the practical improvement of our Lord's temptation; for why should Christ be led into the wilderness to have this dream, or vision? Did he fast only in a vision forty days and forty nights? That sure was a long dream or vision. Or, why is it said that he afterward was hungry? Why is it said, the devil said to him, the devil set him upon a pinnacle, and upon a high mountain? And Luke iv. 13. that when the devil had ended all his temptations, he departed from him for a season? Must not these words unavoidably import, that either the devil did really thus tempt him, or else did frame this vision in his brain? And looks it not far more odd to give the devil power over the fancy of our Lord to raise such imaginations in him and suggest such dreams to him, than barely to give him that power over our Lord's body, which neither did nor could do him any hurt? Secondly, As God caused Moses to see the whole land of promise from the top of Nebo, either by strengthening his eyes to see it thence, or else by representing it to him, as it were in a large plan or map, in all the valleys round about him, so might the devil in the valleys round about that high mountain upon which Christ stood, make a large draught of the stately edifices, the guards and attendants of kings, appearing in their splendour, visible to the eyes of Christ, which appearance could not be so well made unto him, or advantageously seen, had he been in a plain.

[6] Ver. 10. Κύριον τὸν Θεόν σου προσκυνήσεις, καὶ αὐτῷ μόνῳ λατρεύσεις. Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.] From these words, compared with other like scriptures, it appears that Christ is not a creature; because the worship and service due to God alone cannot be duly given to a creature, that being to own him equal in dignity with God: and the sin of idolatry chiefly consisting in giving that worship to a creature which is due only to the God of heaven: and therefore religious adoration and service being here said to be due to God alone, cannot be given duly, or without idolatry, to Christ, provided that he be only a creature. Seeing then God doth require, That all men should worship the Son, even as they worship the Father; (John v. 23.) and when he brought the first-born into the world, said, Let all the angels of God worship him: (Heb. i. 6.) and seeing that this is the character of Christians, that they serve the Lord Christ, (Colos. iii. 24.) it is certain that he cannot be a creature only, but must be truly God.

To this the Socinians answer, that God alone is to be worshipped as the first and supreme cause of all things, and the chief cause of our salvation, but yet religious worship and service may be paid to Christ as the immediate cause of that salvation, which God intended by him to procure, and bring to pass for us. But as there are no footsteps of this distinction in the Holy Scriptures, so there are many things contained in it which seem to contradict it. And it is plain the devil here doth not require to be thus worshipped as the first and supreme cause of all things, for he frankly owns that all the power he had over the kingdoms of the earth was given to him, and yet our Lord rejecteth his temptation, not by saying, as the Socinians do, that he was an impudent liar, no such power being given to him, but by opposing to him this command, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. Again, all the angels are ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation; (Heb. i. 14.) and the papists, who worship them with religious adoration, do it, doubtless, as they conceive it is to the glory of that God whose ministers they are; and, notwithstanding, must we not condemn that worship in them? Moses and Aaron were intermediate causes of the preservation and happiness of the Jews, whom God by them brought out of Egypt; they by their supplications and intercessions preserved them many times from present death; and might they therefore pay religious worship to them, provided it was directed to the glory of God whose ministers they were? Might they do this to Joshua, who carried salvation in his very name? The apostles are styled Συνεργοὶ Θεοῦ, workers together with God for our salvation, 1 Cor. iii. 9. their doctrine is called the savour of life unto life, 2 Cor. ii. 16. and they are said to save those that hear them, 1 Tim. iv. 16. Must we therefore pay religious adoration to them as the papists do? Vain therefore is this subterfuge, by which the Socinians endeavour to justify their religious adoration of that Jesus, whom they maintain to be a creature only, and whose Divinity they deny!

[7] Ver. 14. Ἵνα πληρωθῇ τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ Ἡσαΐου τοῦ προφήτου, &c. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias, the prophet, saying, The land of Zabulon and Nephthalim, &c.] I see here no reason for saying with some learned men, that this whole passage of Isaiah is by the evangelist applied to Christ's preaching in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim, only by way of accommodation, and not in any mystical sense intended by the Holy Ghost; for it is very easy to discern, that upon occasion of our Lord's leaving Nazareth, a town in the lower Galilee, in the tribe of Zabulon, and going to Capernaum in the higher Galilee, in the tribe of Nephthalim, which was called Galilee of the gentiles, as being partly inhabited, saith Strabo,* by Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians, he only takes the names of these places from Isa. ix. 1. having no farther consideration of the place, than to shew they are the people of whom the prophet said, The people that sat in darkness had seen a great light; let this now be understood in the prophetic style, representing things surely to be accomplished in their season, as done already, of which we have an instance, ver. 6. in these words, for unto us a child is born, to us a son is given; and then the prediction will run thus; The people sitting in darkness shall see great light, and to those who sit in the region and shadow of death shall the light arise; as we know it did, it being in Chorazin and Bethsaida, situated in lower Galilee, that Christ did his mighty works mentioned Matt. xi. 21. and it being Capernaum that was exalted up to heaven by his dwelling there, and preaching in their synagogues, (ver. 23.)

[8] Ver. 18. Εἶδε δύο ἀδελφοὺς, Σίμωνα, καὶ Ἀνδρέαν, &c. He saw two brethren, Simon, surnamed Peter, and Andrew his brother, casting their nets into the sea. Ver. 21. Καὶ προβὰς ἐκεῖθεν, εἶδεν ἄλλους δύο ἀδελφοὺς, Ἰάκωβον, &c. Going thence he saw two other brethren, James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, with Zebedee their father, mending their nets; and he called them.] So also we read, Mark i. from ver. 16. to 21. The history of Simon and Andrew's coming, mentioned John i. 41—43. is plainly different from that of St. Matthew and St. Mark, and so cannot be said to contradict what is here said. For (1.) here Christ sees them, and calls them both together; there they hear Christ, and follow him home, and Andrew after finding Peter leads him to Christ, from ver. 37. to 42. (2.) Here it is noted, that Simon was already surnamed Peter; there it is said, Thou shalt be called Peter: (ver. 43.) there they abide with Christ only one night, (ver. 40.) and that uncalled; here they are called and follow him as his apostles, being always with him. (John xv. 27.) As for the history, Luke v. from ver. 1. to 11. I conceive it to be the same with this in St. Matthew and St. Mark, because it happened at the same place, at the lake of Gennesareth, (Luke v. 1.) i. e. at the sea of Galilee; (Matt. iv. 18.) the same persons being present, and following him, having left all to do it. (Ver. 10, 11. Matt. iv. 20. 22.) But then I place the story thus; He saw these fishermen, two of them, viz. Simon and Andrew, washing their nets, (Luke v. 2.) i. e. casting them into the sea to wash them, (Matt. iv. 18.) and the other two mending their nets, where they were broken, (ver. 21.) and then he spake to them both to follow him. And presently the multitude resorting to him, to hear the word of God, (Luke v. 1.) he enters into the ship of Simon; and when Simon, at his request, thrust it a little from the land, he sat down and taught them; then speaks he to Peter, to let down his net into the sea for that draught which filled both the ships of Simon, and of the sons of Zebedee, and struck them all with great amazement, insomuch that Peter was afraid to follow him, or to be with him; but Christ bidding him not to fear, they drew their ships to land, and leaving both ships and fishes with Zebedee, and others that were with them, (Mark i. 20.) forsaking them all they follow him. (Luke v. 11.) It is no objection against what is said, that in St. Luke we find no mention of St. Andrew, it being certain from St. Matthew and St. Mark, that Andrew was then with Peter, though Simon only be named by St. Luke; because Christ spake only to him. Thus it is easy to remove those manifold disagreements which some mention betwixt the history of this matter in St. Luke and in St. Matthew and St. Mark. For, according to the series of the story thus placed, St. Luke, being to supply what was not told by St. Matthew and St. Mark, begins where they ended, and St. Mark having only said in the general that Christ came thither preaching the gospel of the kingdom, St. Luke shews how he went on with the work; and this puts an end to Mr. Whiston's four first differences. His fifth is grounded on an evident mistake; for in St. Luke he doth not assure them, that from henceforth they should catch men, but said this only to Simon, astonished at the miracle, and desiring Christ to depart from him, repeating to him in particular, what he had said more generally to all, that he might remove his fears. The last is indeed no difference, it being the same thing to leave all that were then with them, and all they had there, and follow him, as St. Luke says they did; and to leave nets, ship, father, and hired servants, to follow him, as in St. Matthew and St. Mark they did.

Ver. 24. Καὶ δαιμονιζομένους, and men possessed with the devil.] Dr. Lightfoot gives two reasons why Judea then especially abounded with such persons. (1.) Because they were then advanced to the very height of impiety; the truth of which assertion Josephus fully proves. See the note on Rom. ii. 1. (2.) Because they were then strongly addicted to magic, and so, as it were, invited evil spirits to be familiar with them: and it seems strange to find men, at this distance of time, questioning the truth of that which neither pharisees nor sadducees then doubted of, or ever did object against the pretensions of Christ or his apostles, to cast them out: and both Josephus and the Acts of the Apostles, (xix. 13, 14.) speak so positively of Jewish exorcists. (See the preface to the Epistles, §. xiii.)

CHAP. V.

1. AND [1] seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain: and when he was set (down, as the Jewish doctors did when they taught, see Luke iv. 16. 20.) his disciples came unto him:

2. And he opened his mouth, and taught them, saying,

3. Blessed are [2] the poor in spirit (i. e. the humble and lowly-minded): for theirs is the kingdom of heaven (they are fitted to enter into it here, and to enjoy it hereafter).

4. Blessed are [3] they that mourn (for their sins, with that godly sorrow, which works repentance not to be repented of, 2 Cor. vii. 10.) for they shall be comforted (with the assurance of the pardon of their sins, and with the hope of future happiness).

* Lib. xvi. p. 523.

5. Blessed are the [4] meek (i.e. the men of a sweet, quiet, affable, and courteous disposition): for they shall inherit the earth (enjoying what is needful for them with the greatest quiet and tranquillity, and with most comfort, satisfaction, and contentedness of mind).

6. Blessed are they who do [5] hunger and thirst after righteousness (i. e. are as concerned to be righteous before God, walking in all the commandments of the Lord blameless, as is the hungry person to have meat, or the thirsty to have drink): for they shall be filled (i. e. be satisfied with the enjoyment of it here, and the completion and reward of it hereafter).

7. Blessed are [6] the merciful (who out of pity to others under all their infirmities, wants, miseries, indispositions of soul or body, are ready not only to forgive, and bear with their infirmities, but to their power to relieve, instruct, support, comfort, and reclaim them from their evil ways): for they shall obtain mercy (at the great day of their accounts).

8. Blessed are [7] the pure in heart (they whose hearts are cleansed from evil thoughts, evil concupiscences, and evil passions): for they shall see (and enjoy) God (here and hereafter).

9. Blessed are [8] the peacemakers (who being themselves of a peaceable temper, endeavour to promote peace among others): for they shall be called (i.e. shall be, see note on i. 23. and shall be owned as) the children of God (and as such rewarded).

10. Blessed are they which are [9] persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

11. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake.

12. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven, (who do thus patiently suffer for my name's sake upon earth; your case being like that of the holy prophets, who are now in Abraham's bosom, and sat down with him in the kingdom of heaven, Luke xiii. 28.) for so persecuted they (of this nation) the prophets which were before you.

13. Ye are (designed by me to be, as) [10] the salt of the earth (to preserve men's manners from corruption, and give a good savour to their actions): but if the salt hath lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? (if you in example and conversation should become unsavoury, there would be no recovering of you; and so it would be with you, as) it is (with unsavoury salt, which is) thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men (and so you must expect to be cast out by me into outer darkness).

14. Ye [11] are (appointed to be) the light of the world, (and as) a city that is set on a hill cannot be hid (so neither in this eminent station in which you are placed, can the light of your doctrine or manners be concealed).

15. Neither (should you endeavour to conceal them, for) do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel? (surely no:) but on a candlestick, and (then) it giveth light to all that are in the house.

16. (Accordingly) [12] let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and (on the account of them may have cause to) glorify your Father which is in heaven.

17. (And though I preach a more spiritual doctrine, than is contained in the letter even of the moral law, yet) [13] think not that I am come to destroy (i. e. to dissolve or loose you from the obligation of) the law or the prophets: (for) I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil (them, to give you the full sense and the spiritual import of the moral law, and also to fulfil the types and predictions of the law and the prophets).

18. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass (away), one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law (or the prophets) till all be fulfilled (which was both typified in the law, and foretold by the prophets).

19. Whosoever therefore [14] shall break one of these least (Gr. the least of these) commandments, and shall teach men so (to do), he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven (i. e. he shall not be admitted as a true member of my kingdom): but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great (i. e. he shall be an eminent person) in the kingdom of heaven.

20. (And let it not be thought a sufficient excuse that your scribes and pharisees thus teach); For [15] I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, (who by their traditions exempt themselves and others, in many cases, from the observation of this law, Mark vii. 8, 9.) ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.

21. [16] Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time (Gr. to them of old), Thou shalt not kill; (Exod. xx. 13.) and, whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment (Gen. ix. 6. Numb. xxxv. 31. and are taught by your scribes, that by this precept you are not obnoxious to guilt for any thing but murder):

22. But I say unto you, [17] That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment (or anger of God): and whosoever shall say unto his brother, Raca (i. e. thou art an empty worthless fellow, fit to be whipped, or punished as an idle drone), shall be in danger of the council (i. e. of being punished by them, for vilifying and reviling one of the seed of Abraham): but whosoever (from the like rancour of spirit against his brother) shall say (to him), Thou fool (i. e. shall censure him as a profane person, or a hell-hound), shall be in danger of hell-fire (the portion he assigneth to his brother).

23. [18] Therefore, if thou bring thy gift to the altar (to make atonement for thy sin), and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee (i. e. hath received from thee any injury of this or any other kind);.

24. Leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; (and) first (use thy endeavour to) be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift (it being not acceptable for the atonement of thy sins committed against God, till thou hast thus endeavoured to make satisfaction for thy faults committed against thy brother.

25. And if there be any person to whom thou art indebted and who upon that account may implead thee before the judge), [19] agree with thine adversary quickly, whilst thou art in the way (to the judge) with him, lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer (appointed for that purpose), and (so) thou be cast into prison.

26. Verily I say unto thee (if thou permit things to go so far), Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the utmost farthing (and so will it also be if thou neglectest to be reconciled to God, and so he cast thee into the infernal prison).

27. [20] Ye have heard that it was said by (Gr. to) them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery: (Exod. xx. 14.)

28. But (know this is not all which is forbidden by that precept, for) I say unto you, Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.

29. And (if then) thy right eye offend thee (by thus lusting), pluck it out, and cast it from thee (i. e. suppress all such impure lustings): for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell (i. e. it is better for thee to want these delights at present, than by enjoying them to plunge both soul and body into hell).

30. And if thy right hand offend thee (by ministering to this or any other sin), cut it off, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell.

31. [21] It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement: (and this being permitted for the hardness of your hearts, you think may lawfully be done for any cause, Matt. xix. 3.)

32. But I say unto you, That (according to the primitive institution of marriage) whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery (by giving her this occasion to go and be married to another): and whosoever shall marry her that is (thus) divorced committeth adultery (with her).

33. Again, [22] ye have heard that it hath been said by (Gr. to) them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths (Exod. xx. 7. Lev. xix. 12. and this you think is all that is criminal in oaths, viz. to swear falsely by the name of the great Jehovah):

34. But I say unto you, Swear not at all (in your common conversation): [23] neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: (and so by swearing by it, thou swearest by him who sits upon it, Matt. xxiii. 22.)

35. Neither by the earth; for it is his footstool (and he that sweareth by it, sweareth also by him whose footstool it is): neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King (and he that sweareth by it, sweareth also by him that dwelleth in it).

36. Neither shalt thou swear [24] by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black (for the preservation of that life, of which the head is the fountain, is not in thy power, but depends on him by whom we live; and therefore to swear by it, is in effect to swear by him who hath the power of life and death in his hands).

37. But let your communication be, [25] Yea, yea; nay, nay (an ordinary, or at the most a redoubled affirmation, or negation): for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil (i. e. from some evil principle, as want of reverence of the great name of God, or from that evil one who is the enemy to God, and to his honour).

38. [26] Ye have heard that it hath been said, (that he who maimeth any body, shall restore) An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth (Exod. xxviii. 24. if the maimed person shall require the judge to execute this punishment on the offender, and will not admit a pecuniary compensation):

39. But I say unto you, That you resist not evil (i. e. oppose not violence to violence): but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also (i. e. bear rather that disgrace redoubled patiently, than give him stroke for stroke).

40. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also (i. e. suffer one small and reparable wrong after another, rather than contend by law with him).

41. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain (rather than maintain thy liberty by forcibly opposing his compulsion.

42. And if men do not use force, but only ask, or desire to borrow of thee), [27] give to him that asketh of thee (what thou hast to spare); and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.

43. [28] Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and (this by the scribes and pharisees is interpreted as a permission to) hate thine enemy:

44. [29] But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you (i. e. be kindly affected towards your enemies, and ready to do good to them for evil, and the good you cannot do yourselves, pray that God would do for them);

45. That (so) you may (appear to) be the children of your Father which is in heaven (by your likeness to him): for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

46. For if you (restrain your) love (to) them (only) which love you, what reward have you? (i. e. what reason to expect any reward from God for so doing? for) do not even the publicans (whom you look upon as men deserted by God, do) the same?

47. And if ye salute (or kindly treat) your brethren only, what do you more than others? do not even the publicans so (also)?

48. Be ye therefore perfect (in your charity and mercy to others), even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect (and then your eminent good works will eminently be rewarded by him).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. V.

[1] Ver. 1. ΤΟΥΣ δὲ τοὺς ὄχλους ἀνέβη εἰς τὸ ὄρος, καὶ καθίσαντος αὐτοῦ, &c. And seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain; and sitting down, his disciples came to him.] Here note, (1.) That Christ seeing the multitude, taught them; for though his disciples may be especially concerned in some few verses of this fifth chapter, yet it is certain from these words in the close of this sermon, the multitudes were astonished at his doctrine, for he taught them as one that had authority, that the multitude not only heard, but were taught the things contained in this sermon, according to those words of Chrysostom, μὴ τοῖς μαθηταῖς μόνον αὐτὸν νόμιζε διαλέγεσθαι, ἀλλὰ καὶ δι' ἐκείνων ἅπασιν.

Moreover it deserveth to be noted, that the whole multitude of them who attended on his doctrine, and thought well of him, are called his disciples, and not the twelve apostles only; so doth St. Luke inform us, by saying, he called to him his disciples, and out of them he chose the twelve, Luke vi. 13. and ver. 17. that the whole multitude of his disciples were then with him. So John vi. 66. From that time many of his disciples went back, and followed no more after him; and ver. 67. he said to the twelve, Will ye also go away? What therefore was here spoken to his disciples, might also be spoken to the multitude. (2.) This sermon was spoken upon the mount, which he made choice of, saith Dr. Hammond, that as the law had been delivered from Mount Sinai, so might the preaching of the gospel begin from a mountain: say others, that he might be the better heard by his auditors, instructing us by his example so to form this service, as may be most conducing to the advantage of the hearers.

The question here raised by interpreters, whether this sermon be the same with that which we find mentioned Luke vi. or only like a sermon spoken at another time and place, is of some concern for the right understanding of the words; for if the sermon be the same in both, and it were spoken only once by Christ, though it be set down twice by the evangelists, the words of one evangelist must be interpreted in a sense agreeable to the other, or else they cannot both be true. Whereas, if our Lord spake the words recorded by St. Luke at any other time and place, than the discourse related by St. Matthew was delivered at, we may give different interpretations to their words; and that this was so seems highly probable,

First, Because St. Luke omits so many things recorded by St. Matthew as parts of this discourse, viz. all the fifth chapter from ver. 13. to 39. the whole sixth chapter, and chap. vii. from ver. 6. to 16. that is, he omits the greatest part of this sermon; and therefore it is probable he did not intend to set down the same sermon: since otherwise it must be granted, that he had performed what he intended very imperfectly; and also added many woes, of which St. Matthew makes no mention.

Secondly, As for the time, St. Matthew doth sufficiently inform us that his sermon was delivered before the healing of the leper, for as Christ came down from the mount, the leper came to him, viii. 2 whereas St. Luke, though he promiseth to discourse in order of what Christ did, gives us the story of the leper, v. 12. and the history of Christ's sermon, vi. 17. Again, St. Luke reckons Matthew amongst those whom Christ had chosen to be of the twelve, and ver. 17. he adds, that Christ went down with them and preached the following sermon, whereas the sermon mentioned by St. Matthew was preached long before his calling to be one of Christ's disciples; for after Christ was come down from the mount, had healed the leper, and the centurion's servant, and had done many other things; he saw a man sitting at the receipt of custom, named Matthew, and said unto him, Follow me, ix. 9. Whence it appears, that he was called long after the preaching of this sermon on the mount, and yet before the preaching of the sermon mentioned by St. Luke. Lastly, St. Matthew's sermon was preached on the mount by our Lord, calling his disciples up to him; whereas St. Luke informs us, ver. 17. that our Lord came down with his disciples from a mount, and stood in the plain, and from thence preached what he recorded: wherefore the difference of these sermons being so great, both as to matter and to circumstance of time and place, it seems most reasonable to conceive that they were severally spoken, and therefore may admit of divers senses. Yet seeing soon after both these sermons we find him entering into Capernaum, and healing the centurion's servant, (Matt. viii. 5. Luke vii. 1.) it may be probably conjectured, that he spake the sermon in St. Matthew, whilst he was sitting on the mount, to his disciples, and that in St. Luke, when he afterward came down into the plain with them, (Luke vi. 17.) in the audience of all the people. (Luke vii. 1.)

[2] Ver. 3. Μακάριοι οἱ πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι· Blessed are the poor in spirit.] Here note,

First, That by the poor in spirit we are not to understand, as many Romish commentators do, such persons as, having riches and plentiful possessions, do voluntarily quit them, and choose a state of poverty as most conducing to the free exercise of religion, as did some Eremites and monks of old, and as the mendicants or begging friars of that church pretend now to do; for it is assuredly the duty of all men, who would obtain this bliss, to be poor in spirit; whereas it cannot be the duty of all Christians to turn monks and friars mendicant to this end, for then all other Roman catholics must be excluded from the kingdom of heaven. Nor,

Secondly, Doth our Lord here pronounce this blessing on the poor properly so called, that is, on such as have no riches and possessions in this world, as being the most likely persons to embrace that gospel which calls for the forsaking all that they have, which they who have but little will be most easily persuaded to do, and so will be most ready to enter into the kingdom of God. (1.) Because our Lord expressly limits this beatitude, not to the poor in purse, or in externals, but to the poor in spirit. (2.) Because Christ actually pronounces that the poor he speaks of are blessed, and that theirs is the kingdom of heaven; which is not true of all, or of the most part, of those who, as to temporals, are poor; for by experience we find they are often discontented with their state, are apt to steal, lie, flatter, and use sordid arts to get a penny, and have but little sense of piety, and but little knowledge of, and less concernment for, religion. (3.) This interpretation seems to exclude the rich, who do not actually quit their temporal enjoyments, from any interest in the kingdom of heaven; whereas St. Paul only requires them to be rich in good works, that they may lay hold of eternal life. (1 Tim. vi. 18, 19.) And therefore,

Thirdly, The most received and best interpretation of this phrase is this—that by the poor in spirit, our Saviour understands the man of a true, humble, lowly spirit; this being the usual expression by which the Scriptures and the Jewish writers still represent the humble man, that he is shephal ruach, i. e. poor, low, or contrite in his spirit. So Prov. xvi. 19. Better is it to be shephal ruach, of an humble spirit with the meek, than to divide the spoil with the proud; and xxix. 23. The pride of man shall humble him, but shephal ruach, he that is of an humble spirit obtaineth glory. So Isa. lxvi. 2. To whom will I look but to the poor in spirit? which lvii. 15. is shephal ruach, to the man of an humble spirit. Accordingly, in their Pirke Avoth,* they have these instructions, Be thou shephal ruach, humble in spirit towards all men; he that is shephal ruach is worthy of honour, and the Holy Ghost will rest upon him. And great are the humble in spirit in the sight of God.† And they who are thus poor in spirit are blessed, because their humility rendering them teachable, submissive, contented, and obedient, prepares them to enter into Christ's kingdom, and makes them living members of his body; and seeing they who are thus holy shall be also happy, they must be also meet to enter into the kingdom of glory hereafter.

[3] Ver. 4. Μακάριοι οἱ πενθοῦντες, Blessed are they that mourn.] Here note,

* Chap. iv. §. 4. 10. v. 19. † Buxt. Floril. p. 17.

First, That by the mourners here, I do not think it reasonable to understand men whose condition in this world is sad and lamentable, as being destitute of all those outward things which render this life comfortable, and perhaps also under great afflictions, which some conceive to be the import of these words, because a like beatitude in St. Luke runs thus, Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh. For (1.) if this mourning did only import a condition sad and lamentable as to outward circumstances, then must the laughter in St. Luke opposed to it, be only a promise of outward temporal felicity, which, as it is no gospel promise, so it is far from rendering any person truly blessed. (2.) Because either we must then pronounce all blessed who are in such a lamentable state, which is far from being true, there being many who fall into it by their own sin and folly, and many who being in it are nothing better by it, as to the inward frame and disposition of their spirit; or else we must restrain this to them, who do thus suffer for the name of Christ, and for the sake of righteousness; and then it will not be the import of the second but of the eighth beatitude. Nor,

Secondly, Do I think, as some of the fathers did, that the mourners here are those who mourn for the sins of others, for the iniquities committed by the professors of Christianity, and especially for the sins committed in the place and nation where they live; for though when men thus weep out of a fixed hatred to sin, from a true zeal for God, and a sincere affection for the souls of men, this must be highly acceptable in the sight of God, and therefore matter of just comfort to them also; yet the word mourn is general, and therefore seems not fit to be restrained unto such mourners in particular. The mourner therefore here intended is the person filled with that godly sorrow which works repentance to salvation not to be repented of, or not reversed by our return again to the like sins: (2 Cor. vii. 10.) this person must be blessed in the pardon of his sins, for blessed is he whose iniquity is forgiven, and whose sin is covered. (Rom. iv. 6—8.) He also will be comforted with the assured hope of future happiness; this true repentance being styled, repentance unto life, Acts ix. 18. repentance unto salvation, 2 Cor. vii. 10.

[4] Ver. 5. Μακάριοι οἱ πραεῖς. Blessed are the meek.] i. e. The men of such a happy frame of spirit as renders them averse from wrath, even when they are provoked to it by the injuries they have received from others, and from retaliation, or recompensing evil for evil; but, on the contrary, are inclined rather to remit something of their right, and overcome evil with good; and by the sweetness, friendliness, and affability of their conversation, to reconcile and win their brother to a good-liking and kind affection to them. The blessing promised to these meek persons is this, that they shall inherit the earth; which words being taken from Psal. xxxvii. 11. cannot admit of that strained exposition of some of the ancients, who by the earth understand heaven, as being eminently the land of the living; for it is evident to a demonstration, that David did understand this of the present earth, or of the land of Canaan; for the tenor of this whole thirty-seventh Psalm is designed to shew, that wicked men shall by God's judgments suddenly perish, whilst righteous men live easily and quietly in the land of Canaan. So ver. 9. Evil-doers shall be cut off, but they that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth; for yet a little while and the wicked shall not be, but the meek shall inherit the earth. They that are blessed of him shall inherit the earth, and they that are cursed of him shall be rooted out. So ver. 34. Wait on the Lord, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee, τοῦ κληρονομῆσαι τὴν γῆν, to inherit the earth: when the wicked are destroyed, thou shalt see it. It is therefore well observed by Chrysostom upon the place, that because the Jews had been oft taught this lesson in the Old Testament, our Saviour addresses himself to them in the language they had been accustomed to: this Son of David repeateth and confirmeth to them the promise made by David. And this I judge to be the most natural and truest exposition of these words.

But then it must be noted, (1.) that our Saviour doth not here promise to advance the meek unto an affluence, or great abundance of things temporal, to make him great in power, or rich and wealthy in the world. For a man's life, i. e. the true comfort and satisfaction of it, consists not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth; (Luke xii. 15.) and so we have no reason to expect those things which are not needful to the comfort and satisfaction of our lives. Experience shews that this is not the ordinary portion of the meek, and therefore doth sufficiently instruct us, that this is not the blessing promised by that God, who cannot lie or fail of the performance of his promise; and therefore positively this phrase seems rather to import, that meekness is the best way to the most sure enjoyment of these things, as far as they are needful and convenient; and (2.) to enjoy them with the greatest quiet and tranquillity, without that strife, debate, anxiety, and trouble, which embitter the enjoyment of these things, to others; and (3.) with the truest comfort, satisfaction, and contentedness of mind.

[5] Ver. 6. Μακάριοι οἱ πεινῶντες καὶ διψῶντες τὴν δικαιοσύνην, &c. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness.] The righteousness here mentioned is by some thought to be the righteousness of faith, by which we being justified, or freed from the guilt of sin, have peace with God; and this undoubtedly is a fit matter of our spiritual thirst and hunger: but yet I think this cannot be the proper import of the words; (1.) because the word δικαιοσύνη, righteousness, bears no such sense in the gospel; but only in the Epistles of St. Paul; (2.) because the Jews, to whom Christ speaks, had no idea of this righteousness, no apprehension that their Messiah was to die, and much less that they should be justified by his death; and therefore had Christ spoken of this righteousness, none of them could have understood his meaning, as we may learn from his discourse on this subject, John vi. for the Jews could not understand it; wherefore the righteousness here intended is that inherent righteousness, which consists in a sincere endeavour to practise all those duties which God requires at our hands, and to eschew that evil which he hath forbidden; in which sense Zacharias and Elisabeth are said to be both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments of the Lord blameless; (Luke i. 6.) and it is represented as our duty, to serve God in righteousness and holiness before him all the days of our life; (ver. 74, 75.) and here it is said, that except our righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, we can in no case enter into the kingdom of God, (ver. 20.) To hunger and thirst after this righteousness, is to be as sensible of the want of it, as fervently desirous to have it, as industrious to obtain it, as restless and incessant till we do enjoy it; as men usually are when they are pinched with hunger and thirst. And they, who stand thus affected to it, shall be satisfied with it; i. e. they shall have all the means and aids required to make them thus righteous here, and shall have the reward of righteousness hereafter, and so shall be blessed: for seeing it is God himself, who by his word and spirit raises in them this disposition towards righteousness; since he inviteth every hungry soul to eat of this spiritual food, and saith to every thirsty soul, Come drink of these waters of life; seeing this righteousness renders them so acceptable and well-pleasing in his sight; and, lastly, seeing he hath promised them this satisfaction, they all on these accounts may rest assured, that they shall obtain this food of the soul. (See note on John vi. 27.)

[6] Ver. 7. Μακάριοι οἱ ἐλεήμονες, Blessed are the merciful.] i. e. They who from an affecting sense of a sympathy with others, and a charitable affection and good-will towards them, are ready to relieve them, as they are able, under all their wants; to pity them in their infirmities; to comfort and support them under their calamities; and ready to forgive, and to shew mercy to them when they have offended; and to pray to their heavenly Father to give them those supports and consolations we are not able to afford them; and who especially have this compassion for their souls, by endeavouring to instruct the ignorant; and to reclaim the wicked from their evil ways: such merciful persons shall be blessed both in the inward comforts and satisfaction they shall find arising from those dispositions which render them so like to their heavenly Father, and also from that mercy they shall obtain from him at the great day of their accounts.

[7] Ver. 8. Μακάριοι οἱ καθαροὶ τῇ καρδίᾳ, Blessed are the pure in heart.] They whose hearts are pure from those evil thoughts and reasoning, those evil desires, lustings, and affections, those evil passions and perturbations, and from those evil intentions, devices, and machinations, which defile the soul, are blessed; for they are fitted to enjoy communion with God here, (1 John iii. 3.) and happiness with him hereafter. (Heb. xii. 14.)

[8] Ver. 9. Μακάριοι οἱ εἰρηνοποιοὶ, Blessed are the peacemakers.] i. e. (1.) The men of a peaceable mind; for as he that is inclined to lying is said to make a lie, (Rev. xxii. 15.) and he that is inclined to sin, ποιεῖν ἁμαρτίαν, to do, make sin, (1 John iii. 8.) so he that is disposed to follow after the things which make for peace, may be styled a peacemaker: (2.) they who endeavour in their stations, and as occasions do present themselves, to preserve peace, love, and friendship, and to prevent contentions, quarrellings, and discords, among Christian brethren: and (3.) they who labour to promote the peace and quiet of the public, both in church and state, are blessed, because they shall be called; i. e. they are and shall be owned by God, as sons, by reason of their likeness to the God of peace, (1 Cor. xiv. 33. 2 Cor. xiii. 11. Phil. iv. 9. 2 Thess. iii. 16. see note on i. 23.) and being sons shall be heirs of God, joint heirs with Christ, (Rom. viii. 17.) such as shall reign with him in glory; they shall be sons of the resurrection, (Luke xx. 36.) and shall receive υἱοθεσίαν the blessing consequent on this sonship, or adoption, to wit, the redemption of their bodies from corruption. (Rom. viii. 23.)

[9] Ver. 10. Μακάριοι οἱ δεδιωγμένοι ἕνεκεν δικαιοσύνης, Blessed are they which are persecuted for the sake of righteousness.] Or for Christ's sake, &c. i. e. (1.) for persevering patiently and steadfastly in the profession of the Christian faith: or (2.) for the performance of that duty which they owe to God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, and to our Christian brother for their sakes: or (3.) who are persecuted; because they do not own that as an article of faith, or any part of the Christian duty, which God hath not declared to be so: for seeing this cannot be done without making profession of a lie, or saying we believe what we can see no reason to believe, to suffer for this cause is evidently to suffer because we will not play the hypocrite, or give the lie to our own consciences; and therefore this in St. Peter's language is to suffer for conscience towards God, and to suffer wrongfully or unjustly. Yea, seeing this cannot be done, but we must own another teacher, lawgiver, and author of our faith, besides the Lord Christ, our sufferings for refusing to do this are truly sufferings for the sake of Christ; and such as make us happy sufferers, since Christ hath promised them the blessings of this heavenly kingdom, and hath assured them that great is their reward in heaven: and therefore, as their state on earth under these persecutions doth render them conformed to their head, and like to the holy prophets and apostles; so shall they hereafter be like to them in glory. (Rom. viii. 17. 2 Tim. ii. 11.)

[10] Ver. 13. Ὑμεῖς ἐστε τὸ ἅλας τῆς γῆς, Ye are the salt of the earth.] "Sal sapit omnia," Salt is given to make things savoury, according to that question of Job, (vi. 6.) Can that which is unsavoury be eaten without salt? and also to save them from putrefaction: (see note on Mark ix. 49.) so that the import of this metaphor is this; Ye are appointed by that pure and holy doctrine, which you are to preach, and by the savour of your good conversation, to purge the world from that corruption in which it lies, and represent them to God as a sacrifice of a sweet-smelling savour, holy and acceptable to God; but if you yourselves should lose the savour of your good conversation, and become putrefied members in my body, you would be wholly useless to these good ends; and therefore can expect nothing but to be rejected by me, and cast off, as unsavoury salt is cast unto the dunghill.

[11] Ver. 14. Ὑμεῖς ἐστε τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου, Ye are the light of the world.] The effect of light is to make things manifest, (Eph. v. 13.) and to direct us in the way in which we are to walk. So that the import of this metaphor seems to be this;—I have appointed you to manifest to the world my doctrine, which will discover to them what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, and so direct their feet into the way that leadeth to eternal life, and will enable them to walk as children of the light; and if you do not hide this light from them, but cause it to shine forth both in your doctrine and Christian conversation, the light of it is so clear and radiant, that it cannot be hid from them.

[12] Ver. 16. Οὕτω λαμψάτω τὸ φῶς ὑμῶν, &c. So (therefore) let (this) your light shine before men, that they may (from your conversation, as well as from your doctrine) see your good works, and (then they will see cause to) glorify your Father which is in heaven.] Hence note,

First, That though Christ's twelve apostles are chiefly concerned in these metaphors, yet are they in some measure applicable to all Christians; for it is the duty of all Christians to shine as lights in the world. (Phil. ii. 15.) And Christ having said, He that forsaketh not all he hath, cannot be my disciple; presently subjoins, Salt is good, but if the salt hath lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? (Luke xiv. 33, 34.) Note,

Secondly, That the good works here mentioned, must be such as by the light of nature seem good and honourable in the sight of men; because they must give occasion even to heathens to think well of Christianity: these works may therefore be performed to be seen of men, provided we desire this not for ostentation, but for God's glory, and their edification; that they discerning the holiness, justice, and goodness, of his precepts, and the excellent effects they have on those who embrace them, may thereby be convinced that they are derived from a God, just, holy, and full of kindness and good-will towards men.

[13] Ver. 17. Μὴ νομίσητε ὅτι ἦλθον καταλῦσαι τὸν νόμον, ἢ τοὺς προφήτας· Think not that I am come to destroy (Gr. dissolve) the law or the prophets.] Our Lord hath taught us that all the law and the prophets are comprehended in these two precepts, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, &c. and thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; (Matt. xxii. 40.) St. Paul, that he who loves his neighbour as himself, νόμον πεπλήρωκε, hath fulfilled the law; (Rom. xiii. 8.) and that the whole law, πληροῦται, is fulfilled, (Gal. v. 14.) or is perfected, (James ii. 8.) in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: it is not therefore to be thought that Christ came to dissolve the moral law, or any rules of morality delivered by the prophets, but he came rather that the righteousness of the law, πληρωθῇ, might be fulfilled by us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. (Rom. viii. 4.) And that this is the law chiefly intended here, may be concluded, (1.) because Christ only undertakes the true interpretation of the precepts which respect the moral law; in these alone can he be rationally conceived to require our righteousness should exceed that of the scribes and pharisees, not in the literal observance of the ritual precepts, in which they were exactly scrupulous, whilst they neglected judgment, mercy, and the love of God. And of them only could he say, that he who brake the least of them, and taught men so to do, should be the least in his kingdom: (ver. 19, 20.) since otherwise the apostle Paul must have been chief in that number. (2.) As for the rituals of the law and prophets, our Lord declares, the law and the prophets were till John, (Luke xvi. 16.) and says, the time was coming, when neither in Samaria nor in Jerusalem should they worship the Father, but should worship him every where in a more spiritual manner. (John iv. 22—24.) Yea, he foretells the dissolution of that temple and Jewish polity, on which their ritual and judicial precepts did depend, (ch. xxiv.) St. Paul informs us, that the law was only given till the promised seed should come, (Gal. iii. 19.) and that he being come, we were no longer under the pedagogy of the law; that Christians were dead to the law through the body of Christ; (Rom. vii. 4.) that they were loosed from the law, that being dead under which they were held; (ver. 6.) that it was evacuated; (2 Cor. iii. 11.) that they were redeemed from it by Christ, (Gal. iv. 5.) and that they ought no more to be subject to that yoke of bondage, or return to those beggarly elements; (ver. 9. and v. 1.) that Christ had broken down this partition-wall, and evacuated that law of commandments; (Eph. ii. 14, 15.) that he had blotted out that handwriting of ordinances, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross; (Col. ii. 14.) that it was only to continue to the time of reformation; (Heb. ix. 10.) that the priesthood being changed, there was a necessity of a change of the law; (vii. 12.) and that there was a disannulling of the commandments going before, because of the weakness and unprofitableness of it, (ver. 18.) Which things seem inconsistent with the doctrine that Christ came not to dissolve that ceremonial law, from which he freed all Christians, and made them dead to it, by his body, evacuating his handwriting of ordinances, and taking it out of the way, by nailing it to his cross. Nor seems it here sufficient to say, This law was not abolished by Christ, but vanished by the maturity of the time appointed for the continuance of it, seeing it therefore only vanished because Christ came to evacuate it by his death and cross; and what he came to take away, he came also to dissolve. But (3.) these rites may be considered as they were typical of things future, and were a shadow of good things to come by Christ. (Col. ii. 17. Heb. x. 1.) The prophets also may be looked upon as foretelling his days, and speaking of the things he was to do and suffer, and of his future glory, and the glad tidings of the gospel; (Acts iii. 24. 1 Pet. i. 10—12.) of the conversion of the Jews at the close of the world, the fall of antichrist, the coming in of the fulness of the gentiles, and the final judgment; and in this sense, Christ came not to dissolve the law and the prophets, but to fulfil them, by exhibiting the antitype and substance, of which these rituals were the types and shadows; and fulfilling these prophecies, and taking care the truth of these things should not fail; nor should the law and the prophets cease to have their force, till these things were accomplished; and so the phrase ἕως πάντα γένηται occurs, importing the performance of what was typified by the law, and foretold by the prophets. So Luke xxi. 32. This generation shall not pass away, ἕως ἂν πάντα γένηται, till all things foretold by me be done. (Matt. xxiv. 34. Mark xiii. 30.) And (4.) many of these ritual precepts had a spiritual sense; as the circumcision of the flesh denoted the spiritual circumcision of the heart; the rest of the sabbath, a rest remaining for the people of God, &c. on which account the apostle declares, not only that the law was holy, just, and good, but that it was also spiritual. (Rom. vii. 12. 14.) And in this sense Christ came not to dissolve the law, but to fulfil, establish, and perfect it, by changing him that was a Jew outwardly, to one inwardly; and the circumcision of the flesh in the letter, to the circumcision of the heart, in the spirit; (Rom. ii. 29.) and by circumcising us, not with the circumcision made with hands, but with the circumcision of Christ, (Col. ii. 11.) that we might be the true circumcision, who serve God in the Spirit. (Phil. iii. 3.) And (5.) by one iota, or tittle of the law, I understand one precept of it, according to that saying of the Jews, It were better one letter of the law should be razed out, i. e. one precept of it should be violated, than that the name of God should be openly blasphemed. And as for those words till heaven and earth pass away, they must be understood only of the moral law, or else must bear the sense, which St. Luke gives of them, (xvi. 17.) Sooner may heaven and earth pass away, than God fail of accomplishing the things typified by the law, or foretold by the prophets. Moreover, some of these types relating not only to spiritual, but to heavenly things; the rest of the sabbath being typical of the rest remaining to the people of God; (Heb. iii. iv.) the tabernacle being a shadow of the heavenly tabernacle made without hands, and the law being the shadow of future good things; (Heb. x. 1.) and the prophets foretelling those things, which were not to be completely fulfilled till the end of the world, or the day of judgment,—our Saviour might well say, Heaven and earth shall pass away, but one jot or tittle of the law shall not pass away till all things be fulfilled; some of the things typified by the law, and foretold by the prophets, being then only to be fulfilled, when heaven and earth were to pass away.

[14] Ver. 19. Ὅστις ἐὰν οὖν λύσῃ, &c. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven.] Ἐλάχιστος κληθήσεται, he shall be called least; i. e. he shall be unworthy to be reckoned one of the members of my kingdom. So, I am the least of the apostles, is, I am unworthy to be called an apostle. (1 Cor. xv. 9.) Note also, that Christ is speaking not of the precepts of his new law, but of the precepts of the moral law, of which he had discoursed in the two preceding verses, as is apparent from the illative particle οὖν, therefore. Moreover, it seems harsh, either to refer this to the beatitudes, which ended ver. 12. or to the following precepts, of which Christ had yet spoken nothing. And, lastly, it is probable that Christ may here reflect on those scribes and pharisees, who by their traditions exempted themselves, and taught others not to observe some of those moral precepts, and might hint, that how highly soever they were valued by themselves, or others, for their skill in the law, such teachers of it should be of no account in his kingdom.

[15] Ver. 20. Λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν· For I say unto you, Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees.] i. e. Except (1.) you observe all the precepts of the moral law, not making any of them void by your traditions, not leaving undone the more weighty matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith, as they do, (Matt. xxiii. 23.) not thinking to atone for the neglect of some of them by your observance of the rest: see notes on James ii. 10. (2.) Unless you do observe this law, not only according to the outward man and in the letter, but also in the spiritual sense, and so as to cleanse your hearts from those inward dispositions, which are in God's sight violations of it, and defile the man, you will not be fitted to enter into my kingdom. And that in both these things the legal righteousness of the scribes and pharisees was deficient, is clear, (1.) from our Saviour's care to teach them, it was not sufficient to observe what was said to them of old, according to the letter only, but that they were to regard the higher and spiritual sense of it, not only not to kill, but not to be angry without cause, &c. (2.) that adultery might be committed in the heart as well as in the outward action, (ver. 28.) and that what cometh out of the heart, defileth the man: which doctrine the pharisees were so unacquainted with, that they were offended at it. (Matt. xv. 12.) And Josephus, who was well acquainted with their doctrine, declares Polybius mistaken, when he saith, Antiochus Epiphanes perished, because he would have robbed Diana's temple of its treasure; for, saith he,* Τὸ γὰρ μηκέτι ποιῆσαι τὸ ἔργον βουλευσάμενον, οὐκ ἔστι τιμωρίας ἄξιον, He deserved no punishment for what he only would have done, but did not. And Kimchi, on these words of David, (Psal. lxvi. 18.) If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me, comments thus, He will not impute it to me for sin; for God does not look upon an evil thought as sin, unless it be conceived against God or religion.

[16] Ver. 21. Ἠκούσατε ὅτι ἐρρέθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις, &c. Ye have heard it hath been said by (to) them of old, Thou shalt not kill; ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, but I say unto you, Whosoever is angry with his brother, &c.] That τοῖς ἀρχαίοις is here to be rendered in the dative case, may be concluded (1.) from the words I say unto you, where ὑμῖν is undoubtedly the dative case. (2.) Because the word ἐρρήθη elsewhere is always joined to this case; so Rom. ix. 12. ἐρρήθη αὐτῇ, it was said to her; and ver. 26. ἐρρήθη αὐτοῖς, it was said to them; Gal. iii. 16. the promises τῷ Ἀβραὰμ ἐρρέθησαν, were spoken to Abraham; so Rev. ix. 4. 11. And where mention is made of a thing spoken by another, the phrase is still τὸ ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ, or τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ. (3.) Because the words thus cited by our Lord, are words spoken to them of old, as, Thou shalt not commit adultery, ver. 27. Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths, ver. 33. and here, Thou shalt not kill, Exod. xx. 13. and, Whosoever killeth, shall be obnoxious to the judgment, Gen. ix. 6. Numb. xxxv. 31. You shall take no satisfaction for the life of a man, ἔνοχον ὄντος ἀναιρεθῆναι, worthy to be cut off by the hand of judgment, he shall die. Of the question, Whether Christ here adds to the law of Moses, or rather declares those things belong to the true scope and intention of it, which the scribes and pharisees never thought, or at least taught not their scholars so to be? see the appendix to this chapter. I incline to this last opinion, and therefore give this sense to the words: You have heard it said by Moses to them of old, Thou shalt not kill; and understand not, that by this precept you are obnoxious to guilt for any thing but murder: but I say unto you, that by the genuine import of it, all causeless anger against our brother, all contemptuous expressions and treatment of him, all rash judgment of him as a profane and wicked person, are forbidden, as being either dispositions to murder, or to neglect the welfare of our brother's life and soul: and therefore say,

[17] Ver. 22. Ὅτι πᾶς ὁ ὀργιζόμενος τῷ ἀδελφῷ αὐτοῦ εἰκῇ, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be obnoxious to the judgment.] St. Jerome here notes, that in quibusdam codicibus legitur sine causâ, cæterum in veris definita sententia est, as if εἰκῇ without cause had not been in the true copies: but how little St. Jerome is to be trusted in these matters, is evident from this, and many other instances of like nature; for certain it is, that we find this word in Justin's epistle ad Zenam, &c. p. 311. D. Nor is it any objection against this reading, that in his second Apology, p. 83. the word εἰκῇ is omitted, the whole citation there running thus, ὃς δ' ἂν ὀργίσθῃ, ἔνοχός ἐστὶν εἰς τὸ πῦρ, for this is only a brief recapitulation of the whole: and you may as well argue, that neither Raca nor μωρὲ was in that verse, as that εἰκῇ was not there. A like instance I find in Irenæus, who, when he gives a brief recapitulation of our Saviour's words, saith, That instead of these words, Thou shalt not kill, he commandeth, "Ne irasci quidem," Not to be angry: yet whenever he cites these words, (as he doth thrice, viz. lib. ii. cap. 56. p. 189. col. 1. lib. iv. cap. 27. p. 314. cap. 1. &c. 3. p. 320. col. 2.) he always adds, "sine causâ," without cause; so also doth St. Cyprian, Test. lib. iii. p. 64. Constit. Apost. lib. ii. cap. 52. p. 199. So Chrysostom, Euthymius, Theophylact, without any hint of a various reading; so also reads the Syriac. And this, with what I have added, Exam. var. Lection. D. Millii, lib. ii. cap. 1. n. 1. I think sufficient to justify this reading. For explication of these words, note, (1.) that they seem not rightly to interpret these words, who refer them to the judgment of the three Sanhedrins of the Jews; (1.) because the Sanhedrin is only mentioned in the second gradation: for (2.) it did not belong to the lower court of three men to judge of capital causes; and so those words, the murderer shall be obnoxious to the judgment, (ver. 21.) cannot belong to them, and therefore the words here repeated cannot belong to them: nor (3.) can hell-fire be properly applied to the judgment of the highest Sanhedrin. Let it be therefore noted, (2.) that the Jews held that many murderers were not to be punished by the judgment of the Sanhedrin, but only the judgment of the hand of God; and that the word Raca, which signifies a vain, empty fellow, was used as a word of scorn and contempt. Now the vilifying a Jew, was a thing punishable by the Sanhedrin: the word fool, both in the Scripture and the Jewish phrase, signifies a profane and wicked fellow, or, as we say, a hell-hound: for, the wicked shall be turned into hell: so in those words, Psal. xiv. 1. The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. This then may be the import of these words, He that is subject to unjust and causeless anger, shall be obnoxious to the anger and judgment of God: he that publicly reviles his brother, shall be obnoxious to the public censure of the council; and he that represents and censures him as a child of hell, shall be obnoxious to hell-fire: according to that saying of the Jews, He that calls another bastard, let him be punished with forty stripes; but he that calls him fool, let him descend with him into his life, i. e. into his misery. Note, (3.) that these words, vain and foolish, when they are used by men assisted by the Spirit of God, or speaking by virtue of their office, out of a spirit of charity, and an ardent desire to make men sensible of their folly, do not render them obnoxious to this guilt: not St. James, when he calls the Solifidian, vain man: (ii. 20.) not St. Paul, when he saith, O foolish Galatians! (Gal. iii. 1.) and much less Christ, when he styles the pharisees, fools and blind, (Matt. xxiii. 17.) and when he saith to his disciples, O fools and slow of heart; (Luke xxiv. 25.) but only then when they proceed from rash and causeless anger, rancour of spirit, and ill-will towards men. Note, (4.) that God, in forbidding murder, forbiddeth also those things which tend and dispose us to it; all rash anger, hatred, rancour of spirit, malice, all that contempt of others, which may make us not to value their lives, and so not fear much the dispatching them out of the way; all that reproachful language, which begets such strifes, as too often end in blood; Ye fight and kill: (James iv. 2.) that, in forbidding the outward act, he forbids all inward workings of the heart towards that act, all desires, machinations, and contrivances, all purposes or resolutions so to do; out of the heart come evil thoughts, murders: (Matt. xv. 19.) and that, by forbidding us to kill, he commands us to do what we are able to preserve our brother's life: (see note on Luke vi. 9.) and, lastly, that by forbidding us to kill the body, he much more doth forbid us to kill the soul, or suffer that to perish, as did the scribes and pharisees; suffering the sinner and the publican to perish, by their refusal to converse with them, though it were to save that which was lost, or to call sinners to repentance. Note, (5.) from those words, He that is angry with his brother without a cause, that some anger may be just and lawful; not as it is defined to be ὄρεξις ἀντιλυπέσεως, a desire of revenge, or doing evil to another, purely because he hath done so to me; we being forbidden to avenge ourselves, (Rom. xii. 19.) or even to say, we will do to others as they have dealt with us: (Prov. xxiv. 29.) but as it is an inward commotion and displeasure of the mind, arising from the apprehension of some evil done to me, or others for whom I am concerned, with a desire to remove the evil; and in this sense anger cannot be always sinful:

First, Because some anger hath been found even in that Jesus who did no sin, (1 Pet. ii. 22.) as when the cause of God and piety were much concerned; for, he looked upon the pharisees with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. (Mark iii. 5.)

Secondly, Because anger is a passion implanted in us by the God of nature; if therefore it were wholly evil in its exercise, that God, who is the author of it, must be the author of our sin, whereas the just avenger of it can never be the author of sin.

Thirdly, Because we are only bid to be slow to anger, (James i. 19.) and not to be hasty in our spirits to exert this passion; (Prov. xiv. 29.) whereas that, which is always evil, we ought not only to be slow to do, but always careful to avoid.

[18] Ver. 23. Ἐὰν οὖν προσφέρῃς τὸ δῶρόν σου ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον· If therefore thou bringest thy gift unto the altar, &c.] Here note,

First, That it was customary with the Jews, who lived at some distance from Jerusalem, to reserve their oblations till the next feast, at which they were obliged to attend, and then to offer them; so that they might easily comply with this precept.

Secondly, The scribes and pharisees held, That the gifts and sacrifices brought to the temple, were sufficient to expiate for all offences, which were not to be punished by the judge (except those which required restitution to be made first, and that without amendment of life); and therefore Christ here teacheth, in opposition to them, that no sacrifice, or other worship, could be acceptable to God, without justice and charity, and a mind reconciled to our brother; and that they did in vain attempt to propitiate an offended God, till they had made satisfaction for the injuries done to their brother: and that, therefore, when they had injured him by causeless anger, reproachful language, or undue and uncharitable censures of his state, or any other way, they should endeavour to be reconciled to him before they sought to render God propitious to themselves; at least, by doing all things on their part necessary to give him satisfaction, and obtain his friendship: so that if they prevail not, the fault shall be in him, and not in them. Note, Thirdly, That the duties of justice and charity are more acceptable to God than sacrifices, or any other part of outward worship; these being only of positive institution (whilst the others are duties required by the law of nature), and so to be left undone, that we may do the other.

[19] Ver. 25. Ἴσθι εὐνοῶν τῷ ἀντιδίκῳ σου ταχὺ, Agree with thine adversary quickly, &c.] Episcopius here saith, These words cannot be properly understood, because rash anger, reproachful speeches, and calling a man a fool, could not be punished with imprisonment; but it is evident, that our Saviour is not now speaking of these things, but having told us what we ought to do to gain our brother's favour, when we had given him just cause of offence; he here counsels us what to do when we lie at his mercy for our debts due to him, viz. to do all we can amicably to compound the matter, lest being brought before the magistrates, we should be put in prison. Now these magistrates were to be in their gates, (Deut. xvi. 18.) that is, in all their cities; (if the city were small, it had only the consistory of three judges; if large, that of twenty-three; and both these are styled ἄρχοντες, Luke xii. 58.) and from them the creditor might appeal to the higher Sanhedrin, here styled the judge by way of eminency; and these consistories had their schoterim, officials, apparitors, or executors of their sentence, called here ὑπήρεται, and Luke xii. 58. πράκτορι, who carried him to prison who was sentenced thither, or inflicted the punishment to which the consistory adjudged him. Here then δι' ὑπονοίας is insinuated, how much more it concerns us in time to repent of our offences against God, and to endeavour to be reconciled to him, lest we be cast into the infernal prison, according to that good advice of the son of Sirach, Before judgment examine thyself, and in the day of visitation thou shalt find mercy; humble thyself before thou beest sick, and in the time of sins shew repentance, and defer not until death to be justified. (Ecclus. xviii. 20—22.)

[20] Ver. 27. Ἠκούσατε ὅτι ἐρρέθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις, οὐ μοιχεύσεις, Ye have heard that it hath been said to them of old, Ye shall not commit adultery.] And this the rabbins interpret strictly, calling it the thirty-fifth precept, forbidding to lie with another man's wife; on which account our Lord proceeds to say, It is also a prohibition of all incitements to adultery, called by St. Peter, the adulterous eye, (2 Pet. ii. 14.) and by the poet adultera mens, the adultery of the heart, in lusting after any woman; only this seems not to be meant of every sudden desire arising in us before we are aware, and suppressed and contradicted as soon as it is observed; but of morose desires, which we consent to, and entertain with pleasure, without retracting them; and more especially of such desires, which are followed with contrivance how to accomplish what we thus desire, and which we are only restrained from the accomplishment of, by want of opportunity; in the first case, lust hath conceived and brought forth sin, a sin against this precept, as it forbids all incentives to adultery; in the second, it is finished in the will, and hath brought forth death; and doubtless will be so esteemed by that God, who, as he estimates our good actions, rather from our good minds, purposes, and intentions, than from the act itself, which ofttimes it is not in our power to perform; so will he estimate our evil actions more from the full consent of the will, which makes them morally evil, than from that fact which only renders them more evil in the same kind, as adding to them scandal, and injury to others. And therefore the words, adultery in his heart, are not here used to diminish the adultery, or signify it less truly such, but to shew the true interpretation of the precept. And though many things are produced from the Talmudists, to shew some of their rabbins condemned this looking on a woman as a very vile thing, yet nothing is produced from them to shew they held it forbidden by this precept. Pertinent here is the observation of St. Jerome on this place: "Dixerunt jurisperiti, si videat quis mulierem quam in deliciis præ uxore habeat, uxorem demittat, atque eam ducat;" Their expositors of the law said, If a man sees a woman whom he loves better than his wife, let him divorce his wife and marry her. This adulterous eye our Lord here styles adultery; and ver. 31, 32. severely taxes their divorces upon any cause. (See note on Rom. ii. 22.)

[21] Ver. 31, 32. Ἐρρέθη δὲ ὅτι ὃς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, &c.] Here Christ saith not, as before, It hath been said to them of old, but only it hath been said; to note, that this was not a precept given by Moses to divorce their wives, as the pharisees suggested, xix. 7. but only a permission in some cases so to do, as our Lord there answers, ver. 8. Of what farther relates to this and the following verse, see note on xix. 7. 9. (See Examen Millii.)

[22] Ver. 33. Ἠκούσατε ὅτι ἐρρέθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις, οὐκ ἐπιορκήσεις. Ye have heard it hath been said to them of old, Thou shalt not forswear thyself.] For explication of which words, let it be noted,

First, That Christ, by this prohibition, must not be supposed to forbid all swearing as a thing absolutely evil; for, in those writings which were indited by the Holy Ghost, St. Paul doth often seal the truth of what he delivered with an oath, saying, God is my witness, that without ceasing I make mention of you in my prayers. (Rom. i. 9.) In the Epistle to the Galatians, he gives a large account of his conversion and apostleship, which concludes thus, Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God I lie not. (Gal. i. 20.) Having given the Corinthians a catalogue of his great sufferings for the gospel's sake, because it might be thought incredible that any sober person would, or that the stoutest person could, endure so many and so dreadful sufferings; he concludes thus, The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ knoweth that I lie not. (2 Cor. xi. 31.) To confirm his tender love to the same church, he saith, I call God to record upon my soul, that to spare you I came not yet to Corinth. (2 Cor. i. 23.) To manifest his passionate affection to the Philippians, God (saith he) is my record, how greatly I long after you. (Phil. i. 8.) Now these examples prove, that blessed Paul, and that good Spirit, by which he was directed thus to write, did not conceive all swearing to be forbidden by our Saviour's words, but that it was still lawful, when the matter was of great importance to the welfare of the souls of men, and could not be confirmed any other way, to seal it with a voluntary oath. Now undoubtedly St. Paul well understood the mind of Christ in this his prohibition; and therefore, had he conceived it so universal, as some contend it is, he would not have encouraged others, by his example, to transgress it.

It is confessed the words, both in the prohibition of our Saviour and St. James, are universal; Swear not at all; swear not by heaven, nor by earth, or any other oath: but it is also certain, that Christ and his apostles do often use such general expressions, which yet must necessarily admit of limitations. Thus, 1 Cor. vi. 7. we meet with an expression, which in the Greek is fully parallel to this, viz.

ὅλως ἥττημα, it is altogether faulty in you, that you go to law one with another; why do you not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? Which notwithstanding, no man, except some few Socinians, thinks it unlawful to go to law, for preservation of his own family, or to secure the goods of orphans, widows, or the poor, committed to his trust, when these things cannot be secured or preserved by any other means. Christ hath expressly said, Give to every man that asketh of thee, and of him that taketh away thy goods, ask thou not again; (Luke vi. 30.) and yet as God himself gives not to them that ask amiss, that they may make provision for their lusts, (James iv. 3.) so neither must the Christian give to such an asker; and it is evidently repugnant to the law of nature and self-preservation, tamely to bear the loss of all that is necessary to our subsistence here, without endeavouring to preserve or to recover it when taken from us. As therefore these, and many other passages of Scripture delivered in universal terms, must be restrained by other scriptures, that so they may not seem to enjoin absurdities, or thwart the law of nature, or the voice of reason: so must the words we now discourse of be restrained and limited by others, which we meet with in the word of God. Especially if, secondly, we consider that Christ himself, after this prohibition given, seems to swear; for, Mark viii. 12. we read thus, Verily I say unto you, εἰ δοθήσεται τῇ γενεᾷ ταύτῃ σημεῖον, If a sign shall be given to this generation, which is a Hebrew form of swearing, and imports thus much, Let God punish me, or let me not live, if a sign be given to this generation. So Deut. i. 35. The Lord was wroth, and swore, saying, εἰ ὄψεται, ne vivam, If any of these men shall see the good land of promise. Psal. xcv. 11. So I sware in my wrath, εἰ εἰσελεύσονται, mentiar, if they shall enter into my rest. So 1 Sam. iii. 14. I have sworn touching the house of Eli, εἰ ἐξιλασθήσεται, if the iniquity of the house of Eli shall be purged with sacrifice for ever. So Psal. lxxxix. 35. Once have I sworn by my holiness, εἰ ψεύσομαι, if I fail David: in all which passages interpreters agree, God sweareth by his life or truth. And Psal. cxxxii. 2, 3. Lord, remember David, how he sware, εἰ εἰσελεύσομαι, if I go into my tabernacle, εἰ ἀναβήσομαι, if I climb up into my bed, εἰ δώσω, if I give sleep to mine eyes, till I find out a temple for the Lord; i. e. let me not prosper if I do not this: wherefore the words of Christ being exactly parallel to all these, which are expressly styled oaths, may very reasonably be deemed a form of swearing.

Secondly, These words must not be so interpreted as to forbid all promissory oaths, in which we do engage, by calling God to witness, we will be faithful to our promises, or will do this or that hereafter. For (1.) were it unlawful to use a promissory oath, it must be so, because it is unlawful to engage, as we expect God's favour, for the performance of things future: this being the whole difference betwixt an assertion and a promise confirmed upon oath, that an assertory oath hath always for its object something past or present; whereas a promissory oath hath for its object something future, which oath some therefore think unlawful, because we may forget our promise, or lie under such evil circumstances as render us unable to perform it. But notwithstanding these considerations, that it is not simply unlawful to take a promissory oath, is evident, (1.) from the examples of such oaths recorded and approved in Holy Scripture. For the Lord made his people enter into an oath to serve him, and to keep his covenant. (Deut. xxix. 12. 14.) King Asa made all Judah swear that they would seek the Lord with all their hearts; (2 Chron. xv. 14.) and this was so acceptable to God, that he was found of them, and gave them rest round about, (ver. 15.) Ezra engaged the priests and Levites, and all the house of Israel, to swear that they would put away all their strange wives and children. (Ezra x. 5.) And Nehemiah called the priests, and took an oath of them to do according to their promise. (Neh. v. 12.) Moreover, he engaged all the nobles and people to enter into a curse, and into an oath, to walk in God's law, and to observe and do all his commandments; (x. 29.) and having done these things, he saith, Remember me, O Lord, for this, and wipe not out the good deeds that I have done for the house of my God. And, lastly, I have sworn (saith David), and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments. (Psal. cxix. 106.) All these were promissory oaths made by direction, or with the approbation of the God of Israel, to strengthen the good resolutions of a backsliding people, and to increase their obligations to perform their duty; and can it rationally be conceived that the holy Jesus should forbid what wholly was designed and really tended to strengthen and confirm us in the performance of our holy purposes? Can he be thought to do it who hath laid upon all Christians the baptismal vow, and the ὅρκος στρατιωτικὸς, military oath, to fight under his banner, and hath obliged us to renew this vow at every sacrament? (2.) If Christ did by these words forbid all promissory oaths, no prince may thus confirm a league with other states and princes; whereas both Abraham and Isaac made a promissory oath unto Abimelech, that they would still retain a perfect friendship with him. (Gen. xxi. 24. xxvi. 31.) Again, according to this exposition of the words, no magistrate or officer of justice may exact a promissory oath of any Christian subject, nor could a Christian soldier or trustee give any promissory oaths of his fidelity. Now had the Christian law untied and freed all its professors from these bonds of government, this must have much reflected on the wisdom of its constitutions, and given occasion to the infidels to say, that it exposed all government, by this exemption of the subject from those obligations to obedience which lay before upon them, to the greatest hazards; it being formerly the duty both of Jew and heathen, to keep the king's commandments by virtue of the oath of God. (3.) That which directly tends to the advancement of society, cannot rationally be supposed to be forbidden by our Saviour, because the current of the Christian precepts does most peculiarly tend to the promotion of the public good; but promissory oaths, as well as assertory, directly tend to the advancement of society, and the promotion of the public good, they being instrumental both to put an end to these contentions, which tend to the destruction of society, and to the confirmation of men's minds, touching the truth of what another promises; and therefore to encourage them in making those contracts, which are of absolute necessity to human commerce: and all this the apostle seemeth to insinuate by saying, that an oath is for confirmation, and for the ending of all strife among men. (Heb. vi. 16.) For that the apostle in that passage speaks chiefly of a promissory oath, is evident from the occasion of it; viz. the promise of a signal blessing God had made to Abraham, and had confirmed with an oath. And (4.) if all promissory oaths be utterly unlawful by virtue of Christ's prohibition, then must it be unlawful to adjure a Christian to perform any action we require of him; for to adjure by God, is to engage him, under the curse of God, or under the penalty of forfeiting God's favour, and incurring his displeasure, to do what we require of him. Now that in matters of great concern, the Christian may be thus adjured by his superior, is evident from the example of St. Paul, who writes unto his Thessalonians thus, ὁρκίζω ὑμᾶς τὸν Κύριον, I adjure you by the Lord, that this epistle be read to all the holy brethren. (1 Thess. v. 27.) The words I render thus, because I find this is the constant import of this phrase in the Old Testament. Thus, Gen. xxiv. 37. ὥρκισέ με ὁ Κύριος μου. My master made me swear, saying, Thou shalt not take a wife to my son of the daughters of Canaan; and ver. 41. When thou comest to my kindred, if they will not give thee a wife, ἔσῃ ἀθῷος ἀπὸ τοῦ ὁρκισμοῦ μου, thou shalt be clear from my oath. Thus in the case of jealousy, ὁρκιεῖ ἱερεὺς, the priest shall charge the woman with an oath of cursing, and shall say unto her, The Lord make thee a curse among thy people, &c. (Numb. v. 19. 21.) Thus ὥρκισεν Ἰησοῦς, Joshua adjured the people, saying, Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up, and buildeth the city of Jericho. (Josh. vi. 26.) And Saul adjured the people, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food till the evening; that is, ὁρκίσας ὥρκισε τὸν λαὸν, he charged the people with an oath, 1 Sam. xiv. 24. and ver. 28. the people feared the oath. Thus also Solomon speaks to Shimei, οὐχὶ ὥρκισά σε κατὰ τοῦ Κυρίου, Did I not make thee swear by the Lord, that thou wouldest not go out of Jerusalem; wherefore then hast thou not kept τὸν ὅρκον Κυρίου the oath of the Lord? (1 Kings ii. 42, 43.) If therefore Christians may be bound by others under a curse or oath, to the performance of something future, which they had not promised; much more may they be thus obliged by the magistrate to promise, and confirm that promise by an oath.

And, thirdly, hence it clearly follows, that our Lord doth not here condemn judicial oaths, imposed by magistrates and by superiors in matters testimonial: for it is observable in judicial oaths, the custom which obtained among the Jews was this; not for the person who came under the obligation of an oath to pronounce the words of swearing with his own mouth, but an oath was exacted of him by the magistrate, and he became obliged to answer upon oath, by hearing φωνὴν ὁρκισμοῦ, the voice of adjuration, or swearing from his mouth; so the law saith expressly, (Lev. v. 1.) If a man hear the voice of swearing, and is a witness, whether he hath seen or known any thing, if he do not utter it, then he shall bear his iniquity. To which custom that passage of the Proverbs evidently refers, Whoso is partner with a thief, hateth his own soul: he heareth אלה the adjuration of the magistrate, and bewrayeth it not, (Prov. xxix. 24.) i. e. doth not discover what he knows; if, hearing ὅρκου προτεθέντος, the oath pronounced, he doth not declare it, say the Septuagint and the Targum. Now hence it follows, that Christ could not forbid in these words such judicial oaths: (1.) because it was not in the power of the Jews, to whom he spake, to avoid them, they being subject to them, by hearing the voice of swearing pronounced by the judge. (2.) Had Christ by this injunction condemned all judicial oaths, he must have dissolved the law of Moses in this particular; and so have given just occasion to the pharisees to complain of him, both as teaching contrary to the law of Moses, and stirring up the people to disturb the government. Then, (3.) after this declaration made against such oaths, he should not have answered when adjured by the high-priest, to tell whether he were the Son of God; because he ought not so far to have countenanced this sinful action: wherefore, by breaking of his former silence, and taking the adjuration upon himself, he shewed that he did not conceive it sinful to answer upon oath before a magistrate. (4.) This prohibition therefore only doth forbid all voluntary oaths in common conversation and discourse; this (first) clearly follows from the removal of those other glosses which have been put upon the text; and (secondly) from what our Saviour adds, by way of explication of it, viz. ἔστω δὲ ὁ λόγος ὑμῶν, let your discourse or talk be yea and nay; i. e. let it suffice, that in your ordinary discourse you use a single affirmation or denial, or, if occasion do require, a reduplication of them, and do not on your own voluntary motion, call God to witness the truth of what you ordinarily say. (Thirdly,) This is apparent from the distinction which the Jews observed betwixt such oaths as were imposed by the magistrate in doing justice, and voluntary oaths: in the first kind of oaths, they reckoned it unlawful to swear by any name but that of God; it being written, that when a cause of parties comes before the judge, then shall the oath of Jehovah be between them: (Exod. xxii. 11.) wherefore this prohibition of swearing, by the heavens, the earth, or any other oath, could not relate to their judicial oaths; because in them God only was invoked: it therefore must respect those voluntary oaths, which were in frequent use among the Jews, and were less scrupled by them; because they did not swear by God, but by the creatures, accounting that far more excusable than swearing by the name of God. And that this also is the meaning of the prohibition of St. James, is evident; because in the foregoing words he had exhorted Christians patiently to bear afflictions, and not to be provoked to anger by them; and knowing that our impatience under sufferings, and our unbridled passions, do often vent themselves in oaths, he therefore adds, (ver. 12.) But above all things, brethren, swear not.

[23] Ver. 34. Μήτε ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, Ver. 35. μήτε ἐν τῇ γῇ, &c. Neither by heaven, nor by earth, nor by Jerusalem.] That these forms of swearing were very usual among the Jews, we learn from the Jewish writers, saying,* By heaven so it is; By heaven you have brought this to my memory. It was also customary with them, to swear by the heavens and earth together, or by them separately. And accordingly Philo† forbids men to swear by the Supreme Cause; but, saith he, if there be a necessity of swearing, call to record, γῆν, ἥλιον, ἀστέρας, οὐρανὸν, the earth, the sun, the stars, the heavens. They also swore by Jerusalem, and by the temple. But then observe, they did not look upon these as binding oaths. So Maimonides saith,‡ If any man swear by heaven, or by earth, yet this is not an oath. And R. Judah,§ That he that saith by Jerusalem, it is nothing, unless with an intent purpose he shall vow towards Jerusalem; and this Martial intimates in that known distich,

Ecce negas, jurasque mihi per templa Tonantis:
Non credo: jura, Verpe, per Anchialum.

§ In Shevaoth, cap. 12.

And hence our Lord informs them, that this was their great mistake, all these oaths being in effect oaths made by God, and so as binding as those in which he personally was named. And seeing an oath is a solemn appeal to what we swear by, as a witness of the truth, and an avenger of the falsehood of the testimony, it follows, that all our oaths made by insensate creatures, must in effect be oaths made by that God whose creatures they are, or none at all. And therefore St. Jerome here truly notes, that "Judæi per angelos, et urbem Jerusalem, et templum, et elementa jurantes, creaturas, resque carnales venerabantur obsequio et honore Dei." The Jews are guilty of idolatry in swearing by angels, the temple, and by other creatures. And therefore, by parity of reason, the papists, who swear by saints, images, and relics, must be guilty of the like idolatry.

[24] Ver. 36. Μήτε ἐν τῇ κεφαλῇ, &c. Neither by thy head, for thou canst not make one hair white or black.] This also was a usual form of swearing among the Jews, who said to their neighbour, Swear to me חַיֵּי רֹאשְׁךָ* by the life of thy head; now, saith Christ, the preservation of that life, of which the head is the fountain, is not in thy power, but depends entirely upon him, by whom we live; and so to swear by it is, in effect, to swear by him who hath the power of life and death.

[25] Ver. 37. Τὸ δὲ περισσὸν τούτων, ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἐστιν, For what is more than this cometh of evil.] These words import either,

First, That swearing in our common discourse proceeds from some inherent evil, as certainly it doth from an unhallowed heart, from a soul void of reverence to God, and therefore prone to vilify his sacred name; or,

Secondly, That it proceeds from Satan, and that he it is who tempts us to mix them with our common talk. And this interpretation well comports with the signification of the word ὁ πονηρὸς, being most frequently used in the New Testament to signify this wicked one: thus ἔρχεται ὁ πονηρὸς, the wicked one cometh and snatcheth away the seed, Matt. xii. 19. the devil doth it, ver. 39. Cain is declared to be ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ, from the devil; God's children have overcome τὸν πονηρὸν; they keep themselves so that ὁ πονηρὸς the evil one doth not touch them. Now this is a full demonstration of the vileness and horrid nature of this sin, that we are most particularly excited to it, by him who is the worst of beings, and bears the greatest hatred and opposition to God's glory; and therefore, if he be so diligent to tempt us to the commission of it, we may be assured it is, because he knows it highly tends to the dishonour of God, and to deprive us of that reverence to his most sacred name, which can alone restrain us from the commission of the worst of evils.

[26] Ver. 38,39. Ἠκούσατε, &c. You have heard it hath been said to them of old, An eye for an eye, &c. But I say unto you, Resist not evil.] Of this law of talio, let it be observed;

First, From Grotius, that it bound not the party damaged to require the like punishment, but left him free, either to forgive or take a compensation; but if this penalty was required by him, it bound the judge to inflict it. For to the judge only it is said, thy eye shall not spare or pity him, but eye shall go for eye, &c. (Deut. xix. 18. 21.) And hence it follows, secondly, that the party hurt or damaged, could not himself be the executioner of this law; but was obliged, if he would require the punishment, to repair to the magistrate for the execution of it; for this punishment was to be executed by the judges, (Exod. xxi. 22, 23.) and therefore, as the words, thou shalt not pity, (Deut. xix.) relate only to the judge; so also the words, as he hath done, so shall it be done to him, (Lev. xxiv. 19.) relate to the same person, as if it had been said, so shall it be done to him by the judge; but they oblige not the injured party to require the judge so to do. Now hence it follows, that they mistake Christ's meaning in the following words, opposed to this law, who say, Christ only doth forbid that resistance of evil, and return of injuries, which private persons do themselves attempt, without repairing to the magistrate for redress; for private vengeance, or execution of punishment upon offenders, was never permitted to the Jews themselves; whereas those words, but I say unto you, seem plainly to evince that Christ forbids the Christian something which was permitted to the Jew. Note, thirdly, that the Jewish doctors generally maintain that the punishment of an eye for an eye, or a tooth for a tooth, might be redeemed by money, or that satisfaction might be made for it by a pecuniary mulct; Josephus* is express, that the law allowed him that was hurt to estimate his own damage, and that if he would not take a pecuniary satisfaction, he was deemed severe or cruel. Hence the Targum of Jonathan renders the words thus, The price of an eye for an eye, the price of a tooth for a tooth, &c. both in Exod. xxi. 24. in Lev. xxiv. 20. and in Deut. xix. 21. All these, say the Hebrew doctors (except life for life), may be redeemed by money; and this they gather from Numb. xxxv. 31. Ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer; so that the other maims or hurts are not forbidden to be satisfied for: and in respect of satisfaction, it is said, Deut. xix. 21. Thine eye shall not pity. (Maim. Treat. of Hurts, cap. 1. sect. 3, 4.) So of the Roman law of the twelve tables, A. Gellius† asks what cruelty is in it, "cum habeas facultatem pacisccndi," when liberty is granted to compound the matter, and there is no necessity of suffering the law, where men do not choose to do so? And this seems very reasonable in many cases, there being some cases in which the law of talio is impossible—as, if he that has lost his own teeth should strike out the tooth of another; some, in which it seems impracticable, as in breach for breach, wound for wound; for how difficult is it to make a wound neither deeper nor wider than that the other hath received? to break a bone, or make a rupture in the scrotum, or elsewhere, just like another made already? and sometimes it seems unmerciful to do it, as in the case mentioned by Diodorus Siculus,‡ and by Aristotle, Rhetor. lib. i. cap. 7. of the man with one eye; for would it not seem unmerciful to make him stark blind, because he hath casually, or in a sudden fit of anger, struck out his brother's eye; or to cut off the right hand of a painter, or a scrivener, by which he maintains himself and family, because he hath cut off the right hand of a songster, or one who suffers little in his calling by the loss? Lastly, I cannot think that God allowed this to be done by the damaged person out of revenge, he having so expressly said, (Lev. xix. 18.) Thou shalt not avenge, or bear any grudge against the children of thy people; nor as a remedy of his grief, it being an unreasonable and ill-natured thing to desire to ease my grief by causing grief to another, nor will either my pain or loss be less, because another suffers the like pain or loss: this therefore only seemeth to be granted as it tends to the public good, by causing men to be more careful how they offend in this kind.

Secondly, That which Christ here forbids, in opposition to what has been granted to the person injured by this law, is ἀντιστῆναι, to resist evil in kind, by requiring the execution of this law of retaliation upon him; as being that which tended not to the diminution of the Christians' pain or loss, and therefore seemed not suitable to Christian charity. (2.) In matters easy to be borne, rather to suffer them with Christian patience, than to contend before a judge about them, or to require compensation of him for them. For it is to be noted,

(1.) That the striking of a freeman on the cheek with open palm, was only matter of disgrace; and he that did it was, by the law of the twelve tables,* to pay twenty-five asses, or halfpence; and by the Jewish canons, to pay, if he gave one blow upon the cheek, two hundred zuzees; if he gave him another, four hundred; and these mulcts were established and inflicted by the judge. (See Dr. Lightfoot.) But Christ will rather have both these injuries borne patiently, than that his servants should contend before the judge for reparation of the disgrace put upon them.

(2.) As for the taking the outward coat, that seems but a small loss to him that hath an inward coat remaining: for the Baptist requires him that hath two coats, to give to him that hath none; (Luke iii. 11.) and Christ suffers not his disciples to provide two coats for their journey. (Matt. x. 10.) Though, therefore, by the Jewish canons, a mulct of four hundred zuzees was allowed for this, Christ requires those who, being so well provided, may reasonably be supposed able to repair the loss of both, to do it rather than contend, or wage law for the reparation of his loss before a heathen, or a Jewish magistrate: so St. Paul also; Why do you not rather suffer wrong? (1 Cor. vi. 7.)

(3.) If the king's officer will ἀγγαρεύειν, compel or press thee, who hast a privilege or immunity from these affairs, as the Jews thought the disciples of the wise and students of the law had; yet, saith Christ, I require my disciples, rather to wave this privilege, than to contend for this immunity: so that, according to this sense, Christ here requires his disciples to remit tolerable injuries, relating either to their reputation, as in the first instance, or to their possessions and estates, as in the second, or to their privilege and freedom, as in the third, rather than to contend at the law about them. If this exposition be not liked, it is observable, that κρίνεσθαι and κρινεῖν is also to contend by fighting, or striving with another, or using force to repel the injury. So Ecclus. vi. 10. A man cannot, κριθῆναι, strive or fight with one that is stronger than himself. So 2 Macc. xv. 17. Κρῖναι τὰ πράγματα, is to try the matter by conflict, or to fight it out; in which sense Christ may be supposed to command, rather that his servants should patiently suffer these things, than fight and strive with those who offer such affronts and injuries to them.

[27] Ver. 42. Τῷ αἰτοῦντί σε δίδου, καὶ τὸν θέλοντα ἀπό σου δανείσασθαι μὴ ἀποστραφῇς, Give to him that asketh; and from him that would borrow of thee, turn thou not away.] Here it is certain,

(1.) That Christ by saying, (Luke vi. 35.) Give to every one that asketh, doth not require us to give to every one that asketh whether he need or not, nor whether we can spare it or not, but only to give to him that asketh out of need, what we are able to bestow, and do not ourselves want: so Paul, by asking the charity of the Corinthians, for the distressed Jews, saith, I mean not that others be eased and you burdened, but that your abundance be a supply for their want, 2 Cor. viii. 13, 14. (2.) These words may have respect to the precedent, and be intended to teach Christians, not to be unwilling to give to others, because they have disgraced or unjustly taken something from us; nor to upbraid them in their wants, with their deportment towards us, and call upon them first to restore what they have taken from us, but even to shew kindness to them, as if they had not thus offended. (3.) I see no reason for changing our translation from, Turn thou not away, into Turn not him away; for as men, ἀποστρεφόμενοι τὴν ἀλήθειαν, (Tit. i. 14.) are men turning away from the truth: so τὸν θέλοντα,——μὴ ἀποστραφῇς, may be ἀπὸ τοῦ θέλοντος—— μὴ στραφῇς, from him that would borrow of thee, turn not thou away.

[28] Ver. 43. Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, καὶ μισήσεις τὸν ἐχθρόν σου, and shalt hate thine enemy.] Here note, (1.) that these words, Thou shalt hate thine enemy, are not found in the law of Moses; though nothing is more frequent in the Jewish canons, nothing more certain in their practice, than that they had, as Tacitus observes, "intestinum odium adversus omnes alios," a deadly hatred against all that were not of their religion; which affords a strong argument, that Christ here is not correcting or adding to the moral precepts of the law; but opposing the corrupt interpretations of the scribes and pharisees, of which we have this farther argument, That the law expressly doth require this love of enemies and the love of strangers in the highest measure, saying, (Lev. xix. 18.) Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; and, (ver. 34.) The stranger that sojourneth with you, shall be as one home-born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt. Now here it cannot be truly answered, as the Jews and some Christians do, that the neighbour, (ver. 18.) is only a Jew, and not a stranger; for both our Saviour and St. Paul, speaking of these very words, do plainly shew the contrary, as is fully proved, note on Matt. xxii. 39. Moreover, every Egyptian man and woman is a neighbour, (Exod. xi. 2.) and so is every other man. (Deut. xxii. 26.) And even Kimchi on Psal. xv. 3. saith truly, A neighbour is every one with whom we have any dealing or conversation; and so also the word neighbour must signify in the tenth commandment, if it do not leave the Israelite free to covet the wife of the gentile. Nor (2.) can it be truly said, the stranger mentioned ver. 34. is only a proselyte of justice, or one who had obliged himself to observe the law of Moses. For (1.)

the text speaks of such strangers as they themselves were in the land of Egypt, where they were strangers of a different religion from the Egyptians: so again, Deut. x. 18, 19. God loveth the stranger in giving him food and raiment; love ye therefore the stranger, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt: which words afford another argument for the love of all strangers permitted to be among them, though they were not of their religion; because in this affection, they were to imitate God's love to strangers, which extended not only to those of their religion, but even to all that conversed with them, in giving food and raiment to them. (See xxiv. 22.)

Obj. It is objected, That God's commands concern the seven nations, that they should utterly overthrow them; (Exod. xxiii. 24.) that they should smite them, and utterly destroy them; that they should make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy to them. (Deut. vii. 2.) That of the Ammonite and Moabite it is said, Thou shalt not seek their peace, nor their prosperity, all thy days for ever: (Deut. xxiii. 6.) and of the Amalekites, Thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven; thou shalt not forget it. (Deut. xxv. 19.) "Habemus ergo hostes, habemus et odium;" Here we find the enemies, and the hatred, saith Grotius.

Ans. Here is indeed an instance of God's hatred of, and severe displeasure against, these nations, whom he commanded them thus to root out and to destroy, without that mercy and pity, which might preserve them from that destruction he had decreed against them for their abominable impurities and idolatries; but here is no instance of a command given to the Jews to hate them. For,

First, It is observable, that the war waged against them is called the Lord's war, and he promiseth to destroy them; and their neglect of doing it, even to a man, is styled disobedience against the Lord. This is extremely evident in the case of the Amalekites, God having said, he would utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek for ever, and sworn, he would have war with Amalek, from generation to generation. (Exod. xvii. 14. 16.) Accordingly, when the Lord sent Saul to smite Amalek, and utterly destroy them, and spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, (1 Sam. xv. 3.) it was no argument of Saul's hatred to them that he went to execute this command of the Lord, but an act of disobedience that he spared Agag, and the best of the sheep. And in like manner the war against the seven nations was the Lord's war; and the Israelites which fought against them were the Lord's hosts; (Josh. v. 14.) and the destruction of them he ascribes to himself, saying, I will destroy all the people to whom thou shalt come. (Exod. xxiii. 27.) I drive out before thee the Amorite. (Exod. xxxiv. 11. see Deut. vii. 12.) So that the Jews were only the executioners of God's vengeance upon these nations for their abominable idolatries, beastly lusts, and horrid cruelties; and sure an executioner may do according to the sentence of the judge, without hatred of those he executes; nor is it any sign of hatred to them that he spares not them of whom the judge hath said, Thou shalt not spare them. Moreover, the reason given why they should not shew mercy to them in sparing their lives, being this, (Deut. vii. 4.) For they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods; so will the anger of the Lord be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly. This sparing mercy towards them would have been not only disobedience to God's commands, but also cruelty to themselves and their posterity; and so it proved in the issue. And, lastly, whereas it is said of the Ammonite and Moabite, Thou shalt not seek their peace, nor their prosperity, all thy days for ever; the import of these words is this, saith Grotius, "Thou shalt not do it by entering into leagues of friendship, mutual assistance, and conjugal society, with them, and that by reason of the danger they might suffer by their friendship with them, who, being their near neighbours, would watch all opportunities to ensnare and disturb them." This precept therefore was to be observed, not so much out of hatred or ill-will to them, as out of friendship to themselves, and regard to their own good.

[89] Ver. 44. Ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, ἀγαπᾶτε τοὺς ἐχθροὺς ὑμῶν, But I say to you, Love your enemies, &c.] To this restrained affection of the Jews, to their own brethren, and men of their religion, Christ here opposeth his excellent precept of loving enemies. And that (1.) by shewing a sincere affection and good-will to them who bear enmity or ill-will to us, and by expressing our beneficence to them who, by their actions, shew their hatred to us; and in our works, by doing good to them for evil; and in our words, by blessing them who with their mouths curse us; and praying for God's blessing upon them who revile and persecute us as his enemies. And this affection he recommends to us,

First, From the plain absurdity of the Jewish doctrine, which made them no better in this respect than those sinners, publicans, and heathens, whom they allowed themselves to hate. For, if you only love them who love you, what reward have you? Do not even the publicans the same, even sinners? saith St. Luke, vi. 36. If you salute your brethren only, what excellent thing do you? Do not even the publicans, or, as some copies have it, heathens, so? Which words being so directly levelled against that hatred, the Jews allowed themselves to these three sorts of men, shews that the foregoing words, Thou shalt hate thine enemy, are not to be restrained to the seven nations.

Secondly, That they who boasted of this as their proper title and their peculiar glory, that they were the sons of God, might shew they really were so, by their resemblance of his goodness, who is kind to the unthankful and to the wicked. (Luke vi. 35.) For, he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. (ver. 45.) So Seneca; "Si Deos imitaris, da et ingratis beneficia, nam et sceleratis sol oritur;" If thou wouldest imitate the gods, be kind to the unthankful, for the sun rises on the wicked. (De Benef. lib. v. cap. 25.) The immortal gods (saith Antoninus) not only patiently bear with the wicked men, but also κήδονται αὐτῶν παντοίως, take all manner of care of them; and shalt thou, a mortal man, be weary of bearing with them, καὶ ταῦτα, εἷς ὢν τῶν φαυλῶν, when thou art one of them? Lib. vii. §. 70. (See Gataker in Anton. p. 291. 316. 331.)

Thirdly, That this will render us complete in this great duty of love and mercy to others; ver. 48. Be ye (in this) perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect. That this command is thus to be restrained, we learn (1.) from the parallel words, Luke vi. 36. Be ye therefore merciful, as your heavenly Father is merciful; and (2.) from the preceding words, which call not on us to resemble God in holiness, justice, fidelity, but only in beneficence and mercy, as well to the evil as the good: so that there is no reason to extend this perfection here beyond the subject-matter, though it be true, that in all other perfections in which we are required to imitate him, we are to come as near unto him as we can, truly resembling that pattern, which we cannot, nor by this precept are obliged to, equal; for "imitatio stat citra exemplar," imitation falls below the pattern. (See here Examen Millii.)

CHAP. VI.

1. [1] TAKE heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them; otherwise (if that be your inducement to perform them), ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven (because then you do alms, not out of obedience to his commands, or in resemblance of his goodness, but rather from vain-glory).

2. Therefore, when thou doest thy alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do, (proclaiming their actions) in the synagogues, and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto you, [2] They have their reward (i. e. that applause of men they seek for, and no more).

3. But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: (but do them so)

4. That thine alms may be in secret, and (then) thy [3] Father, which seeth in secret (the sincerity of thy love to others for his sake), himself shall reward thee openly (before men and angels).

5. And (likewise) when thou prayest, thou shalt not be [4] as the hypocrites are (doing this out of vain ostentation): for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men (and be deemed devout persons by them). Verily I say unto you, They have their reward.

6. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet; and, when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret (and invisible, both in his nature and operations); and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.

7. But when ye pray, [5] use not vain repetitions (or words of the same import, to lengthen out your prayers), as the heathens do: for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking.

8. [6] Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask him (and is still ready to grant the desires which come from a sincere and honest heart; so that he needs neither your words to inform, nor your persuasives to move, him; and so your requests to him may be absolved in few words).

9. [7] After this manner therefore pray ye, (saying, when ye pray, Luke xi. 2.) [8] Our Father which art in heaven (i. e. who, being in heaven, from thence beholdest all our wants, Psal. xi. 4. and must be able to relieve them, 2 Chron. xx. 7. Psal. cxv. 3. and being our God and Father, must be inclined so to do), [9] Hallowed be thy name (i. e. may all men so speak, and so think of thy Divine majesty, and so deport themselves towards thee, that thou mayest be glorified in their words, thoughts, and actions).

10. [10] Thy kingdom come (may thy gospel be generally entertained by men with due faith and obedience; may all men receive thy son Jesus Christ as their king and saviour, and humbly submit to his laws; may the Christian religion obtain every where, as well in reality as profession, the minds of all men being subdued to the obedience of faith). [11] Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven (i. e. may all men with sincerity, alacrity, and readiness, yield obedience to thy holy will, and imitate the blessed angels in an entire compliance with it, without hesitation or retinency).

11. [12] Give us this day our daily bread (i. e. be pleased continually to afford us what thou seest needful for us, and give thy blessing both upon our labours to procure it, and our food to afford nourishment and strength to us).

12. [13] And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors (i. e. give us upon our repentance, the pardon of our sins committed against thee; for we, in obedience to thy command, freely, and from our hearts, forgive the offences of others against us).

13. [14] And lead us not into temptation (suffer us not by the assaults of Satan, or the subtraction of thy graces, or by putting us for our punishment into such circumstances as may prove snares and stumbling-blocks to us, to be led into, or overcome by, the power of temptation; but grant us such a measure of thy grace, as may preserve us from falling by them); [15] but deliver us from (the) evil (of sin, and from those dispositions and inclinations which make us prone unto it; and from the assaults of the evil one): [16] for thine is the kingdom (we desire may come), and (thine is) the power (thus to assist, provide for, and protect us), and (thine is and will be) the glory (of so doing), for ever. Amen.

14. (And with great reason do I teach you to say, Forgive us our sins, as we forgive others:) [17] For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you:

15. But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.

16. Moreover [18] when ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces (putting on sad and mournful looks), that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward.

17. But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head, and wash thy face (as the Jews do on ordinary days);

18. That thou appear not unto men to fast, but (only) unto thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.

19. [19] Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt (them), and where thieves break through and steal.

20. But lay up for yourselves treasnres in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal (this being the only means to be heavenly-minded):

21. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.

22. [20] The light of the body is the eye (by which we are directed how to guide the body in our walking, as is the eye of the mind the light by which we discern our duty): if therefore thine eye be single (i. e. free from covetousness, and ready to relieve Christ's needy members), thy whole body shall be full of light (i. e. this charity will lead thee in the way to life, and will direct the actions both of thy soul and body aright).

23. But if thine eye be evil (if it be an envious, covetous eye), thy whole body will be full of darkness (i. e. all its actions will be deeds of darkness). If therefore (then) the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness? (i. e. if the inward light, which should direct thy actions, be darkness, how great and fatal will be that darkness in which thou walkest?

24. And that your affection to these earthly things may not thus blind you, consider, that) no man can [21] serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else (which is the consequent of that affection) he will hold to the one, and (comparatively) despise the other: (so that) ye cannot serve (both) God and mammon.

25. Therefore I say unto you, [22] Take no thought for (the things necessary to preserve) your life, (to wit) what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on: (for) is not the life more than meat, and the body (more) than raiment? (He then who gave this life and body, will be concerned to make provisions for them.)

26. Behold (how it is with) the fowls of the air (which are less considerable than you are): for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? (and so more assuredly will be provided for.

27. And) which of you, by taking thought, can add one cubit to his stature (or make your body taller? how much less will your solicitude preserve the whole)?

28. And why take ye thought for raiment? consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin:

29. And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

30. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? (if you distrust his care in making these provisions for you.)

31. Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed?

32. For after all these things do the gentiles seek (but ye who are under a more peculiar providence need not do it): for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things (and sure his providence will never suffer you to want what he sees needful for you).

33. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness (viz. that righteousness which will render you acceptable in his sight); and (then) all these things (as far as they are needful) shall be added unto you.

34. Therefore take no thought for to-morrow (be not beforehand importunately solicitous for your future subsistence): for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself: (i. e. you may have time enough to take thought for the morrow when it comes; add not therefore to the cares of each day, for) sufficient to the day is the evil thereof (i. e. the necessary trouble which attends each day).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VI.

[1] Ver. 1. ΠΡΟΣΕΧΕΤΕ τὴν ἐλεημοσύνην ὑμῶν μὴ ποιεῖν ἔμπροσθεν τῶν ἀνθρώπων, πρὸς τὸ θεαθῆναι αὐτοῖς. Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them, &c.] Christ in this chapter teacheth, that those works, which are otherwise good in themselves, are not acceptable to God, when they are done out of vain-glory; because they are done not for God's sake, but for our own; not with respect to his glory, which ought to be the chief end of every action, (1 Cor. x. 31. 1 Pet. iv. 11.) but that we may obtain glory from, and favour with, men. But here note,

First, That Christ doth not forbid us to perform those works of charity, which being in their nature public, tend to procure respect and good reputation among men, since they fall under the general precepts of providing τὰ καλὰ things honourable in the sight of all men, (Rom. xii. 17.) and approved of men, (xiv. 18.) and of thinking of those things which are good, virtuous, lovely, honourable, of good report, and are praiseworthy, (Phil. iv. 8.) and which St. Paul in distribution of the Corinthians' alms attended to, (2 Cor. viii. 21.) provided these things be done, not chiefly because they are commendable in the sight of men, but because they are acceptable to God, (Rom. xiv. 18.) not that they may gain glory to us, but to God, and our religion, (1 Pet. ii. 12.) and remove all occasions of bringing any scandal on it. (Tit. ii. 8. 1 Pet. iii. 16.) Nor, secondly, doth he absolutely forbid us to do these things, that men may see them, provided we desire not they may be seen from ostentation or vain-glory; but that men seeing our good works, may glorify our Father which is in heaven, (v. 16. 1 Pet. ii. 9.) Nor, thirdly, doth Christ forbid us to do these things, so that others seeing us may profit by our example, and be excited to good works, or so as to seek a good reputation among men, provided we desire it, only for the public good, that we may be more instrumental to promote God's glory, and that others may more freely hearken to our good admonitions; for in these cases we do not properly intend our own advantage, but God's glory, the welfare of souls, and the public good; nor have we our own praise and glory, but those higher ends, for the scope of all such actions. Moreover, it being not apparent from any of their writings, that it was customary with the Jews to sound a trumpet when they distributed their alms; this seems only a proverbial expression, for making a thing known or public, as both Jews and heathens were used to do by the sound of a trumpet, calling the multitude together, saith Phavorinus, by it, using it in their triumphs, and before they began to act their tragedies or comedies. (See Examen Millii here.)

[2] Ver. 2. Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, ἀπέχουσι τὸν μισθὸν αὐτῶν, Verily I say unto you, They have their reward.] It is the observation of the Jews, that God punishes all the light evil deeds of good men in this life, that he may reward them in the next, and that he rewards all the good actions of bad men in this life, that he may punish them in the next. He often gives them the outward things they set their hearts upon; sensual pleasures, wealth, honour, and glory, with men, and thus they have their good things and their reward in this life; and this is very truly and very equitably so. For these things, which can only be enjoyed in the body, and during this present life, are the things they chiefly prize, have their desires and affections set upon, and most industriously pursue, comparatively despising the things above, and neglecting their future interests, and so they very properly are styled their good things, Luke xvi. 25. And happiness being the general end of all men, they who thus chiefly prize, and above all other things pursue, these sensual pleasures, honours, and enjoyments, must chiefly place their happiness in them, and look upon them as the most comfortable, most satisfactory, and most desirable, reward of all their labours, and so in the enjoyment of them they have their reward. They therefore cannot charge God with hardships to them, they having done no good thing for which he hath not rewarded them according to their hearts' desire. He hath given them the good they chose for their portion, and made them as happy as they would be; he hath given them the things they above all things loved and delighted in, and in which they placed their chief happiness, and only lets them want the things which they despised, as not worth their labour; which being offered upon reasonable terms, they scornfully neglected and refused; and of which, by this refusal and neglect, they have rendered themselves both unworthy and incapable.

[3] Ver. 4. Αὐτὸς ἀποδώσει σοι ἐν τῷ φανερῷ, And thy Father, who seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.] Though it be true which Grotius here observes, that God doth often visibly reward the sincere charity of pious persons, performed from true love to him, with temporal blessings in this life, yet will he chiefly do it in the sight of men and angels in the world to come. (Matt. xxv. 34. Luke xiv. 14.) And it is observable, that the very thing we are forbid to seek from men on earth, is part of that reward we shall receive at that great day, when our faith and charity shall be found to our praise, honour, and glory; (1 Pet. i. 7.) and that good men, by patient continuance in well-doing, are said to seek for glory and honour, as well as immortality, Rom. ii. 7. and have the promise of it, ver. 10. (See Examen Millii here.)

[4] Ver. 5. Καὶ ὅταν προσεύχῃ, οὐκ ἔσῃ ὥσπερ οἱ ὑποκριταὶ, ὅτι φιλοῦσιν. And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites: who love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets.] Christ doth not here condemn all prayer made in the synagogues, seeing both he and his disciples often prayed with the Jews in the synagogues, (Luke iv. 16.) nor any public devotions in the house of God; but speaking only here of private prayer, he would have that performed agreeably to the nature of it, and so in secret; and condemns them only who affected to do this in public places, that others might take notice of them, and look upon them as devout, religious persons for so doing.

[5] Ver. 7. Προσευχόμενοι δὲ μὴ βαττολογήσητε, ὥσπερ οἱ ἐθνικοὶ, δοκοῦσι γὰρ ὅτι ἐν τῇ πολυλογίᾳ αὐτῶν εἰσακουσθήσονται. But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathens do: for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking.] What we here render vain repetitions, is, in the Greek, battology; which seems not well rendered by Chrysostom and Theophylact, φλυαρία, trifling, in asking little temporal things; nor by Hesychius or Phavorinus, ἀλογολογία, ἀκαιρολογία, speaking vainly and unseasonably; but is well rendered by Suidas, πολυλογία, much speaking; for (1.) our Lord seems plainly thus to explain himself, use not the battology of the heathens, who think to be heard for their much speaking: (2.) so doth the Arabic, multiply not words; so the Vulgar, "nolite multùm loqui," do not speak much: and (3.) this is agreeable to the like precept of the preacher, Eccles. v. 2. God is in heaven, thou on earth, therefore let thy words be few; and of the son of Sirach, (vii. 14.) μὴ δευτερώσῃς λόγων ἐν προσευχῇ σου, multiply not words in thy prayer: and (4.) this seems to follow from the short form of prayer prescribed, in opposition to this heathen practice, and introduced with an οὕτως οὖν, so therefore pray ye. But still it remaineth difficult to give a determinate sense to this much speaking, and say precisely when this δευτερώσις, or repetition of the same words, is vain. For,

First, We cannot reasonably conceive our Saviour here condemns all repetition of the same words in prayer; especially when it arises from a deep sense of our necessities, and a vehement desire of Divine grace. For he himself prayed thrice in the same words, to be delivered from the bitter cup. It is also highly probable, that as David composed it by the Spirit of God, so Christ sung the hymn called hallel magnum, beginning at Psal. cxv. and ending at Psal. cxviii. where in the four first verses the same words frequently occur. It was also usual for prophets, and men of excellent and raised devotion, to use the same words in the same prayer; so doth Daniel, chap. ix. saying, ver. 5. We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled; ver. 17. O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplications; ver. 18. O my God, incline thine ear, and hear; and ver. 19. O Lord, hear; O Lord, hearken. How oft doth the royal Psalmist say, (Psal. cxix.) Teach me, O Lord, thy statutes, ordinances, commandments, judgments, the way of thy statutes? In Psal. cvii. we have four times these words, Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness; (ver. 8. 15. 21. 31.) and in Psal. cxxxvi. the same words are repeated twenty-six times.

This repetition, therefore, can only be accounted vain, when it is not requisite to heighten the devotion, or when it is used as the heathens did, to lengthen out devotion, or as the comedians have it, "Deorum aures contundere," to stun the ears of the gods, as if we thought they could not hear or understand, "nisi idem dictum sit centies," unless we say the same thing over and over; and this seems to have been the design of the Baalites, in crying out from morning to noon, O Baal, hear us. (1 Kings xviii. 26.)

Secondly, It also seems not agreeable to Scripture, or reason, to assert that all long prayers are forbidden by these words of Christ; though many things which make them so, may be here by analogy forbidden, as coming under the reason of the prohibition; I say, all prayers continued to a considerable length seem not forbidden; for the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the temple was such, and so is that in Nehem. ix. where we are also told that they confessed and worshipped for three hours. In the New Testament (to omit the example of our Lord, who, according to our version, continued all night in prayer, as not conclusive, because it may be rendered, he continued all night in a synagogue, or house devoted to the service of God; see the note on Luke vi. 12. and yet not wholly impertinent, because Matt. xiv. 23. Luke vi. 12. he went up thither to pray, and therefore may be reasonably supposed to have spent much of that time in that duty) we find the church thus praying for the deliverance of St. Peter; for as the prayer itself is styled προσευχὴ ἐκτενὴς, prayer extended to a considerable length; so when St. Peter came to the house, he found them still praying. (Acts xii. 5. 12.) We also find St. Paul praying night and day, and that ὑπὲρ ἐκπερισσοῦ more abundantly, that he might see his Thessalonians; (1 Thess. iii. 10.) and also praying and giving thanks, and making mention of other churches in his prayers incessantly, (Rom. i. 9. 1 Cor. i. 4. Eph. i. 16. Phil. i. 4. Col. i. 3. 1 Thess. i. 2. ii. 13. 2 Tim. i. 3.) which sure must render his supplications of a considerable length. And, thirdly, he requires these churches προσκαρτερεῖν to continue instant in prayer, Rom. xii. 12. to pray always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, ἀγρυπνοῦντες, watching thereunto with all perseverance, and supplication for all saints, Eph. vi. 18. to continue in prayer, γρηγοροῦντες, watching in the same with thanksgiving, Col. iv. 2. to pray without ceasing, 1 Thess. v. 17. and makes it the duty of the widow (after the example of St. Ann, Luke ii. 37.) προσμένειν to continue in prayers and supplications night and day, 1 Tim. v. 5. which precepts seem plainly to suppose their prayers should sometimes be extended to a considerable length; and therefore that he did not think that length was inconsistent with the injunction here delivered by our Lord. But then positively (first) these words seem plainly to condemn prayers lengthened out upon this apprehension, that we shall be the sooner heard for our much speaking; because this is the very thing in which we are forbidden to be like the heathens; and yet this seems to have been also the misapprehension of the Jewish doctors, when they lay down these rules,* That every one that multiplies prayer shall be heard, and that the prayer which is long shall not return empty. And (secondly) all that much speaking must be vain, by which we hope with our fair speeches to incline, or by our arguments to move, or by pathetical entreaties to persuade, God to grant us our reqnests, whilst we continue in our sins, and so are indisposed to receive a gracious answer from him. And indeed, what is it to attempt to move him by arguments, but to think to move him by something he doth not know, or hath not considered already? What is it to assay to incline him by fair speeches, and by importunity, but to look upon him rather as a man, that changeth without cause, than as an unchangeable God, who cannot vary from the just methods of his government, to gratify the importunity of his creatures? And yet experience shews, that when men have thus flattered and importuned God with their lips, they are apt to think, that he on this account will hear them, and that what is thus prevalent with men cannot be lost, when tendered to a gracious God. And (thirdly) the form and exemplar given us being so short and concise in its addresses, for the advancement of God's honour, and of his kingdom, and our obedience to his will, for pardon of sin, and preservation from it; that we in it only request in general terms things of so vast importance, leaving the distinct matter, and manner, and measure, according to which they should be disposed, to the wisdom and goodness of God; I say, this form seems to instruct us, that in our daily and customary addresses to God for the same blessings which we daily want, we should use words as comprehensive, general, and free from needless repetitions as we can, and then of necessity our prayers must be concise, and our words few, and well digested.

[6] Ver. 8. Be not ye therefore like unto them, Οἶδε γὰρ ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν ὧν χρείαν ἔχετε, for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask.] If this argument against speaking much be good, said some heretics* of old, why should we pray at all, seeing God knoweth all our wants before we pray? To this St. Jerome answers, that we do not pray to declare our wants, but supplicate for the relief of them: and we may ask any thing of him, who doth already know we want it; and if we know he is kind, and ready to supply our wants, may therefore ask with greater confidence. Origen† answers, that he who knows all our needs before we ask, knows also that it becomes not him to give what they do want, who do not think it worth their while to ask what they do want, and he alone can give; because by this neglect they do not own him as the donor of the things they want. But, though this may suffice to answer this objection of the heretics, for the due understanding of this text it may be necessary to add, (1.) that this being offered as a reason why we should not be like the heathens in speaking much in prayer to God, seems only to import we should not do it on the accounts on which they did it; viz. as questioning God's omniscience, and therefore speaking thus to impart to him what he did not know, or to inculcate what he might not presently attend to, or suggest again what he had forgotten. For (1.) Cicero‡ himself denies God's omniscience, declaring, that he did not think that God himself could know things casual and fortuitous. (2.) They thonght it not fit to allow of a God so curious as to attend all things, to take care of all things, or to think all things belonged to him.§ And they thought it as well impossible as insufferable in the God of the Christians, that he should diligently inspect the manners, actions, words, and secret thoughts, of all men, and be every where present with them.‖ Nor is it to be wondered that they should have such apprehensions of many of the gods they worshipped, when they had so many of them, their celestial, aerial, and terrestrial gods; their profitable and hurtful, their universal and topical gods; their gods eternal by nature, and their gods born and made of mortal men; and made it the business not of the supreme God, but of their demons, genii, and heroes, to receive all our prayers, and return answers to them. But,

(2.) By comparing these words with ver. 30. where we are forbidden to be anxious about what we shall eat, or drink, or wherewithal we shall be clothed, for after all these things do the gentiles seek; and your heavenly Father knoweth you have need of all these things: it may be conjectured, that these words also do refer to the same matter, to wit, the heathens' solicitude about, and their continual teasing of the gods in long harangues for, these things.

Cæcil. apud Minut. p. 10.

This being in the opinion of the Greek fathers,* the battology, and much speaking here reproved in the heathens by our Lord, to wit, the being thus ardent in their desires after little and earthly things. And then this will be suitable both to the philosophy of Plato,† who commends the short prayer of the Lacedemonians, who were never heard to say more than this, τὰ καλὰ ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς θεοὺς διδόναι, that the gods would give them things good and honourable; which prayer, saith he, the oracle preferred before the long addresses and pompous sacrifices of the Athenians, who quarrelled with the gods because they were not heard for their much speaking; and adds, that temporal things were not positively to be asked, because no man knew whether he should use them ill or well, and so whether they would be good or hurtful to him; and to the opinion and practice of Socrates,‡ who prayed to the gods, saith Xenophon,§ ἁπλῶς τὰ ἀγαθὰ διδόναι, only to give him good things in the general, leaving the particulars to them who knew best what was good for him, and disapproved of them who prayed for gold, silver, and for government, as being things which might be as well hurtful to, as good for them: and more suitable to the Christian theology, which allows us to ask these things only conditionally, with subordination to the Divine will, and if his wisdom sees they will be good for us; and according to the ancients, not to pray for them at all, as knowing that as far as they are good, they shall be added to them, who seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof; to which purpose they often cite a passage from this chapter, not at present to be found in it, viz. Ask great things, and little things shall be added unto you.‖

[7] Ver. 9. Οὕτως οὖν προσεύχεσθε ὑμεῖς, So therefore pray ye.] Here observe that the word οὕτως hinders not this from being a command to utter the same words, as is apparent from these words of St. Luke, xi. 2. When ye pray, say, Our Father; for the same word is used where a form of words is certainly prescribed: thus in the form prescribed for the Aaronical benedictions, οὕτως εὐλογήσετε, so shall ye bless, saying the words following; (Numb. vi. 23.) and when God put a word into the mouth of Balaam, which he should speak to Balak, God saith to him, οὕτως λαλήσεις, so shalt thou speak, which is the same with τὰ δὲ λαλήσεις, these words thou shalt speak. (Numb. xxiii. 5. 16.) So in God's words directed to the prophets, οὕτως λέγει ὁ Κύριος, Thus saith the Lord, Isa. viii. 11. xxviii. 16. xxx. 15. xxxvii. 33. xlii. 5. xliii. 1. 14. 16. lii. 4. lxv. 8. lxvi. 1. is the same with τάδε λέγει ὁ Κύριος, These things saith the Lord, Isa. xxx. 12. xxxvii. 21. lii. 3. lvii. 15. lxv. 13. lxvi. 12. and so in the other prophets. And had not Christ intended this, he would not have given his disciples a form of prayer, but the heads only of the things they were to pray for. Secondly, The disciples request him to teach them so to pray, as John had taught his disciples. (Luke xi. 1.) Now it is highly probable that John taught his disciples to pray as the Jewish masters taught their scholars, by giving them a form called kaddish magistrorum, from which they used not to vary. But though this be admitted, yet it is still disputed whether this form were only given by Christ to his disciples to be used whilst they were infirm and weak, and before the Holy Spirit fell down upon them, and was plentifully effused upon the church, or whether it were given as a standing form to be used by Christ's disciples, or by all Christians throughout all ages of the church, as by the practice of the church, at least from the third century, they seem to have conceived. Two reasons are alleged to the contrary; viz.

First, That though we read in the Acts of the Apostles, of prayers made by the church, or by particular members of it, yet we find not any intimation that they ever used this form of prayer. We read that they prayed (Acts i. 24.) that God would shew them whether Joseph or Matthias were to be chosen into the place of Judas; (Acts ii. 42.) that those who were converted continued in the doctrine and fellowship of the apostles, and in breaking of bread and in prayers. (Acts iv. 24. 30.) So we find the whole church praying that God would enable them to speak the word with boldness, and would stretch out his hand to heal, and to shew signs and wonders through the name of his holy child Jesus. (See vi. 6. viii. 15. xii. 5. xiii. 3. xx. 36.) But in none of these places have we the least intimation that they ever used the Lord's prayer. In the martyrology of Polycarp is inserted a large prayer made by him after his condemnation, but it concludes not with this form, but with the usual form of some of our collects.

Secondly, Because the second petition in this prayer being this, Thy kingdom come, they do not think it reasonable to continue a petition for that which is come already; God's kingdom being come, and erected from the time that our Saviour ascended into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of glory. To this latter argument I shall give a full answer when I come to that petition.

To the first objection, an answer may be returned from a known rule, that a negative argument is of no validity; indeed in matters of doctrine the argument is always good; we read of no such doctrine in the Scriptures, therefore it neither is nor can be any article of faith, because we have no other rule of faith besides the Holy Scriptures; but then in matters of practice this rule will not hold good, the sacred penmen being under an obligation to deliver the whole rule of faith, but under no obligation to give us a full history of all that the apostles did: we never read that the apostles prayed, or were baptized before our Lord's resurrection; and shall we therefore say they never prayed, or that they refused the counsel of God, as did the pharisees, in being not baptized of John? After our Lord's ascension we never read that any of the apostles, save Paul and Peter, did baptize any; we read not that they ever did receive the sacrament; we read not that half of them ever preached the gospel to any nations,—and shall we therefore say, they did none of these things? St. John informs us, that there were many things which Jesus did, which were not written, (xx. 30. xxi. 25.) What wonder, therefore, is it there should be many things which his apostles did, which are not written? Secondly, In most of the texts cited from the Acts, we read not one word of the matter of their prayer, but only in general that they prayed, and so no semblance that they did not use the Lord's prayer. In the first instance, the whole consists but of one verse, in the second, but of two. Now after every collect or short ejaculation, no man thinks it necessary, or even proper, to add this prayer; but only that in some of our most solemn addresses, public or private, we should use this prayer. For we are Christ's disciples as well as they to whom this prayer was given, and so must very fitly use that prayer which is the badge of a disciple of this Lord. The prayer itself is of all others the most excellent and comprehensive, and as plain as it is full; it is so short that any man may learn it, so clear that all may understand it, so full as to comprehend all our wants, and so exact as to instruct us what we should be, as well as what we should ask, as being, saith Tertullian, "breviarium evangelii," an epitome of the gospel. It was composed by him who had the Spirit above measure, as a direction how and for what to pray, and so, as Cyprian says, we may hope, "ut facilius audiamur," to be more readily accepted by our heavenly Father, when we come to him with the words of his only Son. The learned farther do observe, that this prayer is taken out of the Jewish liturgies, in which we wholly find it, excepting only these words, as we forgive them that have trespassed against us: Our Father which art in heaven, is in their Seder Tephilloth, or form of prayers; let thy great name be sanctified, and thy kingdom reign, in their form called Kaddish; let thy memory be glorified in heaven above, and in earth beneath, in the Seder Tephilloth; forgive us our sins, in the sixth of their eighteen daily prayers; deliver us not into the hand of temptations, and deliver us from the evil figment, in that and the book Musar: For thine is the power, and the kingdom, for ever and ever, is, saith Drusius, their usual doxology. And, as hence Grotius notes, how far this Lord of the church was from affecting novelty, or despising any thing because it was a form; so others do hence justify the doxology contained in the close of this prayer, which some think to be an addition of the Greek fathers, because it is wanting in the Latin, in St. Luke, and in many Greek copies. (See Examen Var. Lect. Millii, lib. ii. cap. 1. n. 2.)

Note, lastly, that this prayer consists of three parts, a preface excellently fitted to prepare us for prayer, by filling our hearts with charity to our brother, who bears the same relation to our common Father, with reverence to him whose throne is in heaven, seated over all, and with faith and humble confidence in him, who being to us a Father, must be ready to do his children good, and being our heavenly Father, must, looking down from heaven upon the children of men, see all our wants, and must be able to supply them. The Lord's throne is in heaven (saith the Psalmist) he doth whatsoever pleaseth him. Secondly, It consists of six petitions, the three first of which calls upon us to pray for the sanctification of his name, the advancement of his kingdom, and the performance of his will, teaching us to make the glory of God, and the advancement of his Son's kingdom, the chief end of all our actions; and having first done his will, then expect provision and protection from him, and preservation from all evil. The three next respect, (1.) our daily sustenance, as being that without which we cannot be able to promote his glory, or to do his will: (2.) the remission of our past sins, that they may not obstruct his blessings, and preservation from them for the future, that we may not lose his favour: and, lastly, an agnizing the supreme dominion, the power fit to be ascribed to, and the glory due to God for ever.

[8] ΠΑΤΕΡ ἡμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς· Our Father which art in heaven.] This being spoken to his disciples, who were Jews, and had no distinct notion of a Trinity, must be understood in the usual notion of the Jews, who styled the God of Israel אבינו our Father; and so must signify the first person in the blessed Trinity, they being not able to apprehend it otherwise. Moreover, our Lord still calls the God of Israel his heavenly Father, (Matt. vii. 21. x. 32, 33. xi. 25. xii. 50. xv. 13. xvi. 17. xviii. 10. 19. 35. Luke x. 22.) clearly distinguishing himself in person from that heavenly Father with whom in essence he was one. This phrase must therefore necessarily signify a distinct person from the Son, nor is it certain that it ever bears any other sense in the New Testament.

Now God is called Father, first, by right of creation. he having made us, and not we ourselves, according to that question of Malachi, ii. 10. Have we not all one Father, hath not one God created us? On which account the Scriptures style him, the Father of our spirits. (Heb. xii. 9.) Secondly, By right of providence and preservation, for he upholds our souls in life, according to that question of God to his own people, Is he not thy Father which hath bought thee, hath he not made thee, and established thee? (Deut. xxxii. 6.) he being that one Father who is above all things by his power and essence, goes through all things by his providence, and is in all by his presence. (Eph. iv. 6.) Thirdly, By right of vocation and adoption, we being called to that faith in Christ, which constitutes us the sons of God; (John i. 12.) we being all the children of God, through faith in Christ Jesus, (Gal. iii. 26.) and by the renovation of the Holy Spirit, who enables us to cry, Abba, Father, (Rom. viii. 15.) and testifies to our spirits, that we are the sons of God; (ver. 16.) For as many as are led by the Spirit, they are the sons of God; (ver. 14.) in which sense he is styled the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named sons. (Eph. iii. 14, 15.) The angels, who by the Jews are styled his family above, being oft called the sons of God, (Job i. 6. ii. 1. xxxviii. 7.) and good men, who are styled his family on earth, being made so by adoption. Yet, though this be the most excellent notion of a son, and in this sense especially God is the Father of the Christian; yet seeing, as the heathens have well noted, God is "communis humani generis parens," the common Father of mankind; seeing he owned himself the Father of the whole nation of the Jews, and styled them all his sons,—the notion of a Father here must be extended to all the senses mentioned, or at the least to all to whom God is a Father, by calling them unto the faith; since otherwise persons of tender consciences, who doubted of their renovation in the Spirit, and of their right to claim the privileges of the adopted sons of God, could not recite this prayer in faith. And, also, (2.) then only could we pray for the regenerate in this form of prayer, and so it would be only an imperfect form; we being bound in charity to pray for all men, that they may hallow his name, and do his will.

Moreover, as this relation to God as our Father calls for our reverence of him, our fear to offend him, our zeal for his honour, (Mal. i. 6. 1 Pet. i. 17.) our obedience and likeness to our heavenly Father in purity and holiness, (1 Pet. i. 14, 15. Phil. ii. 15. 1 John iii. 2, 3.) and in love to all mankind, (Eph. v. 1.) even to them that are our enemies, and despitefully use us; (Matt. v. 44. 48.) and, lastly, our patient submission to all his fatherly chastisements: (Heb. xii. 9, 10.) so doth it naturally tend to cherish our faith, and raise our hope of speeding in our sincere, fervent, and reasonable addresses to the throne of grace; our Lord having taught us to conclude, that if earthly parents, being evil, will give good things to their children, much more will our heavenly Father give good things to those that ask him. (Matt. vii. 9, 10.)

The word Our is joined to Father, saith St. Chrysostom, Ἵνα κοίνον πατέρα ἔχειν διδαχθέντες ἀδελφικὴν πρὸς ἀλλήλους δεικνύωμεν τὴν εὔνοιαν, That being taught, we have one common Father, we may love as brethren, and pray for all the members of the church; though this hinders not, but in our private devotions we may use the singular number, and desire the supply of our own particular wants, provided we also intercede for others as well as for ourselves; so David, O Lord, thou art my God, &c. It is added, which art in heaven; not to signify that his essence is included there, for he fills heaven and earth, (Jer. xxiii. 24.) undoubtedly with the same presence, seeing he is not far from any of us; (Acts xvii. 25. 27.) and whether we go up to heaven or down to hades, or fly to the ends of the earth, we can never fly from his presence: (Psal. cxxxix. 7, 8.) and Solomon declares, That the heaven of heavens is not able to contain him. (1 Kings viii. 27.) Vain therefore is the note of Woltzogenius here, that when God is said to be any where but in heaven, we are to understand it, not of his essential presence, but of his efficacy, operation, and omniscience; for, if the heavens cannot contain him, the earth must; if he fill heaven and earth, why not with the same presence? And seeing his power and essence is the same thing, and never can be separated, how can it be conceived that he should act where he is not? He is therefore said to be in heaven, because there is his glorious presence, where he dwells in light inaccessible: and by this phrase is signified, (1.) the high majesty and supreme excellency of God, and his dominion over all creatures; as in those words of Jehoshaphat, Art thou not God in heaven, and rulest not thou over all the kingdoms of the heathen? And Psal. ciii. 19. The Lord hath prepared his throne in heaven; his kingdom ruleth over all. And so we owe to him the highest reverence, (Eccles. v. 2.) and most exact obedience. (2.) His power, whereby he is able to do for us above what we can ask or think: 2 Chron. xx. 6. Art not thou God in heaven? and in thy hand is there not power and might, so that none is able to withstand thee? Psal. cxv. 3. Our God is in heaven, he hath done whatsoever he pleased; and this engageth us to fear him above all, who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell-fire. (3.) His omniscience, by which he sitteth in heaven, beholdeth all that is done upon the earth; Psal. xi. 4. The Lord's throne is in heaven, his eyes behold, his eye-lids try the children of men: Psal. xxxiii. 13—15. The Lord looketh down from heaven, he beholdeth all the sons of men; he fashioneth their hearts alike; he considereth all their works: and this should teach us sincerity, and a regard both to our words and thoughts at all times, but more especially in our addresses to him. Lastly, His infinite purity and holiness: Deut. xxvi. 15. Look down from thy holy habitation from heaven, and bless thy people. Hence is he styled, the high and lofty One, who inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; (Isa. lvii. 15.) and this teacheth us to be holy, for the Lord our God is holy.

[9] Ἁγιασθήτω τὸ ὄνομά σου· Hallowed be thy name.] Note,

(1.) That by the name of God, we are to understand himself, considered not precisely as to his essence; for of that we may inquire with holy Job, Canst thou by wisdom find out God? But, as he is made known to us by his creating all things, to be God over all, infinite in power; by the beauty and exact order in which he hath placed all things, and the wise ends for which he hath adapted them, to be a God of infinite wisdom and knowledge; by the law of truth, equity, and righteousness, which he hath impressed upon our spirits, that he is a God of truth and righteousness; by the purity and holiness of his precepts, that he is a God of purity; and by the rich provisions he hath made, both for the present and the future happiness of man, that he is a God, rich in mercy and plenteous in goodness to the sons of men, and a true lover of souls. For, as in Scripture, τὸ ὄνομα, the name of any one is often put for his person, (Acts i. 15. Rev. iii. 4. xi. 13.) or the glory and majesty of him that bears that name; (Eph. i. 21. Phil. ii. 9, 10. Heb. i. 4.) so here the name of God signifies the Divine Majesty, or God himself, as he is made known unto us by his attributes; in which sense, to call upon the name of God, or Christ, (Gen. iv. 26. 1 Kings xviii. 24. 2 Kings v. 11. Psal. cxvi. 17. Joel ii. 32. Zeph. iii. 9.) to love the name of God, (Psal. lxix. 36. Isa. lvi. 6. Heb. vi. 10.) to blaspheme and profane his name, (James ii. 7. Rev. xiii. 6.) is to do this to God himself.

Note, (2.) That to sanctify or hallow, when it is ascribed to things capable of being changed to the better, signifies either to consecrate and set them apart from a profane to a sacred use; in which sense, the vessels of the sanctuary, set apart to God's service, were hallowed; and the priests and Levites, consecrated to God's service, are said to be sanctified; or else to be adorned with such inward habits and dispositions, as render them inwardly pure and holy; and thus we are said to be sanctified through the Spirit in the inward man. Now the Divine Majesty being infinitely holy in himself, and exalted above all that we are able to conceive, cannot be hallowed or sanctified in either of these senses, but by analogy to them. He is then sanctified by us, when we do separate him from, and in our conceptions do exalt him above, all other things, and when we do ascribe unto him the excellences of his Divine Majesty, and treat him suitably to them. According to that of St. Chrysostom, τὸ ἁγιασθήτω ἀντὶ τοῦ δοξασθήτω, hallowed, that is, glorified be thy name. Now, how this may most effectually be done, we cannot better learn than from observing, how God himself acts for his glory, and the sanctification of his holy name; now this he does by the discovery of those perfections which naturally tend to raise within us a fear and reverence and love of him, trust and affiance in him, and render us obedient to him, and in which it is our duty and our perfection to be as like to him as we can. And therefore (1.) God glorifies his name and sanctifies himself by the discovery of his mighty power, rendering him able to do exceedingly above what we can ask or think. So Psal. cvi. 7, 8. He saves them for his name's sake, that he might make his power to be known: and Isa. xliv. 23. The Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and in Israel δοξασθήσεται will he be glorified. (2.) By rendering his judgments conspicuous against presumptuous sinners, and those whose hearts are hardened from his fear; according to that saying of Solomon Jarchi on Numb. xx. 23. The holy blessed God sanctifies himself before his creatures, by the exercise of his judgments on them. Thus, saith he, Exod. xiv. 4. 17. Ἐνδοξασθήσομαι, I will get me glory upon Pharaoh, and all his host; i. e. I will shew my power and justice in their destruction. And when God had broke forth upon Nadab and Abihu, for offering strange fire, Moses saith, This is that which the Lord had pronounced, I will be sanctified in those that come nigh me; and before all the people I will be glorified, Lev. x. 3. see also Isa. v. 16. Ezek. xxviii. 22. xxxviii. 23. (3.) By rendering conspicuous his truth and faithfulness to his promises; as when the Psalmist saith, Psal. cxxxviii. 2. I will praise thy name, for thy loving-kindness and truth; for thou hast magnified thy truth above all thy name: i. e. thou hast been chiefly glorious in the punctual performance of thy promises: see Jer. xiv. 22. (4.) By shewing the riches of his grace, mercy, and goodness, to the sons of men: so when God had declared to Moses, that he was a God merciful and gracious, long-suffering, abundant in goodness, and forgiving iniquity, (Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7.) he is said to make his goodness pass before him, and to shew him his glory. (Exod. xxxiii. 22. xxxiv. 5, 6.) Only it ought to be observed from the fathers,* That the great end of all God's glorious works and dispensations, in which these excellences are displayed, cannot be this, That he may be admired and applauded by his creatures. It is vain to think, the all-wise God can be concerned, whether such blind creatures as we are approve or disapprove of his proceedings, or that he really can suffer any diminution of his glory by our dislike, or is advanced in honour by our approbation of his dispensations. We detract from his majesty if we conceive that he is tickled with applause, or aims at reputation from us, in any of his glorious actions; that therefore such as we should think well of him, can be no farther his concern, than as these apprehensions may engage us to that affection and obedience to and imitation of him, which tends to the promotion of our happiness.

God therefore in discovering the Divine perfections, must be supposed to design as well the benefit and happiness of man as the advancement of his honour. Thus, when he discovers all those attributes which represent him good and merciful, kind and obliging to the sons of men, he doth it with design, and in a manner proper, to lay the highest obligations on us to returns of love and gratitude, and to engage us to that imitation of his goodness and mercy to our fellow-creatures, which renders us the children of our heavenly Father. (Matt. v. 45.) When he gives signal demonstrations of his almighty power and his great wisdom, he designs by this to teach us, that he is able to foresee and to divert the evils which may at any time befal us, and to confer the greatest blessings on his servants, that so he may encourage us to trust in him at all times, to repair to him in the time of need, and serve him faithfully, in expectation of his favour and protection. When he manifests himself to be a God of truth and faithfulness, one who will punctually perform his promises, and execute his threats upon us, he doth this chiefly to affright us from those sins which make it necessary for him to be severe upon us, and to provoke us to the performance of those duties to which he hath annexed the greatest blessings. When he informs us, that his holiness and justice cannot permit the wicked to escape his judgments, or any upright soul to want the tokens of his love or the reward of his sincere obedience; his great design in all this is, that sin, which is the rise of all our miseries, may be avoided, and holiness, which is the true advancement and best accomplishment of human nature, may be more earnestly pursued by us: so that God's acting for his glory is also acting for the good of his most noble creatures; it is only recommending himself to their goodliking and affection, that so he may the more effectually advance their happiness. Hence therefore we may learn,

1. That we sanctify or glorify God with our mouths, when we declare and do acknowledge these his excellences; when we offer up our prayers and praises to him as the author of every good and perfect gift, ascribing all the good we do receive or hope for to him alone, and tell of all his wondrous works.

2. We sanctify him in our hearts, when we conceive aright of him, as a God infinite in all these excellences, and consequently have such impressions on our spirits as cause us truly to fear and reverence him, to believe all his revelations, trust in his promises, behave ourselves before him with all sincerity of heart, and uprightly design the promotion of his glory.

3. We sanctify him in our lives and actions, when the consideration of these Divine excellences engage us to obedience to his holy will, and to act suitably in all our dealings to our belief of them; when we shew forth his imitable perfections in our lives, (1 Pet. ii. 12.) by our sincere endeavour to resemble him in them; when we are fruitful in all those works of righteousness, which are, through Jesus Christ, to the glory and praise of God; (Phil. i. 11.) and let our works so shine before men, that they seeing them, may glorify our Father which is in heaven.

When then we say, Hallowed be thy name, we pray, That all men may so speak, so think of the Divine Majesty, and so deport themselves towards him, that he may be thus glorified in their words, hearts, and actions; and that all worship of idols and devils may wholly be abolished; and that this honour, as it is due, so may it be ascribed to him alone.

[10] Ver. 10. Ἐλθέτω ἡ βασιλεία σου· Thy kingdom come.] This cannot be understood of that general kingdom, by which God ruleth over all the world, that being always come, and capable of no amplification, and so we cannot wish rationally, in any sense, that it may come. And it seems probable, that it is not primarily and directly to be understood of the kingdom of glory in the heavens; we praying, this kingdom may come to us, that we may do his will on earth. But, considering that this phrase in the prayer, as well as in the language of the Jews, respects the kingdom of the Messiah, which they then thought should immediately appear, (Luke xix. 11.) and which they were then expecting, (Mark xv. 43.) and were waiting for, (Luke ii. 38.) and which they daily prayed for in those words,*

* Οὐ γὰρ χρείας ἕνεκεν ὁ Θεὸς πεποίηκε τὸν κοσμὸν ἵνα τιμὰς παρός τι ἀνθρώπων, καὶ παρὸς Θεὸν τῶν ἄλλων, καὶ Δαιμόνων, φησὶν ὁ Πλάτων, καρποῖτο. Clem. Alex. Strom. v. p. 585. B. Theodor. adv. Græc. Serm. 4. p. 535.

* See Vitringa de Synag. Vet. lib. iii. p. 2. cap. 8. p. 962.

Let him make his kingdom reign, let his redemption flourish, and let his Messiah come and deliver his people: (2.) that this is chiefly the import of the kingdom of God, when our Lord in the gospels speaks of it to the Jews, as is shewed, note on Matt. iii. 2. [2] and, (3.) that this prayer was composed for the use of Christ's disciples, when this kingdom of God was approaching; and both the Baptist, our Lord, and his disciples, began to say unto the Jews, Repent ye, for the kingdom of God is at hand;—I think our Saviour, in the direct and immediate sense of these words, instructs them out of zeal to God's honour, and that his name may be hallowed, and his will be done on earth, to pray, That his gospel might be generally entertained by men with due faith and obedience; that all might own and worship God in truth, receive his son Jesus Christ as their king and saviour, and humbly submit to his laws; or, in the words of the Jews, Hosanna to the word of David, (Matt. xxi. 9.) Blessed and prosperous be the kingdom which cometh in the name of the Lord. (Luke xix. 38.) And consequently, that it may reign in the hearts of all who do profess to own it, disposing them to an entire subjection to and ready compliance with its precepts, and working in them those fruits of righteousness, and peace, and joy, in the Holy Ghost, in which this kingdom does especially consist. (Rom. xiv. 17.) This being the kingdom of God intended, when it is said, ver. 33. Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof; we therefore in this petition, by parity of reason, are to pray, That all men may become subjects to the kingdom of God erected by Christ; that the knowledge of the Christian faith may come to all nations; that the kingdoms of this world may be the kingdoms of our Lord Christ, (Apoc. xi. 15.) all kings and nations, people and languages, doing him service: (Psal. lxxii. 11. Dan. vii. 14. 27.) that his kingdom may be advanced by the coming in of the Jews, and by the fulness of the gentiles; that the Christian religion may obtain every where, as well in reality as profession; the minds of all men being subdued to the obedience of faith, and they shewing forth the virtues of it in their lives.

[14] Γενηθήτω τὸ θέλημά σου, ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ, καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς· Thy will be done, as in heaven so on earth.] Note here,

First, That we pray not here that God may do his own will and pleasure; for he will always do whatsoever he pleaseth in heaven and on earth: (Eccles. viii. 3.) and, who hath resisted his will? (Rom. ix. 19.) Whether therefore we pray thus or not, he will do all his pleasure, (Isa. xlvi. 10.) and so it is needless to call upon him so to do. Nor,

Secondly, Do I think we here desire his providence may be done upon us; and that we may cheerfully submit to it; though in this consists the life of Christian patience, and self-resignation; for we here pray to do God's will on earth, as it is done in heaven, where there is perfect happiness, endless and necessary bliss, and therefore no occasion or possibility of submitting in adverse providences to the will of God. Nor,

Thirdly, Do we here pray we may on earth be equal to the blessed angels, in the perfection, readiness, and alacrity of our obedience; it being not in the power of imperfect creatures to do God perfect service; or of them who have in them flesh still lusting against the Spirit, the world still soliciting, Satan still tempting, and the corruptible body pressing down the soul, to pay continually that ready, cheerful, and complete homage, which blessed spirits, freed from all these imperfections, conflicts, and temptations, yield: and therefore, such obedience which it is impossible for us to pay, must also be unreasonable for us to desire. It is almost needless to add,

Fourthly, That we pray not here, that God would necessitate or inwardly compel us to do his will; for this is not to pray, his will may be done by us, but by him in us, nor could we then desire not to be led into temptation: but notwithstanding, by desiring his will may thus be done by us, we consequentially must desire all that grace and that assistance of his Holy Spirit, which is on God's part requisite to enable us thus to do his will. Now of these angels in heaven, we read,

First, That they stand continually before the face of God, (Matt. xviii. 10.) as being always ready to receive, and prepared to execute, his holy will: hence are they represented as having wings, and flying swiftly with them whither he is pleased to send them, to shew the readiness and alacrity with which they do his pleasure.

Secondly, That they are styled ministers of his to do his pleasure, obeying his commandments, and hearkening to the words of his mouth. (Psal. ciii. 20, 21.) This therefore seems to be the import of this prayer, That with as much readiness, alacrity, perfection, as the imperfection of human nature will admit of, we may yield obedience to his holy will, and imitate the blessed angels in a sincere compliance with it, without hesitation or renitency; and that in order to this end he would vouchsafe us those Divine assistances which may enlighten our understandings, rightly to discern what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, and powerfully incline our wills, and strengthen all our executive faculties, to such a cheerful, ready, constant, and sincere obedience to it.

[15] Ver. 11. Τὸν ἄρτον ἡμῶν τὸν ἐπιούσιον δὸς ἡμῖν σήμερον, Luke xi. 3. τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν· Give us this day (or, day by day) our daily bread.] Here let it be observed,

First, That under the name of bread, is doubtless comprehended all that is necessary for sustaining human nature, and so, meat, drink, and clothing: these things, saith Christ, your heavenly Father knoweth to be needful for you; (ver. 32.) and these things he hath promised to those who seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, (ver. 33.) and therefore will undoubtedly provide them. Having this food and raiment, the apostle enjoins us to be content. (1 Tim. vi. 8.) And thereby he defineth, saith Theophylact, what is sufficiency; with this food, Jacob terminates his wishes; for he desires only, that God would give him food to eat, and raiment to put on. (Gen. xxviii. 20.) And Agur only asks, that God would order for him τὰ δέοντα, καὶ τὰ αὐτάρκη, what he wanted, and would suffice. (Prov. xxx. 8.) Moreover, seeing the reason of asking thus our daily bread, is the necessity of it for sustaining human life, it follows that all other things must be comprised in that word, which are as needful to sustain it; to wit, that money, health to labour, and that blessing on our labours and our callings, which are necessary to procure this food and raiment; and that habitation, or house, which is necessary to preserve us from the injuries of the weather; and that seasonable weather which may enable us to reap the fruits of the earth, and so preserve us from perishing by dearth or famine; it also, doubtless, must comprise those things which are not only necessary for the sustaining of ourselves, but of our family; for seeing charity requires us to ask these things, as well for others as ourselves, it more especially requires us to desire them for them to whom we are so intimately related, and for whom we are required to provide them. All these things seem to be necessaries contained under the name of bread, or food and raiment; and with a sufficiency of these to sustain life commodiously, we must rest contented. But yet, I doubt not, that many other things may be comprised under this head, provided we do only ask them with submission to the Divine wisdom, and if he sees them needful and convenient for us, submitting our concerns about them to his providence. Thus, v. g.

First, Under the name of bread, may be comprised all those things which Providence hath given and designed for the nourishment of man; flesh, fish, fowl, wine, oil, milk, honey, the fruits of the earth, corn, roots, herbs, and of the trees that grow upon it; for all these things hath God created, to be received with thanksgiving. (1 Tim. iv. 3.) He hath given all these things to man to eat. (Gen. i. 29. ix. 2, 3.) He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herbs for the use of man, that he may bring forth food out of the earth, and wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread to strengthen man's heart. (Psal. civ. 14, 15.) And this is the import of the word bread, when Abraham said, (Gen. xviii. 5.) I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort your hearts; for he brought with it butter and milk, and the calf that he had dressed, and set it before them, (ver. 8.) Thus Joseph saith, Set on bread, (Gen. xliii. 31.) when they slew cattle, (ver. 16.) and had messes of meat, and store of good wine, (ver. 34. see 1 Sam. ix. 7. 1 Kings xxi. 7.) And, in like manner, under the name of raiment, may we understand all those things which nature hath provided for no other use we know of, but to clothe and adorn us, flax, wool, hair, silk; and which, by using to these ends, we only use unto those purposes to which they were designed by the God of nature. And,

Secondly, That we may have food and raiment in this sense, we must have all things necessary to this end; some having flocks of sheep, some herds of cattle, some employed in husbandry, some in gardening, some in dressing vineyards and oliveyards, some in clothing, some in other trades, which provide instruments necessary for these employments; and if all these things are sanctified to us by prayer and thanksgiving, then may we ask God's blessing on our honest labours to procure them, and tender our thanksgivings to him for his blessings on these labours to that end. Note, Thirdly, That the bread we are bid to ask is styled, ὁ ἐπιούσιος, that is, either the bread of the day present, or coming on: as when the wise man advises us not to say, αὔριον δώσω, I will give to-morrow, when we can at present do it, (Prov. iii. 28.) and not to boast of to-morrow, (Prov. xxvii. 1.) because we know not, τὶ τέξεται ἡ ἐπιοῦσα, what a day will bring forth, or what will be on the morrow. So Chrysostom and Origen, τὸν ἄρτον τὸν ἐπιούσιον, τουτέστι τὸν ἐφήμερον· And St. Jerome confesses, that some expound it, "de præsenti cibo," of food at present, because, say Theophylact and others, we are forbidden to be solicitous for the morrow: so also is the phrase interpreted by Phavorinus,* Suidas, and St. Chrysostom. Others interpret it the bread, τοῦ ἐπιόντος χρόνου, of the time to come, or of that future life God shall please to afford us, which seems best to comport with St. Luke, saying, Give us τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν, day by day, or after day, our daily bread; and so σήμερον may also signify, as יוֹם doth, Psal. xiii. 3. "de die in diem," from day to day; and so the sense will be, Lord, give us day by day, that which shall be sufficient for the remainder of our lives: both senses are good, and may be joined together, though I incline most to the first.

They who render this with the Vulgar, panem supersubstantialem, as they do not consider that it is in no sense, ἄρτος ἐπιούσιος daily bread, but ὑπερούσιος, more than we need for sustentation; so neither (2.) that this sense of the words relating to sacramental bread, obliges all Christians to receive the sacrament daily: (3.) that this sacrament was not then instituted, nor did the apostles for whom this prayer was made know any thing of it: and, lastly, that our petitions for spiritual bread are fully contained in the foregoing precepts. Note,

Fourthly, That the rich, as well as the poor, have need to put up this petition, not only by reason of the mutability of their affairs, and the uncertainty of those enjoyments, which may be quickly taken from them, but also from the insufficiency of their abundance to feed and nourish them without God's blessing on it, which they are therefore daily to implore; we therefore are from this petition taught,

First, How moderate our appetites should be towards these outward things, both as to quality and quantity, we being here directed to ask τρόφην, οὐ τρύφην, bread or food, not delicious fare; our necessary food, not superfluities; our daily food, not full barns, or treasures to lay up for many years; a moderate provision to be dealt to us as we need it.

Secondly, By directing us daily to apply ourselves to God for these things, we are taught to own our continual dependance on him for our being; that we owe all we have or can expect, not to our industry or wisdom, to the support of friends, or our own stock, but purely to the conduct and blessing of his good providence; esteeming his providence our best estate, his bounty our surest treasure, his fatherly care our only certain and comfortable support: and therefore praying, that from the riches of his goodness, he would continually afford us what he sees needful for us, and give his blessing both upon our labours to procure it, and on our food to afford nourishment and strength unto us.

[13] Ver. 12. Καὶ ἄφες ἡμῖν τὰ ὀφειλήματα ἡμῶν, (τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἡμῶν, Luke xi. 4.) ὡς καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀφίεμεν τοῖς ὀφειλέταις ἡμῶν (Luke, καὶ γὰρ αὐτοὶ ἀφίεμεν πάντι ὀφείλοντι ἡμῖν·) And forgive us our trespasses (sins), as (for) we forgive (every one of) them who trespass against us.] Here note that this petition supposeth these several things, viz.

First, That we, who put up this petition, are sinners, and want God's mercy in the pardon of our offences against him. For seeing Christ requires all his disciples thus to pray daily, he must exclude himself out of that number, who says, he wants not this forgiveness. Hence Solomon informs us, there is no man that sinneth not;

* Ὁ ἄρτος ἐπιούσιος ὁ τῇ ἑκάστῃ οὐσίᾳ ἡμῶν ἁρμόζων, ἢ καθημερινὸς, τὸν σήμερον ἡμῖν ἀρκοῦντα μόνον. Tom. v. p. 187.

(1 Kings viii. 46.) none who can truly say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from sin; (Prov. xx. 9.) and that there is not a just man upon earth, who doeth good and sinneth not. (Eccles. vii. 20.) And holy Job inquires, What is man that he should be clean, or he that is born of a woman that he should be righteous? (Job xv. 14. xxv. 4.) The prayer of the Psalmist is, Enter not thou into judgment with thy servant, O Lord: for in thy sight shall no man living be justified. (Psal. cxliii. 2.) St. James saith, that in many things we offend all; (James iii. 2.) and St. John, that if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us: (1 John i. 8. 10.) by all which Scriptures it is evident against the Pelagians and the Cathari, that this remission of sins is necessary not for a few only, but for all Christ's disciples, that they are not only humbly but also truly to confess they are sinners, and that if they deny it, they lie, and the truth is not in them.

Secondly, This prayer supposes also that these our sins, should God deal with us according to the merit of them, must render us obnoxious to his just displeasure, and that we therefore want the pardon of them. For seeing every sin is a transgression of God's holy law, it must render us guilty, till by an act of grace we have obtained the remission of it. And,

Thirdly, It supposeth that we are humbly to confess our sins to God, for he that begs pardon must be supposed to own his offence. And in requesting pardon for our sins, we confess ourselves to be sinners, and to need God's mercy. This petition also teacheth us,

First, To lay the foundation of our devotions in humility; and when we are addressing to God for spiritual or temporal blessings, to acknowledge our own unworthiness to receive them, that so we may more magnify his goodness, in affording them to those who are less than the least of any of his mercies.

Secondly, This being the first spiritual petition we make for ourselves, it shews how much we are concerned to obtain it; our happiness depending wholly on the favour of God, and our misery on his displeasure. And that being obnoxious to his wrath by our omissions of what he hath enjoined, and our commission of what he hath forbidden, we are first and especially concerned to obtain the pardon of our sins, and get him reconciled to us, especially if we consider that any iniquity unpardoned will obstruct the efficacy of our petitions for other things, and turn his face and his ear from us that he will not hear.

Thirdly, The condition annexed to our petitions, in that clause, as we forgive, or the reason of it in those words, for we forgive, shews us how necessary it is, that we may speed in this petition, that we come to pray with a heart full of charity and good-will to all men, and free from any grudge, ill-will, any rancour or regret against our brother, according to that counsel of our Lord, When ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have any thing against another, that your heavenly Father may forgive your trespasses; (Mark xi. 25.) seeing our own forgiveness depends upon this disposition, nor shall we be forgiven without it, (ver. 14, 15.) Yea, we come to God with a lie in our mouths, when we say to him, forgive, for we forgive others their trespasses, and pray that we may not be pardoned, when we say, forgive us, as we forgive others their trespasses, if we do not from the heart forgive them. What this forgiveness on our part doth require, see note on ver. 14, 15.

[14] Ver. 13. Καὶ μὴ εἰσενέγκῃς ἡμᾶς εἰς πειρασμὸν, And lead us not into temptation.] Temptations being of two kinds, first, such as are sent for trial of our faith and constancy, or the improvement of our graces, and the example and encouragement of others; and that Christ speaks not primarily of these, interpreters conclude, (1.) because they, by the wisdom of Christ, are made the portion of all Christians, who are to take up their cross and follow him, and must through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of God; (Acts xiv. 22.) they are appointed to them, (1 Thess. iii. 3.) and if they will live godly they must suffer persecutions: 2 Tim. iii. 12. (2.) Because these trials are sometimes necessary for us, we falling into them only εἰ δέον ἐστὶ, if need be, (1 Pet. i. 6.) and are sent for salutary ends by God; viz. to make us partakers of his holiness, and to work in us the comfortable fruits of righteousness, (Heb. xii. 10, 11.) and render us conformed to our head, (Rom. viii. 29.) and so are represented as the gifts of God: (Phil. i. 28.) and it seems not reasonable that Christ should advise us to pray against those things which are so needful for, and salutary to, us. (3.) Because we are bid to count it all joy when we fall into these tribulations, (James i. 2.) are said to be blessed and happy when we do endure them for the sake of Christ, (ver. 12. 1 Pet. iv. 14.) and believers rejoiced in them. (Rom. v. 5.) We are therefore only to pray against them, when they fall so heavy on us, as to be strong inducements to make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience, as in the case of the Thessalonians, to whom the apostle sends to know their faith, lest the tempter should have tempted them, and made his labour vain among them; (1 Thess. iii. 5.) in which case, as they are called καιροὶ πειρασμοῦ, times of temptation to fall away, (Luke vii. 13.) ὥρα τοῦ πειρασμοῦ, the hour of temptation, which was to come upon the earth, from falling by which, Christ promiseth to keep the church of Philadelphia, (Rev. iii. 10.) πύρωσις πρὸς πειρασμὸν, the fiery trial, (1 Pet. iv. 12.) which made so many of the Jews fall off from the faith: so in this sense our Saviour suffering himself to be tempted, that he might succour us when we are tempted, (Heb. ii. 18.) doubtless we may pray that God would not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able, but would with the temptation make a way for us to escape, that we may be able to bear it, (1 Cor. x. 13.) that he would so strengthen our faith, and so assist us by his Holy Spirit, that we may be able to repel all these fiery darts of Satan, (Eph. vi. 16.) and may stand in the evil day, (ver. 13.) and that he would either keep us from, or preserve us from falling in, this hour of temptation; for the Epistles are full of such prayers made by the apostles for the churches, or with directions thus to pray; and this is only praying that we may not enter into temptation, or may be delivered, when under it, from evil. Secondly, Temptations are such as lead to sin, and such are the temptations of Satan, suggesting evil things unto, or raising evil motions in us; or of our fleshly lusts, by which we are drawn away, and enticed to covet that which is forbidden. (James i. 14.) And these are the temptations which we are here especially directed to pray against, the other sort being so only to be prayed against as they fall in with these, as being strong temptations to sin. For he, who had taught us in the precedent words to pray for the pardon of our past sins, may rationally be thought here to direct us to pray, that we may be preserved from them for the future. And this may also be concluded from the following clause, but (when we are thus in danger of it) deliver us from evil; as we shall see in the interpretation of those words. And in this sense the word πειρασμὸς, temptation, occurs in Christ's exhortation to his disciples to watch and pray, lest they enter εἰς πειρασμὸν into temptation; (Matt. xxvi. 41.) when St. Paul bids the spiritual man restore those that are overtaken with a fault, in the spirit of meekness, considering himself lest he also be tempted, (Gal. vi. 1.) when he saith, they that will be rich fall into temptation, εἰς πειρασμὸν, and a snare. (1 Tim. vi. 9.)

Now by praying we may not enter into these temptations, we cannot rationally be supposed to pray that we may not be obnoxious to any solicitations or temptations to sin; for whilst we carry flesh about us, this flesh will lust against the Spirit; (Gal. v. 17.) and the whole life of Christians is a continual warfare and conflict against Satan and spiritual wickednesses, (Eph. vi. 12.) against the flesh, (1 Pet. ii. 11.) and against the allurements of that world, in which we do converse; and therefore, to pray absolutely to be freed from these temptations, is to desire to be freed from the common lot and condition of all Christians.

Yet, because there be sometimes cases in which we are more than ordinarily solicited to sin, as Joseph was by the daily importunity of his mistress; either by Satan's more impetuous assaults, as when our Saviour being hungry was tempted by the devil to make experiment whether he was the Son of God, by commanding stones to be made bread; or by some circumstances and allurements of the flesh; or of the world concurring with our inward lustings, as when the young man is tempted by the harlot to lust, or the indigent by his companions to theft or robbery; and in these cases we, by reason of our frailty and proneness to these vices, lie under great temptations to offend, and to be overcome by that εὐπερίστατος ἁμαρτία, sin which doth too easily beset us: in all these cases we are especially to pray we may not enter into temptation, this being only to desire we may not be obnoxious to the continual peril of offending, and to the fierce assaults of a temptation. Note, Thirdly, That to be led, or enter into temptation, in the Scripture sense, is to be drawn by the allurements of a temptation to commit iniquity. In this sense Christ adviseth his disciples to pray, not that they might not fall into times of temptation, for they were then come; not that Satan might not vex or tempt them to evil, for this he told them they were to expect; but that they might not fall into temptation, i. e. they might not be overpowered by the incursion of it; in which sense the apostle saith to the spiritual man, restore thy brother in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself lest thou also be tempted; (Gal. vi. 1.) i. e. lest thou also fall by a temptation (see the note there): and to his Thessalonians, I sent to know your faith lest the tempter should have tempted you, and my labour be in vain. (See the note there.) And if we do consider that this petition, in the Jewish phrase, runs thus, bring us not into the hand, or power, of temptation, we shall be easily induced to believe, this is the primary import of these words, though they may also secondarily request, that the providence of God would not subject us to those circumstances, which lay us under a great peril of offending; or when he doth think fit to do so, that he would not deny us strength sufficient to repel the violence of those assaults.

Fourthly, That we may understand in what sense it is fit to pray, that God would not lead us into temptations of this kind, we must know,

1. That God cannot be supposed to lead any man into temptation to sin, either by infusing any evil principle into his heart, or by inclining, exciting, or enticing, any man to sin, or by laying upon any man a necessity to commit it, (see note on 2 Thess. ii. 11.) seeing in all these cases he would be certainly the author of it, as much as Satan and our own concupiscence can be supposed so to be; and we in vain should ask of him, not to be led into temptation, who is disposed to do those things which will infallibly subject us to it. And hence St. James speaks thus unto us, Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. (James i. 13.) God therefore can be only said, to lead us into temptation upon such accounts as these. (1.) That he is pleased to remove those restraints which he had laid on Satan, and to let loose his chains, so that he may freely assault and try his strength upon us; for it is carefully to be observed, for our comfort, that Satan cannot tempt us at his pleasure, but only when and so far as God shall be pleased to permit him; as is apparent in the case of Job, whom Satan could not touch without permission from God; and the example of the apostles, whom Satan first begged leave to winnow, before he could assault them. (Luke xxii. 31.) And surely he who durst not enter into the swine till leave was given him by Christ, can much less fall on his disciples without leave. And when God in his wisdom seeth fit to grant it, he himself is said to do what he permitted Satan to effect. So when he permitted Satan, by his ministers, to destroy the substance and the children of Job, Job said, God gave, and God hath taken away. (Job i. 21.) And God himself speaks thus to Satan, Thou movedst me to afflict him without cause, (ii. 3.) So in the case of David numbering the people, Satan rose up against David, and moved him to number the people. (1 Chron. xxi. 1.) Yet because God permitted him to do it, it is said, 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. that the fury of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David to say, Go number the people. The coming of antichrist is said to be, with the operation of Satan, in all power, and signs, and lying wonders, with all deceivableness of iniquity to them that perish. (2 Thess. ii. 9, 10.) But because he doth this by God's permission, towards them who received not the truth in the love of it, that they might be saved, but had pleasure in unrighteousness; therefore it is said, that God sent them strong delusions to believe a lie: (ver. 11, 12.) because God did not only permit this, but did so for the punishment of their infidelity and impiety; so God designing the destruction of a wicked Ahab, permitteth Satan to be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets, and saith to him, Thou shalt deceive him and shalt prevail, go forth and do so, (1 Kings xxii. 20. 22.) giving him full permission so to do. (2.) That he is pleased to withdraw that grace, which hath in vain been given, and take those talents from us, which hath been hidden in a napkin: according to that rule of God's proceedings, To him that hath (i. e. improveth what he hath) shall (more) be given; but from him that hath not (i. e.

who by not using it, as if he had not), shall be taken away that which he hath. (Matt. xiii. 12. xxv. 29.) Here therefore note, (1.) that we are not sufficient for ourselves, without Divine assistance, to repel and overcome the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil, and to yield constant and sincere obedience to the will of God: for were this so, why should we be daily asking that of God, which he already hath put into our own hands? This hath been owned even by the wisest of the heathens,* that there was never a good man without a Divine aid; and that the imperfection of the human nature requires this aid, to regulate our passions, and conquer the difficulties of a virtuous life. And this is fully evident from all those places in Scripture, in which it is ascribed to God alone to be able to keep us from falling, (Jude 24.) to be able to stablish us, (Rom. xvi. 25.) καταρτίσαι to confirm us in every good work to do his will, working in us what is good and acceptable in his sight, (Heb. xiii. 21.) and to work in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure: (Phil. ii. 13.) and from those places, which require us to pray that we enter not into temptation, (Matt. xxvi. 41.) that we may be able to stand against the assaults of Satan, (Eph. vi. 11.) that we may have wisdom to direct us how to bear them, (James i. 5.) and that we may keep ourselves in the love of God. (Jude 20, 21.) For these things evidently shew God's grace preventing us is necessary to make us truly willing, and his assisting grace to make us able to perform our duty; and that we are not able to bear up against and overcome these temptations without the Divine aid. (2.) Observe that this aid is not to be expected without diligent seeking it by fervent prayer, and knocking for it with daily importunity: (Matt. vii. 7. Luke xviii. 1.) nor will it be continued to us without our diligent endeavours to make some due improvement of it; it rather is to be supposed that he, who doth not rightly ask it, shall not have it, and that from the slothful and unprofitable servant it should be wholly withdrawn. And then, (3.) from the withdrawing of that which is so necessary to preserve us from falling by temptations, and to enable us for the performance of our duty, it certainly will follow that we shall fall by them, and shall neglect our duty. Now because God denies or withdraws his grace, by way of punishment of our iniquity in resisting, or neglect in asking it, or sloth in not improving it when granted to us, he may on this account be said to lead us into temptations, although he doth not otherwise concur unto it, than by withdrawing or not affording his abused grace to persons so neglectful, and therefore so unworthy of it; because by giving us thus up into the hand or power of the temptation, we shall as certainly fall by it, as if he himself led us into it. Thus, because when the gentiles knew God, they did not glorify him as God, but fell into all manner of idolatry, God also gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts: (Rom. i. 24.) he gave them up to vile affections: (ver. 26.) he gave them up to a reprobate mind, (ver. 28.) as a physician gives up his patient to do what he will, when he finds he will not follow his prescriptions. (See the note there.) So, though Ahithophel gave Absalom that wicked counsel, of going into his father's wives, and his own wicked heart inclined him to commit that incest; (2 Sam. xvi. 21, 22.) yet, because God permitted Satan to inject this counsel into the heart of Ahithophel, and gave up Absalom to his own heart's lust, and did all this for the punishment of David's murder and adultery; he by his prophet saith, I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and I will give thy wives to thy neighbour, and he shall lie with them: I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the sun. (2 Sam. xii. 11, 12.) And, lastly, because the Jews shut their eyes against the gospel, and seeing would not see, and hearing would not understand, (Matt. xiii. 14, 15.) the gospel was spoken to them in parables, (ver. 13.) and afterward taken from them, and God is said to have given them a spirit of slumber, Rom. xi. 8. (See the note there.)

And, thirdly, God is sometimes said to do this, by leaving them under those circumstances, or by his providence placing them in a condition, which he foresees will, through the wicked inclinations of their own hearts, render them subject to temptations, and prone to yield to them, or fall by them. Thus was he pleased to send his prophet to anoint Hazael king of Syria; (1 Kings xix. 15.) though he knew the evil he would do to the children of Israel, by slaying their young men with the sword, dashing their children in pieces, and ripping up their women with child, when he was once advanced to that station: (2 Kings viii. 12, 13.) because he was permitted to do this for the punishment of the sins of Israel. And because by the flight of David and the conspiracy of Absalom, occasion was given to Shimei to curse David without fear of punishment, the king speaks thus, Let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, Curse David; (2 Sam. xvi. 11.) i. e. he by his providence hath given him an opportunity of venting thus his malice without fear of punishment. Thus God is said to have turned the hearts of the Egyptians to hate his people: (Psal. cv. 25.) not by infusing hatred into their hearts, but by increasing his people continually, and making them stronger than their enemies, (ver. 24.) Thus Jeremiah saith, Ah, Lord God! surely thou hast greatly deceived this people; (Jer. iv. 10.) i. e. as the Chaldee paraphrast well interprets it, by suffering the false prophets to say to them, Peace, peace, when there was no peace, (vi. 14. xxiii. 17.) And the church speaks thus to God, Why hast thou caused us to err from the way, and hardened our hearts from thy fear? (Isa. lxiii. 17.) though he had only concurred to this, by withdrawing the Spirit, against whom they had rebelled; (ver. 10.) by withholding those blessings and tokens of his favour, by which they were encouraged to fear him; (ver. 12. 15.) and by subjecting them to the power of their enemies, whose service made them alien from his fear, (ver. 17, 18.) So, lastly, is he said to lay a stumbling-block in the way of the righteous, departing from his righteousness, and committing iniquity, (Ezek. iii. 20.) when he doth not recall him by his chastisements, but leaves him to his own heart's lusts, and to the temptations of Satan and his evil companions.

So then the import of this petition is to this effect; Suffer us not, O Lord, either by the assaults of Satan, or the subtraction of thy grace, or by putting us, for the punishment

* Εὖ γὰρ χρὴ εἰδέναι, ὅτι οὐκ ἂν σωθῆ τε καὶ γένηται οἷον δεῖ, ἐν τοιαύτῃ καταστάσει πολιτείας, θεοῦ μοῖραν αὐτὸ σῶσαι. Plato de Repub. lib. vi. p. 677. C. Vide Epin. 1014.

"Multos et nostra Civitas et Græcia tulit singulares Viros, quorum neminem nisi juvante Deo talem fuisse credendum est. Nemo igitur Vir magnus sine aliquo afflatu Divino unquam fuit." Cic. de Nat. Deor. lib. ii. ad finem. Vid. Arrian in Epict. lib. iii. cap. 21. p. 306. Max. Tyr. diss. 22. p. 218.

of our sins, into those circumstances, which may prove snares and stumbling-blocks unto us, to be led into and overcome by the power of temptation; but be thou pleased to afford us always such a measure of thy grace, as may keep us from falling by temptations; or if we fall into temptations, may so support us under them, that we be not foiled by them; or if we slide, may be erected quickly by thy power, and stand more firmly for the future.

[15] Ἀλλὰ ῥῦσαι ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ, But deliver us from evil.] The temptations we desire not to be led into, being temptations to sin, the evil from which we here request to be delivered, must be either that of sin, or Satan, the great tempter to it; if by ὁ πονηρὸς, we understand with Tertullian, Origen, and Chrysostom, the devil, who is a malicious, subtle, powerful, and diligent tempter, and therefore one against whose assaults, that we may stand firm, we are to pray always with all prayer, and watch thereunto with all perseverance: or our own evil concupiscence, vicious inclinations, and distempers of mind, by which we are enticed and drawn into sin; this very properly is added to the former clause, as the most sovereign expedient to preserve us from being led into temptation, and so we may well pray, that, in order to that end, God would graciously preserve us from those evil frames of heart, and dispositions of spirit, which render us so prone to yield to a temptation, and from the violent assaults of Satan, who, being once let loose upon us, will not fail to hurry us unto sin.

[16] Ὅτι σοῦ ἐστιν ἡ βασιλεία, καὶ ἡ δύναμις καὶ ἡ δόξα, for thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory.] It must be owned that this clause is not in St. Luke, nor in many copies of St. Matthew, yet are there sufficient reasons to receive it as part of the Lord's prayer, as being in the Syriac version, and owned in the Greek liturgies, and being in most ancient copies, and a familiar doxology of the Jews; and, lastly, because it is very unlikely the holy fathers of the Greek church should presume to add their own inventions to a form of our Lord's own composing; but it is probable that our Lord, delivering this form twice upon different occasions, might add this clause at the first time, and leave it out at the second, and that the Latin copies, which are full of errors, might leave it out in both, lest the evangelists should seem to differ in a matter so considerable. But of this, see more in Examen Millii, lib. ii. cap. 1. n. 2. Now the import of this clause seems to be this, We pray thy kingdom may come, and that thy name may be hallowed, and thy will be done by all men, for thine is the kingdom, and all men are concerned to honour thee, and to obey thy holy laws; we pray for temporal blessings to be derived from thee, for the pardon of our past sins, and preservation from them for the future, for thine is the power thus to provide for and protect us, and thou alone canst pardon our offences; we pray for all these, for, by thus hallowing thee, owning thy kingdom and doing thy will; by thus pardoning, providing for us, and protecting us, thine will be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

[17] Ver. 14. Ἐὰν γὰρ ἀφῆτε, &c. For if you forgive men their trespasses.] Note here, that God promiseth in these words remission of sins, to him that forgiveth others; not that this virtue can alone obtain favour with God, where other Christian duties are neglected: for though negative precepts are absolute, and he that forgiveth not, shall never be forgiven, yet affirmative promises admit this limitation, si cætera sint paria, if no other condition of salvation shall be wanting. So, v. g. He that heareth not (the gospel revealed to him) shall be damned, is absolutely true; but he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, is only true, if he perform the condition of his baptismal covenant, when he is in capacity to do so. Or, (2.) this promise is made to him who from his heart forgives his brother, because he who doth thus forgive the offences of his brother, in obedience to God's commands, and from a sincere desire to obtain forgiveness of God, will by the same motives be induced to do whatever else is necessary to obtain favour and acceptance with him. Now to this true remission it is requisite,

First, That our minds be fully freed from all desires of revenge, or of returning evil to our brother, according to that admonition of St. Paul, (Rom. xii. 19.) Avenge not yourselves, but rather give place to wrath: for God hath said, Vengeance is mine; and I will repay it. See to it, that none render evil for evil. (1 Thess. v. 15. 1 Pet. iii. 9.) This being to do that ourselves, which it belongs to God to do. And hence it follows, that we must not desire God to revenge our quarrels, seeing this shews a mind desirous to be avenged of our brother.

Secondly, That we do not rejoice in any evil that befals our brother, according to that admonition of Solomon, Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth, and let not thine heart be glad when he stumbleth. (Prov. xxiv. 17.)

Thirdly, That we do not so retain the evil done unto us in our memory, as to reproach him for it, or upbraid him with it, this being an indication that we have not from the heart forgiven him. Thus the Jews say, that he who being desired by one to do that for him, which he refused to do to him, answers, I will not deal with thee as thou hast dealt with me; he, though he lends what is desired, doth not forgive.

Fourthly, That we be still inclined to shew kindness to, and be still ready to help and do him good; for what the law required the Jew to do to the beast of his enemy, (Exod. xxiii. 4, 5.) the gospel doth assuredly require the Christian to do to his enemy; and if we by consideration of the injury done to us be restrained from helping him, we have not from the heart forgiven him.

And so far we must go in our forgiveness of all persons at all times, even though they do not ask forgiveness. When this is done sincerely, then,

Fifthly, We are to admit our offending brother into friendship and familiarity again; for if we from the heart forgive him, our heart must be towards him as formerly it was. Moreover, this remission must be,

First, Without delay, before the sun goes down, saith the apostle, before we go to our devotions; for when you pray (saith Christ) forgive: (Mark xi. 15.) seeing we pray to God for forgiveness at present, and if we do not thus forgive, we cannot say forgive us as we forgive.

Secondly, It must be an entire forgiveness of all, even the most heinous crimes; for this the example of the ten thousand talents forgiven by our Lord requires. (Matt. xviii. 24.) And otherwise, when we pray to be forgiven as we ourselves forgive, we pray that our greatest crimes may not be forgiven.

Thirdly, This forgiveness must be extended to our brother, though he doth frequently offend; (Luke xvii. 3.) for we pray daily to God for the remission of our daily sins.

[18] Ver. 16—18. Ὅταν δὲ νηστεύητε, μὴ γίνεσθε ὥσπερ οἱ

ὑποκριταὶ, but when ye fast, be not as the hypocrites.] i. e. Do nothing which may signify you fast to gain applause from men. (See the discourse of fasting; appendix the third at the end of this Gospel).

[19] Ver. 19. Μὴ θησαυρίζετε ὑμῖν θησαυροὺς ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, &c. Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, but lay up treasures in the heavens.] These and the following words to the end of this chapter, contain an excellent dissuasive from an inordinate affection to, and from an anxious solicitude about, the good things of this present life; taken,

First, From the consideration of the nature of them, they being fading, and subject to casualty, (ver. 19.)

Secondly, From the mischiefs of them, when our hearts are set upon them, and our minds are anxious about them. For, (1.) they take off our hearts from those true, spiritual, and lasting blessings, ver. 20, 21. which we should primarily and chiefly prosecute, ver. 33. (2.) They corrupt all our actions, and turn them into deeds of darkness, ver. 22, 23. (3.) They rival God, and take off our affections from him, ver. 24. (4.) They shew great want of faith, and trust in God, ver. 30. (5.) They add to the evils of this present life, ver. 34. discruciating the mind with cares, which are, (1.) fruitless, ver. 27. (2.) needless, seeing our heavenly Father knows our wants, ver. 32. And he who is so liberal in making provision for the grass of the field, and for the fowls of the air, will not be wanting in his provisions for the necessities of his children, ver. 26. 28—30. And, (3.) they are heathenish, for after all these things do the gentiles seek, ver. 32.

Note, also, that by the word treasure we are not to understand every thing which we lay up for the future, provided we be ready, when the glory of God, or the duties of charity, require us to part with it, for merchandize and husbandry cannot be carried on without something laid up in store; but that is in the forbidden sense our treasure, which we chiefly prize, delight in, and set our heart upon; as we may gather from those words, For where your treasure is, there will your hearts be also; (ver. 21.) and which we do chiefly spend our time and study to pursue and prosecute, with the neglect or to the hazard of our heavenly treasure, as appears from the opposition here: that which we seek first, (ver. 33.) and are concerned for, though we be not rich towards God. (Luke xii. 21.)

[20] Ver. 22. Ἐὰν οὖν ὁ ὀφθαλμός σου ἁπλοῦς, &c. If thy eye be single, thy whole body will be full of light; ἐὰν δὲ ὁ ὀφθαλμός σου πονηρὸς, &c. but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body will be dark.] That by the single eye, the liberal person, by the evil eye, the covetous man, is intended, appears, (1.) from the connexion of the words: for the preceding words are a dissuasive from laying up treasures on the earth: the following from the love of riches: and therefore the intermediate words most probably relate to the same thing. (2.) From the like use of the phrase, both in the sacred writers and among the Jews, who say proverbially, He that gives a boon, let him do it with a good eye, i. e. freely and liberally; and, give thy first-fruits ἐν ἀγαθῷ ὀφθαλμῷ, with a good eye: (Ecclus. xxxv. 10.) so ψυχὴ ἁπλῆ, is the liberal soul, (Prov. xi. 25.) and to give ἁπλῶς and ἐν ἁπλότητι, is to give liberally. (James i. 5. Rom. xii. 8. 2 Cor. viii. 2. ix. 11. 13.) And, on the contrary, ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρὸς, the evil eye, is the covetous eye that envies others any share of its good things. So Prov. xxviii. 22. He that hasteth to be rich is a man רע עין of an evil eye; and xxiii. 6. Eat not the bread of him that hath an evil eye, for the evil eye, ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρὸς, is envious for his bread, and he is a niggard at his table; (Ecclus. xiv. 10. Tob. iv. 16.) Give alms of thine abundance, and let not thine eye be envious when thou givest alms; and Matt. xx. 15. ὀφθαλμός σου πονηρὸς, is thine eye evil, because I am good? So that the import of these words is this; As the eye gives light to the body to lead it safely in the way, so the eye or mind free from covetousness, and ready to relieve the wants of Christ's needy members, will be a light to the Christian to lead him in the way of life; whereas, covetousness being the root of all evil, he that hath this evil eye, must be led by it into evil, and walk in darkness, and in that way which leads to utter darkness; for the friendship of this world is enmity to God, (James iv. 4.) and he that loveth this world, the love of the Father is not in him. (1 John ii. 15.) Now our affections are inordinately set upon the things of this world,

First, When we are not contented with those things that we at present do enjoy, though we have what is necessary, to wit, food and raiment: (1 Tim. vi. 8, 9.) for this man is ὁ Βουλόμενος πλουτεῖν, one that cannot be contented without being rich. (See note on Heb. xiii. 5.)

Secondly, When being not satisfied with things needful, we are solicitous for superfluities, Luke xii. 15. (See the note there.)

Thirdly, When we cannot freely give of our superfluities, when the necessities of Christ's members do require our charity; but we do this grudgingly and sparingly; and our charity is extorted from us by shame or importunity, and comes not liberally and freely from our hands, for then it is imparted ὡς ἐκ πλεονεξίας, as of covetousness, and not of good-will, 2 Cor. ix. 5. (See the note there.)

[21] Ver. 24. Οὐδεὶς δύναται δυσὶ κυρίοις δουλεύειν, No man can serve two masters.] Here is an excellent rule, by which we may infallibly discern what we do prevalently love in any case, even that which we cleave to, with neglect of that which stands in competition with it. And hence it follows, that we love mammon more than God, (1.) when we pursue it by unlawful or forbidden means; by a lie, as Ziba and Gehazi, by fraud, oppression, theft, violence, or by false testimony; for in all these cases we despise God's authority to obtain mammon. (2.) When our labour and concernment for these temporals, do cause us to neglect or be remiss in the performance of our duty to God, then are we ἀμελήσαντες, despisers, and neglecters of his invitation, out of regard to our fields, our yoke of oxen, or our married wife. (Matt. xxii. 5.) And, (3.) when we cannot part with them for God's sake, but choose rather to make shipwreck of a good conscience, and quit our interest in spiritual than in temporal blessings; for then we certainly cleave to them more than God, and him we do comparatively despise.

[22] Ver. 25. Μὴ μεριμνᾶτε τῇ ψυχῇ. Take no thought for your life: Ver. 34. Μὴ μεριμνήσητε εἰς τὴν αὔριον· Take ye no thought for the morrow.] We are not to imagine that Christ doth here forbid our provident care and diligence in providing, by our honest labours, things necessary for this present life, or even all care of improving ourselves, or getting wealth by this means; for God hath commanded us to labour with our hands, both for provisions for ourselves and others. (Eph. iv. 28.) This also is the reward God hath promised to the diligent hand, that it shall make us rich; and these enjoyments are useful, not only for the offices of charity, but also for the flourishing estate of kingdoms and commonwealths: and therefore cannot absolutely be forbidden. Nor can we reasonably think Christ here forbids all provident concernment for the future, i. e. not only for the morrow, but the next month or year; all laying up provisions of corn, wine, oil, money, which economical wisdom doth require, and prudence in all governments instructs men to do. The solicitude therefore about these things forbidden here, is, (1.) a solicitude arising from a want of faith, or a surmise, that Divine Goodness may be wanting to us in things his wisdom seeth needful for us, ver. 30. (2.) A regard to these things more than spirituals, and with a comparative neglect of them, you cannot serve God and mammon; διὰ τοῦτο, and for this cause, I say unto you, Take no thought, &c. (3.) Such a solicitude for these things as makes us anxious, rends and afflicts our hearts with fears lest we should want them, as may be gathered not only from the import of the word μεριμνᾶν, but from the reason assigned of this precept, Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof; i. e. the cares and troubles which necessarily attend each day.

And, lastly, let it be noted, that though generally speaking it be true that the gentiles, ἐλπίδα μὴ ἔχοντες, having no certain hope of future blessings, sought thus after these things: yet some of their philosophers have used the same arguments against this solicitude, declaring,

First, That a philosopher and servant of God ought not to be solicitous for these things, δεδοικὼς μὴ οὐ σχοῇ τροφὰς ἄφριον, as fearing he might want food to-morrow. (Arrian, lib. iii. cap. 9. p. 109. cap. 36. p. 348.)

Secondly, That a good man ought to believe God will provide things necessary for him; for, saith Epictetus in Arrian, p. 350. Φοβεῖ τὶς ἀνὴρ ἀγαθὸς μὴ λίπωσιν αὐτῷ τρόφαι; Doth any good man fear he may want food? Will he, who is not wanting to the blind and lame, be wanting to good men? Doth God so neglect his servants and his witnesses of his care and providence?

Thirdly, They add, that this fear renders us worse than brutes, ὧν ἕκαστον αὐτὸ αὐτῷ ἀρκούμενον οὔτε τροφῆς ἀπορεῖ τῆς οἰκείας, which are content with their portion, and want nothing necessary for preservation of their lives. (Lib. iii. cap. 9. p. 108. see Examen Millii here.)

CHAP. VII.

1. [1] JUDGE not (severely, and without charity and mercy), that ye be not judged (accordingly, James ii. 13.)

2. For with what judgment ye judge (men), ye shall be judged (of God); and with what measure ye mete (to them), it shall be measured to you again.

3. And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye (i. e. his lesser failings), but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye (i. e. thy own greater crimes)?

4. Or how wilt thou say to thy brother (without shame and self-condemnation), Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye?

5. Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye (i. e. reform first thy own greater sins, and then thou wilt be better fitted to reprehend the failings of others.

6. But then, that being thus fitted to correct the vices of others, you may not labour in vain, or run into hazards without cause,) [2] Give not that which is holy unto dogs, neither cast you your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you (i. e. continue not to preach the gospel to those whom you find refractory, and pertinaciously confirmed in their infidelity, and so addicted to their evil habits, that they will rather revile and persecute you on that account than hearken to you.

7. And that ye may never want what is necessary to the performance of your duty as Christians or apostles,) [3] Ask (in faith), and it shall be given you; seek (diligently), and ye shall find; knock (perseveringly), and it shall be opened unto you:

8. For every one that asketh (duly) receiveth; and he that (thus) seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh (thus), it shall be opened.

9. (And of this you may be assured from the kindness of earthly parents, for) [4] What man is there of you, whom, if his son ask bread (of him), will he give him a stone?

10. Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent (i. e. will he give him what is unprofitable for or hurtful to him)?

11. If ye then, (though) being evil, know how (and are inclined) to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that (duly) ask him?

12. (And as I have thus taught you how to obtain what you would have God to do for you, so do I now teach you the best way to obtain what you would reasonably desire of men:) [5] Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for (in) this (rule) is (comprised the substance of) the law and the prophets.

13. Enter [6] ye in at the strait gate, (that leadeth unto life, ver. 14.) for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat (with ease; but there is great need of industry, and much striving to get into the other):

14. Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.

15. (And that you may not be led out of it,) [7] Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing (as the old prophets did), but inwardly they are ravening wolves.

16. Ye shall know them by their fruits, (for) do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? (Surely, no.)

17. Even so (it is not to be expected that ye should receive good from such persons; for) every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit.

18. [8] A good tree (whilst it continues so) cannot bring forth evil fruit; neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.

19. (And yet it is of great importance that your fruit should be good; for) every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down, and cast into the fire (the punishment reserved for such false prophets and evil workers).

20. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them (whom I thus bid you beware of, for)

21. [9] Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord

(or calls himself one of my prophets or disciples), shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he (only) who doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven, (and thus will it appear to be in the great day; for)

22. [10] Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works?

23. And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you; (i. e. never approved of you as my disciples, therefore) depart from me, ye that work iniquity.

24. [11] Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, who built his house upon a rock:

25. And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock (so also will the obedient person stand firm in the day of trial).

26. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened to a foolish man, who built his house upon the sand:

27. And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it (i. e. so will it be with him who lives not suitably to my doctrine).

28. And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine:

29. For he taught them [12] as one that had authority (from God to teach them), and not as the scribes (who only taught them what were the traditions and expositions of their fathers).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VII.

[1] Ver. 1. ΜΗ᾽ κρίνετε, ἵνα μὴ κριθῆτε. Judge not, that ye be not judged.] Here note,

First, That Christ cannot reasonably be supposed in these words to forbid the magistrate to sit in judgment on the criminal, or to condemn notorious offenders, since by his own authority it is that kings do reign, and princes decree judgment. They are the ministers of God, ordained for the execution of his wrath upon the evil-doer, and the defence, encouragement, and reward of well-deserving subjects, which office they can never execute, unless they have authority to judge, who are the persons that do good or evil, and to pass sentence on them according to their actions. Moreover, we are obliged to pray for magistrates, that under them we may live peaceable and quiet lives; which, in effect, is to desire that they may judge, restrain, condemn, and punish the factious and profane, seditious and ungodly person. (See Prov. viii. 15. Rom. xiii. 4. 1 Tim. ii. 2.) That, therefore, cannot be forbidden here, which is the duty and design of magistracy, and which all Christians are obliged to pray for.

Secondly, It cannot reasonably be thought, that Christ doth here forbid church governors to judge, condemn, and pass the censures of the church upon notorious and scandalous offenders, because he hath himself enjoined the execution of her censures upon those, who will not hear the church when she requires them to repent of, and satisfy their Christian brother for, any trespass done against him. (Matt. xviii. 17.) He hath committed to them an authority to bind and loose, retain or to remit offences, as upon due examination of the fact they shall find cause to do so; (Matt. xvi. 19.) which office doth suppose a power to judge not only who offend, but what offenders may deserve to be condemned, and to proceed according to their judgment in those matters. St. Paul himself doth in the general declare, That it belongeth to the church to judge of them, who are within the pale of her communion; that he himself had judged the incestuous person, and that it was the duty of the church to put out or exclude from her communion that wicked person. (1 Cor. v. 3. 12. 15.) And to deny the rulers of the church this power, is wholly to dissolve her discipline, to lay upon her a necessity of giving holy things to dogs, which their great Pastor here forbids, and render her unable to remove the precious from the vile, which they, who are God's mouth unto the people, are obliged to do. (Jer. xv. 19.)

Thirdly, Christ doth not here forbid the Christian to pass a judgment on the manifest or notorious actions of his Christian brother, seeing he doth enjoin such duties as cannot be performed without this judgment; v. g. he enjoins him to reprove his brother, and not to suffer sin upon him; (Lev. xix. 17.) to have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but reprove them; (Eph. v. 11.) to withdraw himself from every brother that walks disorderly, and not according to the traditions received from the apostles; (2 Thess. iii. 6.) to mark them who caused divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrines they had received from them, and avoid them; (Rom. xvi. 17.) to turn away from them, who, though they had the form, denied the power of godliness; (2 Tim. iii. 5.) not to communicate with him, who, being called a brother, is a fornicator, or idolater, or a drunkard. (1 Cor. v. 11.) Now it is impossible that any Christian should perform these duties, who does not judge who walks disorderly, who commits deeds of darkness, who is a fornicator or idolater, who make divisions, and the like; and, therefore, to forbid this judging, is consequently to forbid the practice of these Christian duties. But, positively,

First, The reason of the prohibition shews, that judging and condemning others must be here forbidden, which will render us obnoxious to judgment and condemnation from God; now such is all rash and uncharitable judgment, and all the judgment we pass upon our brother, without sufficient ground; viz. (1.) that judgment which we pass upon his person, state, or actions, when we have no right or authority to do so, by virtue of our office, or that relation which we bear unto him, or the discharge of any duty, which Christianity doth call for at our hands; for such a one doth meddle with a matter which belongs not to him, and doth usurp the office of him who is his proper judge, and therefore must offend. To this effect is that inquiry, Rom. xiv. 4. Who art thou who judgest another man's servant, when thou hast no commission from his Lord to do so? (2.) Such is that judgment or censure which we pass upon another without sufficient evidence—as, when we judge that action evil, which may, for any thing we know to the contrary, be good; that action done upon corrupt and evil principles, which perhaps was well intended, and free from any ill design; or, when we judge that person hypocritical and obstinate, who perhaps only sins through weakness and infirmity, or want of better information.

This rule I gather from those words of the apostle, (1 Cor. iv. 5.) Judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the secrets of the heart; what therefore is not manifest, as the hypocrisy or obstinacy of our brother, in many circumstances cannot be; what doth depend upon his inward thoughts, as the intentions of our brother do, when they are not revealed by his words, is by this rule to be reserved to God's judgment, and we, by passing our verdict in such cases, must be too forward, and guilty of rash judgment. Such (3.) is that judgment which doth aggravate the actions of our brother beyond their just demerit, or passeth a more heavy censure on him than he hath deserved; for so far is our judgment false, and without ground, as it exceeds the nature and the demerit of the fact.

Secondly, our Lord here plainly seemeth to forbid that judgment of our brother, which is void of charity and mercy, and which is not consistent with the forgiveness of him. This may be fairly gathered from the connexion of the words, for the preceding words are these, (Luke vi. 36.) Be ye merciful as your heavenly Father is merciful; the following words run thus, Forgive, and ye shall be forgiven; (ver. 37.) and also from that saying of St. James, (ii. 13.) He shall have judgment without mercy, who sheweth no mercy.

Thirdly, That judging must be here condemned which begets in us a contempt of others, and makes us to despise and vilify them, as may be gathered from that question, (Rom. iv. 10.) Why dost thou judge? why dost thou set at nought thy brother?

Lastly, Christ, by this prohibition, must be supposed to condemn our forwardness to judge and censure others, whilst we ourselves are guilty of far greater crimes, it being plain hypocrisy to pretend a zeal against the lesser faults of others, and yet allow much greater in ourselves. This plainly follows from the connexion of the words, Judge not, that ye be not judged; and why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, when behold a beam is in thine own eye? The Jews themselves used this proverb familiarly in this very case, against those who reprehended the least offences in others, when they themselves were guilty of very heinous crimes. (See Cartw. Mellif. and Lightfoot here.)

[2] Ver. 6. Μὴ δῶτε τὸ ἅγιον τοῖς κυσὶ, &c. Give not that which is holy to dogs, neither cast you your pearl before swine.] By dogs and swine here we must not understand all that are wicked and profane, either through ignorance or vicious habits; for Christ preached the gospel to publicans and harlots, and sent his apostles to preach it to the heathen world, which lay in wickedness, and was dead in trespasses and sins; but such wicked persons only, as by experience they found, after the gospel was preached, and confirmed to them by miracles, were still refractory, and pertinaciously continued in their filthy lusts, after they had received the knowledge of the truth, and were so far from embracing it, that they resisted and blasphemed it, and were ready to persecute and destroy the professors of it; among such persons, saith Christ, spend not much time, seeing your labour will not be only lost to them, but hazardous to yourselves. Such were those Jews to whom St. Paul having preached the gospel, they contradicted and blasphemed it, and, therefore, he turned from them to the gentiles: (Acts xiii. 41. 46.) such were especially the scribes and pharisees, and rulers of the Jews, who, seeing that Christ did cast out devils, said, he did it by confederacy with Beelzebub the prince of devils, (Matt. ix. 34. xii. 24.) who, being reduced to silence by his miracles, were filled with madness, (Luke vi. 11.) and took counsel how they might destroy him, (Matt. xii. 14.) and confessing that he did many miracles, conclude thence, he was to be taken off, (John xi. 47. 53.) and consult of cutting off Lazarus also, because by reason of him many believed in Christ: (John xii. 10, 11.) and being assured of Christ's resurrection, by the testimony of those very soldiers whom they had placed as a guard about his sepulchre, corrupt these witnesses with money, to disguise it with a barefaced lie. (Matt. xxviii.) Note also that this saying was proverbial among the Jews.*

[3] Ver. 7. Αἰτεῖτε καὶ δοθήσεται ὑμῖν· &c. Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find, &c. for every one that asketh receiveth.] To understand aright this promise, let it be observed, that to enable us to pray with such an assurance of faith, that what we ask we shall receive, some things are requisite in the party praying, some as to the matter, and some as to the manner of his prayer. And,

First, The person who expects his prayer should find acceptance with God must not persist in any way of sin, his heart and his affections must be taken off from every evil way; for, saith the Psalmist, If I regard iniquity in my heart, God will not hear my prayer. (Psal. lxvi. 18.) And otherwise in our addresses to God for preservation from sin, we do but flatter him with our lips, and dissemble with our double hearts, we being not disposed or willing to forsake that sin we pray against.

Secondly, He must begin at least to be a doer of God's will: one, who sincerely doth desire to fear him, and who doth uprightly purpose and resolve that he will keep his righteous precepts; for if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth his will, him he heareth: (John ix. 31.) when once this holy fear is rooted in our hearts, his ear will be still open to our prayers, for he will fulfil the desires of them that fear him, and when they call he will answer them. (Psal. cxlv. 19.) And whilst we do persist in the sincerity of our obedience, we shall retain this humble confidence of our acceptance; for if our hearts condemn us not (of insincerity), then have we confidence with God, and we know that what we ask we receive, because we keep his commandments. (1 John iii. 21, 22.)

To clear both these particulars, consider that true prayer is attended with a strong desire, that we may enjoy the blessing we pray for, and also that we address to God for the assistance of our weakness and inability to compass the desired blessing, by our own industry, without the Divine assistance; so that in all our addresses to God for preservation from, or strength against, any temptations or assaults of sin, or the mortification of any evil habit, which we have contracted, we solemnly profess to him, we are very willing and desirous to mortify that sin, and be preserved from that temptation; and in all our supplications for grace, to perform our duty, or to increase in any virtuous habit, we declare that we are truly willing to perform that duty, we earnestly desire to advance to higher measures in that Christian virtue, and that we therefore sue to him for power to enable us to do according to those good desires. Now these professions made to God must be hypocritical and false, and therefore cannot render any of our prayers successful; or else we must be truly willing and desirous to break off our sins by repentance, and to perform that duty which we owe to God, before we do address to him for strength for the performance of our duty and preservation from sin.

Again, seeing that God to whom we pray is in himself immutable, and in the holiness and perfections of his nature is unchangeable; seeing he always acts agreeably to those standing rules of righteousness he hath declared in his word—it must be vain for us to hope, by argument to move, by fair speeches to incline, or by pathetical entreaties to persuade him to do any thing which is not suitable to this purity of his nature, and to the justice of his government; when therefore we ask pardon for those sins we are not willing to forsake, when we desire his friendship or protection, whilst we continue violators of his holy laws and rebels to his government, it is impossible we should prevail in our addresses; because it is not consistent with the honour of a just and holy God to grant what we desire: we pray against the declarations of his holy will, against the laws of his government, and the perfections of his nature, and so we cannot hope that our desires should be granted: since then God changeth not, if we desire that our prayers should find acceptance with him, the change must be in us, in our affections, from a love to a hatred of every evil way, from a dislike to an approbation of the ways of piety; in our wills, from a perverse and disobedient to a willing mind; and then that God, who is immutable, will therefore be disposed to hear us; for he unchangeably is willing to shew kindness to his friends, and give assistance to every soul that uprightly desires to fear and serve him.

Thirdly, He must be one who doth forgive his brother's trespasses, that he may be disposed to obtain the pardon of his own. A man (saith the son of Sirach) beareth hatred against another, and doth he hope for pardon from the Lord? He sheweth no mercy to a man that is like himself, and doth he ask forgiveness of his own sins? (Ecclus. xxviii. 3, 4.) When ye stand praying (saith our Lord), forgive if you have aught against any man, that your heavenly Father may forgive you; for if you forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses. (Mark xi. 25, 26.)

Fourthly, He must be free from all injustice, injury, and wrong, done to his neighbour, or ready to make satisfaction for it, according to that resolution of the Psalmist, I will wash mine hands in innocency, and so will I compass thine altar. (Psal. xxvi. 6.) We must not offer our oblation to God, till we have offered, or are resolved, as we have opportunity, to offer, reasonable satisfaction to our brother; for if thou bringest thy gift to the altar (saith our Lord), and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. (Matt. v. 23, 24.) To proceed to the matter of our petitions:

First, What we ask must be agreeable to the holy will of God; for if we ask any thing according to his will he heareth us. (1 John v. 14.) And this must be the limit of all our acceptable desires, it being neither possible in nature that he can, nor fit in reason that he should, permit our foolish wills to thwart the counsel of his wisdom. It must be also something which comporteth with and tendeth to his glory, that being the great end of all our rational desires, that God in all things may be glorified. And hence observe, that even spiritual blessings may be asked amiss, and so as not to be obtained; because we are not fitted to receive them in that way in which alone it is for God's glory to confer them. As when we would enjoy the end, but will not use the means, by Divine wisdom appointed for the obtaining that end: v. g. he that desires to be saved, desires what is agreeable to his will, who would have all men to be saved; but if he will not also, by continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and immortality, if he will not work out his salvation with fear and trembling, if he will not have his fruit unto holiness, the end can never be eternal life; because God hath made holiness the means, and obedience the condition, of salvation: and it is in the nature of the thing impossible, that an impure soul should be prepared for the enjoyment of a holy God; nor is it for his honour to confer this blessing on the disobedient, or to admit unholy souls into his blissful presence. And though our gracious God be willing we should be saved, he is not willing we should be so, whether we will or no; he is not willing we should be saved, though we use not the means appointed by him to obtain salvation. Again, it is certainly agreeable to the mind of God, that we should abstain from that iniquity, which is a provocation to the pure eyes of his glory, and it is doubtless for his honour that we should do so; but though we pray to be preserved from it, yet, if we add not our sincere endeavours, if we do not watch as well as pray, that we enter not into temptation, and, as much as in us lies, avoid the occasions of, resist the temptations and solicitations to it, our prayer for preservation will not be successful; because we are not uprightly disposed to use the means for preservation from it, which God hath put into our hands.

Secondly, What we thus ask must be what is truly good for us, and were we entirely wise, we should not be capable of tendering to God a request, which doth not minister to this end; because good is the adequate object of all our rational desires, and when we ignorantly put up addresses for what he in his wisdom seeth not to be good for, but rather hurtful to us, it is out of pure kindness and concern for us that he denieth our requests. To proceed,

Thirdly, To the manner requisite to render these our prayers successful;

First, We must pray in faith, that is, with an entire persuasion that God is able to supply all our wants, that Divine wisdom discerneth all our real needs, and knows how to relieve them; sees all our miseries and troubles, and knows how to convert them to our good, or work deliverance from them in the fittest season, that he will be exactly true to all his promises, and so will not withhold any good thing from them that lead a godly life; that, lastly, he is a God of immense goodness, and therefore willing to bestow upon his servants all that his wisdom seeth good and necessary for them; what things soever you desire in prayer, believe that you shall receive them, and ye shall receive them; (Matt. xxi. 22.) if you have faith, καὶ μὴ διακριθῆτε, and doubt not, (ver. 21.) if ye ask in faith, μὴ διακρινόμενοι, not doubting of his power or will to do what is for his glory and your good, (see note on James i. 6.) ask, and you shall receive.

Secondly, If our petitions be not instantly granted, we must pray (for spiritual things especially) with perseverance, and wait with patience till he will be gracious, for we must pray always, and not faint. (Luke xviii. 1. Eph. vi. 18.) And,

Thirdly, We must pray (at least for spiritual blessings) with fervency of spirit, we must knock, saith the metaphor here, we must ἀγωνίζειν, be in agonies of devotion for them, (Col. iv. 12.) to shew how much we prize them, the fervent being the availing prayer. (James v. 16.)

[4] Ver. 9. Ἢ τίς ἐστιν ἐξ ὑμῶν ἄνθρωπος, ὃν ἐὰν αἰτήσῃ—μὴ λίθον ἐπιδώσει αὐτῷ·] For the construction of these words, let it be noted from Stephanus, that ἤ at the beginning of a sentence, no other particle preceding, signifies an; so Judg. xiv. 15. ἢ ἐκβιασᾶσαι ἡμᾶς κεκλήκατε; Have ye called Samson to do us violence? 1 Sam. x. 12. ἢ καὶ Σαοὺλ ἐν τοῖς προφήταις; Is Saul also among the prophets? so Matt. xx. 15. ἢ οὐκ ἔξεστί—ἢ ὁ ὀφθαλμός σου; Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with my own? Is thine eye evil because I am good? 1 Cor. xiv. 36. ἢ ἀφ' ὑμῶν ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐξῆλθεν, ἢ εἰς ὑμᾶς μόνους κατήντησεν; Came the word of God from you, came it to you only? So here, ἢ τίς, is there any man among you, ὃν ἐὰν αἰτήσῃ—ἄρτον; of whom his son shall ask bread? μὴ is only the sign of an interrogation: so Gen. xviii. 14. μὴ ἀδυνατήσῃ, shall any thing be too hard for God? ver. 17. μὴ κρύψω; shall I hide from Abraham? ver. 23. μὴ συναπολέσῃς; wilt thou destroy the righteous with the wicked? Judg. ix. 9. 11. 13. μὴ ἀπολείψασα; shall I leave my fatness? shall I leave my sweetness? shall I leave my wine? Jer. xxxii. 27. μὴ κρυβήσεται; shall any thing be hid from me? (see Gen. xxvii. 38. xxx. 15. xxxi. 14. xli. 38. xliii. 7.) So that the whole verse runs thus, Is there any man among you of whom his son shall ask bread, will that man give him a stone?

[5] Ver. 12. Πάντα οὖν ὅσα ἂν θέλητε ἵνα ποιῶσιν ὑμῖν οἱ ἄνθρωποι, οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς ποιεῖτε αὐτοῖς, Whatsoever you would that men should do to you, do you even so to them, &c.] Here the critical note is this—that we are not to look for a connexion of these words to the former, though they be introduced with the particle οὖν, therefore; that being, saith Phavorinus, often ἀργὸν, an expletive, or serving only by way of transition from one thing to another. Others connect the words thus; viz. That in the immediate preceding words our Lord instructs us, by a comparison taken from men, that we may reasonably expect our heavenly Father will confer upon us all those blessings which he sees needful for us, and we can reasonably desire, provided that we ask them with faith and importunity, and do with diligence seek them: and hence, saith Grotius, our Lord infers that we, who stand engaged to be followers of God as dear children, should be as ready to afford to others all needful aid, which they, on the account of equity, humanity, and Christian charity, desire of us; this being only that which, in like cases, we expect from others. Hence in St. Luke, vi. 30. our Lord is introduced, saying, Give to every one that asketh; and as you would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, (ver. 31.) But for explication of this rule, note,

First, That it was a rule, which obtained both among Jews and gentiles, and was delivered by them in some variety of words, but with great harmony of sense; first positively, as here,

Quod tibi fieri vis, fac alteri.
Γενοῦ πᾶσιν ὡς σοι θέλεις πάντας. Nilus.

And also negatively,

Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris.
Quod damnaturus sis in aliis, in te non admiseris.
Ὅπερ συ μισεῖς παρ' ἑτέρῳ σοι γένεσθαι, εἰς ἑτέρους μὴ ποίει.
Ἃ πάσχοντες ὑφ' ἑτέρου ὀργίζεσθε, ταῦτα τοῖς ἄλλοις μὴ ποιεῖτε. Isocr. ad Nicocl. Or. 3.

And in those words of Hillel, Do not thou that to thy neighbour, which thou hatest when it is done to thee; which rule in Tobit (iv. 14.) is expressed thus, ὁ μισεῖς μηδενὶ ποιήσῃς, do that to no man which thou hatest.

Secondly, That this rule being given as the sum of the law and the prophets, as an abridgment of the rules of justice prescribed by them, can never duly be construed, as to subvert any of the laws and orders established by them, or thwart the proper rules of charity or justice. And therefore this rule admits these limitations:

Thirdly, Whatsoever I desire with a well-ordered or regulated will, that is, what I desire agreeably to the dictates of right reason, or to the principles of Christian religion, should be done, or not done to me, that I must do, or not do to others. It therefore will not follow from this rule, that if a pot-companion will give me drink to excess, that I must give him drink to excess, or that, if Socrates would lend his wife to his friend, that friend should do the like to him; because that which is here prescribed as a rule of charity and justice among Christians, could never be intended to countenance what is opposite to charity and justice, to the law and the prophets, and more especially to the precepts of Christianity. And so, as to the negative part of this rule, though a criminal, or guilty person, would not have the judge condemn him, or the witnesses give in testimony against him, but would be pardoned after condemnation; yet he who is a judge, were he such a person, must not forbear to condemn, or always pardon, the condemned criminal, since this practice would take away vindictive justice, and let offenders go unpunished.

Fourthly, This rule must be interpreted as a rule of proportion, binding us to, or not to do that to others, which in like state, condition, or relation, we would, or we would not have done to ourselves; v. gr. it requires not the master to obey his servants, because he would have them obedient to him, but to be as obedient to his masters, as he can reasonably expect they should be to him, and to treat his servants as kindly and favourably, as, if he were a servant, he could reasonably desire to be treated by his master: the prince must not be subject to his people, as he would have them be to him, but he must treat them with that equity and kindness, which, if he were a subject, he reasonably might expect from a prince duly regardful of his subjects' weal; and so proportionably in the relations of father and children, man and wife, master and scholar, pastor and flock, &c.

Fifthly, This rule must not be extended to every thing which another may lawfully do to me, and therefore I desire he would do; but only what I may desire of him, or expect from him as his duty, on the account of equity and justice, charity, friendship, or relation. Thus, if a poor man would desire that some very wealthy person would give him out of his estate enough to make him rich; though were this rich man poor, he would be glad if somebody would shew the like kindness to him, yet he is not obliged by this rule, though lawfully he might do it, to make this poor man rich, because he stands not bound by any law of charity or justice so to do. And,

Sixthly, Note that this rule, as it is positive, respects not only our outward actions, but even our words and thoughts, requiring us to speak, think, and judge of others, as in like circumstances we may in equity and reason expect they should speak, think, or judge of us. As it is negative, it must require us not to speak, think, or judge of others, as we conceive that in like circumstances they ought not to speak, think, or judge of us; for there is an equity to be observed in our words and thoughts of others, as well as in our actions, and a judgment of charity, and a righteous judgment, as well as a labour of love, and a righteous deed; and also an evil word and thought, and a wrong judgment, which therefore ought to be forborne from principles of love and equity.

[6] Ver. 13, 14. Enter in at the strait gate, &c.] Of the metaphor of a strait gate, see note on viii. 11. and note that the way of virtue and felicity is represented by the heathen sages under the like metaphor; thus Cebes saith, that there is at the entrance of it θύρα τίς μικρὰ, a little gate, and ἀνάβασις στενὴ πάνυ, the way hath a very strait ascent, and is a way not trodden in, which πάνυ ὀλίγοι πορεύονται, very few walk in, as seeming to be difficult, τραχεῖα καὶ πετρώδης, rough and rocky. And yet this is no contradiction to those Scriptures, which represent the ways of wisdom as ways of pleasantness, and the yoke of Christ as easy, and his commandments as not grievous; for this way is only rough and grievous at our first entrance into it, when we have many old acquaintance and seeming friends to part with, and evil habits to put off, and till faith and patience have smoothed it to us; but then we can rejoice in tribulations, and take pleasure in infirmities, and love will make it pleasant to us; when temperance and patience, said Cebes, have lifted us to the top of the hill, then is it ὁδὸς καλή τε καὶ ὁμαλὴ καὶ εὐπόρευτος, a way that is pleasant, smooth, and easy to be trod, free from all evil, and leading to the regions of felicity. And whereas it is added, ὅτι στενὴ ἡ πύλη, because strait is the gate, ὅτι there should be rendered but, for so the Hebrew כ which answers to it often signifies, and is therefore rendered by the Septuagint, ἀλλὰ or ἀλλ' ἤ but, viz. 2 Chron. xx. 15. Psal. xlii. 3. Dan. ix. 18. Amos vii. 14. And sometimes ὅτι in the sense of but; so 1 Kings xxi. 15. Naboth is not alive, כי מת ὅτι τέθνηκε, but dead; 2 Kings i. 4. He shall not descend down from his bed תומת כי מות ὅτι θανάτῳ ἀποθανῇ, but shall die. So Numb. xxvii. 3. Deut. xi. 7. Judg. i. 19. ii. 17. 1 Sam. xvii. 47. 2 Sam. xxiv. 24. and in many other places. (See Noldius de partic. Heb. p. 404.)

[7] Ver. 15. Προσέχετε δὲ ἀπὸ τῶν ψευδοπροφητῶν, Ver. 16. ἀπὸ τῶν καρπῶν αὐτῶν ἐπιγνώσεσθε αὐτούς, beware of false prophets,—by their fruits ye shall know them.] They who extend the word false prophets to all teachers of false doctrines, will scarce be able to shew, how they, who teach the doctrine of the millennium, or that the promises of the law were only temporal, or that the baptism of infants may be deferred till they come to years of discretion, or that the sabbath-day is still to be kept holy, can be proved to be false prophets by the evil tendence or consequents of their doctrine: moreover, it must be noted that Christ here speaks to the multitude, (ver. 28, 29.) and to the ears of the people: (Luke vii. 1.) they therefore must beware of them, and so be able to know them by their works, as the tree is known by its fruits, (ver. 20.) from the works of iniquity they do, (ver. 23.) not from their doctrines; for that would render our Lord's words ridiculous, viz. Beware of teachers of false doctrines; by their false doctrines ye shall know them.

Obj. But you may say, Christ owns they shall appear in sheep's clothing, that is, in a fair appearance of piety and innocence, and so it must be difficult to pass a judgment on them by their works.

Ans. It is not necessary that their coming in sheep's clothing should signify their seeming innocency, but only their appearance in the habit of prophets. For so Elias wrapped himself ἐν τῇ μηλωτῇ αὐτοῦ, in his sheep's skin mantle, (1 Kings xix. 13.) and when he ascended ἡ μηλωτὴς, his mantle fell from him. (2 Kings ii. 13.) This therefore may be the true import of this phrase, They shall appear in the habit of prophets. But (2.) admit it signifies their hypocrisy and dissimulation; things feigned and dissembled only, will in a little time be easily discerned from that which is sincere and real; when such hypocritical pretenders have got once a liberty to do it, when their advantage requires it, when persecutions for the faith arise, they will soon put off the mask, and discover themselves to be counterfeits.

Moreover, false prophets, both in the Old and the New Testament, do always signify such persons as falsely pretend a commission from God for what they teach, or who promise or foretell things falsely in his name; as will appear from all the places of the New Testament where this word occurs, Matt. xxiv. 11. Mark xiii. 22. Luke vi. 26. Acts xiii. 6. 2 Pet. ii. 1. Rev. xvi. 13. xix. 20. xx. 10. That such false prophets were suddenly to come into the world, our Lord foretells, Matt. xxiv. 11. That many of them were come, we learn from St. Peter and St. John, 1 John iv. 1. And,

Lastly, The apostles teach, agreeably to Christ, that such false apostles and false prophets are to be discovered, not only by their doctrines, but by their works, as being ravenous wolves, not sparing the flock; (Acts xx. 29.) teachers of what they ought not for filthy lucre's sake; (Tit. i. 11.) such as count gain, godliness; (1 Tim. vi. 5.) lovers of money; (2 Tim. iii. 2.) through covetousness by feigned words making merchandise of others; (2 Pet. ii. 3.) admiring persons for gain; (Jude 16.) such as may be known by the evil works they did, and taught others to do as being lovers of pleasure; (2 Tim. iii. 4.) abominable; (Tit. i. 16.) defiling the flesh, and turning the grace of God into lasciviousness; (2 Pet. ii. 10. Jude 4. 8.) and, lastly, such as insisted upon questions, which had no tendence to advance godliness, but rather to nourish strife, and to subvert the hearers. (1 Tim. i. 4. iv. 7. 2 Tim. ii. 16. 23. Tit. iii. 9.)

[8] Ver. 18. Οὐ δύναται δένδρον ἀγαθὸν πονηροὺς καρποὺς

ποιεῖν, A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can an evil tree bring forth good fruit.] i. e. While they continue such. Hence some make two inferences, which are false and alien from the mind of Christ:

First, That he who once is regenerate can never cease to be so; which no more follows, than that he who is once wicked cannot cease to be so; and therefore that it is vain to call sinners to repentance, or bid them make the tree good, as Christ doth, Matt. xii. 33.

Secondly, That an irregenerate person can do nothing that is good, because he is an evil tree, and so he must be purely passive in his whole conversion; which is as if I should argue, that a good man cannot sin, because being a good tree he cannot bring forth evil fruit. Good here is the note of St. Jerome, that Judas being once a good tree brought forth bad fruit, when he betrayed his Master. And Saul being once a bad tree, brought forth bad fruit, when he became a vessel of election: "Tamdiù ergo arbor bona fructus non facit malos, quamdiu in bonitatis studio perseverat; et mala arbor tamdiù manet in fructibus peccatorum, quamdiu ad pœnitentiam non convertitur." So long then as the good tree persevereth in its goodness, it bringeth not forth evil fruit; and the evil tree continues to bring forth the fruits of sin, till by repentance it is turned into a good tree.

[9] Ver. 21. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, &c.] Of the import of this phrase, the kingdom of heaven, see note on iii. 2. And note hence, that faith and purposes of obedience, without actual obedience to the commands of God, as long as we live and have opportunity to do so, will avail no man to salvation.

[10] Ver. 22. Many shall say in that day, Lord, οὐ τῷ σῷ ὀνόματι προεφητεύσαμεν, &c. have we not prophesied, cast out devils, and done many mighty works in thy name?] I grant that it cannot be certainly inferred from these words, that any persons will thus plead at the day of judgment; but only that such pleas, if made, will be of no account with God from workers of iniquity: but yet it will hence follow, that such persons might be workers of iniquity, and also that they might have some expectations of favour from Christ, on the account of these things performed in his name. And that such miracles were actually performed by such men in the name of Christ, we learn from Origen,* who saith, That so prevalent is the name of Christ to cast out devils, ὡς ἔσθ' ὅτε, καὶ ὑπὸ φαύλων ὀνομαζόμενον ἀνύειν, that sometimes (as Christ said) it avails when named by wicked Christians. And Pseudo-Justin † confesseth of the heretics, ἐνεργεῖν τινὰς ἐν αὐτοῖς δυνάμεις, that some miracles were wrought by them. For though true miracles cannot be wrought in confirmation of a false doctrine, yet, seeing miracles wrought by the name of Jesus, are wrought not to confirm either the doctrine or piety of him that doth them, but only to confirm his doctrine in whose name they are wrought; I think it no absurdity to grant, that evil Christians may do them in his name. Thus God put many true prophecies concerning his people into the mouth of that Balaam, who loved the wages of unrighteousness; and Judas was one of those twelve to whom Christ gave power to cast out unclean spirits, and to heal all diseases. (Matt. x. 1.)

[11] Ver. 24. Πᾶς οὖν ὅστις ἀκούει τοὺς λόγους τούτους, καὶ ποιεῖ αὐτούς, &c. Every one that heareth these words, and doeth them, will I liken to a wise man.] Hence it appears, (1.) that this sermon on the mount contains those rules of faith which are sufficient for salvation; since otherwise Christ could not promise it to them, who observed and practised these his sayings.

(2.) That a man may be disposed to yield this obedience, it is necessary, (1.) that he believe Christ was a teacher sent from God into the world, to propound these rules of life and death in his name, and by his authority; faith being the principle and root of all obedience. (2.) That he hath a sufficient knowledge of these rules, and doth retain them in his memory; for what he doth not know he cannot, and what he retains not in his memory he will not do. We must add to our faith, knowledge; (2 Pet. i. 5.) and keep in memory the things we have heard, 1 Cor. xv. 2. (3.) That he firmly believe and frequently reflect upon the motives to perform these rules; viz. the blessings promised to the observers of them, and the great evils threatened to the neglecters of these rules: for the serious and frequent consideration of these things will not only animate us to the performance of our duty, but will strengthen us against all the temptations and allurements of the world, to divert us from it; whilst we perceive that the advantages we shall receive by living according to these rules, are infinitely greater than any which the world can tender; and the evils which will certainly ensue on our neglect to do so, are far more formidable than any we can suffer from a persecuting world.

[12] Ver. 29. Ἦν γὰρ διδάσκων αὐτοὺς ὡς ἐξουσίαν ἔχων, The multitude were astonished at his doctrine; for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes.] They certainly mistake, who interpret these words thus, He taught them as the author of the doctrine he preached, and one who had authority in his own name, to propound the terms of life and death, and therefore saith not, as the prophets, Thus saith the Lord, but I say unto you. This being not only contrary to the nature of his prophetic office, but to his frequent declarations, that the doctrine which he taught was not his own, but his that sent him; that he spake not of himself, or in his own name, but as he had heard from his Father, and as he had commanded him to speak. (John vii. 16. viii. 28. xii. 49. xiv. 10. xvii. 18.) This interpretation therefore of St. Jerome, Theophylact, and others, is to be rejected. Others think this relates to the confirmation of his doctrine by miracles; for when he had cured all manner of diseases, demoniacs, lunatics, and paralytics, the people flock to him from all quarters, (Matt. iv. 24, 25.) and then he begins this sermon. So Mark i. 27. They all marvelled, saying, What is this new doctrine? for κατ' ἐξουσίαν with authority he commanded the unclean spirits, and they obey him: and Luke iv. 32. They were amazed at his doctrine; for his word was ἐν ἐξουσίᾳ, attended with the power of miracles, (ver. 36.) And, thirdly, because it is here said, they were astonished, not at his miracles, but at his doctrine; others interpret the words thus, He spake as a prophet, having authority from God to deliver his message to them; not as the scribes, who pretended only to deliver the traditions of their forefathers, and to teach only what they had learnt from Hillel, Shemaia, Abtalion, &c. So Lightfoot.

* Contr. Cels. lib. i. p. 7. † Qu. 5.

CHAP. VIII.

1. WHEN he was come down from the mountain (on which he delivered this Divine discourse), great multitudes followed him.

2. And, behold, (when he was in or near one of the cities, Luke v. 12.) there came a leper and [1] worshipped him, (kneeling, Mark i. 40. and falling down before him, Luke v. 12. and) saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

3. And Jesus (having compassion on him, Mark i. 41.) [2] put forth his hand, and touched him, saying (to him), I will; be thou clean. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed.

4. And Jesus (straitly charged him, and forthwith sent him away, Mark i. 43. and) saith unto him, [3] See thou tell no man (who hath done this); but go thy way (first, and) [4] shew thyself to the priest, and offer (for thy purification, Mark i. 44. Luke v. 15.) the gift that Moses commanded, for a [5] testimony to them: (but he going from him, published it so much, that the multitude hearing of it came to him from every place to be healed of their infirmities, Mark i. 45. Luke v. 15.)

5. And when Jesus was entered into Capernaum, [6] there came unto him (by the elders of the Jews, Luke vii. 3.) a centurion, beseeching him,

6. And saying, Lord, my servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, grievously tormented (and nigh to death; I desire thou wouldest come and heal him, Luke vii. 3.)

[Luke vii. 4. And when they came to him, they besought him instantly, saying, That he was worthy for whom he should do this: Ver. 5. for he loveth our nation, and hath built us a synagogue.]

7. And Jesus saith unto him (i. e. to the messengers sent by him), I will come and heal him: (and having said this, Jesus went with them, and when he was now not far from the house, Luke vii. 6.)

8. The centurion (hearing that Christ was coming to him, sent other friends to him, by whom he) answered and said, Lord, (trouble not thyself to come to me; for) I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof; (wherefore neither thought I myself worthy to come unto thee, Luke vii. 6, 7.) but [7] speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed.

9. For I am a man under authority, having (also) soldiers under me: and I say unto this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. (How much more canst thou, who hast all power in heaven and earth, command one of the ministering spirits to come and heal my servant?)

10. When Jesus heard (this saying), he marvelled, and said to them that followed him, Verily, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel (the people to whom I was promised, and to whom I am sent).

11. And I say unto you, That [8] many shall come from the east and from the west, (from the north and from the south, Luke xiii. 29.) and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, (and with all the prophets, Luke xiii. 28.) in the kingdom of heaven (i. e. shall be partakers of the blessings promised to these patriarchs).

12. But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: (so that) there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth (among them thus excluded from the blessings of this kingdom).

13. And Jesus said unto the centurion, Go thy way; and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. And his servant was healed in the selfsame hour, (and they that were sent, returning to the house, found the servant whole that had been sick, Luke vii. 10.)

14. And when Jesus was come into Peter's house, he saw [9] his wife's mother laid (upon a bed), and sick of a fever, (for they had told him of her, Mark i. 30.)

15. And (he stood over her, and rebuked the fever, Luke iv. 39. and) he touched her hand, and the fever left her: and she arose, and ministered unto them (what was necessary for their entertainment).

16. And [10] when the even was come (so that the sun was set, Mark i. 32. Luke iv. 40. and the sabbath ended), they brought unto him many that were (sick, and many) possessed with devils: and he cast out the spirits with his word, and (laying his hands upon them, Luke iv. 40.) healed all that were sick:

17. That (in this sense also) it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet Esaias, saying, (liii. 4.) [11] He himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses.

18. Now when Jesus saw great multitudes about him, he gave commandment (to his disciples) to depart unto the other side (of the lake Gennesareth, Luke viii. 22.)

19. And (as they were preparing for their departure) a certain scribe came, and said unto him, Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest.

20. And Jesus saith unto him, (If thou resolvest thus, upon prospect of any temporal advantages in my kingdom, thou wilt be frustrated in thy expectation, for) the foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his (own) head (and, therefore, much less any accommodations for his followers).

21. And another of his disciples (or attendants, being bid to follow him, Luke ix. 59.) said unto him, Lord, suffer me first to go and (abide at home till I) bury my father.

22. But Jesus said unto him, Follow me (now); [12] and let the dead bury their dead; (i. e. let those who are unconcerned for the things of God, and unfit to engage in the promoting them, do such offices, which they may do as well as others; but do thou, who hast begun to follow me, and to attend upon the doctrine of the kingdom of God, go on without diversion in that work; for no man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God, Luke ix. 62.)

23. And when he was entered into a ship, his disciples followed him.

24. And, behold, there arose a great tempest in the sea, insomuch that the ship was (sometimes) covered with the waves: but he was asleep (in the hinder part of the ship, Mark iv. 38.)

25. And his disciples came unto him, and awoke him, saying, Lord, save us: we perish.

26. And he saith unto them, [13] Why are ye so fearful, O ye of little faith? Then he arose, and rebuked the wind and the sea, (saying to them, Peace, be still, Mark iv. 39.) and there was a great calm.

27. But the men marvelled, saying, What manner of man is this (and how great is his power), that even [14] the winds and the sea obey him!

28. And when he was come unto the other side, into the country of the Gergesenes, (see note on Mark v. 1.) there met him [15] two possessed with devils, coming out of their tombs, (one which was) exceeding fierce, so that no man might (safely) pass by that way; (for no man could tame him, or bind him so effectually with chains or fetters, that he could not break them; and night and day he was in the mountains, or among the tombs, crying and cutting himself with stones; and seeing Jesus afar off, they run unto him, and worshipped him, Mark v. 3—6.)

29. And, behold, they (i. e. the unclean spirits in them) cried out, saying, [16] What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? [17] art thou come hither to torment us before the time (appointed for our punishment? i. e. the fierce one said this, the other being present with him: and this he said after that Christ had said to the unclean spirit in him, Come out of the man; and Jesus asking, what was his name? he had answered, saying, My name is Legion: for we are many; and (farther) had besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country, Mark v. 8. 10.)

30. And there was a good way off from them (in the mountains, Luke viii. 32.) a herd of many swine (even two thousand, Mark v. 13.) feeding.

31. So the [18] devils besought him, saying, If thou cast us out, [19] suffer us to go away into the herd of swine.

32. And he said unto them, (I suffer you to) go. And when they were come out (of the men), they entered into the herd of swine: and, behold, the whole herd of swine ran violently down a steep place into the sea, and perished in the waters.

33. And they that kept them fled, and went their way into the city (and villages), and told (them) every thing (that Christ had done), and what was befallen to the (men) possessed of the devils.

34. And, behold, the whole city came out to meet Jesus: and when they saw him, they (being terrified at what he had done, and grieved for their loss) besought him that he would depart out of their coasts.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. VIII.

[1] Ver. 2. ΠΡΟΣΕΚΥΝΕΙ αὐτῷ, worshipped him.] The Jews paid civil adoration both to kings and prophets, either by bending of the knee, or by prostration, or falling down before them: so Abigail fell down before David, and bowed herself to the ground, 1 Sam. xxv. 23. 41. so also the Amalekite fell to the earth before him, and did obeisance, 2 Sam. i. 2. so Mephibosheth fell on his face, and did him reverence, 2 Sam. ix. 6. so the woman of Tekoah, 2 Sam. xiv. 4. Nathan, 1 Kings i. 23. so the whole congregation worshipped the Lord and the king, 1 Chron. xxix. 20. Thus also they reverenced the holy prophets: so Saul stooped with his face to the ground to Samuel, 1 Sam. xxviii. 14. Obadiah fell on his face before Elijah, 1 Kings xviii. 7. see 2 Kings i. 13. and Nebuchadnezzar fell on his face before Daniel, ii. 46. Whence I conclude, that the adorations given to our blessed Saviour, by those Jews and gentiles who knew nothing of his divinity, could be no argument of his Divine nature, but rather were paid to him as the Messiah, or as a prophet sent from God, or as the King of Israel.

[2] Ver. 3. Καὶ ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα ἥψατο αὐτοῦ ὁ Ἰησούς. And Jesus, stretching forth his hand, touched him.] The Jews cannot reasonably object that our Lord violated the law, either by touching the leper here, or by touching the bier of the dead; (Luke vii. 14.) for, as the effect wrought upon both demonstrated, that the God who gave these laws approved both these actions, they being done by the finger of God, so was it a received rule among them, *That a prophet might vary from, or even change, a ritual law: so did Elijah, who took the woman's dead son out of her bosom, and carried him up to his bed, and stretched himself upon him three times: (1 Kings xvii. 19. 21.) so did Elisha, when he lay upon the Shunammite's child, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands. (2 Kings iv. 34.) Whence Theophylact† observes, That our Lord touched the leper, to shew it was not necessary that he should observe those lesser matters of the law, and that a pure person is not defiled by touching one unclean; but that it is the leprosy of the soul which doth indeed defile. (See note on ver. 8.)

[3] Ver. 4. Ὅρα μηδενὶ εἴπῃς, See thou tell no man.] viz. That thou wast healed by me, till thou hast offered thy gift to the priest; and he, by receiving it, hath owned thee to be clean from thy leprosy, lest they hearing that thou wast cleansed by me should, out of envy to me, refuse to own that thou wast cleansed. This sense, the words offer the gift for a testimony to them, seem to require; for that which was always to be concealed from them, could be no testimony to them of the Divine mission. (See note on ix. 30.)

[4] Σεαυτὸν δεῖξον τῷ Ἱερεῖ, Shew thyself to the priest, &c.] Here it is well observed by Dr. Lightfoot, that though the priesthood was much degenerated from its primitive institution and office, and many human institutions were added to God's law, touching the priest's examination of the leper who pretended to be clean; yet doth Christ send this leper to submit to all these human inventions, as knowing that they did indeed corrupt but not extinguish the Divine institution.

[5] Εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς, For a testimony to them.] This some interpret thus, Offer thy gift for a testimony unto them, that thou art cleansed from thy leprosy, which must be the import of these words, if Christ had absolutely forbid him to declare, who it was that cured him of his leprosy; but in all other places where this phrase is used, it imports a testimony to the truth of Christ's mission or his doctrine, and, therefore, most probably here signifies, that by pronouncing the man clean, they may have a testimony that I am the Christ, or am a prophet sent from God; they themselves owning that the leprosy can only be cured by the finger of God, (2 Kings v. 7.) and, therefore, not suffering a physician to attempt to cure it: so, v. g. Matt. x. 18. Ye shall be brought before governors and kings, εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς, for a testimony to them and to the nations: Matt. xxiv. 14. This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, εἰς μαρτύριον, for a testimony to all nations: Luke ix. 5. If they receive you not, shake off the dust of your feet, εἰς μαρτύριον ἐπ' αὐτούς, for a testimony against them. Hence the lepers cleansed, Matt. xi. 5. are made the sign of the advent of the Messiah.

* Neve Shallom. lib. ix. cap. 19. † In Luke vii. 14.

[6] Ver. 5. Προσῆλθεν αὐτῷ ὁ ἑκατόνταρχος παρακαλῶν αὐτὸν, There came to him a centurion, beseeching him.] Luke vii. 3. He sent to him the rulers of the Jews; and, ver. 8. the centurion answered and said; Luke vii. 6. the centurion sent friends to him, saying. (See these things reconciled, in note on Luke vii. 1.) It is conjectured by St. Chrysostom, Καὶ αὐτὸν μετὰ τὸ πέμψαι τοὺς φίλους παραγενόμενον, That he himself, as Jesus came nearer to his house, came out of civility to meet him; because Christ says unto him, Go thy way, as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee, ver. 13. but of that also, see note on Luke vii. 1.

[7] Ver. 3. 8. Θέλω, καθαρίσθητι, I will, be thou clean.] Here the note of Woltzogenius is this, "Hic verè divina Christi vis elucet;" Here shines forth the Divine power of Christ, that he could do so great things only by his command: so also Moses says, the world was created by God, saying, Let there be light, and there was light, (Gen. i. 3.) And on those words, ver. 8. only say the word and thy servant shall be healed, &c. he saith, he represents the faith of the centurion, concerning our Lord's Divine power, thus: If I, who am subject to the power of another, have so much power over my servants, that they instantly do whatever I would have them, how much more shall all things which thou requestest be done at thy word and command, "qui nullius potestati subjectus es," who art subject to the power of none? And how can he deny him to be God, in whom shines forth that Divine power, which God exerted in the creation of the world, and at whose word all things that he commandeth must be done, and who is subject to the power of none? Surely this faith of the centurion may induce us to conclude with St. Jerome on the place, Quod intra corporis tegmen Divinitatem latentem videret.

[8] Ver. 11, 12. Λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν, ὅτι πολλοὶ ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν καὶ δυσμῶν ἥξουσι, καὶ ἀνακλιθήσονται μετὰ Ἀβραὰμ — ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τῶν οὐρανῶν, And I say unto you, That many shall come from the east, and from the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven, &c.] For the right understanding of these words, note,

First, That to lie down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven, doth not here signify to enjoy everlasting happiness in heaven with them, but only to become the sons of Abraham through faith, (Gal. iii. 7.) and so to be blessed with faithful Abraham; (ver. 9.) to have the blessing of Abraham coming on them, that they may receive the promise of the Spirit; (ver. 14.) through faith in Christ, to be the seed of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise; (ver. 29.) viz. the promise made to Abraham, (Gen. xii. 3.) renewed to Isaac, (Gen. xxvi. 4.) and confirmed to Jacob, (Gen. xxviii. 14.) and to be, according to Isaac, the children of the promise. (Gal. iv. 28.) This, saith Christ, shall be the blessing of the believing gentiles, they shall be sons of Abraham, and heirs of the promises made to the patriarchs, and mentioned by all the prophets of the Old Testament; whereas the unbelieving Jews, wanting the faith of Abraham, shall be deprived of the blessings promised to his seed; for they who seek to enter, and shall not be able, because the Master hath shut to his door, (Luke xiii. 24, 25.) are those Jews who sought for righteousness by the works of the law, and not by faith, and therefore found it not; (Rom. ix. 31, 32. xi. 7.) who entered not into the rest prepared for them, by reason of their unbelief, (Heb. iii. 18, 19. iv. 2. 5.) and from whom the kingdom of God was taken away: (Matt. xxi. 43.) they are they who shall say to Christ, We have eaten and drunk before thee, and thou hast taught in our streets, (Luke xiii. 26.) which could be said only by the Jews.

Secondly, Observe that this kingdom of God is represented here, and elsewhere, as a nuptial solemnity, or a banquet, at which the guests sit down with the master of the feast. Now these banquets were usually made at night, and continued long in the night; hence were they called cœnæ convivales, suppers,* ὀψὲ γὰρ δειπνεῖν ἀπὸ πράξεων, because they were wont to sup late, after they had done their business, saith Plutarch; thus have we mention of a great supper, Luke xiv. 16. of the supper of the Lamb, Rev. xix. 7. and of the bridegroom coming at midnight to his supper, Matt. xxv. 6. Hence at those suppers the house of reception was filled with lights, called δᾶδες, λαμπάδες, λυκνεῖν, φάνοι, in Athenæus† and Plutarch,‡ i. e. torches, lamps, candles, and lanterns; and so they who were admitted to the banquet had the benefit of the light: but they, who were shut out, or could not enter, were in darkness; whence the unhappy state of those, who were excluded from the kingdom of God, or from a state of future happiness, is frequently expressed by their being cast out into outer darkness, ver. 12. (see Matt. xxii. 13. xxv. 30.) and because they, who were thus shut out from the marriage-feast, were not only exposed to shame, but also to cold and hunger, therefore is it added, there shall be weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth. (Matt. xiii. 42. Luke xiii. 28.) And, oh! how contrary is this prediction of our Lord to the vain opinions of the Jews, who were wont to say, that all Israel should have a portion in the world to come; but the heathens (say they) are to be fuel for hell-fire; (Pirk. Eliezer, cap. 9. sect. 4.) whereas our Saviour here declareth, that these heathens should sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven; and they, the children of the kingdom, should be cast into outer darkness.

Thirdly, Observe, for explication of other places relating to these banquets and nuptial-feasts, that they, who were invited to them, entered by a gate designed to receive them; whence Christ, by whom we enter into this marriage-feast, compares himself to a gate, John x. 1, 2. 7. 9. Now this gate, at the time when the guests invited were to come, was made narrow, the wicket only being left open, and the porter standing there, that they who were not bidden to the marriage might not rush into it. Hence Christ exhorts the Jews to enter in at the strait gate; (Matt. vii. 13, 14. Luke xiii. 24.) i. e. to strive to enter into the kingdom of heaven, and be made partakers of the blessings of it, before it was taken from them. Lastly, When all that were invited were once come, the door was presently shut, and was not to be opened any more to them, who stood knocking without: so after the wise virgins had entered with the bridegroom, the gate was shut, and was not opened to the foolish virgins, who stood knocking without. (Matt. xxv. 11.) And in this sense are we to understand those words of Christ, (Luke xiii. 24, 25.) Many shall seek to enter, and shall not be able; viz. not for want of any grace sufficient on God's part, but because of their coming too late, after the gate is shut, and the bridegroom is entered; as is apparent from the reason of that admonition, Strive to enter in at the strait gate, for many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able, when once the master of the house is risen up, and hath shut the door.

[9] Ver. 14. Εἶδε τὴν πενθερὰν αὐτοῦ, &c. And when Jesus came unto Peter's house, he saw his wife's mother laid, and sick of a fever.] Learn hence, saith Theophylact, that marriage is no hinderance to virtue, since the chief of the apostles had his wife. Brugensis here notes, that it is written of Peter only that he had a wife; but that this is not exactly true, see note on 1 Cor. vii. 8. and on ix. 5. Moreover we read in the interpolated Ignatius,* περὶ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου καὶ τῶν ἄλλων ἀποστόλων τοῖς γάμοις προσομιλησάντων, of Peter and Paul, and other apostles that were married. St. Basil† reckons among those that were married, Πέτρον καὶ τοὺς λοιποὺς τῶν ἀποστόλων, Peter and the rest of the apostles. And St. Ambrose‡ saith, that "omnes apostoli, exceptis Johanne et Paulo, uxores habuisse dicuntur," all the apostles, except John and Paul, are said to have wives. See many other testimonies in Cotelerius's notes§ on the epistle of Ignatius to the Philadelphians.

[10] Ver. 16. Ὀψίας δὲ γενομένης, and when the even was come.] The Jews kept their sabbath from evening to evening, according to those words, (Lev. xxiii. 32.) from even to even shall ye celebrate your sabbath; and therefore, when it began to be dark, before the sabbath, Nehemiah commands the gates of Jerusalem to be shut; (Neh. xiii. 19.) and the author of Cosri‖ saith, "non ingreditur nisi occumbente sole," the sabbath doth not enter but when the sun is set, as St. Mark and St. Luke speak. (See Lightfoot on the place.)

[11] Ver. 17. Αὐτὸς τὰς ἀσθενείας ἡμῶν ἔλαβε, That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, He himself took our infirmities, and bore our sicknesses.] This is one of those places from which interpreters conclude, a prophecy is said to be fulfilled only by way of accommodation, though not according to the intention of the prophet. But I conceive without just ground: for, first, the Jews themselves did think this passage of the prophet related to the curing their diseases, as well as the procuring remission of their sins; for thus they speak, the name of the Messiah is the leper of the house of Rabbi, as it is said, Surely he bore our infirmities. And, We esteemed him, נגוע Isa. liv. 4. quasi leprosum, as a leper, saith St. Jerome and the Vulgar, ἀφημμένον ἐν ἀφῇ ὄντα, Symma. and Aquila; now ἀφὴ, say Hesychius, Suidas, and Phavorinus, is ἡ χροία τῆς λέπρας, the colour of the leprosy. (See Lev. xiv. 32. 35.) And again, If the Messias be among the living, Rabbona Hakkedosh is he, as being one who bears our infirmities: and seeing Christ, by healing our diseases, took away the temporal punishment of our sins, (see the note on ix. 2.) and said to some of them he healed, thy sins are forgiven thee, why might not this prophecy be twice fulfilled, when, by taking away their diseases, he took away the temporal punishment of their sins, and when, by suffering on the cross, he procured a full remission of the guilt of their iniquities?

[12] Ver. 22. Καὶ ἄφες τοὺς νεκροὺς θάψαι τοὺς ἑαυτῶν νεκροὺς, And let the dead bury their dead.] That οἱ νεκροὶ, the dead, in Scripture doth often signify, not those who in a natural sense are dead by dissolution of the soul and body, but those who in a spiritual sense are so, by being alienated from the life of God, and dead in trespasses and sins, see note on 1 Pet. iv. 6. Thus, Clemens of Alexandria* saith, that, ἐν τῇ βαρβάρων φιλοσοφίᾳ νεκροὺς καλοῦσι τοὺς ἐκπέσοντας τῶν δογμάτων, καὶ καθυποτάξαντας τὸν νοῦν τοῖς πάθεσι τοῖς ψυχικοῖς, the philosophy of the barbarians called them dead who deserted their doctrines, and subjected their minds to sensual passions; and Origen,† That the Pythagoreans placed coffins in their room, symbolically to represent that death; and Philo styles this the death of the soul, ἐντυμβευομένης παθέσι καὶ κακίαις ἀπάσαις, entombed in passions and all wickedness, (legis alleg. lib. i. p. 45.) Here then Christ teacheth, that when we are called by him to the promotion of the gospel, and the salvation of men's souls, we should not suffer earthly business, which may be done as well by others, who are unfit to be employed in spirituals, to give us the least hinderance from setting instantly upon that work.

[13] Ver. 26. Τί δειλοί ἐστε, ὀλιγόπιστοι; Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?] Here I conceive it may be useful to lay down the indications of a weak and little faith, that we may guard ourselves against them. And,

First, The fears and jealousies of pious persons betray the weakness of their faith, as is apparent from this question, Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? Now such are not only those evil fears, which terrify us from the performance of our duty, but our irrational and superstitious fears of being left alone, or in the dark, the fear of evil spirits, and the like; and also all anxious and tormenting fears of what hereafter may befal ourselves, our Christian brethren, or the sincere and living members of Christ's body: a fear of caution, which renders us industrious to prevent the evil, may be useful in this case; but a fear of diffidence becomes not the good Christian; He (saith the Psalmist) whose heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord, will not be thus afraid of evil tidings. (Psal. cxii. 7.)

Secondly, Our doubtings and despondings in the time of peril demonstrate the weakness of our faith, according to that saying of our Lord to Peter, when he began to sink, O thou of little faith, wherefore dost thou doubt? (Matt. xiv. 31.) They, then, who doubt of God's assistance in the time of danger, or do suspect he may desert them in the needful hour, are weak in faith.

Thirdly, Our anxious solicitude for any temporal concern, and our perplexing cares for these enjoyments, shew we are men of little faith, for our heavenly Father knoweth how far we have need of these things; and hence our Saviour argues thus, If God so clothed the lilies of the field, if he feed the fowls of the air, will he not much more clothe and feed you, O ye of little faith? (Matt. vi. 30.) He, therefore, who suspects the kindness of his heavenly Father in these inferior concerns, either mistrusts his power, as did the unbelieving Jews, saying, Can God prepare a table in the wilderness? or else conceives his goodness to his faithful servants may be less than to the meanest of his creatures. And, Fourthly, Our impatience under trouble argues our want of faith; for he that believeth will not make haste. (Isa. xxviii. 16.) Our due persuasions of God's paternal love towards us will engage us to possess our souls in patience, and tarry the Lord's leisure, and wait contentedly for any blessing he hath promised, as knowing it will surely come in its most proper season, and when the wisdom of our heavenly Father sees we are best fitted to enjoy it.

[14] Ver. 27. Οἱ ἄνεμοι καὶ ἡ θάλασσα ὑπακούουσιν αὐτῷ, The winds and the sea obey him.] It being so often made the property of God, to still the raging of the sea, (Psal. lxv. 7. cvii. 25. 29.) it is not to be wondered that Christ's disciples should conceive there must be a Divine power in him who could perform such things.

[15] Ver. 28. Ὑπήντησαν αὐτῷ δύο δαιμονιζόμενοι, There met him two possessed with the devil, Mark ii. 5. A man possessed with an unclean spirit, so Luke viii. 27.] See this reconciled in note on Mark v. 2.

[16] Ver. 29. Τί ἡμῖν καί σοὶ; What have we to do with thee?] Schmidius here shews, that this is not a form of speaking proper to the Jews and Hellenists only, it being used by good Greek authors, who had no converse with them. So Arrian upon Epictetus, τί ἡμῖν καὶ αὐτῷ; What have we to do with him? (Lib. i. cap. 1. p. 85.)

[17] Ἦλθες ὧδε πρὸ καιροῦ βασανίσαι ἡμᾶς; Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?] That βασανίσαι should here signify only to imprison these demons, or send them to the place of their restraint, a reverend person argues, because the word βασανίζω sometimes signifies to imprison, and βασανισταὶ gaolers. (Matt. xviii. 34.) And, secondly, because they entreat, Luke viii. 31. that he would not command them to go out, εἰς ἄβυσσον, that is, into hell. But (1.) βασανίζω never signifies to restrain but in order to punishment or torment, to extort the truth; and βασανιστὴς only signifies a gaoler, because it is his office to torture and to punish men. And (2.) they who do afterward entreat not to be sent into the abyss, had formerly entreated not to be tormented, ver. 28. which shews that to be tormented, ver. 28. and to be sent to the abyss, ver. 31. were two different things. That it rather signifies to torment and punish them, may be gathered from the words of another unclean spirit, parallel to these, What have we to do with thee? art thou come ἀπολέσαι ἡμᾶς, to destroy us? Mark i. 24. Luke iv. 34. (2.) From these words, πρὸ καιροῦ, Art thou come to do this to us before the time of torments? For, though the devils do at present believe and tremble, (James ii. 19.) yet are they not at present tormented in the flames prepared for the devil and his angels, but only are reserved in chains of darkness to the day of judgment to be punished; (2 Pet. ii. 4. Jude 6.) then Satan is to be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone; (Rev. xx. 21.) at present he walks to and fro through the face of the whole earth, (Job i. 7.) and goes about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. (1 Pet. v. 8.)

[18] Ver. 31. Οἱ δὲ δαίμονες παρεκάλουν αὐτὸν, The devils entreated him.] Some are of opinion, that the persons represented in the New Testament as demoniacs, were only persons afflicted with some strange diseases, fits of the mother, convulsions, falling sickness, and the like; but this cavil may be evidently confuted,

First, From the Scriptures and ecclesiastical writers, which make a constant and a plain distinction betwixt these two things, the curing diseases, and the casting out of devils. So Matt. iv. 24. They brought to him all sick people, that were taken with divers diseases, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatic, and had the palsy, and he healed them; and Matt. x. 1. He gave to the apostles power against unclean spirits to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and diseases; Mark i. 34. He healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils. So also Luke iv. 40, 41. The Christians (saith Irenæus*) truly cast out devils, and heal the sick by imposition of hands. They cast out devils, and heal many diseases, saith Origen.† How many honest men have by us been healed, or freed from devils? saith Tertullian.‡

Secondly, This will be farther evident from many circumstances relating to the devils to be cast out, or actually rejected. As, v. g. that Christ suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him (Mark i. 34.) to be the Christ; (Luke iv. 41.) that they said, Thou art the Christ the Son of God; (Luke iv. 41.) that they expostulate with Christ, saying, What have we to do with thee, art thou come to destroy us? art thou come to torment us before the time? and pray that he would not torment them; that they ask his leave to enter into the swine, and being entered hurry them down into the sea, and beg they may not be sent out of the country; that they acknowledge that their name was Legion, there being many of them which possessed one man. (Mark v. 1. 14. Luke viii. 27. 33.) Now to make all these sayings the effects of a disease, or to conceive that Christ spake thus to a disease, is too great an evidence of one that is himself diseased. For,

Thirdly, Christ sometimes puts questions to these demons, asking their names, sometimes commands them to be silent, and sometimes to come out of a man, and enter no more into him, (Mark i. 25. ix. 25. Luke iv. 41.)

Fourthly, This we may argue from the symptoms of these demoniacs, their being of such strength, that no chain or fetters could bind them. (Mark v. 3.) Nor could the diseased persons fear to be destroyed, tormented, sent out of the country, or into the abyss, by Christ.

Obj. If it be said that we find no mention of persons thus possessed with the devil among Jews or gentiles before our Saviour's advent, nor have we any experience of any such thing, either among the Christians or in the heathen world, and therefore cannot easily believe it was so then:

Ans. I answer, That the falsehood of this suggestion, that men possessed with evil spirits were not known among the Jews in former ages, hath been proved from the plain testimonies of Josephus, Justin Martyr, and Irenæus, in the general preface to the Epistles.

And that among the heathens there were persons thus possessed, is there proved also from the testimonies of Plutarch, Lucian, Justin Martyr, and Origen; so that it is certain that the history of Christ and his apostles casting out devils in Judea, and of Christians casting them out throughout the world, was therefore never questioned by Jew or gentile; because they had among themselves in every place pretenders to it.

Obj. 2. Whereas it is objected, That to have a devil, and be mad, are joined together as the same thing, John x. 20. and to be lunatic, and have a devil, Matt. xvii. 15. 18. and is hence inferred that these diseases were the same as devils; and, according to the Jewish phrase, gave occasion to the being said, such persons were possessed with a devil:

Ans. To this I answer, That I have sufficiently confuted this cavil in this note, by shewing, both from the sacred records and the writings of the fathers, that there is a constant and plain distinction betwixt these two things, the curing of diseases and the casting out of devils.

[19] Ἐπίτρεψον ἡμῖν, Suffer us.] He only therefore sent them into the herd of swine, (Mark v. 12.) by permitting them to enter into them; and this he did, saith Grotius, to convince the Greeks, who lived in this place, and kept these swine, of the sacredness of the Jewish laws, which they ridiculed, especially on the account of the prohibition to eat swine's flesh.

1. AND he entered into a ship, and passed over (a part of the sea of Galilee), and [1] came into his own city (Capernaum).

2. And (a rumour being spread, that he was in the house, Mark ii. 1. as indeed he was, sitting and teaching a multitude so great, that the house and porch could not receive them; and healing them by his Divine power, in presence of the pharisees and doctors of the law, who came from Galilee, Judea, and Jerusalem, Luke v. 17.) behold, they brought to him a man sick of the palsy, lying on a bed, (carried by four persons, who being not able to come to him for the press, they uncovered the roof of the upper chamber where he was, and let down the bed to him: see the note on Mark ii. 3.) [2] and Jesus seeing their faith [3] said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven thee.

3. And, behold, certain of the scribes (and pharisees sitting there) said within themselves, (i. e. in their hearts, Mark ii. 6. and in their private discourses, Luke v. 21.) This man blasphemeth (making himself a god, for who can forgive sins but God only? Luke v. 21.)

4. And Jesus, knowing their thoughts, said, Wherefore think you evil in your hearts (concerning me for these words)?

5. For [4] whether is easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise (take up thy bed), and walk? (which is a certain indication that the sins, which brought upon him that disease, are pardoned, or that this punishment of them is remitted.)

6. But (I choose to say the first), [5] that ye may know that the Son of man hath power (even whilst he is) on earth to forgive sins; then (turning from them) saith he to the sick of the palsy, Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thy house.

7. And he arose (took up his bed), and departed to his house.

8. But (and) when the multitude saw it, they marvelled, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men, (acknowledging they never saw it so before, Mark ii. 12.)

9. And as Jesus passed forth from thence, he saw [6] a man, named Matthew, (or Levi, the son of Alpheus, Mark ii. 14. Luke v. 27.) sitting at the receipt of custom (or toll-booth): and he saith unto him, Follow me. And he (leaving all things) arose, and followed him, (and made him a great supper in his house, Luke v. 29.)

10. And it came to pass, as Jesus sat at meat in the house (of Matthew), behold, many publicans and sinners came and sat down with him and his disciples.

11. And when the pharisees saw it, they (murmuring) said unto his disciples, [7] Why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners? (why doth he, who professeth himself a prophet, and a holy man, defile himself by touching, and vilify himself by conversing, with such men?)

12. But when Jesus heard that, he said unto them, (Such more especially need my help, for) they that be whole need not a physician, but they that be sick.

13. But (for your farther satisfaction in this matter) go ye and learn what that (of the prophet Hosea, vi. 6.) meaneth, [8] I will have mercy, and not sacrifice (and how it suits with this action of mine): [9] for I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance (and must not be diverted from such acts of mercy by your rules).

14. Then (it being a day on which the disciples of John and the pharisees fasted, Mark ii. 18.) came to him the disciples of John, saying (to Jesus), [10] Why do we and the pharisees fast oft, (even twice a week, Luke xviii. 12.) but thy disciples fast not, (but eat and drink on our fasting days? Luke v. 33.)

15. And Jesus said unto them, [11] Can the children of the bridechamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them (is this fit or usual in such cases)? but (as for my disciples) the days will come, when the bridegroom shall (by death) be taken from them, and then shall they fast.

16. (And he said also by way of parable, Luke v. 36.) [12] No man putteth a piece of new cloth unto an old garment; for (if so) that which is put in to fill it up taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worse.

17. Neither do men put new wine into old (leather) bottles: else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and (so) the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved: (so in like manner my young disciples, taken not from the schools or academies, as perhaps those of John and the pharisees might be, but from their fishing trades, must not presently be put to such severe tasks, for which they are not yet strong enough, lest they should be discouraged, and fall from me.)

18. While he spake these things to them, behold, there came a certain [13] ruler (of the synagogue, Jairus by name, Mark xv. 22. Luke viii. 41.) and worshipped him, saying, My daughter [14] is even now dead: (Gr. is dead by this time, for when I came from my house she was at her last gasp, Mark v. 23.) but come and lay thy hand upon her, and she shall live.

19. And Jesus arose, and followed him, and so did his disciples, (and a great multitude who pressed upon him, Mark v. 24. Luke viii. 42.)

20. And, behold, a woman, which was diseased with an issue of blood twelve years, (and had spent all that she had upon the physicians, and was nothing better, but rather grew worse, Mark v. 26. Luke viii. 43.) came behind him, [15] and touched the hem of his garment: (and presently the issue of her blood was stanched, Mark v. 29.)

21. For she (had) said within herself, If I may but touch his garment, I shall be whole.

22. But Jesus (knowing that virtue was gone out of him) turned him about (to the multitude, and said, Who touched me?) and when he saw her (that had done so, and heard her tell the reason why she had done it, Luke viii. 45. 47.) he said (unto her), Daughter, be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole. And the woman was made whole from that hour.

[Luke viii. 49. While he was thus speaking, there cometh one from the ruler of the synagogue's house, saying to him, Thy daughter is dead, trouble not the Master. Ver. 50. But when Jesus heard it, he answered him, saying, Fear not, believe only, and she shall be made whole.]

23. And when Jesus came into the ruler's house, and saw the minstrels, and (heard) the people making a noise (as at a funeral solemnity),

24. He said unto them, Give place: for [16] the maid is not dead, but sleepeth (i. e. she shall be raised from it, as it were out of sleep). And they laughed him to scorn.

25. But when the people were put forth, (Peter, James, and John, and the father and mother of the damsel being only left, Mark v. 40.) he went in, and took her by the hand (and said unto her, Daughter, arise; and her spirit returned unto her), and the maid arose, (and walked, being twelve years old; and he commanded that something should be given her to eat, to strengthen her, and confirm them that she was alive, Luke viii. 54, 55.)

26. And the fame thereof went abroad into all the land, (though he straitly charged them to tell no man of it, Luke viii. 56.)

27. And when Jesus departed thence, two blind men followed him, crying, and saying, Thou son of David, (of whom the prophet Isaiah hath foretold, that he should open the eyes of the blind, xxix. 11. xxxv. 5. xlii. 7.) have mercy on us.

28. And when he was come into the house, the blind men came to him: and Jesus saith unto them, Believe ye that I am able to do this? They said unto him, Yea, Lord.

29. Then touched he their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you.

30. And their eyes were opened; and Jesus strictly charged them, saying, [17] See that no man know it.

31. But they, when they were departed, spread abroad his fame in all that country.

32. And as they went out (of the city), behold, they brought to him a dumb man possessed with a devil.

33. And when the devil was cast out, the dumb spake, and the multitudes marvelled, saying, It was never so seen in Israel.

34. But the pharisees said, He casteth out devils through (Beelzebub, Luke xi. 15. who is) the prince of the devils.

35. And Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing every sickness and every disease among the people.

36. But (and) when he saw the multitudes (that followed him), he was moved with compassion on them, because [18] they fainted (or strayed), and were scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd, (and he taught them many things, Mark vi. 34.)

37. Then saith he to his disciples, [19] The harvest is plenteous, but the labourers are few (i. e. there be many who are willing to receive instruction, but few who are fit to give it to them);

38. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into his harvest (to instruct those aright who are ready to receive instruction).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. IX.

[1] Ver. 1. Ε'ΙΣ τὴν ἰδίαν πόλιν, Into his own city.] That is, into Capernaum; (Mark ii. 1.) Christ having left Nazareth, to go to dwell at Capernaum. (Matt. iv. 13.)

[2] Ver. 2. Καὶ ἰδὼν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὴν πίστιν αὐτῶν, And Jesus seeing their faith.] i. e. The faith of those who let down the sick of the palsy: whence it is evident, that the faith of others may prevail for the obtaining temporal and corporal blessings. Thus, in the preceding chapter, ver. 13. the faith of the centurion prevails to heal his servant; and here, ver. 33. the devil is cast out of a dumb and deaf man, who had no tongue to ask it, through the faith of them that brought him. Thus the daughter of Jairus is raised, Luke viii. 50. and the unclean spirit is cast out of the son, by the father's faith, Mark ix. 22, 23. Note also, that Theophylact here adds, καὶ αὐτοῦ τοῦ παραλυτικοῦ, and the faith of the paralytic; for, saith he, had he not believed he should be healed, he would not have consented to their action.

[3] Εἶπε τῷ παραλυτικῷ, ἀφέωνταί σοι αἱ ἁμαρτίαι σου, He said to the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins are forgiven thee.] Shewing (saith Theophylact) that diseases, and chiefly palsies, proceed from sin, he first speaks of forgiving them: but then it must be noted, that our Lord here speaks of remission, not of the eternal punishments, but of the temporal punishments, inflicted for sin. (1.) Because this remission is obtained by the faith of others; whereas, the enjoyment of spiritual and eternal blessings in persons capable of faith, depends on their own faith alone. (2.) Because our Saviour saith, it is as easy to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; as to say, Rise up, and walk? which consequence seems not to be good, if we take remission of sins in the highest sense; since, by the example of the apostles and seventy disciples, it appears, they might have power of healing such diseases, who had no power of forgiving the eternal punishments of sin. Moreover, it is usual in Scripture, and was so among the Jews, to represent bodily afflictions, miseries, and diseases, as the effects of sin, according to the common proverb, "Nisi essent peccata, non essent flagella;" Were there no sins, there would be no chastisements: hence is the inquiry of the disciples, touching the man born blind, Who hath sinned, he or his parents, that he should be born blind? (John ix. 2.) and to the paralytic, Christ, having heard him, speaks thus, Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. (John v. 14.) For the law of Moses threatened various kinds of diseases to the transgressors of it, Deut. xxviii. 21, 22. and when they were remitted, these diseases were removed; according to those words of Isaiah, (xxxiii. 24.) The inhabitants shall not say that they are sick; the people that are there shall be forgiven their iniquity: and it is also usual in the Old and the New Testament, to intimate deliverance from corporal diseases by remission of sins; as when the prophet saith to David, 2 Sam. xii. 13. The Lord hath taken away thy sin; thou shalt not die for it: and, 2 Chron. vii. 14. I will be merciful to their iniquities, and will heal their land: so what is worded thus, Matt. ix. 22. Thy faith hath saved thee; is, Mark v. 34. Thou art made whole.

[4] Ver. 5. Τί γάρ ἐστιν εὐκοπώτερον εἰπεῖν; Whether is it easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up, and walk?] They who here tell us, it is therefore easier to say the first; because he cannot so easily be disproved, who promiseth a thing invisible, as he who engageth to do that which is the object of our senses; do not compare together the things to be done, but only the ways of knowing when they are not done: they therefore interpret these words better, who say, that it must be as easy to say, do the one, as to say with effect the other; it being indeed the same thing to say, Thy sins, that is, the temporal punishments of them, are forgiven; and to say, Be thou healed, or Rise up and walk effectually; seeing by being freed from the disease, which was the temporal punishment of sin, it was manifest that sin was thus far forgiven.

[5] Ver. 6. Ἵνα δὲ εἰδῆτε ὅτι ἐξουσίαν ἔχει ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἀφιέναι τὰς ἁμαρτίας, but that ye may know the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins.] i. e. Of absolving or releasing men from the temporal punishments of sin, whilst he is in his state of humiliation; for that Christ speaks here only of the temporal punishments of sin, is evident, not only from what hath been already said, but also from the effect; Christ only giving him power to rise up, and walk. Moreover, that Christ here speaks of a power inherent in him, and not only of the power of God assisting him, as it did the apostles, when they healed diseases, is evident; because, had Christ only pronounced, that the sins of this paralytic were remitted by God, and the cure performed by his power, the pharisees could have had no cause to be offended with him, and much less to have accused him of blasphemy.

Lastly, Observe, that by this power the distemper of this paralytic was healed instantly; which shews the power that did effect it was Divine: that power only being able instantly to cure diseases by a word. Hence do the fathers conclude, our Lord was God as well as man: so Irenæus,* By remitting the sin, he cured the man, and manifestly shewed who he was; for, if none can remit sins but God, and yet our Lord did remit them, and cure the man, it is manifest, that he was both the Word of God, and the Son of man, receiving power of remission of sins from his Father, as God and man: and Novatian,† If only God can remit sins, and yet Christ remitted them, " merito Christus est Deus," he is truly God. The Jews here say, that it was proper to God to forgive sins; and this Christ denies not, but only proves, that the Son of man had this power also, leaving them to make the inference. The multitude, indeed, glorified God who had given this power to men; in which words, though there was a mistake in thinking that Christ wrought his miracles as the prophets did; not by an internal power residing in them, but only by the assistance of the power of God; yet seeing even this acknowledgment tended to the confirmation of Christ's prophetic office, and so to induce them to embrace all Christ's doctrines and instructions, as the word of God, they by this glorified God, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Theophylact here adds, That our Lord bid the paralytic carry his bed, partly ἵνα μὴ φαντασία δόξῃ, to shew the cure was real, and not imaginary only; and partly to convince the multitude of the miracle thus done by ocular demonstration.

[6] Ver. 9. A man named Matthew.] That this Matthew here was the same with Levi, in St. Mark and Luke, see note on Luke v. 27.

[7] Ver. 11. Διατί μετὰ τῶν τελωνῶν καὶ ἁμαρτωλῶν ἐσθίει ὁ διδάσκαλος ὑμῶν; Why eateth your master with publicans and sinners?] The pharisees looked upon publicans and great sinners as if they had been heathens, thinking it a sin even to converse with them, though it were to convert them from the evil of their ways; objecting this to the reproach of Christ, that he was a friend to publicans and sinners: (Matt. xi. 19.) hence saith our Saviour of him that would not hear the church, Let him be to thee as a heathen and publican; i. e. abstain from any farther converse and familiarity with him. (Matt. xviii. 17.) And if you love them that love you only, or lend to them only that lend to you again, what do you more than others? do not publicans and heathens, (Matt. v. 46.) and sinners, (Luke vi. 32, 33.) the same? And they bore the same character among the heathens: so the scholiast* upon those words of Aristophanes, Καὶ τελώνην, καὶ φάραγγα, καὶ χάρυβδιν ἁρπαγῆς, a publican, and a whirlpit, and a gulf of rapine: and Suidas notes, That διαβέβλητο τὸ τελώνου ὄνομα παρὰ τοῖς παλαιοῖς, the very name of publican was infamous to the ancients. Theocritus says, That bears and lions were the most savage beasts in the mountains; but in the cities, τελῶναι, publicans and sycophants. (Apud Stob. Serm. 2. p. 31.) And in Apollodorus they are joined with thieves and dissolute men, κλέπτει, τελωνεῖ, ῥαδιουργεῖ. (Stob. Serm. 44. p. 307.) Cicero† declares, The name and office was very grievous to the Greeks, and insinuates, that it was not much less abhorred among the Romans; and well it might be, since Suidas out of an old author agrees so exactly with Aristophanes, declaring, That the life of a publican was, Παῤῥησιασμένη βία, ἀνεπιτίμητος ἁρπαγή, an open and free violence, and unpunished rapine, ἀναίσχυντος πλεονεξία, ἀναίδης ἐμπορία, πραγματεία λόγον μὴ ἔχουσα, a shameless covetousness, an impudent merchandise, an unreasonable negotiation: whence Tacitus‡ not only speaks, " de novis acerbitatibus, et illicitis exactionibus publicanorum," of the new grievances and unlawful exactions of the publicans; but adds, that Nero therefore was consulting, whether he should take away all tributes, idque pulcherrimum donum generi mortalium daret; and St. John the Baptist requires them to exact no more than that which was appointed. (See Dr. Hammond on the place.)

[8] Ver. 13. Ἔλεον θέλω καὶ οὐ θυσίαν, I will have mercy and not sacrifice.] i. e. I rather will have mercy than sacrifice: so Gen. xlv. 8. οὐκ ὑμεῖς, you have not sent me, but God; οὐ γὰρ καθ' ἡμῶν, your murmuring is not against us, but against God, Exod. xvi. 18.; Prov. viii. 10. Receive instruction, καὶ μὴ ἀργύριον, and not silver; and knowledge ὑπὲρ before gold; Joel ii. 13. Rend your heart, and not your garments. (See John vi. 27. 1 Cor. i. 17.) For that these words are not to be understood absolutely, is evident, because God had commanded sacrifices, and therefore could not absolutely say, he would not have them.

[9] Οὐ γὰρ ἦλθον καλέσαι δικαίους, ἀλλ' ἁμαρτωλοὺς εἰς μετάνοιαν· For I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.] Where, by the righteous, we are not to understand those who are only righteous in their own conceits, such as the pharisees were, who justified themselves before men, (Luke xvi. 15.) and trusted to themselves that they were righteous, and despised others in comparison of themselves: (Luke xviii. 9.) for such are not whole, but have great need of the spiritual Physician; (ver. 12.) and such, especially, the gospel calleth to repentance. (Matt. iii. 8—10. Apoc. iii. 17.) Moreover, the word sinners here imports, such persons as live in a customary practice of sin; so that the tenor of their lives is wicked, and who are therefore to be called to that repentance, which consists in the change of their lives, from the service of sin to holiness, from slavery to Satan to the fear of God; and therefore, by the righteous, who need no repentance, we are not to understand those who are entirely free from sin; for, so there is not a just man upon earth, (Job ix. 2. Eccles. vii. 20.) nor any man who is not a sinner; (1 Kings viii. 46. James iii. 2. 1 John i. 8.) but those who are truly and sincerely righteous, have truly reformed their lives, who carefully endeavour to abstain from all known sins, and set themselves sincerely to the performance of their whole duty both to God and man, and so are righteous and accepted in the sight of God; in which sense Job was righteous, and eschewed evil; Zacharias and Elisabeth were righteous, walking in all the commandments of God; (Luke i. 6.) and Simeon; (Luke ii. 25.) and so they needed not that repentance which consists in the change of the life, from a course of sinning to living unto God. So that the argument here is double; (1.) That though familiar converse with sinners was in the general to be avoided, yet was that only on this account, that we may not encourage them in sin, or be defiled by them; and so it could not hinder that great act of charity and mercy to their souls, which was directed to the conversion of them from their evil ways; the avoiding of familiarity with them, being only as the precept of sacrifice, and therefore not to be regarded so as to obstruct that more important duty of shewing mercy to their souls. (2.) That Christ was the great spiritual physician sent to heal these sin-sick souls, and call them to repentance; and therefore, in conversing with them, in pursuance of this end, he was so far from transgressing his Father's precepts, that he was doing the great work for which he was sent by him into the world. Note, also, that this of the physician was a proverbial saying; for, when Antisthenes* was asked, Why he conversed with wicked men? his answer was, Καὶ οἱ ἰατροὶ μετὰ τῶν νοσούντων εἰσιν, Physicians are with the diseased: and, when Diogenes, saith Stobæus,† when Pausanius, saith Plutarch, was asked, Why he praised the Lacedemonians, but stayed not with them? he answered, Ὅτι οὐδὲ ἰατροὶ παρὰ τοῖς ὑγιαίνουσιν, ὅπου δὲ οἱ νοσοῦντες διατρίβειν εἰώθασιν, That physicians conversed not among the healthy, but among the sick. (See Examen Millii here.)

[10] Ver. 14. Διατί ἡμεῖς καὶ οἱ φαρισαῖοι νηστεύομεν πολλά; Why do we and the pharisees fast much, but thy disciples fast not?] It is here said, by Mr. Clerc, that it was not the design of St. John's disciples, to inquire simply, Why the disciples of Christ did not fast, but why they did not follow the example of all devout men among the Jews, who did fast often? But (1.) this seems to be a mistake; for they ask, why they did not fast at all? and our Saviour's plea for them is, for an entire exemption from that duty whilst he was present with them. (2.) Were it as Mr. Clerc would have it, yet is the observation of the reverend Dr. Hammond true and pertinent, That the disciples of John intended not to ask the reason, why they themselves fasted often? they being so well satisfied with the reason of that, that they wondered why Christ's disciples did not as they did: this being, saith he, truly the meaning of their question; Since we fast so devoutly, why do not thy disciples do this as well as we?

[11] Ver. 15. Μὴ δύνανται οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος πενθεῖν, &c. Can the children of the bridechamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them?] The sons of the bridechamber are those who are admitted into it, styled by the Grecians παράνυμφοι and πρόχοροι· by the Latins, pronubi; by the Jews, shoshebinim; and their business was, to enter into the bridechamber, and to rejoice and exhilarate themselves with the bridegroom, during the time of the marriage-festival; which was, saith Dr. Lightfoot on the place, seven days; and these were usually φίλοι τοῦ νυμφίου, the friends or kindred of the bridegroom: whence St. John the Baptist represents himself, as rejoicing to hear the voice of the bridegroom, as being one of his friends. (John iii. 29.) So then the argument runs thus: I am the bridegroom, and the church is my bride; as long as I am here, lasts the marriage-feast, and my disciples are the children and friends of the bridegroom, and so are not to mourn, but to rejoice with me whilst this time lasts; at my death and departure from them, this bridegroom will be taken from them, and then will be the time for them to fast and mourn.

[12] Ver. 16, 17. Οὐδεὶς δὲ ἐπιβάλλει ἐπίβλημα ῥάκους ἀγνάφου ἐπὶ ἱματίῳ παλαιῷ, No man putteth a piece of new cloth to an old garment.] It is the opinion of many fathers and interpreters, that Christ by these two similitudes intended to shew, he thought it not fit at their first entrance, and before the Holy Spirit was come down upon his disciples, to impose the burden of fasting on them, because they were not fitted to bear it, by reason of their infirmity, and that they might be tempted by such austerities, as were frequent fastings, imposed on them, to fall off from him. And hence they add, that Christ, by his example, recommends this condescension to weak and infirm consciences to his disciples, and to the ministers of the gospel; viz. not to impose upon them, that βάρος ἐπιταγμάτων, weight of ordinances, which they cannot bear: but, against this exposition Episcopius objects, That no reason can be assigned, why Christ's disciples should be less able thus to fast, than the disciples of the Baptist, or the pharisees. To which objection I answer, That there were among the Jews, not only sects of the essenes and pharisees, who led an austere life, but also schools of the prophets;* and those frequently lived in mountains and deserts, and were also many of them Nazarites, and consecrated to the service of God; they had also their academical and private schools, to train up men in discipline; and from these might come disciples to John in the wilderness, and disciples to the pharisees, who might be trained up in those duties; whereas it is certain, that the disciples of our Lord were chosen from their fishing-trade, and so came to him wholly unacquainted with and so unfitted for those austerities. His interpretation is therefore this, That it is as unfit or unseemly for his disciples to fast, whilst he is present with them, as it is to sew a new piece of cloth to an old garment, or to put new wine into old bottles: in which interpretation I cannot acquiesce, because it is manifest from both these similitudes, that our Lord represents not the unfitness, but the hurt or damage of doing either of these things, viz. that the doing of the first would make the rent worse; the doing of the second would endanger the breaking the bottles, and the spilling the wine: to which danger, the sense given by Episcopius hath no respect.

[13] Ver. 18. Ἄρχων, a ruler.] This ruler being in St. Mark and Luke, ἀρχισυνάγωγος, a ruler of the synagogue, it is not reasonable to conceive, as some do, that he was one of the twenty-three judges that were constituted in every city, but rather that he was the head or ruler of the synagogue, which was at Nazareth; of which rulers we have mention, Acts xiii. 15. xviii. 8. 17. Luke xiii. 14. (See note on Mark v. 22.)

[14] Ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν, is now dead.] This being in St. Mark v. 23. ἐσχάτως ἔχει, she is at the last extremity; the words must be rendered as in the paraphrase, she is by this time dead, and this is evident from the story; because, as Christ was going to the ruler's house, a messenger comes from it to tell him, that his daughter was now dead; (Luke viii. 49.) which shews, that at his coming to Christ she was not so, but only at the last extremity.

[15] Ver. 20. Προσελθοῦσα ὄπισθεν, coming behind him.] The woman having an issue of blood, which rendered her touch defiling, according to the law, seems therefore to have come behind him, as fearing she might not have been permitted to touch him, had her distemper been made known.

[16] Ver. 24. Οὐ γὰρ ἀπέθανε τὸ κοράσιον ἀλλὰ καθεύδει. For the maid is not dead, but sleepeth.] From this place the Jesuits contend for their equivocations and mental reservations; by which they certainly deceive the hearer, who knows not what in their minds they do conceal, alleging, that when our Lord here saith, she is not dead, he reserved in his mind, in respect of my power, or so as to remain under the power of it. But the words of Christ were plainly spoken to those who were preparing for her interment, and performing the funeral rites belonging to it, and, therefore, only intimate, she was not so dead as that they needed to make these preparations, he being come to awake her as out of a sleep.

[17] Ver. 30. Ὁρᾶτε μηδεὶς γινωσκέτω, see that no man know it.] That Christ should take this care, that his miracles in healing persons, and casting out of devils, should not be known, only to avoid vain-glory, seems not very reasonable; this being done sufficiently by the declaration, that he did this by the finger of God, (Matt. xii. 28.) and that by these works, he sought not his own glory, but the glory of his Father. (John v. 41. vii. 18.) Let it then be noted;

First, That when he doth his miracles among the heathens, or upon them that dwelt among them, such as were the Syrophœnician woman, and the woman of Paneas, or Cæsarea Philippi, he never imposeth silence on the person healed, but sometimes, on the contrary, bids them declare what God had done for them: so when he had cured the demoniac at Gadara, he bids him go to his house and his acquaintance, and tell them what things the Lord had done for him, and how he had shewed mercy even to a heathen. (Mark v. 19.) And though he charged his disciples to tell no man among the Jews that he was the Christ, till his resurrection, (Matt. xvi. 20.) he doth himself declare to the Samaritan woman that he was the Messiah; (John iv. 25, 26.) because these things would prepare these heathens and Samaritans, when Christ was preached to them by his apostles, to receive their testimony.

Secondly, Observe that the things which he forbids his disciples to declare, were not his miracles, but either his transfiguration on the mount, (Matt. xvii. 9.) or that he was the Christ. (Mark viii. 29, 30.) And this he only bade them to conceal, till he was risen from the dead; and this he did, not only that their testimony of him might not be looked upon as a thing compacted between him and them, but chiefly because they were not fitted to be his witnesses of these things, till they had received power from on high, by the coming down of the Holy Ghost to do it. (Acts i. 8.) For he received before the testimony of John, and appealed to it, (John v. 33.) because he was sent by God to bear witness of him, (John i. 6, 7.) and because the blazing these things abroad by his disciples that he was the Messiah, sent by God to be their Saviour; and that God, by a voice from heaven, commanded all men to obey him—would have so far comported with that imagination of a temporal kingdom to be erected by him, and looked so like the sending his disciples as his heralds, to proclaim him king, as that it would have given too much occasion to the government to suspect that he designed some such thing, and too much colour to the accusation of the Jews, that he forbade men to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself was Christ a king. (Luke xxiii. 2.) Now, from the first observation we learn, that the reason why he was thus concerned to have his miracles concealed, must be somewhat peculiar to the Jewish nation; and, from the second, that he did this chiefly to avoid all suspicion that he intended to set up any temporal kingdom, or to give occasion to any innovation, sedition, or disturbance, upon this account. We therefore say,

First, With the reverend Dr. Hammond, that he did this to avoid the malice of the scribes and pharisees and Herodians against him, who were so far from being convinced by his miracles, that they not only did blaspheme them, but oft consulted how they might entrap him in his words, and get something out of his mouth, by which they might accuse him as an enemy to God and Cæsar. So when he had pronounced his woes against them, the scribes and pharisees began to urge him vehemently, laying snares for him, and seeking to get something out of his mouth, that they might accuse him to the government. (Luke xi. 53, 54.) When, in the parable of the kingdom of heaven, he had told them what was like to be their fate, they send out their disciples with the pharisees to entrap him in his words, and to put the question to him, Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar or not? (Matt. xxii. 15. 17.) And when he doth but covertly declare himself to be the Son of God, they are ready to stone him for it. (John viii. 59. x. 31.) And at his miracles they were so incensed, as to think of nothing less than cutting him off; and thus, when he cured the man that had the withered hand, the pharisees and Herodians take counsel together how they might destroy him. (Mark iii. 6.) Thus, when the people, hearing his words, and seeing his miracles, began to be convinced by them, and to say that he was the Christ: the pharisees and high-priests hearing that they murmured such things concerning him, send forth their servants to apprehend him. (John vii. 30—32.) When he had raised Lazarus, the chief priests and pharisees conclude that it was expedient that he should die, and send forth their commands, that if any one knew where he was, he should declare it, that they might take him. (John xi. 47. 49, 50. 57.) That, therefore, they might not take him off before his time, and that they might have less occasion to do it for his popularity, or the resort of multitudes unto him, he commands his miracles should be concealed; and when they could not be so, he departs from the multitudes into desert places; and when his fame was spread forth in any one country round about, he departs thence into some other place. But,

Secondly, His chief design in thus concealing that he was the Christ, and giving charge not to divulge his miracles, was this,—that he might not indulge that pernicious conceit, which had obtained among them, that their Messiah was to be a temporal king; for the very name of their Messiah being still in their Targums, Messiah the king; and they speaking so much of his kingdom and dominion over the nations, his delivering Israel, and subduing their enemies; had our Lord openly declared himself the Messiah before his resurrection, and exaltation to the right hand of God, they would easily have made this inference, that therefore he must be their king, their deliverer, and the subduer of their enemies, and would have attempted by tumults and seditions to set up his kingdom: thus, when he had fed five thousand with five little loaves and two small fishes, they gathering hence, that he was able to make provisions for an army, presently conclude that they would take him by force, and make him a king. (John vi. 15.) And this causeth him to depart from them into a mountain alone. And his miracles being so great a conviction, that he was that Prophet that should come into the world, this was thought warrant enough for this attempt, (ver. 14.) Christ's kingdom, therefore, not being of this world, and, therefore, not to come with that pomp or observation, or to the ends which they expected, and it being his great concern, that no sedition or disturbance of the civil government should be laid either to his person or doctrine, this seemeth to have been his chief reason, why he gave charge to those healed not to make his miracles known, and to his disciples not to declare that he was the Christ.

[18] Ver 36. Ὅτι ἦσαν ἐκλελυμένοι, they fainted.] It is certain that Chrysostom and Theophylact read here ἐσκυλμένοι, they were tossed and wearied, either with the burdens of the scribes and pharisees, or with going from one of these false guides to another; from those that bound, to those that loosed the same thing. But our reading, they were scattered from one another, comports best with the similitude of being as sheep without a shepherd.

[19] Ver. 37. Ὁ μὲν θερισμὸς πολὺς, The harvest indeed is great, but the labourers few, &c.] From this discourse of Christ we learn these things, worthy to be regarded by all the pastors of Christ's flock, viz.

First, That he who doth not instruct his flock in the sincere milk of the word, and acquaint them with the things belonging to their eternal peace, from a heart full of love to God, and to the souls committed to their charge, deserves not the name of a true shepherd; for the want of these things in the scribes and pharisees, made Christ complain that the Jews were as sheep without a shepherd.

Secondly, That where the harvest is great, and there be many who are white for the harvest, (John iv. 35.) or ready to receive instruction, we should be the more diligent and laborious to afford it to them.

Thirdly, That in such cases, when either we are not called to that work, or are placed in another station, we should pray fervently that God would raise up men fitted for their instruction, and zealous for his glory and the good of souls.

CHAP. X.

1. AND when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them [1] power against unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of disease (as they went preaching in his name).

2. Now the names of the twelve apostles are these; the [2] first, Simon, who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother; James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother;

3. Philip, and Bartholomew; Thomas, and Matthew The publican; James the son of Alpheus, and Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus;

4. Simon the Canaanite, and Judas Iscariot, who also betrayed him.

5. These twelve Jesus sent forth, (by two and two, Mark vi. 7.) and commanded them, saying, Go not (at present) into the way of the gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not:

6. [3] But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, (to whom this doctrine of salvation is first sent, and is to be first preached, Acts iii. 26.)

7. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand, (i. e. the kingdom of the Messiah is now to be set up.

8. And in confirmation of this) heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, [4] raise the dead, cast out devils: [5] freely ye have received (this power from me), freely give (the benefit of it to others.

9. Then he commanded them to take nothing by the way, Mark vi. 8. saying), Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass, in your purses;

10. Nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, [6] nor yet staves; for the workman is worthy of his meat (and therefore you may reasonably expect to find it among them, for the benefit of whom you labour).

11. And into whatever city or town ye shall enter, inquire who in it is [7] worthy (or prepared to receive instruction); and there abide till ye go thence (or from that town).

12. And when ye come into a house, salute it (saying, Peace be to this house).

13. And if the house be worthy, let your peace come upon it (your blessing shall rest on it); [8] but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you (i. e. they shall receive no advantage by it).

14. And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, [9] shake off the dust of your feet (for a testimony against them, Mark vi. 11. Luke ix. 5. that you count them as unclean and unfit to be conversed with any more, because they have rejected the word of life propounded, and by your miracles confirmed to them).

15. [10] Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the (great) day of judgment, than for (the people of) that city; (because the means of knowledge rejected by them have been greater, xi. 23, 24.)

16. Behold, I send you forth as (if) sheep (were sent) in the midst of wolves (i. e. on an employment full of peril from the men of the world): be ye therefore wise as serpents (i. e. as prudent and wary as they are to preserve themselves from danger), and harmless as doves; (that, giving no offence to any man, you may give them no occasion to do evil to you: see Rom. xvi. 19.)

17. [11] But (and especially) beware of (the) men (of this age and nation): for they will deliver you up to the councils (of the Sanhedrin), and they will scourge you in their synagogues (for preaching in my name).

18. And ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake, for a testimony against (Gr. to) them and (to) the gentiles, (who believe not the gospel preached to them, that the kingdom of God was come to them, Luke x. 9.)

19. But when they deliver you up (to these men), [12] take no thought how or what ye shall speak: for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak.

20. For it is not ye that speak (from your own abilities), but (it is) the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you.

21. And (know this, that when the gospel is thus preached by you, the effect of it will be this, that) the brother (who believeth not) shall deliver up the (Christian) brother to death, and the father the child; and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death (as being Christians).

22. And ye (also) shall be hated of all (the) men (of the world) for my name's sake; but he that endureth to the end (of these days of persecution from the unbelieving Jews) shall be saved (from the dreadful destruction coming on them).

23. [13] But when they persecute you in this city (i. e. in any one city), flee ye into another; for verily I say unto you, [14] Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come; (with his Roman army to destroy that nation, and to burn up their cities.

24. And to arm you against these persecutions, consider that) the disciple is not (to expect to be) above his master, nor the servant (to be) above his lord.

25. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and (for) the servant (to be) as his lord. If (then) they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more (shall they call or proportionably revile) them of his household?

26. [15] Fear them not therefore: for there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; and hid, that shall not be known (i. e. for my doctrine, which now seems obscure and hidden from the world, shall in time be revealed to all nations, and overcome all the calumnies with which it is loaded, and all the opposition it shall meet with).

27. [16] What (therefore) I tell you in darkness, (or parabolical expressions), that speak ye in the light; and what ye hear (from me) in the ear (i. e. more privately), that preach ye (publicly, and as it were) upon the housetops.

28. [17] And fear not them which (can only) kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.

29. (Moreover, you who are so highly valued by God, and live under such a peculiar conduct of his providence, have no cause to fear what they can do to the body, for) are not two sparrows sold for a farthing (as being birds of little value)? and [18] one of them shall not fall on the ground (or die) without (the providence of) your Father.

30. But (yet this providence is more particularly concerned for you, for) the very hairs of your head are all numbered (i. e. your minutest concerns are under the especial conduct of his providence).

31. Fear ye not therefore, (for) ye are of more value (in the sight of God) than many sparrows.

32. Whosoever therefore shall (by these considerations be encouraged still to) confess (or own) me (and my doctrine) before men, him will I confess also (or own at the great day as my faithful servant) before my Father which is in heaven.

33. But whosoever (notwithstanding these encouragements) shall (to avoid their persecutions) deny me before men, him will I also deny (and disown at the great day) before my Father which is in heaven.

34. (And) [19] think not that I am come to send (or cause) peace on earth (and so to free you from these persecutions; for) I came not to send peace, but a sword.

35. For I am come to (preach that doctrine which will rather) set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law.

36. And (thus it shall happen, that) a man's foes shall be they of his own household.

37. (And this dispensation of providence will discover who is worthy to be owned as my disciple, for when this happeneth), he that loveth father or mother more than me (i. e. is moved by his regard to them to disown me, or disobey my precepts), is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me.

38. And he that taketh not (up) his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me. (See note on Luke ix. 23.)

39. (And know that by refusing thus to follow me, men will be the greatest losers, for) he that (by deserting me in time of persecution) findeth his life (preserved for a little while), shall lose it (probably here, and certainly hereafter); and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it; (happily improved into life eternal, and so shall be the greatest gainer.

40. Nor shall my kindness be confined only to those who shew this affection to my person, but) [20] he that receiveth you (preaching in my name, shall be esteemed as he that) receiveth me, and he that receiveth me (as he that) receiveth him that sent me.

41. (And) he that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet (i. e. as one sent from God, and doth accordingly attend to him), shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man (i. e. out of true love to his righteousness), shall receive a righteous man's reward.

42. And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones (i. e. the meanest of my disciples), [21] a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily, I say unto you, He shall in no wise lose his reward.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. X.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἐξουσίαν πνευμάτων ἀκαθάρτων, He gave them power against (or over) unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of disease.] Ἐξουσία πνευμάτων, here is genitivus objecti, say grammarians; power of unclean spirits, being put for power over, or against, them. So βλασφημία τοῦ πνεύματος, Matt. xii. 31. is expounded, ver. 32. blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. (See Isa. iii. 14. Joel iii. 19. 1 Cor. ix. 12.) But that which chiefly is to be observed here is this, that Christ here delegates power to the apostles, and afterward to the seventy disciples, (Luke x. 9. 17.) and after his resurrection to believers in the general, to do this in his name. (Mark xvi. 17, 18.) And though the apostles were not at present empowered to impart these gifts to others, yet after our Lord's resurrection they were enabled to do it, by baptizing, and laying their hands upon them; which is so eminent a demonstration of the truth of Christian faith, as hath no parallel in any history, excepting that of Moses, who laid his hands upon Joshua, and he was filled with the spirit of wisdom; (Deut. xxxiv. 9.) and of Elisha, on whom the spirit of Elijah rested. (2 Kings ii. 15.) Though this was done, not by any power they had to communicate to others the virtue which resided in them, but in the case of Joshua by the particular command of God, (Numb. xxvii. 19, 20.) and in the case of Elisha by the will of God; and was a signal confirmation that they were both prophets sent by God; and much less was it done as here, by invocation of their names. For among all the accounts the heathens have given us of their famous magicians, and workers of wonders, there is not one to be found who ever pretended to a power to delegate their virtue to others, or to impart their power to them, upon the invocation or using of their names, or belief of their doctrine. And hence Arnobius,* having summed up the miracles our Saviour did, adds, that he not only did them by his power, "verùm, quod erat sublimius, multos alios experiri et facere sui nominis cum adjectione permisit," but permitted many others to do them, by invocation of his name; nor did he any of these miracles which raised astonishment in others, which he enabled not his little ones and even rustics to perform. And then he triumphs over the heathens thus, What say you, O ye stiff and incredulous minds? "Alicuine mortalium Jupiter ille capitolinus hujusmodi potestatem dedit?" Did ever that Jupiter, whom ye Romans worship in the capitol, give the like power to any mortal? And then he concludes this to be the evidence of a true Divine power; for to transfer your miraculous power to a man, and to give authority and strength to a creature, to do that which you alone can do, "supra omnia sitæ est potestatis, continentisque sub sese est rerum omnium causas," is an evidence of one who hath power over all, and hath the causes of all things at his beck.

[2] Ver. 2. Πρῶτος Σίμων, first Simon.] It is the observation of many of the fathers and interpreters here,* that Simon is here reckoned the first of the apostles, not as being so in dignity, but as being first called: for which see Matt. iv. 18. Mark i. 16. and therefore this word is omitted both by St. Mark, iii. 16. and St. Luke, vi. 14. which sure they would not have done, had they imagined it to be so remarkable, for establishing St. Peter's monarchy, as the papists do.

[3] Ver. 6. Πορεύεσθε δὲ μᾶλλον πρὸς τὰ πρόβατα τὰ ἀπολωλότα οἴκου Ἰσραήλ, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.] He calls all Israel sheep, though they were not obedient to the voice of the Shepherd, as being all God's chosen people; he calls them lost sheep, because they were in so great peril of being lost and ruined by the ignorance and wickedness of their guides. (So Psal. cxix. 176. Isa. liii. 6. Jer. l. 6.) To them the apostles are sent, because they were children of the kingdom, (Matt. viii. 12.) to whom the promise of the Messiah was made, (Gen. xvii. 1.) and the adoption and promises especially belonged. (Rom. ix. 4.) Whence the apostle saith, the gospel ought first to be preached to them. (Acts xiii. 46.) They who by sheep here understand the elect by a secret decree of God, must, contrary to the tenor of the New Testament, make Christ and his apostles to be sent to none who rejected the gospel; yea, they make Christ send his apostles to them, whom they could never find; it being not possible for them, without a revelation, to know who were thus the elect of God.

[4] Ver. 8. Νεκροὺς ἐγείρετε, raise the dead.] Dr. Mills here notes, That these words are wanting in many manuscripts; and, because the apostles raised none from the dead before Christ's resurrection, he conjectures, that they have been added to the text: but, against this imagination, let it be noted, that these words are to be found in the Vulgar, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions, and left out only in the later version of the Persic; and the argument which he and Grotius use for the excluding these words from the text, would exclude also the cleansing of the lepers, for we read of none cleansed by them in that interval: but it is to be observed, that the words in this chapter reach to their mission after Christ's resurrection, and many of them were not fulfilled before: for then only was it, that they were brought before councils, and scourged in the synagogues, and brought before kings and governors, for Christ's sake; (ver. 17, 18.) then only was the Spirit given them to teach them how to speak; (ver. 19, 20.) then were they hated of all men for his name. Note, therefore, that there was a double mission of the apostles. The

First, Was to the Jews only, exclusively to the gentiles and Samaritans, (ver. 5.) and thus they were sent, two and two, (Mark vi. 7.) to go through the cities and villages of Israel to preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand, (here, ver. 7. 23. Luke ix. 5, 6.) which mission they completed before our Saviour's death; (Luke ix. 10. 22. 35.) and in this they were only empowered to heal diseases, and to cast out devils. (Matt. x. 1. Mark vi. 7. 13. Luke ix. 1, 2.) But,

Secondly, They had a second mission after our Lord's resurrection conceived in these words, as my Father sent me, so send I you. (John xx. 21.) And this was to be executed after the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them, by being his witnesses in Jerusalem, and all Judea and Samaria, and to the utmost ends of the earth, (Acts i. 8.) and to this mission relates this commission, to cleanse the lepers, and to raise the dead; for, besides the many things already mentioned, which cannot possibly relate to their first mission, most of the things mentioned in this chapter, are the very things spoken in our Lord's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, and are there mentioned as things to be done then. (Matt. xxiv. 9.) And these words, (ver. 22.) He that endures to the end, shall be saved, are the very words which Christ useth, when he speaks of the destruction of the Jewish polity; (Matt. xxiv. 13. Mark xiii. 13.) and therefore it is observable, that St. Mark and Luke, who relate only what appertained to their first mission, speak nothing, in the chapters mentioned, of their commission to cleanse the lepers, and to raise the dead; or from ver. 15. to 31. as knowing, that these things belonged to their second mission. (See Examen Millii, lib. ii. cap. 1. n. 4.)

[5] Δωρεὰν ἐλάβετε, δωρεὰν δότε, freely you have received, freely give.] Though these words are by latter fathers extended to both the sacraments, according to those words of Tertullian, "nulla res Dei pretio constat," we receive nothing for the things of God; yet, from the connexion of them with the commission given to cure diseases, cast out devils, and raise the dead; and from the words of Irenæus,* saying, The church did all these miracles, neither seducing any man, nor taking money for them, ὡς γὰρ δωρεὰν εἴληφε παρὰ Θεοῦ, δωρεὰν καὶ διακονεῖ, for as she hath received them freely of God, so she freely ministers them; I say, from these things it is evident, that these words only relate to the dispensing of miraculous gifts, and they assuredly do wrest, and very much abuse them, who plead from them against the maintenance of the ministry: for (1.) Christ sending the seventy on the same errand, and investing them with the same power, bids them, into whatsoever house they entered, to eat and drink what was set before them, because the labourer was worthy of his hire. (Luke x. 7.) And many of the apostles, when executing this commission, even the brethren of our Lord, and Cephas, did so. (1 Cor. ix. 4, 5.) St. Paul also, who did not use this liberty, not only justifies his right to do so, but requires them, who are taught the word, to communicate to him that teacheth in all good things (Gal. vi. 6. see the note there); and pronounceth him that labours in the word and doctrine, worthy of double honour, that is, maintenance; and saith, The Lord hath ordained, that they who preach the gospel, should live of the gospel. (1 Cor. ix. 14.)

[6] Ver. 10. Μηδὲ ῥάβδον, nor yet staves.] That the reading of Theophylact, and many MSS. μηδὲ ῥάβδους, nor staves, is the true reading, is evident from Mark vi. 1. Luke ix. 3. where they are permitted to carry one staff. And by this precept, our Lord taught them, when they were employed in his service, to depend upon his providence for the provision of what they wanted; and therefore, he speaks thus to them, When I thus sent you forth, lacked ye any thing? Luke xxii. 35. it follows, for the labourer is worthy of his meat; and therefore, even when they were dispensing these miracles, our Lord allows them to receive it: only Theophylact here notes, That Christ here says, he is worthy τροφῆς, οὐ τρύφης, of his food, not of dainties; for it becomes not a teacher to fare deliciously.

[7] Ver. 11. Ἐξετάσατε τίς ἐν αὐτῇ ἀξιός ἐστι, inquire who in it is worthy.] So ver. 13. And if the house be not worthy. Here Cameron pronounces them innovators, who conclude hence that the reason why one is rather called than another, is in men themselves, i. e. in any disposition in them to receive the word; that is, he pronounceth all the ancients, innovators: for that they were of this opinion, is evident from Dally's Testimon. Veterum,* and from Vossius in his Pelagian history, lib. vii. cap. 2. and is demonstrable from these words of Christ; for he sends his apostles to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; i. e. to those who had strayed from the salutary pastures of the law and the prophets, to them whom he calls to repentance, (Mark vi. 12.) to whom the gospel was to be preached. (Luke x. 9.) He speaks therefore not of them who are called already, but who were to be called to Christ's sheepfold, to the kingdom of heaven, and to faith and repentance, as the preparations for entering into it. (2.) In those who are thus to be called, Christ manifestly supposeth some would be found by the apostles ἄξιοι, worthy, some unworthy; bidding them to inquire, who were such, and who not; and accordingly to deport themselves towards them: now, whence should they know this, but from such dispositions found in some, which render them fit for the kingdom, or from whom they might hope they should not labour in vain, in calling them to repentance, and preaching the kingdom of God to them? so also, when he sends his seventy disciples on the same errand, bidding them say Peace to the house they came to; and promising, that if a son of peace were there, their peace should rest upon it; (Luke x. 6.) what can this son of peace be, but one disposed to receive such persons peaceably and kindly, and to hearken to their admonitions? and is not this the very thing which fitted them for the Divine benediction? This will be still more evident, from the consideration of the persons opposed to the worthy, and the sons of peace; for they were not such as were disposed to hearken to the word, or to receive the preachers of it, (Matt. x. 14. Mark vi. 11. Luke x. 10.) for which they were to look upon them as impure; yea, for which, Christ pronounces, their punishment would be greater in the day of judgment, than that of Sodom and Gomorrah: and must not such dreadful judgments befal them, for want of such dispositions, as might and ought to have been in them towards the gospel of the kingdom, and those who came to them with the kind offer of the blessings of it? They therefore by refusing to receive the word, judged themselves unworthy of eternal life, (Acts xiii. 46.) when they might and should have done the contrary; and for want of those good dispositions which others had, and they might have had, fell short of the salvation tendered to them.

[8] Ver. 13. Ἐὰν δὲ μὴ ᾖ ἀξία, but if it be not worthy, let your peace return unto you.] That is, They shall not obtain the peace you wish them, or receive any benefit from your wishes; so this phrase signifies in those words of the Psalmist, My prayer returned into my bosom, Psal. xxxv. 14. (See Isa. lv. 11.)

[9] Ver. 14. Ἐκτινάξατε τὸν κονιορτὸν τῶν ποδῶν ὑμῶν, Shake off the dust from your feet.] The Jews thought the dust of the heathen lands polluted; so that the import of this phrase is this, Look upon such, as those heathens whom I have forbid you to preach to; when therefore ye depart from them, shake off the dust of your feet, as a testimony that you so esteem them.

[10] Ver. 15. Ἀνεκτότερον ἔσται γῇ Σοδόμων καὶ Γομόρρων ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως, Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city.] The gloss which some have put upon these words, viz. That the punishment of that city shall be greater, when Christ comes to execute his judgment on the Jewish nation, than that which Sodom and Gomorrah suffered for refusing the preaching of Lot, doth certainly pervert the import of these words. For (1.) Christ saith not, it hath been more tolerable for Sodom, but ἔσται, it shall be so; which shews he had respect, not to the past, but future sufferings of Sodom and Gomorrah. (2.) Christ adds, It shall be more tolerable for Sodom, &c. in the day of judgment: now, though the times of the destruction of the Jewish nation are sometimes styled the days of vengeance, yet never are they called the day of judgment: but that phrase still relates unto the final judgment and perdition of ungodly men, (2 Pet. iii. 7.) that day to which the wicked are reserved to be punished, 2 Pet. ii. 9. (See Matt. xii. 36. 1 John iv. 17.) So also doth the phrase ἐν τῇ κρίσει, used by St. Luke, (x. 14.) concerning the same persons, always signify; (Matt. xii. 41, 42.) so that the Sodomites shall certainly receive a future judgment: according to these words of Theophylact, ἐκεῖ μετριώτερον κολασθήσονται, and they shall be punished more moderately. And who can rationally conceive, that men, polluted with such unnatural lusts, should be fit to come into that place, into which nothing enters that is polluted, or defiled? (Rev. xxi. 27.) Here also it is well noted by Grotius, That the sin of those who reject the gospel, rendering them obnoxious to greater punishment than Sodom and Gomorrah were to suffer at the day of judgment, because committed against greater light, and greater confirmation of the truth, must be a wilful sin, which it was in their power to avoid.

[11] Ver. 17. Προσέχετε δὲ ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, But beware of men.] i. e. Avoid, as much as in you lies, the persecutions you may suffer from them. For, as Theophylact here notes, this is to be wise as serpents, viz. to be circumspect in declining their snares, and giving them no just occasion to afflict us; and to be harmless as doves, is to offend no man by word or example, and so to give them no occasion to do evil to us.

[12] Ver. 19, 20. Μὴ μεριμνήσητε πῶς ἢ τί λαλήσητε, &c. Take no thought how or what you shall speak: for it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of my Father which speaketh in you.] Christ promising here to his apostles immediate assistance from the Holy Spirit, forbids them, προμελετᾶν, to meditate beforehand what they should say. (Luke xxi. 14.) Vain therefore are the papists, who ascribe the same assistance to their fathers met in councils, saying, It is not they that speak, but the Holy Ghost that speaketh in them; and yet make prayers and disputations, and many other things, requisite to an infallible decision. Vain also are the anabaptists, quakers, and whosoever do now expect the like assistance in prayer and preaching, after these extraordinary gifts are ceased, as the apostles had by virtue of them; they may as well pretend to speak with tongues, and cast out devils, as the apostles did, by virtue of the same assistance.

[13] Ver. 23. Ὅταν δὲ διώκωσιν ὑμᾶς, &c. But when they shall persecute you in this city, flee to another.] It follows not from these words, that a pastor, who is fixed to a particular congregation, may fly from it in times of persecution; their case being not the same with that of the apostles, whose commission was to go through all the cities of Judea, beginning at Jerusalem: (Acts i. 8.) so that they only fled from one part of their jurisdiction to another, and were still executing the office and trust committed to them.

[14] Οὐ μὴ τελέσητε τὰς πόλεις τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, ἕως ἂν ἔλθῃ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, I say unto you, Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of man be come.] This Dr. Lightfoot understands as spoken of their first mission, and says, the meaning of the words is this, You shall not have finished it till the Son of man rise from the dead. But, first, in that first mission, they met with no persecution in any city; but, where they were not received, left it of their own accord, (ver. 11.) Secondly, They presently returned from their first commission to their Lord, and told him all that they had done and taught in prosecution of it, as we read, Luke ix. 10. Mark vi. 30. Thirdly, This phrase, the coming of the Son of man, doth never, that I know of, signify our Lord's coming at his resurrection, but either his coming with the Roman army to destroy the Jews, as Matt. xxiv. 27. 30. 37. 44. xxv. 13. Mark xiii. 26. Luke xviii. 8. xxi. 27. or else, his coming to the final judgment, Matt. xvi. 27. And seeing the apostles were none of them to live till the day of judgment, it seems necessary to understand this of his coming to avenge his quarrel on the Jewish nation. And to this sense lead the following words; And if you meet with great obloquies and persecutions from the Jewish nation, whilst you are thus spreading the gospel through Judea (as they did even to the beginning of the war;* James, the brother of our Lord, and other Christians, being slain by Ananus the high-priest, but three years before the war broke out), it is only what was done to our Lord; and therefore, what you have equal reason to expect, for the disciple is not above his master, (ver. 24—26.)

[15] Ver. 26. Μὴ οὖν φοβηθῆτε αὐτούς· οὐδὲν γάρ ἐστι κεκαλυμμένον, ὃ οὐκ ἀποκαλυφθήσεται· Fear ye not them therefore: for there is nothing hidden that shall not be revealed.] These words are capable of two good senses: first, Let not the dread of these persecutors affright you from preaching of the gospel, as despairing of the success of it; for though at present it seems to be hidden from the world, and it is like to be obscured awhile by the calumnies of the Jews and others, I will cause it to shine through all the world, and dissipate all the clouds they cast over it, and break through all the obstacles, and will render it mighty, to cast down every high thought that exalts itself against the knowledge of God, and bring into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ: (2 Cor. x. 5.) or thus, secondly, Fear not the calumnies with which they shall load you, (as they did your Master, calling him Beelzebub, ver. 25.) for I will make the innocency and excellency of your doctrine as clear as the light; and your integrity in the dispensing of it, and your patience in suffering for it, to redound to your praise, honour, and glory, throughout all ages, and especially at the revelation of our Lord from heaven. (1 Pet. i. 7.)

[16] Ver. 27. Ὃ λέγω ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ, εἴπατε ἐν τῷ φωτὶ, &c. What I say to you in darkness, speak ye in the light; and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the house-tops.] i. e. What I have said to you in private, and in obscure parables, and almost as the Jewish doctors, whose custom it is to whisper into the ear of one who is to speak what he thus whispers aloud to others (see Dr. Lightfoot and Dr. Hammond on this place), that speak ye openly and clearly in the audience of all, and, as it were, after the manner of the Jews, who, having battlements on the tops of their houses over which they could look, (Deut. xxii. 8. 2 Sam. xi. 1. Acts x. 9.) did often from them preach to the people. And so, saith Hegesippus,* they carried James the Just to the top of the temple, to preach to the people at the Passover.

[17] Ver. 28. Καὶ μὴ φοβηθῆτε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποκτεινόντων τὸ σῶμα, τὴν δὲ ψυχὴν μὴ δυναμένων ἀποκτεῖναι, And fear not them who can kill the body, but cannot kill the soul, &c.] These words seem to contain a certain evidence, that the soul dies not with the body, but continues afterward in a state of sensibility: for, first, that which it is allowed that men can do to the body, it is denied that they can do to the soul; therefore Christ speaks not in these words of death eternal (for that men cannot inflict upon the body, or hinder its resurrection): therefore it is spoken of a temporal death. Note, secondly, that they who, by killing the body, make the soul also to perish, till the reunion and reviviscence both of soul and body, do also kill the soul, and so do more than they who can kill the body only: and they, who, by killing of the body, render the soul or spirit of a man insensate, and deprived of all possibility of thinking, or perceiving any thing, do also kill the soul; for it is not easy to perceive, how an intelligible, thinking, and perceiving being, can be more killed, than by depriving it of all sensation, thought, and perception; the body itself being killed by a total privation of its capacity of sense and motion: since therefore in St. Luke, xii. 4. Christ saith, the adversaries of the Christians can only kill their bodies, and here, that they cannot kill their souls; it remains, that the soul doth not perish with the body, nor is it reduced into an insensible state by the death of it. And, thirdly, our Lord may well be supposed to speak here, as the Jews would certainly understand his words; now they would certainly thus understand him, this being their received opinion, That the soul after the death of the body, was capable of bliss or misery, and therefore did continue in a state of sensation;† Man (say they) fears an earthly king, who may die to-morrow, should punish him; and doth he not fear him, in whose hands his soul is, both in this life and the future? And the author, αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ, saith,‡ Let us not fear them who seem to kill the body; for them who die for the law, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, receive; but they who transgress the law of God, subject the soul to a great danger of endless torments.

[18] Ver. 29. A sparrow falls not to the ground without your Father.] This, as Buxtorf* hath observed, is like that saying of the Jews, "Avicula sine cœlo non perit, quantò minùs homo:" A bird perisheth not without the providence of God, much less a man.

[19] Ver. 34. Μὴ νομίσητε ὅτι ἦλθον βαλεῖν εἰρήνην ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν—ἀλλὰ μάχαιραν, Think not that I came to send peace upon the earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword, ver. 35, 36.] The usual import assigned to these words is this: Though all my exhortations and institutions tend to conciliate the most endearing love, and to establish the firmest and most lasting peace in the world; yet the event of it, through men's ignorance and wickedness, will be great variance and discord, even between nearest relatives and persons of most intimate acquaintance and familiarity: yet is the exposition of Dr. Lightfoot very ingenious and true, That he came to send upon the land of Judea, not that peace and those halcyon days which they expected at the coming of their Messiah, but a sword, and continual war, and discords, to destroy them, not only by their enemies, but by their own hands: of which Josephus gives us a full comment in his history of the continual wars the Jews had with the Greeks, the Syrians, and the Samaritans, which were, saith Eusebius,† from him, στάσεις καὶ πόλεμοι καὶ κακῶν ἐπάλληλοι μηχαναὶ, continual wars, and seditions, and machinations of evil, with the prognostication of them by a kind of flaming sword hanging over Jerusalem for a year. (See note on chap. xxiv.) He adds,‡ that ἐκινεῖτο ἐν ἑκαστῇ πόλει ταραχὴ καὶ πόλεμος ἐμφύλιος, there arose in every city tumults and civil wars; and no sooner had they any respite from the Romans, but they turned their hands against one another; giving us tragical accounts of the fearful outrages, spoils, murders, devastations of robbers, cut-throats, zealots, and of their amazing cruelties, beyond example, especially of the three adverse parties in the temple and city of Jerusalem.

[20] Ver. 40—42. Ὁ δεχόμενος ὑμᾶς, ἐμὲ δέχεται, He that receiveth you, receiveth me, &c.] Here Christ comforts his disciples by promising a blessing and reward to every one that shews the least kindness to them, or any of those who were employed in the same work with them; viz. the prophets, mentioned among spiritual persons in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, and of whom Christ speaketh thus, (xxiii. 34.) Behold, I send you prophets, and wise men; or even to any of his righteous servants; which, as it is a great incitement to others to express their kindness to Christ's ministers and faithful servants, so is it also to his ministers, to apply themselves to his service with a ready mind, and with the utmost diligence, in execution of their pastoral charge. To receive them in the name of a prophet, is to receive them on that account, that they are such. As to learn the law lisemah,§ in the name of the law, is to learn it upon that account; and to do a thing al shem,‖ or leshem, in or for the name, is, saith he, to do it upon that account; as when they say, Let all thy works be done, leshem shammaim, in the name of heaven, that is, with respect to God, and to his glory. Moreover, when he saith, (ver. 39.) He that loseth his life for my sake, shall find it, and he that findeth or preserveth it by deserting me, and my doctrine, shall lose it; this is exactly true, according to the Christian doctrine, which promiseth a resurrection of the body to eternal life to those who are faithful to Christ to the death, and threateneth eternal death to those who desert him to preserve this momentary life; now sure he with a witness loseth life, who is deprived of that eternal life he in the body might enjoy, and he as surely finds it whose body is raised to a life incorruptible.

CHAP. XI.

1. AND it came to pass, when Jesus had made an end of commanding his twelve disciples, (whom he had sent to preach, before his coming to the cities of Israel, Matt. x. 23. Luke x. 1.) he departed thence (from Capernaum, Matt. ix. 1.) to teach and to preach in their cities.

2. Now when John had heard in the prison (of Machærus) the works of Christ, (being told of them by his disciples, Luke vii. 18.) he sent two of his disciples, (whom he had called to him for that purpose, Luke vii. 19.)

3. And (they, in the name of their master, Luke vii. 20.) said unto him, [1] Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?

4. (And in that same hour, that the disciples of John came with this question, Christ cured many of their infirmities, and plagues, and of evil spirits, and unto many that were blind he gave sight, Luke vii. 21. and therefore) Jesus answered, and said unto them, Go, and shew John again those things which ye do hear (Luke vii. 22.) and see:

5. [2] The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the [3] poor have the gospel preached to them.

6. And [4] blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me.

7. And as they departed (or, when they were gone), Jesus began to say unto the multitudes concerning John (that they might not doubt of the testimony John had given to him, by reason of his inquiry, which seemed to render him now doubting, of what he before had testified; When you went forth into the wilderness to be baptized of John), What went you forth into the wilderness to see? (was it to see) a reed shaken with the wind? (i. e. a man wavering in his testimony, and turning this way, and that way, as a reed shaken with the wind doth.)

8. But what went you out to see? (was it) a man clothed in soft raiment? (a courtier, or a parasite, apt to flatter, and speak rather what will please others than what truth requires?) behold, they that wear soft clothing are in kings' houses (i. e. such persons may be expected rather in king's palaces, than in deserts).

9. But what went you out for to see? (was it to see) a prophet? yea, I say unto you, and (one that is) more than a prophet (his doctrine being more excellent, and his office being not only to foretell, but to prepare the way of the Messias).

10. For this is he, of whom it is written, (Mal. iii. 1.) Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. (See note on Matt. iii. 3.)

11. Verily I say unto you, Among them (i. e. those prophets) that are born of women, there hath not risen [5] a greater than John the Baptist (on the accounts forementioned): notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven (the least prophet belonging to the gospel dispensation) is [6] greater than he.

12. And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven (as it were) suffereth violence (by reason of the great concourse of people that fly into it with a fervour, like that which is used by a multitude assaulting a city or castle), and the [7] violent take it by force.

13. (I say, from the days of John the Baptist;) for all the prophets and the law prophesied (of the Messiah, and were the teachers which the people were to hear, Luke xvi. 31.) until John: (and, ἀπὸ τότε, from that time the kingdom of God was preached, καὶ πᾶς ὁ βουλόμενος εἰσελθεῖν, and every one that is willing to enter presseth or rusheth violently into it, Luke xvi. 16. which seems to justify the exposition of ver. 12.)

14. [8] And if ye will receive it, (or him as such, I tell you truly) this (person) is (that) Elias, which was for to come (according to the prophecy of Malachi).

15. He that hath ears to hear (i. e. hath judgment to discern, and is disposed to receive the truth), let him hear (and embrace it).

16. But whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like to children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows.

17. And saying (by way of complaint to them), We have [9] piped to you (as they use to do at festivals), and ye have not danced: we have mourned to you (as it is usual in funerals and times of sadness), and ye have not lamented (i. e. you will neither follow us when we excite you to mirth or sadness).

18. For John came neither eating nor drinking (in the usual manner; his meat being only locusts and wild honey, Matt. iii. 4. and his drink only such as the wilderness afforded), and (because of this austerity) they (who refuse and reject his baptism, Luke vii. 30.) say, He hath a devil (i. e. he is possessed by some melancholy spirit).

19. The Son of man (on the other hand) came eating and drinking (in the usual manner), and they (who reject him and his doctrine) say (of him), Behold a man gluttonous, and a winebibber, and (by his converse with them) a friend of publicans and sinners: but (Gr. and) Wisdom is [10] justified of her children.

20. Then began he to upbraid the cities, in which most of his mighty works were done, because they repented not (at his saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of God is at hand, though he confirmed his doctrine with the greatest miracles, saying thus to them),

21. Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works, which were done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes.

22. But (or therefore) I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon in the day of judgment, than for you.

23. And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven (i. e. advanced highly above others by my presence with thee, and my miracles wrought in thee), shalt be brought down to hell (i. e. into a state of extremest misery): for if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained to this day.

24. But (therefore) I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable [11] for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee.

25. At that time Jesus [12] answered, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast [13] hid these things from the wise and prudent (in their own esteem, and the conceit of others), and hast revealed them to (those whom they account) babes. (Rom. ii. 20.)

26. Even so, Father (hath the event been in my preaching); for so it seemed good in thy sight.

27. [14] All things (appertaining to my office) are delivered to me of (i. e. by) my Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father ('s will aright), save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him.

28. [15] Come (therefore) unto me, all ye that labour (under the bondage and condemnation of the law) and are heavy laden (with the burdens of pharisaical impositions), and I will give you rest (ease and deliverance from these burdens).

29. Take my yoke upon you (become my disciples), and learn (not of those blind guides, but) of me; for I am (not like those severe and supercilious doctors, which despise you as people of the earth, and will not vouchsafe even to converse with publicans and sinners, for their reformation, but I am) meek and lowly in heart (and full of pity to every burdened soul): and (so by coming to me) ye shall find rest (peace, quiet, satisfaction, an drefreshment) to your souls.

30. For my yoke is (not as theirs is, burdensome and galling, but it is) easy, and my burden is light.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XI.

[1] Ver. 3. ART thou ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that cometh, or look we for another?]

Note here (1.) that ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that is coming, was in those days the common style for the Messias: so is he styled by St. John himself, ὁ ἐρχόμενος ὀπίσω μου, he that cometh after me: (Matt. iii. 11. John i. 15. 27.) so by the multitude, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David, blessed is ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that cometh in the name of the Lord, Matt. xxi. 9. xxiii. 39. or as it is, Luke xix. 38. ὁ ἐρχόμενος Βασιλεὺς, the King coming: and this name of the Messiah they received from Habakkuk, where he is styled ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that shall come; (Hab. ii. 3.) and from Daniel, where he is styled ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he that cometh with the clouds of heaven, vii. 13. (See Matt. xxiv. 30. xxvi. 64. Heb. x. 37.)

Note, (2.) that the Baptist could not make this inquiry on his own behalf, or doubt whether Christ were the Messiah or not, for he was sent to that very end to bear witness of Christ; (John i. 6—8.) he was taught from heaven a sign by which he certainly might know him; (ver. 33.) he proclaims him the Son of God; (ver. 24.) the Lamb of God; (ver. 36.) he bare witness to him; (iii. 26. 33.) he declared of him, that he was come from above, from heaven, that he spake the words of God, that God had not given him the Spirit by measure, and that he who received his testimony had set to his seal that God is true. (John iii. from ver. 29. to the end.) It cannot therefore be imagined, that, after all this, he should doubt whether he were the Messiah or not, much less can we imagine, with many of the fathers,* that the sense of this inquiry should be this, "Tu es qui venturus es in infernum?" Art thou he that art to come to hades, whither I am going, and should I preach thee there? Chrysostom indeed produces, but approves not this opinion; but Origen† bids us not to fear to assert it, and proves it from this place. Dr. Lightfoot and others conceive that John might imagine, as the Jewish nation did, that Christ's kingdom should be temporal and splendid, and so expected that Christ should deliver him out of prison; and that therefore Christ saith to him, Blessed is he that shall not be offended in me. But seeing σκανδαλίζεσθαι, to be offended, still signifies to be so scandalized as to fall off from the faith, and it is by no means credible, after the testimonies that John had given of Christ, he should be guilty of such apostacy, or infidelity, especially since his disciples after his death resort to Christ, and cleave to him, (xiv. 12.) it is most probable that John sent these disciples not for his own, but for their satisfaction in this matter, and that Christ said to them, Blessed is he that shall not be offended in me.

[2] Ver. 5. The blind receive their sight, &c.] That he should make the blind to see, the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, and preach the gospel to the poor, was prophesied of the Messiah, Isa. xxix. 18, 19. xxxv. 5, 6. lxi. 18. but of the lepers being cleansed, and the dead raised, by the Messiah, we read nothing in the prophets; these therefore were the things they heard done at Naim, where the widow's son was raised, (Luke vii. 18.) and saw done before their eyes, when Jesus cured many τῶν μαστίγων of their plagues: for leprosy is often styled נגע צרעת the plagues of leprosy, and the word נגע is by the Septuagint rendered πλήγη and μάστιξ· it is styled the plague of leprosy, Lev. xiii. 2, 3. 9. 20. 25. 31. 47. 49. 51. 59. xiv. 3. 32. 34. and it was looked upon by the Jews as an immediate chastisement sent from God. (See note on viii. 4. See Examen Millii.)

[3] The poor have the gospel preached unto them.] Though the poor here may signify the poor and humble in spirit, to whom the gospel was preached with the best success, they being best fitted for, and so most ready to receive it; yet I see no reason to recede from the obvious sense of the words, That whereas the men of mean condition were by the proud scribes and pharisees and learned rabbies neglected, and contemned as people of the earth, (John vii. 49.) Christ chose chiefly to converse with and instruct them; and the Divine wisdom saw it fit, that when the things of the gospel were hid from these men, who were indeed blind guides, though wise and prudent in their own conceits, they should be revealed to these babes, (ver. 25, 26.) And, indeed, as the subject of the doctrines of the scribes and pharisees was chiefly vain traditions, everting the law of God, (Matt. xv.) and the things they imposed upon them heavy burdens, and the disputes in their Bethi Midrashoth vain janglings; so did they teach in such a manner by cabalistical deductions and allegorical interpretations, as transcended the capacity of the vulgar, so that they could profit very little by repairing to their schools, or hearing their expositions upon the law or prophets; as any one may learn from almost all their expositions cited from their Talmuds, and their learned rabbies; and therefore our Saviour, in the close of this chapter, calls them from them to learn of him. (See note on ver. 28.)

* "Non ait, tu es qui venisti, sed tu es qui venturus es, et est sensus, manda mihi, quia ad infernum descensurus sum, utrum te et inferis renunciare debeam, qui ennunciavi superis." † Μὴ φοβοῦ λέγειν ὅτι Ἰωάννης εἰς ᾅδου καταβέβηκε πεοκηρύσσων τὸν Κύριον ἵνα προείπῃ αὐτὸν, καταλυσόμενον διὰ τοῦτο ἐπυνθάνετο, οὐχὶ συ εἶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος. Com. in Lib. Reg. edit. Huet. tom. i. p. 34. A. et p. 35. A. "In hanc sententiam maxima pars Veterum concessit." Maldonat. in locum.

[4] Ver. 6. Blessed is he who shall not be offended in me.] i. e. Disbelieve, or fall off from me, by reason of my mean circumstances in this present world, or because of those afflictions he may suffer for my sake, or for adhering to my doctrine.

[5] Ver. 11. A greater than John.] His office being more excellent than that of other prophets, to prepare the way of Christ, and fit the people to receive him, by calling them to bring forth fruits worthy of repentance, that they might receive remission of sins, and baptizing them in the name of him that was to come after him, that was, of Christ, Acts xix. 4. (2.) His doctrine being more excellent than theirs, the gospel of God beginning then to be preached, (Luke xvi. 16.) the highest precepts of Christian charity propounded; (Luke iii. 11.) Christ the true light being then attested to by John, that all men might believe in him, (John i. 7.) and he being by him declared to be the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world, (ver. 29.) and who should baptize them with the Holy Ghost, (ver. 33.) was the greatest of prophets. He was so (3.) by reason of the success and efficacy of his doctrine, almost the whole nation flowing in to his baptism, and confessing their sins; (Matt. iii. 5, 6.) whence it is added, that from the days of John the Baptist the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, (ver. 12.)

[6] Ὁ δὲ μικρότερος, But he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he.] Not the meanest Christian, but the meanest evangelical prophet, or preacher of the Christian doctrine, is greater than he. (1.) In respect of his office, which was to preach Christ crucified, his resurrection from the dead, his exaltation to the right hand of God, the blessings tendered to those that should believe in his name; and therefore, also, (2.) in respect of his doctrine, which was more spiritual and heavenly than that of John, and more express in the revelation of the new covenant established in the blood of Jesus, and founded upon better promises, Heb. viii. 6. (3.) In respect of that Divine assistance by which their doctrine was confirmed, for John did no miracle, (John x. 41.) whereas they went forth preaching every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the words with signs following. (Mark xvi. 20.) The Holy Ghost was not yet given, (John vii. 39.) and so he fell not upon John; whence he comparing himself with Jesus, who was from above, (John iii. 31.) and had the Spirit above measure, (ver. 34.) saith of himself, He that is of the earth speaketh of (or from) the earth, (ver. 31.) whereas the evangelical prophets spake by the gifts and afflatus of the Holy Ghost, which Christ sent down from heaven on them.

[7] Ver. 12. And the violent take it by force.] i. e. And they who by their continual attendance on the doctrine of it preached to them, their care to understand it, and readiness to receive it, shew their ardent desires to be made partakers of it, and do ἀγωνίζεσθαι contend for an entrance into it, do by these means prevail. There is another exposition of these words to this effect; i. e. the publicans and sinners, and the meaner crowd of the Jews, who are looked upon by the scribes and pharisees as persons who have no right to the blessings of the Messiah, and so as violent persons, and invaders, and intruders, embrace the gospel, and as it were take it by force from the scribes and learned doctors, who challenge the chiefest place in this kingdom, according to those words of Christ to them, The publicans and harlots go before you into the kingdom of God; for ye believed not John coming to you in the way of righteousness, but the publicans and harlots believed him; (Matt. xxi. 31, 32.) and that which renders this interpretation the more considerable is this observation, that in the parallel place, Luke vii. 28—30. instead of these words, the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, we have these, and all the people and the publicans justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John, but the pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God, being not baptized of him.

[8] Ver. 14. Καὶ εἰ θέλετε δέξασθαι, αὐτός ἐστιν Ἠλίας ὁ μέλλων ἔρχεσθαι· And if you will receive it, this is that Elias, which was for to come.] Here note,

First, That it was the general tradition of the Jewish nation, that Elias the Tishbite was to come in person, as the forerunner of the Messiah of the Jews; that he in person was to anoint him, and make him known unto the people; and that before the advent of the Son of David, Elias was to come to preach concerning him. This is the import of the question put to John, (John i. 21.) Art thou Elias? and of the saying of the scribes, Elias must first come and restore all things; (Matt. xvii. 10.) of the interpretation of the LXX. Behold, I send unto you, Ἠλίαν τὸν Θεσβίτην, Elias the Tishbite, (Mal. iv. 5.) and of that saying of the son of Sirach, (Ecclus. xlviii. 10.) Elias was ordained for reproofs in their times, to pacify the wrath of the Lord's judgment before it brake into fury, and to turn the heart of the father to the son, and to restore the tribes of Jacob. And suitably to these assertions, Trypho* the Jew declares, That ἡμεῖς πάντες προσδοκῶμεν τὸν Ἠλίαν χρῖσαι αὐτὸν ἐλθόντα, all we Jews expect Elias to anoint Christ at his coming. It also was the general tradition of the writers of the Christian church, even from the second century, that Elias the Tishbite, by virtue of those words of Malachi, is to come in person before our Lord's second advent, to prepare men for it. This opinion of the coming of Elias, "tradit tota patrum antiquitas," all the ancient fathers have delivered, said De la Cerda.* "Constans est patrum, omniumque consensu receptissima ecclesiæ opinio;" It is the constant and most received opinion of the church, and all the fathers, saith Huetius.† "Constantissima semper fuit Christianorum opinio;" It was always the most constant opinion of Christians that Elias was to come before the day of judgment, saith Maldonate.‡ It is (saith Mr. Mead§) well known that all the fathers were of this opinion. He is to come (saith Petrus Alexandrinus), κατὰ τὴν τῆς ἐκκλησίας παράδοσιν, according to the tradition of the church; saith Arethas Cæsariensis, according to the unanimously received opinion of the church. Note, Secondly, That in opposition to this received tradition of the Jews, Christ here asserts two things. (1.) That John the Baptist was the very person of whom it was written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, (ver. 10.) St. Mark assures us of the same thing, by saying, that the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, was by the preaching and baptizing of this John, as it was written of him, Behold I send my messenger before thy face, who shall prepare thy way before thee, Mark i. 1. 4. (2.) That this messenger, described by the prophet Malachi, iii. 1. as one to be sent before the face of the Lord, was the very same person promised by the same prophet, in these words, iv. 5. Behold I send you Elijah the prophet before the great and terrible day of the Lord come; and, therefore, that Elijah could be no other than John the Baptist: for when descending from the mount, Christ said to his disciples, Tell no man of the vision till the Son of man is risen from the dead. (Matt. xvii. 9.) They thinking, suitably to this tradition, that this Elias, who appeared in the mount, was visibly to appear among them, to anoint the Messiah in the sight of all the people, and order all things belonging to his advent, ask this question; Seeing, according to the doctrine of the scribes, Elias must first come, (ver. 10.) and do these things, why is it thou forbiddest to speak of his appearance? To this inquiry our Saviour answers, that it is very true there is a promise of an Elias to come, and restore all things; (ver. 11.) But I say unto you, the Elias promised, ἤδη ἦλθε, hath come already, and the scribes knew him not, but did unto him whatsoever they would, (ver. 12.) And then it follows, that his disciples understood that he spake to them of John the Baptist, (ver. 13.) They therefore understood what the fathers did not, and others would not, learn from Christ's plain words, that John the Baptist was the Elias promised, as the forerunner of the great and terrible day of the Lord; whence it doth plainly follow, that they who do not think John the Baptist, and he only, was the Elias mentioned by the prophet, must mistake. For our Lord plainly saying, That that Elias, of whom the scribes made mention as the forerunner of his advent, was already come, and giving them no intimation that any other was to be expected after the coming of this one, there can be no pretence from the tradition of the scribes, or from the saying of the prophet, to expect any other. Moreover our Lord, as if he had foreseen and had designed to confute this Jewish fable, speaks here more plainly thus, All the prophets and the law prophesied until John, and if you will receive, i. e. attend to and believe it, *this is that Elias which was for to come. By which words he most plainly teacheth, that that Elias of whom the prophets spake, as of one for to come, was come already; and makes it manifest, that all that was in Malachi, or any other prophet, spoken of Elias, was made good in the Baptist, who came in the power and spirit of Elias, (Luke i. 16.) and was to be understood of him alone, as much as if he had in express words asserted, that he only was the Elias that was to come, and they were not, by virtue of any prophecy, to look for or expect another. For thus our Saviour speaks: The prophet Malachi saith, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face: now, I assure you, the Baptist is the very person of whom this is written; the same prophet saith, Behold, I will send you Elias the prophet, &c. whence your scribes teach you to expect the personal appearance of Elias the Tishbite, as the forerunner of your Messiah; but if you will receive the true interpretation of those words from me, St. John the Baptist is that Elias, which, according to that prophecy, was to be his forerunner.

Obj. 1. But against this plain assertion of our Lord it is objected, that in the translation of the LXX. the words run thus, Behold, I will send you Ἠλίαν τὸν Θεσβίτην, Elias the Tishbite, which denotes Elias in person, and cannot be applied to St. John the Baptist.

Ans. To this I answer, That this argument is of no force, because it is founded not on the original, but only on a translation, which is not authentic. (2.) From this translation it may be probably collected, that this imagination of the appearance of the Tishbite obtained then among the Jews; but hence it will not follow that it was true, any more than that the doctrine of the millennium, and of Christ's temporal kingdom must be true, because they were received by that nation as such. (3.) By the same reason and figurative way of speaking, the Baptist may as well be called Elijah the Tishbite, as Elijah the prophet, that only shewing the country of that prophet, as the other doth his office; so that if the Baptist deserved to be called Elijah the prophet, because he came in the spirit and power of Elijah, he must deserve to be called Elijah the Tishbite on the same account, seeing Elijah the prophet was Elijah the Tishbite. But,

Obj. 2. It is objected, that the day mentioned, Mal. iv. 5. as the time of the coming of Elijah, is styled the great and dreadful day of the Lord, which seemeth proper to the day of judgment; whereas the day of Christ's first coming is not so called, but rather an acceptable day, and a day of salvation.

Ans. To this I answer, That the day of our Lord's first coming, considered as reaching to the destruction of Jerusalem, was indeed a very dreadful and terrible day. Thus in the prophet Joel, we read of a day of the Lord described in the same expressions: The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come; and yet St. Peter, speaking of what was done after our Lord's ascension, and citing these very words, saith, This was that which was spoken by the prophet Joel. (Acts ii. 16.) Moreover, our blessed Lord, speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the miseries that should befal that very generation, saith, These shall be the days of vengeance, such days of tribulation as never were from the beginning of the world, and never shall be afterward. (Matt. xxiv. 21. Luke xxi. 22.) Yea, the tradition of the Jews doth in their Talmud make mention of such great afflictions which should happen in the days of their Messiah unto Israel, that happy should he be who did not see them.* Which notwithstanding, this day might be styled an acceptable day, a day of salvation, to them, who received our Jesus as their Saviour, believed in him, and obeyed his sayings; according to the words of the prophet Malachi, Behold, the day cometh which shall burn as an oven, &c. but to you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings. (Mal. iv. 1, 2.) Whence after this most terrible description our Lord speaks thus to his disciples, Luke xxi. 18, 19. Be not ye terrified when these things shall happen: in patience possess your spirits, for there shall not one hair of your heads perish; when these things come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh, (ver. 28.)

Obj. 2. It is farther objected, that John expressly denies that he was Elias; for when the Jews from Jerusalem and the priests and Levites were sent to him, saying, Art thou Elias? he said, I am not. (John i. 21.)

Ans. If this objection be of any force, it will also prove that John the Baptist was no prophet; for to the following inquiry, Art thou a prophet? he still answers no; whereas our Saviour attested, that he was a prophet, yea, and more than a prophet, (Matt. xi. 9.) and all the people so accounted of him.† His meaning therefore is only this,—I am not that Elias in person whom you expect, nor am I such a prophet, as in the days of the Messiah you expect to rise from the dead. And expositors tell us, he chose to answer thus out of modesty, that he might not commend or bear witness of himself, thinking it more convenient that Christ should thus bear witness of him, than that he should ascribe so great a dignity to himself.

Obj. 4. It is objected, that after St. John was beheaded, our Saviour saith, Elias truly shall first come and restore all things; now, how, say they, can this be spoken as a thing future of John the Baptist then? This therefore must be understood of some other Elias to come thereafter. This is the ground on which this doctrine is established by Justin Martyr, that our Lord taught it, saying,‡ Ἠλίας ἐλεύσεται, that Elias shall come. And in this he is followed by Theodoret, and many of the ancients.

Ans. After that our Lord had uttered these words, not in the future, as the Vulgar reads them, but in the present tense, Elias cometh, or Elias coming first restoreth all things, (Matt. xvii. 11. Mark ix. 11.) he adds immediately of the same Elias, of whom he had said, he cometh, or he shall come first, that ἤδη ἦλθε, he is now come, ὅτι ἐλήλυθε, that indeed he was come. (Matt. xvii. 12.) And again, If you will receive it, this Baptist is that Elias, ὁ μέλλων ἔρχεσθαι, who is for to come; and when he said these words, then his disciples understood that he spake of John the Baptist; i. e. that he meant him, and no other, when he spake of an Elias who was for to come.

So that the meaning of our Lord's words is plainly this, True it is, as the scribes say, Elias is to come before the Messiah, and it is also true, that John is that Elias which was, when Malachi spake those words, to come afterward; but then he was not yet to come when our Saviour spake of him; but, as he saith expressly, was already come; though they who said Elias must first come, knew him not when he was come. And truly, had our Lord spoken of one Elias, viz. John the Baptist, and the prophet Malachi of another; had Christ spoken of an Elias to come at his first advent, and the prophets and the scribes of one to come at his second advent, he had not answered his disciples' question, but deluded them. And that the Elias here spoken of was to appear at our Lord's first coming, is apparent from the inquiry of the disciples; Why, say the scribes, Elias must first come before the Son of man; for the tradition of the scribes was, that Elias was to anoint the Messiah, and make him known unto the people. And it is as evident from our Lord's answer, Elias cometh first; i. e. before my resurrection, of which I now speak: from this place, therefore, it never can be proved, that any other under that character is to appear before his second coming.

Obj. 5. It farther is objected, That the Elias mentioned by Malachi was to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and was, according to our Saviour's acknowledgment, to restore or set all things in order; which seemeth not to have been done by the ministry of the Baptist, who continued but a short time, and did no such things as these words seem to imply; it remains, therefore, that these words should be fulfilled by an Elias, who should be the forerunner of Christ's second advent.

Ans. To this I answer, That all who will not give the lie unto the angel sent to Zachary, must be obliged to confess the Baptist did fulfil the prophecy of Malachi. For of the Baptist he thus speaks, He shall be great before the Lord, and many of the sons of Israel shall he turn unto the Lord; for he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord. If then John the Baptist did not fulfil the words spoken by the angel, we must confess the angel was deceived, and Zachary deserved not the punishment he suffered for disbelieving his testimony; but if he did fulfil these sayings of the angel, he also must fulfil the words contained in the prophet Malachi, because the angel speaketh in the very words of Malachi.

Again, our Saviour, acknowledging that an Elias was to come before him, and restore all things, adds, that he who was to come, to restore all things, was already come, and was the Baptist: he, therefore, must have restored all things, or it must be confessed, that he did not execute his office, or fulfil what was written of him. Moreover, the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of Zachary, speaks thus concerning John, And thou, child, shall be called the prophet of the Highest; for thou shalt go before the Lord to prepare his way: (Luke i. 76.) which is the very thing the prophet Malachi declares to be the office of his messenger. And whosoever shall consider what in the gospel is said of John the Baptist, and shall compare those things with what the prophet Malachi and even the scribes averred, that the Elias promised should do, will easily perceive all that was said or prophesied concerning Elias was so punctually fulfilled by the Baptist, as to cut off all farther expectation of the completion of this prophecy, by any personal appearance of Elias, before our Saviour's second advent. For the prophet saith,* Behold, I will send Elias; and the gospel saith, There was a man sent from God, whose name was John; and that this John was that Elias which was for to come. The prophet saith of his Elias, that he was to come before the great and terrible day of the Lord: and, in the gospel, John is said to come when the day of wrath was coming, when the axe was laid to the root of the trees, and every tree that brought not forth good fruit was to be hewn down, and cast into the fire; (Matt. iii. 13.) when he was now appearing, whose fan was in his hand, to purge his floor, and gather the wheat into his barn, and to burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire: (Matt. iii. 12.) he came at the time, when, saith our Saviour, their house was to be left unto them desolate; (Matt. xxiii. 38.) when the desolation of their city, nation, and temple, was irreversibly at hand; when the enemies of Jerusalem were to cast a trench about her, and lay her even with the ground, and her children within her. (Luke xix. 43.) Here it is said, That this Elijah should turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, &c. i. e. that he should preach to young and old conversion and repentance: and, in the gospel, it is said of John, That he should turn many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God; that he should turn the hearts of the fathers to their children, and of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; that he preached to all the baptism of repentance, (Luke iii. 3.) and that with such success and good effect, that Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the regions round about Jordan, went out to him, and were baptized of him, confessing their sins; (Matt. iii. 5, 6.) that all the people and the publicans justified God, being baptized of John. (Luke vii. 29.) So effectual was his ministry, that many of the scribes and pharisees came to his baptism, (Matt. iii. 7.) and even the soldiers and the publicans to be instructed by him. (Luke iii. 13, 14.) He prevailed generally with the Jews to unite in one common baptism, that of repentance; and, whereas the tradition of the scribes taught, that Elias was to anoint the Messiah, and make him known to the people; John did baptize him, and declare unto the people that he was the Lamb of God, (John i. 29.) and at his baptism by St. John, he was anointed by the Holy Ghost. (Matt. iii. 16.)

What, therefore, better can agree than the prophecy in Malachi, and the matter of fact in the gospel?

What can be farther requisite to shew, that the person who is characterized thus by the prophet, and who so punctually answered to that character in the gospel, is one and the same person, and that no other ought to be expected by virtue of this prophecy?

[9] Ver. 17. Ηὐλήσαμεν ὑμῖν, &c. ἐθρηνήσαμεν ὑμῖν· We have piped to you,—we have mourned to you.] The Jews had their tibiæ, or pipes, saith Buxtorf, for two uses; for joy and for great lamentations. Hence, saith the prophet Jeremy, My heart shall sound for Moab like pipes; (xlviii. 35.) saith Isaiah, like a harp: (xvi. 11.) so R. Salomon saith, "Tibiæ adhibentur in nuptiis et in funeribus," Pipes are used at marriages and funerals: thus we read of the αὐληταὶ, or tibicines, present at the death of the ruler's daughter, (Matt. ix. 23.) καὶ ἀλαλάζοντας πολλὰ, and lamenting much; which Greek word seems plainly to be derived from חליל a pipe; and the Jews say, That a poor Israelite is bound to procure two minstrels and one woman to lament at his wife's funeral: to this double use of pipes, which children imitated, our Lord, saith Buxtorf, referreth in these words. (In voco, חלל p. 766.)

[10] Ver. 19. Καὶ ἐδικαιώθη ἡ σοφία ἀπό τῶν τέκνων αὐτῆς, But Wisdom is justified of her children.] The common interpretation of these words is this, that καὶ, and, is here put for but; as it is frequently in the Old Testament, viz. Gen. xxxi. 7. Exod. i. 17. Numb. iv. 20. Deut. i. 43. Josh. i. 8. 1 Sam. i. 13. Psal. iv. 3. ix. 8.; and in the New Testament, Matt. xii. 43. xiii. 22. xvi. 4. xvii. 12. John v. 40. Acts x. 28. 1 Thess. ii. 18. that wisdom is the doctrine of St. John, and of Christ, the wisdom of the Father; that the children of wisdom are those who study and seek after true wisdom, as those who study physic are "medicorum filii," the sons of physicians; and those who followed and learned of the prophets, are styled "filii prophetarum," the sons of the prophets; (2 Kings ii. 3. 15.) and these do justify her, i. e. do approve of and receive her doctrines: according to which interpretation the sense runs thus, That though the scribes and pharisees reject my doctrine, and that of my forerunner, and revile those that preach it, yet the wisdom of it is discerned and approved by those who bear a true affection to wisdom, and are disposed to obey her precepts: or else this may be looked upon as a continuance of the scoff of the pharisees, thus, and they say also that wisdom is justified of her children; i. e. This Jesus, who pretends to be a teacher of the highest wisdom, and represents our wise men as fools, behold the fruits of his wisdom, gluttony and drunkenness, whilst we fast twice a week; behold, what associates he draws to him, and converses with publicans and sinners, those whom our wise men will not touch, and much less eat and drink with: from these fruits and these associates, who attend upon his doctrine, and may be called his sons and his disciples, you may judge of his wisdom, for true wisdom may be discerned by its works: and to strengthen this interpretation, it may be observed, from St. Jerome on the place, that in quibusdam evangeliis legitur, justificata est sapientia ab operibus suis; and that they who were taught by any doctor were called his children. (See the note on 1 Cor. iv. 15.)

[11] Ver. 24. Ὅτι γῇ Σοδόμων ἀνεκτότερον ἔσται ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως, ἢ σοί, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee.] Here note, from these words, because they repented not, the power of miracles to confirm the truth of Christ's doctrine, and to prevail with those that heard him to repent sincerely, according to his exhortation, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; for had not the miracles he wrought among them been a sufficient means to induce them to this repentance, Christ must not only have upbraided, but pronounced the heaviest judgments against these cities, for not doing that which they had no sufficient means afforded them to perform.

Secondly, Those words, If the works that have been done in thee, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented, seem to bear this sense; If the exhortations to repentance, and the threats made against Tyre and Sidon for their sins, by the prophet Isaiah, xxiii. 1. 4. Jeremiah, xxv. 22. xlvii. 4. Ezekiel, xxvi. xxviii. Zacha-riah, ix. 2—4. had been confirmed to them by such miracles as I have done in these two cities, they would have wrought in them sincere repentance; for that our Lord here speaks of such repentance is evident, (1.) because he says, they would have repented in sackcloth and ashes; which is the usual description of the most full repentance, as in the case of Nineveh, Jonah iii. 5. See Isa. lviii. 5. Jer. vi. 26. Lam. ii. 10. Dan. ix. 3. Judith iv. 15. (2.) Because the Lord here speaks of that repentance which his doctrine and miracles were designed to produce in those cities, and for the want of which he there upbraids them; which sure must be the want not of external, hypocritical, but inward and sincere repentance; nor doth our Saviour say, it may be, or it is likely they would have repented, but, categorically, they would have done it. Note, Thirdly, That to be exalted up to heaven, and be brought down to hell, are allegorical expressions taken from the Old Testament, and signifying the highest exaltation, and the lowest depression. So Isa. xiv. 13. 15. Thou hast said in thy heart, I will ascend into heaven, &c. but thou shalt be brought down to hell: and lvii. 9. Thou didst debase thyself to hell: and, lastly, from these words It shall be more tolerable for Sodom, and for Tyre and Sidon, in the day of judgment: to that which had been noted on x. 15. add, that this seems to be spoken to suppress the pride of the Jewish nation, and the severity of their judgment upon others; they being wont to say, that the whole Jewish nation, saving some few heretics and apostates, should be saved, but that the people of Sodom should have no portion in the world to come; whereas our Lord declares, that even the Sodomites should have a milder doom in that great day than the unbelieving Jews.

Ver. 20. 24. If the works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented, &c.] Excellent here are the words of Mr. Thorndike:—"Though Grotius and Jansenius make these words signify no more than that in probability they would have repented at the sight of such miracles; yet so I find no good reason to infer, as our Lord doth, that positively Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, shall be tormented more than Tyre and Sidon, Sodom and Gomorrah, because they probably would have repented at the sight of such miracles. The same I say to others, who would have our Lord only say thus; That had these miracles been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented, but not from the heart; for, in conscience, is there reason that Chorazin and Bethsaida should fare worse than Sodom and Gomorrah, because Tyre and Sidon would have repented as hypocrites; continuing no less sinners than they that repented not? And to say as others do, that had God ordained these miracles to be done at Tyre and Sidon, Sodom and Gomorrah, he would have determined their wills by his immediate act to be converted, is to say, that our Lord, by a mental reservation, says that whereof he expresses not the reason, and so cozens them who satisfy themselves with the reason which he expresseth." Moreover, were this immediate act necessary to render even miracles effectual to induce men to repent, why doth our Saviour say, that Tyre and Sidon would have repented, had the like miracles been done among them? Or why doth he pronounce these woes upon Chorazin and Bethsaida, and declare their punishment more intolerable in the day of judgment, than that of the most unnatural sinners, and most vile idolaters, for want of that repentance which, notwithstanding all the mighty works that he had done among them, he knew it was impossible for them to perform, for want of that immediate act he was not willing to afford them? Why, lastly, doth he do this for a reason which did not in the least remove this disability? (See also Examen var. Lect. Millii, lib. ii. cap. 1. n. 1.)

[12] Ver. 25. Ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν; answering said.] This phrase is often used in the New Testament, when nothing had gone before to which an answer could be accommodated; and therefore then it only signifies, that such a one spake with relation to such a matter, saying; so it occurs, Matt. xxii. 1. Mark ix. 38. xi. 14. Luke xiii. 14. (See the note there.)

[13] Because thou hast hid, &c.] Here our Saviour doth not thank God that he had hid these things from the wise, but that, having done so, he had revealed them to babes. So the apostle saith, (Rom. vi. 17.) God be thanked that ye were the servants of sin, but now ye have obeyed from the heart the form of doctrine delivered to you; that whereas formerly ye were the servants of sin, ye have now been obedient to the laws of Christ.

The wise and prudent here are not men truly and spiritually wise, but men possessed with carnal worldly wisdom, and with a swelling conceit of their proficiency in wisdom, both which things indispose men to embrace true spiritual wisdom, and from these God is therefore said to have hid the wisdom of the gospel, because he permitted them to continue in that self-conceit and worldly-mindedness, which caused them to reject it, as being not agreeable to their inclinations and mistaken sentiments.

The babes are those humble, modest persons, who, having a low esteem of their own wisdom, gave themselves up to the Divine wisdom, and being free from carnal and worldly affections, and having nothing in them to oppose this spiritual wisdom, are fitted to embrace it when it is revealed; it being therefore suitable to the wisdom and the good pleasure of that God who resists the proud but giveth grace to the humble, to make known his will to persons so prepared to receive it, our Lord adds, so it seemeth good in thy sight.

[14] Ver. 27. Πάντα μοι παρεδόθη ὑπὸ τοῦ Πατρός μου, All things are delivered to me of my Father.] Here the note of the reverend Dr. Hammond is this, That all things here seem to belong to persons, rather than to things; for of those he peculiarly speaks under the title of babes: nor is the neuter gender any objection against this, it being ordinarily used for persons: so τὸ ἀπολωλὸς, that which is lost, xviii. 11. is the little one, ver. 14. the lost sheep of the house of Israel, x. 6. so Heb. xii. 13. 1 John v. 4. and so his paraphrase runs thus; All that come to me and believe on me are, by my Father enlightening and stirring up their hearts, and using all powerful and proper means for that end, brought to me: (John vi. 37. 44, 45.) and none acknowledgeth me but the Father, and they who, by the miracles which the Father enableth me to do, are attracted by me; as on the other side none acknowledgeth the Father in that manner as he now requires to be acknowledged, but the Son, and he who believes his doctrine concerning him. (See John i. 18. 1 John ii. 23. v. 20.)

bour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.] For explication of these words let it be noted,

First, That to come to Christ, in the phrase of the New Testament, is to believe in him, and become one of his disciples; thus, he that cometh to me shall not hunger, John vi. 35. is in the following words expounded thus, he that believeth in me shall not thirst. Again, If any man thirsteth, let him come unto me to drink, saith Christ, John vii. 37. for he that believeth in me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water, ver. 38. Thus, when our Saviour had complained of the Jews, that on him whom God had sent, they would not believe, John v. 38. he, ver. 30. changeth the phrase thus, you will not come unto me that you may have life. Note,

Secondly, That the taking the yoke is a juridical phrase, their doctors speaking frequently of the yoke of the law, the yoke of the commandments, and the yoke of the kingdom of heaven, which is Christ's yoke. Note,

Thirdly, That the law of ceremonies, imposed on the Jews by Moses, is styled by St. Paul, ζύγος δουλείας, a yoke of bondage, (Gal. v. 1.) and by St. Peter, a yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear, (Acts xv. 10.) by reason of the long and frequent journeys to Jerusalem, and the great payments for tithes and offerings it imposed upon them; and the burdens which, besides this, the pharisees laid upon them by their traditions, are styled by our Lord φορτία βαρέα καὶ δυσβάστακτα, heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne. Note, Fourthly, That all these ceremonial performances, when observed most exactly, could not perfect the observer as to his conscience, or take away the guilt of sin, and so could give no peace or rest unto the soul, whereas being justified by faith in Christ, we have peace with God. (Rom. v. 1.) This is the thing the apostle designs to establish in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and this is that to which the words, ἀναπαύσω and ἀνάπαυσις, rest to the soul, seem plainly to refer; thus Noah had his name from נוח to rest, because, say they, αὐτὸς διαπαύσει ἡμᾶς, he shall give us rest from our labours; (Gen. v. 29.) that is, saith Aben Ezra on the place, from the troubles of our minds. And when after the deluge Noah had sacrificed, God smelled an odour of rest, saith the Hebrew; ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, an odour of sweet savour, saith the LXX. that is, saith the Targum, he rested from his anger, and was appeased. Here then our Saviour, who gave up himself for a sacrifice and oblation of sweet savour, (Eph. v. 2.) with which the Father was well pleased, represents himself as a second Noah, to give rest to men, from the labours and troubles of their minds, and procure them peace and favour with God, as Noah by his sacrifice had done.

CHAP. XII.

1. AT that time (viz.) on the sabbath-day (following the second day of the Passover, Luke vi. 1. see the note there), Jesus went through the corn; and his disciples were an hungered, and began to pluck the ears of corn, and (rubbing them with their hands, Luke vi. 1.) to eat (of the corn).

2. But when the pharisees saw it, they said unto him, Behold, [1] thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do on the sabbath-day.

3. But he said unto them, Have ye not read (a like case in) what David (and his followers) did, when he was an hungered, and they that were with him;

4. How he entered into the house of God (or the court of the tabernacle), and did eat the shew-bread, which (it) was not lawful (otherwise) for him to eat, neither for them which were with him, but only for the priests?

5. Or have ye not read (what is contained) in the law, how (it requires) that on the sabbath-days the priests in the temple (should do those works, which being done by others would) profane the sabbath, and are blameless?

6. But (and moreover) I say unto you, That in this place is one greater than the temple (so that if the temple service would excuse their labour from being a profanation of the sabbath who attend on it, much more will the service which my apostles owe to me excuse them from profanation of the sabbath, by eating of the ears of corn, as they pass along, that they may be the better able to attend upon my service).

7. But if (therefore) ye had known what this meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice (or that God prefers charity towards them that are in need, even before his own ritual instructions), ye would not have condemned the guiltless.

(And he also said unto them, The sabbath was made for the sake of man, and not man for the sake of the sabbath; and so the rest required by it must yield to the necessities of man.)

8. For the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath; (i. e. he who is emphatically so styled is so: see note on ver. 2.)

9. And when he was departed thence, he (on another sabbath-day, Luke vi. 6.) went into their synagogue (and taught):

10. And, behold, there was a man which had his hand withered, (and they watched him, Mark iii. 2.) And [2] they asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath-days? that (if he did, by words or actions, justify the doing this) they might accuse him; (as not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath-day, John ix. 16. and might have a plausible cause to kill him, for violating the rest required on that day, John v. 16.

Then he, knowing their thoughts, said unto the man who had the withered hand, Stand forth in the midst; and he arose and stood forth. Then said Jesus unto them, I will (also) ask you one thing (in answer to your question), Is it lawful on the sabbath-day to do good, or to do evil, to save life, or to destroy it? Luke vi. 8, 9. and they held their peace, Mark iii. 4.)

11. And he said unto them, What man shall there be among you, that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit on the sabbath-day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out (on that day)?

12. How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well (to men) on the sabbath-days.

13. Then (looking upon them with indignation, Mark iii. 5.) saith he unto the man, Stretch forth thy hand. And he stretched it forth; and it was restored whole, like as the other.

14. Then the pharisees (were filled with madness, Luke vi. 11. and) went out, and held a council against him, how they might destroy him.

15. But when Jesus knew it, he withdrew himself from thence (with his disciples to the sea, Mark iii. 7.) and great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all; (see Mark iii. 7—11.)

16. And he charged them that they should not make him known (to the pharisees, who had consulted how they might destroy him):

17. [3] That (by this deportment) it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, (xlii. 1.)

18. Behold my servant, whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my Spirit upon him, and he shall shew judgment to the gentiles.

19. He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets (i. e. he shall not be contentious, or set forth himself with noise, tumult, or ostentation of what he doth).

20. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory (i. e. he shall not cease to exercise all acts of charity to the souls of them who are any way disposed to receive it, though they be weak in faith, till he hath planted the evangelical dispensation completely in the world, or till the time come that he shall execute his judgments on the unbelieving, stubborn Jews).

21. And in his name shall the gentiles trust.

22. Then was brought unto him one possessed with a devil, (who had cast him into a disease, that made him) blind and dumb: and he healed him, insomuch that the blind and dumb both spake and saw.

23. And all the people were amazed, and said, Is not this the Son of David?

24. But when [4] the pharisees (and scribes which came from Jerusalem, Mark iii. 22.) heard it, they said, This fellow (hath a devil, Mark iii. 22. and) doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils (he being a violater of the sabbath, and an enemy to our traditions, which are more weighty than the law).

25. And Jesus knew their thoughts (and called them), and said unto them (in parables, How can Satan cast out Satan? Mark iii. 23. for) every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand:

26. And if Satan cast out Satan (if he assist me in this work, whose doctrine is plainly opposite to the concernments of his kingdom, and who by these miracles cast him out of it), he is divided against himself, how then shall his kingdom stand?

27. And (moreover) if I by Beelzebub [5] cast out devils, (let me ask you) by whom do your children (who exorcise them in the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob) cast them out? therefore they shall be your judges (i. e. your judgment, that they do this by the power of God, shall condemn you, who ascribe the same thing, done by me in my Father's name, to the assistance of the devil).

28. But if I (who profess myself to be the Messias) cast out devils by the [6] Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto (among) you.

29. Or else, how can one enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods (as I spoil these principalities and powers by these miracles), except he first bind the strong man (Satan)? and then he will (be able to) spoil his house. (I therefore, who thus oppose his interests and designs, and defeat his power, can be no confederate with him.)

30. [7] He that is not with me (contending against Satan's kingdom) is against me; and he that gathereth not with me (subjects to God's kingdom) scattereth (men) abroad (from it).

31. Wherefore (this being so) I say unto you, All manner of (other) sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men: [8] but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost (which is to come after me) shall not be forgiven unto men.

32. And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man (the Messias, appearing in these humble circumstances), it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever speaketh against (the following dispensation of) the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, [9] neither in this world, neither in the world to come, (but he shall be obnoxious to eternal judgment, Mark iii. 29.

33. Therefore I say unto you,) Either (take care to) make the tree good, and (then) his fruit (will be) good; or else (you will) make the tree corrupt, and (so) his fruit (will be) corrupt: for the tree is known by its fruit (and so you will be known by the corrupt judgment which you pass on me, and on these operations of the Holy Ghost, which shall testify of me).

34. O (you that are a) generation of vipers, how can ye, being (thus) evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh: (so that)

35. A good man, out of the good treasure of the heart, bringeth forth good things; and an evil man, out of the evil treasure (of his heart), bringeth forth evil things.

36. But (whatever you may think of those malicious and blasphemous words you speak against me) [10] I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall (thus) speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment.

37. For by thy words (if they be good) thou shalt be justified, and by thy words (if they be evil) thou shalt be condemned.

38. Then certain of the scribes and of the pharisees answered (spake), saying, Master, [11] we would see a sign (from heaven) from thee.

39. But he answered and said unto them, An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it, but [12] the sign of the prophet Jonas (lying three days in the whale's belly, and then rising out of it):

40. For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, [13] so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.

41. The men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it, because they repented at the preaching of Jonas (though he did no miracle to convince them that he was a prophet); and, behold, a greater than Jonas is here.

42. The queen of the south (i. e. of Arabia and Saba, lying south of Jerusalem) shall rise up in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: for she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and, behold, a [14] greater than Solomon is here.

43. When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none.

44. Then he saith, I will return into my house from whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished.

45. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in, and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Even [15] so shall it be also to this wicked generation. (Satan, cast out by me and my disciples, finding no where else such pleasant desirable habitations, or persons so fitted to receive him again, as you of this nation are, shall come back to you; and finding that Christ, whose doctrine shall be entertained by the heathens, hath found no admission among you, shall take a more durable possession of you, and render you seven times more the children of Satan than you were before.)

46. While he yet talked to the people, behold, his mother and his brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him; (and they could not come at him, because the multitude sat round about him, Mark iii. 32. Luke viii. 19.)

47. Then one said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee.

48. But he answered and said to him that told him, (and by him to the rest, Mark iii. 33. Luke viii. 21.) Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?

49. And (looking round about on them that sat round him, Mark iii. 34.) he stretched forth his hand towards his disciples, and said, Behold (those whom I esteem as) my mother and my brethren!

50. For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is (as dear to me as) my brother, and sister, and mother.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XII.

[1] Ver. 2. Οἱ μαθηταί σου ποιοῦσιν ὃ οὐκ ἔξεστι ποιεῖν ἐν σαββάτῳ, Thy disciples do that which it is not lawful to do on the sabbath-day.] I shall here in one view give all the exceptions of the Jews against our Saviour and his disciples for violating the rest required on the sabbath-day, and our Lord's defence against them. And,

First, They here declare that Christ's disciples by rubbing of the ears of corn, and eating that which they had rubbed out, did that which was not lawful to be done upon the sabbath-day. And this, saith Maimonides, was forbid, because plucking the ears of corn was a kind of reaping; where, by the way, observe, that they seem to be mistaken, who think the fault objected to the disciples was this, that they did break their fasts before they had celebrated the public offices, against the common custom of the Jews: (Acts ii. 15.) for as it is not intimated at what time of the day they did this, so was it against the Jewish canons, at what time soever of the day it was done: moreover, the accusation is not, that this was not lawful to be done before the morning-service was ended, but that it was not lawful to be done on the sabbath-day; and our Lord's whole defence respects that only, and not the other supposed accusation; nor is our Saviour's argument from what the priests did on the sabbath-day applicable to that purpose, for though they were employed about the sacrifices, they might abstain from eating till the morning-sacrifice was offered. This action of his disciples our Lord defends, (1.) by the example of David and his followers, who did eat of the shew-bread, which the law had appropriated to the priests, and made unlawful for the laity to eat of; for if the hunger of David and his followers made the violation of that ritual law justifiable, the hunger of his disciples must equally justify their violation of that ritual command touching the sabbath. And even according to the Jews * this example of David contains two things, tending to excuse the violation of the sabbath. (1.) That they suppose that David with his men thus fled upon the sabbath-day, and yet were not guilty of violating the rest of the sabbath. For thus they teach, Our masters think it lawful for him whom the gentiles or thieves pursue, to profane the sabbath for preservation of his life; for so we read of David, that when Saul sought to kill him, he fled, and escaped; and that he did this on the sabbath-day, they collect from those words, 1 Sam. xxi. 7. that Doeg was detained that day before the Lord; i. e. by the religion of the sabbath. (2.) That their own canons allowed the laity to eat of the shew-bread for preservation of life; for thus speaks Kimchi † on the place, Our rabbins of blessed memory say, that he gave him of the shew-bread, &c. their interpretation also of the clause, yea, though it were sanctified this day in the vessel, is this, It is a small thing to say, It is lawful for us to eat the bread removed from the table, it would be lawful for us in this extreme hunger even to eat the bread now sanctified upon the table, if there were no other; and indeed this opinion, that it was lawful to violate the sabbath for the preservation of life, seems plainly to have obtained before the translation of the Septuagint, who render the words thus, Exod. xii. 16. Ye shall do no servile work on it, πλὴν ὅσα ποιηθήσεται πάσῃ ψυχῇ, τοῦτο μόνον ποιηθήσεται ὑμῖν, but that which shall be done for the sake of life, that only shall be done by you. (2.) Christ's second argument is taken from the work performed morning and evening by the priests, in preparing and offering the sacrifices; this, saith Christ, by virtue of the same law, and the authority of the same Lawgiver who commanded the rest of the sabbath, was done by the priests upon each sabbath-day; whence it is evident, that far more laborious work was to be done by God's command, upon the sabbath, to obey the ritual precepts which concerned the sacrifices; and much more might my disciples do that lesser work of rubbing out some ears of corn to satisfy their hunger, which is a work of charity, and to fit them for that higher work of attending me in preaching of the gospel. And to this agree those sayings of the Jews, cited by Dr. Lightfoot on the place, There is no sabbath at all in the temple, and the servile works which are done about holy things are not servile. In confirmation of this argument, our Saviour adds, that all that work by which the Jewish priests profaned the sabbath, was done only for the service of the temple, whereas the service done by his disciples to their Lord, was service done to one much greater than the temple, both in respect of dignity, as being a Divine person, and of sanctity, as being not only relatively holy, but sanctified even in his human nature, by inhabitation of the Spirit, and of the fulness of the Godhead in him; what therefore might be done for the service of the temple, might much more be done for the service of one much greater than the temple. (3.) Our Saviour argues still à comparatis, by way of comparison, thus; The observation of the rest prescribed by the law, was only the observance of a ritual command, like that of sacrifice; the feeding of the hungry was a moral precept, God therefore by declaring he would have mercy, rather than sacrifice, sufficiently declared he would dispense with these ritual precepts, when the observation of them did obstruct the rules of charity and mercy; and this was also suitable to that declaration of the Jews, that to love our neighbour as ourselves, is more than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices, Mark xii. 33. (4.) Christ argues thus, That which is instituted for the sake of another thing, must yield to the good of that for whose sake it was instituted; but the rest of the sabbath was instituted for the sake of man, tired with the labours of the week: therefore it is to yield to the good of man. (5.) The words following, For the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath; or as they are Mark ii. 18. ὥστε Κύριός ἐστιν ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, καὶ τοῦ σαββάτου, are differently interpreted by learned men; Grotius conceives, that the phrase, the Son of man, hath no relation to Christ, but only signifies man in general; his reasons are these; the first is taken from the connexion of these with the foregoing words in St. Mark, thus, The sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath; therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath. Now this consequence will not follow from the preceding words, if by them we understand Christ; but it directly follows from them, if by that phrase we understand mankind in general. (2.) Did this relate to Christ's authority over the sabbath, it seems to be an intimation of his power to abrogate or dissolve the sabbath, which power he was so far from asserting, that he declares he came not to dissolve the law, but to fulfil it. And they who were so highly offended with him for the works of charity he did upon the sabbath-day, had he openly asserted his power to abrogate it, would have been much more offended with him, and would have needed no lesser matter of accusation against him; this being by their law a capital crime. And, (3.) because this would have been a plain asserting, that he was the Christ; whereas he never spake thus to the people, or the pharisees, nor would he suffer his disciples to declare it. But the reverend Dr. Hammond, and Dr. Lightfoot conceive this phrase must signify him who is the Son of man, κατ' ἐξοχήν, by way of eminence. (1.) Because this phrase is used eighty-eight times in the New Testament; and in all other places doth unquestionably signify our blessed Lord. (2.) Because, where this phrase occurs, Dan. vii. 13. all the ancient Christians, and even the Jews, expound it, not as Mr. Clerc here doth, of man in general, but say expressly, this is the king Messiah; and that the rabbins did rightly expound the words of Daniel concerning him: Christ, therefore, speaking of himself still in this language to the Jews, must be supposed to use it in the sense they understood it in Daniel; and so he plainly seemeth to interpret himself, by saying, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man coming in the clouds: (Matt. xxvi. 64.) he saying this in answer to the question of the high-priest, Art thou the Christ? ver. 63. And, (3.) he who before had argued that his disciples might lawfully do this in his service, because one greater than the temple was here, (ver. 6.) might also argue from his power, as the prophet sent from God to the Jews, for the exemption of his disciples in cases of necessity, and greater good from the rest of the sabbath, especially since Christ was only greater than the temple, as being emphatically the Son of man. Nor is it difficult to answer the arguments of Grotius. For, (1.) if we render the word ὥστε, denique, as Brugensis and Maldonate; or adhæc, moreover, as it is sometimes used in Homer, there will be in these words of Mark no consequence from the former, but a new argument, like to that of St. Matthew, ver. 6. Here is one greater than the temple. But, (2.) according to the ordinary import of that word, the consequence runs plainly thus, The sabbath was made for the good of man; so that the Son of man, who came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them, must have power in such cases as concern the good and welfare of mankind, to dispense with the strict rest required by the law of the sabbath.

And this affords a sufficient answer to the second argument of Grotius; it being not asserted, that Christ here challengeth a power to abrogate or dissolve the sabbath, but only such a power as the Jews allowed to their own prophets in cases of necessity, and of higher importance, to dispense with the rest from labour required by the letter of it, as he sufficiently does by justifying the works of mercy he did on that day, by this aphorism, that it is lawful to do good on the sabbath-day.

To his third argument, I answer, That our Saviour not only permits others to assert he was the Christ, or the Messiah, as in the case of Andrew, John i. 42. of Philip, ver. 26. of Nathanael, ver. 50. and especially of John the Baptist, who was sent on purpose to bear witness to him, that he was the Son of God; but he himself sufficiently and often doth it, declaring not only to the blind man, (John ix. 35. 37.) that he was the Son of God, but also to the pharisees and Jews, insomuch that they attempt to stone him for it; (John x. 31.) and saying to them, If ye believe not that I am he, ἐγώ εἰμι, (John viii. 24. 28.) ye shall die in your sins, which is as much as, I am the Christ; for what is absolutely, ἐγώ εἰμι, Mark xiii. 6. Luke xxi. 1. is, I am the Christ, Matt. xxiv. 5. So that our Saviour only did forbid his disciples to divulge this before his resurrection, for the reasons assigned note on ix. 30.

To these arguments, used by our Saviour here, we may add two others in St. Luke, where, xiii. 15, 16. Christ argues thus: That if they loosed their ox or ass from the stall on the sabbath-day, and led him to water, much more might he loose a daughter of Abraham, who had been bound by Satan eighteen years on that day. And again, xiv. 5. Seeing when your ox or ass falls into a pit on the sabbath-day, you draw him out of it on the same day, much more may I cure an hydropic man on that day; where the argument is plainly à minori ad majus; it being a greater charity to work for the benefit of man on that day, than for the good of beasts; where Christ again, as Capellus and Lightfoot have observed, argues from the Jewish canons, which permitted them not only to draw water for their beasts, but also to lead them out to water on the sabbath-day; and though the latter Jews, from hatred to Christ, will not allow the drawing of a beast out of a pit on the sabbath, yet is it certain, both from those words of Luke, they could not answer him a word, (xiv. 6.) and from their canons, cited by Dr. Lightfoot on the place, that they anciently allowed this. And this is still more evident from the words cited from the Septuagint, allowing them to do what was requisite, πάσῃ ψυχῇ, to preserve all life; from whence Tertullian* and St. Jerome have observed, that the law allowed them to do on the sabbath, "quod fiet omni animæ, et quæ ad animi salutem pertinent," those things which belonged to the preservation of life.

Our Lord's last argument is taken from the law of circumcision, which required that their children should be circumcised on the eighth day, though that were the sabbath; and circumcision was a work of considerable labour: If then, saith Christ, the rest of the sabbath might be broken for the circumcision of an infant, though that were a ritual precept, surely it may be so, to restore health to a man who hath been diseased thirty-eight years: and this was also suitable to the canons of the Jews; their wise men speaking thus, They do all things necessary to circumcision on the sabbath-day, though this may seem profane on that day. (Pirk. Eliez. cap. 29. p. 65.)

[2] Ver. 10. Ἐπηρώτησαν αὐτὸν λέγοντες, &c. They asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath-day?] This is not contrary to what St. Mark, iii. 4. and St. Luke, vi. 9. say, that Christ asketh them; for both are true, that they asked him, whether it were lawful to heal? and he replies by saying, I will ask you, also, whether it be not lawful to do good on the sabbath-day?

[3] Ver. 17—19. That it might be fulfilled, which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, Behold my servant, whom I have chosen—He shall not strive, nor cry.] Here many phrases are to be explained for the due understanding of these words: as,

First, I will put my Spirit upon him, and he shall shew judgment to the gentiles; where the shewing κρίσιν, judgment, being the effect of his having the Spirit upon him, must respect all the righteous laws he was to deliver by virtue of this unction, in his Father's name, according to the usual acceptation of the word κρίσεις, judgments, for the laws of God in the Old Testament; as when God is said to have given to his people, δικαιώματα καὶ κρίσεις, statutes and judgments, Exod. i. 25. Deut. iv. 5. to teach, ver. 14. and command them to keep his statutes and judgments. (Deut. xxx. 16.) Now it is observable from Mark iii. 6, 7. that when the pharisees held a council to destroy him, he recedes from them to the sea of Galilee, whither came to him a great multitude from Galilee, from Idumea, and beyond Jordan, and from the parts about Tyre and Sidon; and by teaching them, and doing his miracles before them, he shewed judgment to the gentiles.

He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the street; i. e. he shall not be contentious, nor set forth himself with noise or tumult, or ostentation of his doings; and this was here fulfilled by his ceasing to dispute any longer with those pharisees, who, when they could not answer him a word, consult how they may destroy him; and, by his strict charge to the multitudes he had healed, that they should not make him known.

A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench. Here, saith St. Jerome, "Qui peccatori non porrigit manum, et qui non portat onus fratris sui," he that stretcheth not forth his hand to the sinner, and he that beareth not the burden of his brother, he breaks the bruised reed; "et qui modicam scintillam fidei contemnit in parvulis," and he that condemneth the small spark of faith in little ones, quenches the smoking flax. Now, though Christ went from that place to avoid the rage of the pharisees, the text informs us, that he ceased not to heal the multitudes, and to instruct them, ver. 15. Mark iii. 10. And by continuing still such acts of charity to the souls of all that were disposed to hear, though they were yet weak in faith, and by healing all that came unto him for relief, he fully answered this character.

Ἕως ἂν ἐκβάλῃ εἰς νίκος τὴν κρίσιν, till he bring forth judgment unto victory; i. e. according to most interpreters, till he hath made his gospel and his righteous law victorious over all its enemies; and to this sense, the words of the prophet, (Isa. xlii. 4.) till he hath established judgment in the earth, agree. But the phrase, εἰς νίκος, doth often signify to the end, to the utmost, or for ever: (see the note on 1 Cor. xv. 54.) whence others probably interpret the words thus, till the time come, that he shall execute his judgment on the stubborn unbelieving Jews, so that wrath shall come upon them to the utmost; and they being thus rejected, the gospel being taken from them, and their house left desolate, in him shall the gentiles trust.

[4] Ver. 24. Οἱ δὲ φαρισαῖοι εἶπον, οὗτος οὐκ ἐκβάλλει δαιμόνια, εἰ μὴ ἐν τῷ Βεελζεβοὺλ, &c. But the pharisees said, He only casteth out devils by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils.] That which made the pharisees thus to calumniate our Saviour's miracles, was this, that they found the people induced by them to believe he was the Son of David, (ver. 23.) or the Christ; thus, when they heard the people murmuring, (John vii. 31.) the chief priests and pharisees sent men to take him; (ver. 32.) and this they did, not only from an apprehension, that, if this belief obtained, it might bring the power of the Romans upon them, (John xi. 48.) but chiefly, because it would put an end to their credit with, and authority over the people, they being still represented by our Lord as blind guides, and the worst of hypocrites.

The word Beelzebul, or, as St. Jerome hath it better, Beelzebub, signifies the lord of a fly: which was a name the heathens gave not only to Hercules, but even to Jupiter, the prince of their gods; as both Pausanias in Eliacis,* and Clemens Alexandrinus† in his Prophetics, and the epithets given to him, testify. Though it is more probable that the Jews took this name from the Philistines, where Beelzebub was worshipped, (2 Kings i. 6.) as the god of Ekron‡; and what the heathens fabulously write of the temples of Hercules and Jupiter,‡ "divinitùs illò neque canibus, neque muscis ingressus est," that the deity kept the flies from them; that the Jews say of their temple, that "in domo mactationis non conspecta est musca," a fly was not seen in the slaughter-house. (Pirk. Avoth. cap. 5—8.) Note also, that as the Jews § held there was one who was "caput omnium diabolorum," the chief of all the devils: so also did the heathens, for Porphyry ‖ saith, that they who did evil by enchantments, τούτους μάλιστα καὶ τὸν προεστῶτα αὐτῶν ἐκτιμῶσι, chiefly worshipped them and their president, and that ἡ προεστῶσα αὐτῶν δύναμις, the power that presided over them would be deemed the greatest god.

children cast them out?] That it was the custom of the Jews to cast out devils by the invocation of the name of the Most High, or of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, we learn from Justin Martyr, who speaks to Trypho* the Jew thus, If any of you do exorcise devils by the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, perhaps he will obey you. And from Irenæus,† who saith, All things are subject to the Most High, and by invocation of his name even before the advent of our Lord, men were saved from evil spirits, and all kinds of demons. Josephus‡ informs us, that God gave this art to Solomon against devils, that he should teach it, εἰς ὠφελείαν καὶ θεραπείαν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, for the profit and healing of men, and that he left behind him, τρόπους ἐξορκώσεως, those ways of exorcising by which those devils were so effectually cast out, as never to return again. Thus then our Saviour seems to argue; You doubt not but your exorcists, who use the name of God, the God of Abraham, &c. do cast out devils by virtue of that name, it will then be matter of your condemnation, who pass so favourable a judgment upon them, to pass such an unjust censure upon me, in whom you see far greater evidences of the finger of God, in casting out all manner of evil spirits, and healing all kinds of diseases. And whereas Episcopius objects against this interpretation, that it is not certain that these exorcisms were used by the Jews in Christ's time; this is an evidence he had not read these authors: for Josephus doth expressly say, καὶ αὐτὴ μέχρι νῦν παρ' ἡμῖν ἡ θεραπεία πλεῖστον ἰσχύει, that this way of curing demoniacs did even then prevail among them; and gives an instance of one Eleazer, who, before Vespasian, his sons, and soldiers, τοὺς ὑπὸ τῶν δαιμονίων λαμβανομένους ἀπολύοντα τούτων, delivered them from demons who were possessed with them. And Irenæus saith in the forementioned place, "Judæi usque nunc hac ipsa advocatione dæmonas fugant," the Jews to this day expel devils by this invocation. Theophilus,§ that οἱ δαιμονιῶντες ἐνίοτε καὶ μέχρι τοῦ δεῦρο ἐξορκίζονται κατὰ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦ ὄντος Θεοῦ, till that very time those that were possessed were exorcised by the name of the true God. And Origen,‖ that the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, being used by the Jews, ἐν τῷ κατεπᾴδειν δαίμονας, in the incantation of devils, did great miracles; and therefore was used to this effect not by them only, but by all others who used magic and enchantments. We read, Luke ix. 49. of one among the Jews, who did cast out devils by the name of Jesus, though he neither followed him, nor his disciples; and some conceive this question of our Lord relates to such, it being a strong presumption of the Divine power, and the mission of Christ, that his name was so powerful even in their mouths who did not own him; but because we read of one only that did this, and find not that the pharisees thought better of him, than of Christ himself, I prefer the former exposition of these words.

[6] Ver. 28. Εἰ δὲ ἐγὼ ἐν πνεύματι Θεοῦ ἐκβάλλω τὰ δαιμόνια, &c. But if I by the Spirit of God do cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come unto you.] How Christ did miracles, and cast out devils by the Spirit of God, see note on chap. iii. The inference of Christ from this is clear, that he was the Messias promised to set up the kingdom spoken of by Daniel; for seeing in their own opinion their Messias was to erect this kingdom, that Divine assistance which proved that he was now come, who was the Messiah, must also prove the kingdom of God was come; and seeing that the kingdom of Satan was by this power overthrown, they reasonably might think the kingdom of God was ready to be set up, and that one stronger than he was come among them, (ver. 29.)

[7] Ver. 30. Ὁ μὴ ὢν μετ' ἐμοῦ, κατ' ἐμοῦ ἐστι, He that is not with me, is against me.] He that sides not with me, contending against Satan and his kingdom, is against me, as being unwilling that his kingdom should be destroyed. And he that in doing this work is not against me, but casts out devils in my name, though he doth not yet follow me, is for me. (Luke ix. 49, 50.)

[8] Ver. 31. Ἡ δὲ τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ ἁγίου βλασφημία οὐκ ἀφεθήσεται ἀνθρώποις· But the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall never be forgiven unto men.] Against the Holy Ghost, i. e. against the miracles done by him, Theoph. (Of this blasphemy, see the Appendix at the end of this Gospel.)

[9] Ver. 32. Οὔτε ἐν τούτῳ τῷ αἰῶνι, οὔτε ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι, Neither in this age, nor in the age to come.] Hence the papists argue for the remission of some sins in purgatory, after this life is ended, which are not by God remitted here. But the Scripture knows only two times for the remission of sins, one here upon earth, (Matt. ix. 6.) to the believer and penitent person; and the other at the day of judgment, when the great Judge shall pronounce the sentence of absolution to all his faithful servants, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; (Acts iii. 19, 20.) and they shall find mercy in that day. (2 Tim. i. 18.) Christ therefore saith, this blasphemy of the Holy Ghost shall neither obtain remission now, nor at the great day of our accounts; that is, it shall not at all be remitted; for that this is the true import of this phrase, is evident from St. Mark, saying, he that doth thus blaspheme, οὐκ ἔχει ἄφεσιν εἰς αἰῶνα, shall never find remission, (iii. 29.) but is obnoxious to eternal judgment: and from St. Luke, declaring absolutely, οὐκ ἀφεθήσεται, he shall not be forgiven: (xii. 10.) this being a common mode of speaking among the Jews; thus R. Eliezer* proves, that the Samaritans have no portion in the world to come, because it is said, it belongs not to you to build with us in this world, nor in the world to come; and a sick man is introduced, requiring his son to give him the water and meat which the physician had forbidden, threatening if he refused not to forgive him in this world, nor in the world to come, i. e. never to forgive him. And indeed the Jews thought that the pangs of death might expiate sins, but they held, "nullam esse peccati expiationem post mortem," that there was no expiation for sin after death; and therefore could not use this phrase in the popish sense.

[10] Ver. 36. Λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν, ὅτι πᾶν ῥῆμα ἀργὸν, &c. But I say unto you, That of every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account at the day of judgment.]

Agreeable to this is that of Plato,* κούφων καὶ πτηνῶν λόγων βαρυτάτη ζημία, grievous is the damage of light and volatile words, for a Divine nemesis is appointed to oversee these things: now the light, idle words in Plato, are plainly words spoken of their parents, or to the defamation of persons they ought to have in veneration; here then is one sense of the phrase, that scandalous, slanderous reviling of those we ought to venerate, and who have well deserved well of us, will render us obnoxious to condemnation at the day of judgment; and to this sense the very context leads: the scandalous, defamatory words the pharisees had here spoken of our Saviour's person and miracles, giving occasion to these words, Cicero † farther saith, that "appellatur à philosophis, ἀργὸς λόγος, cui si pareamus, nihil omnino est quod agamus in vita," the philosophers call that an idle word, which if we hold to, there is nothing left for us to do, no service to the gods, no acts of virtue or charity; so that what is obstructive to piety and goodness, as was this saying of the pharisees to the admission of our Saviour's doctrine, on which the true love of God and of our brother did especially depend, is emphatically ἀργὸς λόγος. Others think that ῥήματα ἀργὰ here signifies false words, because in the Hebrew דבים בטלים vain words, hath this signification; as when they say, that prophecy contains the pure truth, but in dreams are דבים בטלים false things contained: to be sure the words here intended must not simply be words undefying, or which do not directly tend to the glory of God; from which men of great business and conversation cannot be wholly free; but wicked words proceeding from an evil heart: for our Lord having heard these words of the pharisees, speaks thus to them, O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things? since out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, ver. 34. and 35. an evil man, out of the evil treasure of his heart, bringeth forth evil things; and then connects them thus, I say unto you therefore; whence it is evident, that the words here styled idle words, were such as demonstrated the speaker to be an evil man, out of an evil heart speaking evil words. (See Kettlewell of groundless Scruples, lib. v. cap. 5.)

[11] Ver. 38. Θέλομεν ἀπὸ σοῦ σημεῖον ἰδεῖν, We would see from thee a sign.] They had seen a withered hand made whole, (ver. 13.) a devil cast forth, and a blind and dumb man see and speak: (ver. 22.) the sign which they require farther must therefore be a sign from heaven, as we read, xvi. 1. Luke xi. 16. viz. the sign of the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven. (Dan. vii. 13.) In this our Saviour doth at present refuse to gratify them, the time of his coming thus being after his resurrection, even when he was to come to the destruction of their nation: (Matt. xxiv. 30.) and therefore at his death he speaks thus unto them, Verily I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming in the clouds of heaven, (Matt. xxvi. 64.)

[12] Ver. 39. The sign of the prophet Jonas.] Of Jonah and his preaching these things seem here considerable. First, That as Jonah was sent to preach to the gentiles, so Christ here insinuates, that through the infidelity of the Jews it should be so with his disciples. Secondly, That as Jonah prevailed upon the Ninevites, by surviving after he had been so long in the whale's belly; this miraculous escape, with which they doubtless were acquainted, confirming to them the truth of his prophetic office: so Christ, whilst living, with all his miracles, prevailed but little; but as he had foretold, John xii. 32. after his death, he drew all men after him. Thirdly, As Nineveh repenting then at the preaching of Jonah, relapsed afterward to their old sins; and therefore, according to the computation of Bishop Usher, verified the words of Jonah in the prophetic style, a day for a year: so the nation of the Jews, after they had received the baptism of John, calling them to believe in him that should come after him, perished by their infidelity, about forty years after the preaching of the Baptist to them.

[13] Ver. 40. Οὕτως ἔσται ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ τῆς γῆς τρεῖς ἡμέρας καὶ τρεῖς νύκτας· So shall the Son of man be in the heart of the earth three days and three nights.]

Obj. Against the truth of these words it is objected, That Christ was in the sepulchre only two nights, one whole day, and two parts of a day, and so could not be there three days and three nights.

Ans. In answer to this objection, note,

First, That the Hebrews began their computation of a natural day from the evening or night preceding. So we read, Gen. i. 5. and the evening and the morning were the first day: so Dan. viii. 14. unto two thousand three hundred evenings and mornings shall the sanctuary be cleansed: so Lev. xxiii. 32. from evening to evening shall ye celebrate your sabbath: hence both St. Mark and Luke observe, that Christ taught in the synagogue on the sabbath-day, (Mark i. 21. 32. Luke iv. 40.) and when the sun was set, and so the sabbath ended, they brought their sick unto him: so that in their phrase to say, so many evenings and mornings, days and nights, is the same as to say so many natural days; for in the measuring of any time which contains in it both days and nights, a day is always taken in that sense in which it includes both day and night. Moreover, the Greek language hath its compounds, and so is able to express a natural day by the word νυχθήμερον, but the Jews have no such compound words, and therefore cannot otherwise express a natural day, but by these two words, day and night: So Gen. vii. 4. I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights: 1 Sam. xxx. 12. That Egyptian did eat no bread, nor drink water, three days and three nights: Exod. xxiv. 18. Moses was in the mount forty days and forty nights.

Secondly, Note that it is a received rule among the Jews,* that a part of the day is put for the whole; so that whatsoever is done in any part of the day, is properly said to be done that day; since then our Lord was in the grave one whole natural day, and part of two other natural days, he might truly be said, according to their computation, to be in it three days and three nights. Note,

Thirdly, That it is very usual to reckon that to be done in so many days, or so many days and nights, which is done so as that the action begins in any part of the first, and ends in any part of the last day: so 1 Kings xx. 29. They encamped against one another seven days, and in the seventh day the battle joined. And Esther saith, iv. 16. Fast ye for me, and neither eat nor drink three days, night or day; I and my maidens will fast also, and then will I go in unto the king; and yet (v. 1.) she goes in to the king on the third day. So Luke ii. 21. When eight days were accomplished for the circumcision of the child, they called his name Jesus; and yet the day of his birth and of his circumcision were two of these eight days, and the complete days were only six. So St. Luke saith, that about eight days after these words, he took Peter, John, and James, and went up into the mount: (Luke ix. 28.) but St. Matthew, xvii. 1. and St. Mark, ix. 2. tell us it was six days after; i. e. including the day he spake the words, and the day he went up into the mount, it might be reckoned eight, excluding them it was only six. Since then our Saviour was in the grave part of Friday, and the evening or night before must, by the Hebrew computation, be accounted to that day; seeing he was in the grave all Friday night and Saturday; seeing he was in the grave all Saturday night, and part of the morning of the day following, and that morning, with the precedent evening, make a third natural day, he may, according to the Hebrew computation, be truly said to have been three nights and three days in the heart of the earth. (See note on Mark viii. 31.)

[14] Ver. 42. Πλεῖον Σολομῶντος ὧδε, A greater than Solomon is here.] God therefore having promised to Solomon such wisdom that, as there was none like him before (among mere men), so should there after arise none like unto him, (1 Kings iii. 12.) he that was greater in wisdom than Solomon, must be more than a man.

[15] Ver. 45. Οὕτως ἔσται καὶ τῇ γενεᾷ ταύτῃ τῇ πονηρᾷ· So shall it also be to this wicked generation.] These words seem plainly to apply the preceding parable to the unbelieving Jews of that age, and therefore to import, that the devil, who, by the labours of Christ and of his disciples, had been cast out of so many of them, finding no rest among the heathens, from whose persons and temples the Christians would every where expel him, and finding the Jewish nation, by their prodigious wickedness and obstinate incredulity, still more prepared than ever to receive him, would return unto them, and render them more incredulous, contumacious, and obdurate, more impure and wicked, hypocritical and blasphemous, than they were before, till he had brought them to destruction.

CHAP. XIII.

1. THE same day (that his mother came to him, Matt. xii. 46.) went Jesus out of the house, and sat by the sea-side.

2. And great multitudes were gathered together unto him, so that (to avoid the pressure of the multitude) he went into a ship, and sat (near the land); and the whole multitude stood on the shore.

3. And he spake many things unto them in parables, saying, (Hearken, Mark iv. 3.) Behold, a sower went forth to sow;

4. And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the way-side, (and were trod upon, Luke viii. 5.) and the fowls (of the air, Mark iv. 4.) came and devoured them up:

5. Some fell upon stony places, where they had not much earth (to feed and cover the root): and forthwith they sprang up, (and withered, Luke viii. 6.) [1] because they had no deepness of earth (to take root in):

6. And (so) when the sun was up, they were scorched; and because they had not (deepness of) root, they withered away:

7. And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprang up (with them), and (overgrowing them) choked them: (and so these seeds yielded no fruit, Mark iv. 7.)

8. But other (seed) fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit (according to the goodness of the ground), [2] some a hundred-fold, some sixty-fold, some thirty-fold.

9. (And having said this, he added, Mark iv. 9. Luke viii. 8. He) [3] who hath ears to hear, let him hear. (See xi. 15.)

10. And (when he was alone, Mark iv. 10.) the disciples came, and said unto him, [4] Why speakest thou unto them in parables? (and also asked him the meaning of the parable, Luke viii. 9.)

11. He answered and said unto them, (I speak not to you, who prize and improve the doctrine I impart, in parables,) because unto (such as) you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven (or what is obscurely delivered concerning it), but to them (who slight and neglect what is plainly taught them) it is not given (to know them).

12. [5] For whosoever hath (i. e. duly improves the knowledge which he hath), to him shall be given (more), and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not (i. e. who, by making no use of it, is as if he had it not), from him shall be taken away even that he (unprofitably) hath.

13. (Whence you may learn, that) therefore speak I unto them in parables: because (they are like to those inconsiderate and slothful men, of whom it is proverbially said, because of their neglect to act according to their knowledge, that) they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand.

14. [6] And (so, by their shutting thus their eyes against the light, and stopping their ears against instruction) in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall (or will) see, and shall (or will) not perceive (it being with them now, as it was with the same people then):

15. For this people's heart is waxed gross (hath been made thick or condensated, so that the word cannot pierce into it), and their ears are dull of hearing (Gr. they have heard heavily with their ears), and their eyes they have closed (against the light); lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them, (and their sins should be forgiven them, Mark iv. 12.)

16. But blessed are your eyes, for they see: and your ears, for they hear (the things belonging to this kingdom, well worthy of your regard).

17. For [7] verily I say unto you, That many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see (the advent of the promised Messias), and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear (the mysteries of the kingdom of God revealed), and have not heard them.

[Mark iv. 13. And he said unto them, Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables, as it becometh them to do, who are to reveal the mysteries of this kingdom to others?]

18. Hear ye therefore the (meaning of the) parable of the sower; (He that soweth is the Son of man, the seed sown is the word of God, Luke viii. 11.)

19. [8] When any one heareth the word of the kingdom (of God), and understandeth it not (i. e. considereth not of it), then cometh the wicked one, (the prince of the air, Eph. ii. 2.) and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart. This is he (i. e. the person signified by him) which received seed by the way-side.

20. But he that received the seed into stony places (Gr. but he that is sown upon stony places), the same is he (i. e. he is the emblem of him) that [9] heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it:

21. Yet he hath not root in himself, but (having not received his seed fully into his heart, nor duly considered what he must do and suffer to retain it there, he) dureth (only) for a while: for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by (i. e. presently) he is offended.

22. He also that received seed among the thorns, is he that heareth the word; [10] and the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, (and the pleasures of life, Luke viii. 14. and the lusts of other things entering in, Mark iv. 19.) choke the word, and he becometh (so far) unfruitful (as to bring no fruit unto perfection).

23. But [11] he that (is represented as one that) received seed into the good ground is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; (and receives it into a good and honest heart, Luke viii. 15.) which also beareth fruit, (with patience, ibid.) and bringeth forth some a hundred-fold, some sixty, some thirty. (What is here added, Mark iv. 21—24. is here accommodated to this parable.)

24. Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven (the success of the gospel) is (may be) likened to (that of) a man who sowed good seed in his field:

25. But whilst men (to whom the management of this field was committed) slept, [13] his enemy came and sowed tares (or cockle) among the wheat, and went his way (and this was not presently perceived).

26. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also.

27. So (Gr. then) the servants of the householder (to whose conduct this field was committed), came and said unto him (whose servants they were), Sir, didst thou not sow (only) good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares?

28. He (answering) said unto them, An enemy (to me and the good seed) hath done this. The servants (then) said unto him, [14] Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up?

29. But he said, Nay (do not this now); lest, while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat (growing) with them.

30. Let both grow together until the (time of) harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but (then) gather the wheat into my barn. (The parable inserted Mark iv. 26—28. is there explained.)

31. Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, (Whereunto shall we liken the kingdom of God, and with what comparison shall we compare it? Mark iv. 30.) The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took, and sowed in his field, (or garden, Luke xiii. 19.)

32. Which indeed (when it is sown, Mark iv. 31.) [15] is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown (up), it is the greatest amongst herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches of it, (Luke xiii. 19. and like to this will be the progress of the gospel.)

33. Another parable spake he unto them (saying), The kingdom of heaven (the doctrine of the gospel) is like (for its powerful influence) to leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened (by it).

34. All these things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables; (as they were able to hear, Mark iv. 33.) and without a parable spake he not unto them: (though he after interpreted all these parables to his disciples, Mark iv. 34.)

35. [16] That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet (David), saying, (Psal. lxxviii. 2.) I will open my mouth in parables; I will utter things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world.

36. Then Jesus sent the multitude away, and went into the (a) house: and his disciples came unto him, saying, Declare (explain) unto us the parable of the tares of the field.

37. He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man;

38. The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom (who obey the precepts of it); but the tares are the children of (Satan) the wicked one; (whose works they do, John viii. 44.)

39. The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world, and the reapers are the angels.

40. [17] As therefore (at the time of harvest) the tares are gathered and burnt in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world.

41. (For then) the Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity;

42. And shall cast them into a furnace of fire; (and) there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.

43. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

44. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth (or conceals his finding) it, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field.

45. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant-man, seeking goodly pearls:

46. Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, he went and sold all that he had, and bought it (so must those who desire the blessings of the kingdom of heaven, be ready to part with all their earthly blessings, to possess and secure it to themselves).

47. [18] Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a net, which was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind (good and bad fish):

48. Which, when it was full, they drew to shore, and sat down, and gathered the good into vessels, but cast the bad away.

49. So (likewise) shall it be at the end of the world: (for) the angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just,

50. And shall cast them into the furnace of fire; (and) there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth (or, the extremity of misery).

51. (Then) Jesus saith unto them, Have ye understood all these things? They say unto him, Yea, Lord.

52. Then said he to them, Therefore every scribe, which is instructed to the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is a householder, who bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old (to feed his family; for, so must you produce from Moses and the prophets, and from the doctrines belonging to this heavenly kingdom, what you see needful to feed God's family and household).

53. And it came to pass, that when Jesus had finished these parables, he departed thence.

54. And when he was come (thence with his disciples, Mark vi. 1.) into his own country, he taught them in their synagogue, (on the sabbath-day, Mark vi. 2.) insomuch that they (who heard him) were astonished, and said, Whence hath this man this wisdom, and these mighty works (which are done by him)?

55. Is not this the carpenter's son? (Mark vi. 3. the carpenter; see the note there:) is not his mother called Mary? and (are not) his [16] brethren (called) James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas?

56. And his sisters, are they not all with us? (bearing no marks either of like power or wisdom); whence (then) hath this man all these things?

57. And they were offended in him (or scandalized at him, by reason of his mean original and humble circumstances). But Jesus said unto them, A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and in his own house (there usually he is most despised).

58. And he did not many mighty things there (save only that he laid his hands upon a few sick persons and healed them, Mark vi. 5.) because of their unbelief.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIII.

[1] Ver. 5. ΕΥ'ΘΕ'ΩΣ ἐξανέτειλε διὰ τὸ μὴ ἔχειν βάθος γῆς· It forthwith sprang up because it had no deepness of earth.] Thus Quintilian saith of the rath-ripe wit, that it rarely comes to maturity, comparing it to those seeds, which, being sown on the surface of the earth, spring up quickly; because the root goes not deep into it: Illud ingeniorum præcox genus non temerè unquam pervenit ad frugem—non multum præstat, sed cito—nec penitus immissis radicibus nititur, ut quæ summo solo sparsa sunt semina celeriùs se effundunt. (Instit. lib. i. cap. 3. p. 16, 17.)

[2] Ver. 8. Ὃ μὲν ἑκατόν· Some a hundred-fold, &c.] See note on Mark iv. 8.

[3] Ver. 9. Ὁ ἔχων ὦτα ἀκούειν, ἀκουέτω· He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.] This is a proverbial expression used by Christ, when he spake of matters of great importance, which deserved a serious consideration; (Matt. xi. 15. xiii. 43. Rev. ii. 7. 11. 17. 29. iii. 6. 13. 22. xiii. 9.) by which he excites them who had good inclination to, and a good judgment and perception as to things Divine, thoroughly to weigh and consider of the thing spoken.

[4] Ver. 10. Διατί ἐν παραβολαῖς λαλεῖς αὐτοῖς; Why speakest thou to them in parables?] It is certain, not only that the Jewish doctors and all the wise men of the east taught by parables, משלי משלים παραβάλλοντες παράβολας, expressing their minds by parables, as St. Mark speaks in their own phrase, (iv. 30.) but also that some of our Lord's parables, as that of the rich glutton, Luke xvi. that of the foolish virgins, Matt. xxv. and others, were taken from the Jews. (See Sheringham, Præf. ad Joma.) Yet, because this way of teaching had in it somewhat of obscurity, and the doctrine contained under the covert of these parables was not so easy to be apprehended by the vulgar sort, the disciples here inquire, Why speakest thou to them in parables? and to this question, for the satisfaction of others, I shall give a larger answer: let it be noted, then,

First, That albeit this way of teaching was somewhat cloudy and obscure, yet it was intelligible to the attent and searching auditor, as will appear from that expression with which our Saviour doth so oft conclude his parables, viz. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear: accordingly, our Lord being to instruct the multitude by parables, (Matt. xv. 10.) he saith unto them, Hear, and understand: and when his disciples asked the meaning of that parable, he reprehends them, saying, Ἀκμὴν καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀσύνετοι ἔστε; Are ye also without understanding? intimating that it was not so much the obscurity of his words, as their own dulness and want of understanding, which made them not perceive the import of his doctrine; and again, Mark iv. 13. he speaks by way of admiration to them, saying, Know ye not this parable!

Secondly, This method of instruction was not without its uses and advantages, seeing hereby it was visible who were the υἱοι τῆς σοφίας, sons of wisdom, who had a cordial love to Divine things, and an inflamed desire after them, and thought it worthy of their care and pains to search them out, and so were persons fitly qualified for the reception of the gospel light. It was the custom of the disciples of the Jewish doctors, when they understood not the meaning of their parables, to go unto their rabbies to inquire the meaning of them; as did our Lord's disciples ask of him the meaning of those parables they understood not. And this Christ's hearers might have done, had they not been indisposed to receive the doctrines which he taught, and chosen rather to be held in error by the scribes and pharisees, than to receive instruction from the mouth of Christ. (2.) Such lessons, as they are best remembered, so having once attained to their sense, they will stick closer to us; for the time spent in the unfolding of them, makes the idea the more fixed and lasting in the brain.

Thirdly, That Christ thus spake to them in parables, did not proceed from his unwillingness to instruct them, but from their indisposition to receive his doctrine, delivered more plainly to them: of this St. Mark informs us, by saying, (iv. 33.) He spake the word to them in many parables, as they were able to hear it. For those parables the Scripture mentions, were either such as were obvious in themselves, as that of Dives and Lazarus, of the rich man pulling down his barns, (Luke xii. 16.) their choosing the uppermost seats at feasts, (xiv. 7.) or such as would, had they with greater plainness been delivered, have soured and enraged the leading Jews, and stirred them up to a more violent opposition to his doctrine, and a more quick endeavour to destroy his person; they being either such as did proclaim him the Messiah, and the Son of God, which they still looked upon as blasphemy; as that which styles him the good Shepherd, and concludes them wolves and robbers; or, such as contradicted their traditions, and told them it was not the uncleanness of the hands, or outward man, but the defilement of the heart, which made them loathsome in the eye of God; which doctrine did much offend the pharisees; (Matt. xv. 12.) or, such as did upbraid their stubbornness and disobedience, as did the parable of the vineyard, planted by the husbandman; the parable of the two sons, of which the eldest promised fair, but did not what he promised; or such as taxed their pride and self-conceit, as did the parable touching the arrogant thanksgiving of the pharisee; (Luke xviii. 9.) or else, such as told the great propagation and increase of the gospel among the heathens, as did the parable of the leaven, and of the grain of mustard-seed; or, such as did foretell the ruin and unchurching of the Jewish nation, as did the parable of cutting down the unfruitful fig-tree, and the decree, that they who refused, upon invitation, to come to the wedding-supper, should not taste thereof; or, such as prophesied, that the kingdom of God should be taken from them; or, that their sloth in not improving the talents that they had received already, should be punished with the utter deprivation of them. Now all these things were so offensive to the pharisees, as, had they plainly been delivered to them, they would have provoked them to that rage, which might have quite discouraged his young disciples, and hindered the performance of those works which were preparatory to his resurrection, and to the glorious appearance of his kingdom. Besides the parables already mentioned, we have only those recorded here, and in the parallel chapter of St. Mark; of which two only recorded were spoken to the multitude, viz. the parable of the seed, and of the tares; the rest, when he had sent the multitude away, to his disciples; (ver. 36.) and both might probably reflect upon the Jews, as being the bad ground, and the tares mentioned in them.

Lastly, Consider that what Christ thus delivered here, did not contain the fundamental precepts and doctrines of the gospel, they being delivered in the audience of the people with sufficient clearness, Matt. v.—vii. but only the mysteries relating to the progress of the gospel, and the event of it among Jews and gentiles: now even the Jews acknowledge, that the predictions of this nature, were usually taught in allegorical, improper, and parabolical expressions, they being not so needful to be known as were the fundamental rules of faith and manners. Moreover, the reason here assigned, why our Saviour spake so obscurely to them, was their own wickedness and perverseness, which indisposed them to receive profit by his more plain discourses; for therefore (saith Christ) speak I to them in parables, because they seeing, see not; and hearing, do not hear or understand. Now this, both in the Scripture and in other authors, is a proverbial expression, concerning men so wicked and so slothful, that either they attend not to, or will not follow, the clearest intimations and convictions of their duty: thus, to a revolting and rebellious people, which had cast off the fear of God, the prophet Jeremiah speaks thus, (v. 21.) Hear now this, O foolish people, and without understanding; which have eyes, and see not; which have ears, and hear not: and God speaks to Ezekiel thus, Son of man, thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, which have eyes to see, and see not; they have ears to hear, and hear not: for they are a rebellious house, (xii. 2.) This is a frequent form of speech in Philo,* who, speaking of those that were addicted to wine and sensual pleasures, saith, Ὁρῶντες οὐκ ὁρῶσι, καὶ ἀκούοντες οὐκ ἀκούουσι, they seeing, see not; and hearing, do not hear. And again,† Ὁρῶντες ἐστιν ὅτε οὐκ ὁρῶμεν, it sometimes happens, that seeing we see not, and hearing we hear not, viz. when the mind is more intent upon other things. Demosthenes‡ mentioned this as a παροιμία, or a proverb, Ὁρῶντας μὴ ὁρᾶν καὶ ἀκούοντας μὴ ἀκούειν· yea, sometimes this phrase is used in a good sense, to signify men who will not hearken to any solicitations to wickedness, but stop their ears, and shut their eyes against them. Thus, ὁ βαρύνων τὰ ὦτα, he that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood; καμμύων τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς, he that shutteth his eyes that he may see no evil, he shall dwell on high. (Isa. xxxiii. 15, 16.) Now, hence it evidently follows, that the phrase, to them it is not given to know the mysteries of the kingdom, only imports, That to them I allow or vouchsafe not a clearer knowledge of these things, whom I find too much disposed to slight and to neglect, but indisposed to receive and profit by them; and therefore, by the rule of contraries, to you it is given to know them, can only signify, to you I think fit to allow and vouchsafe the knowledge of them, as finding you disposed to attend to and to improve them: nor is there any sense more frequent in Scripture of the phrase, I give, or give not, than this, I allow, vouchsafe, permit, or think fit, that such a thing be done or not done; this being the sense of the phrase, when mention is made of the days of life which God hath given us, Eccles. v. 18. viii. 15. ix. 9. of the sore travail which God hath given (i. e. allotted) to the sons of men, Eccles. iii. 10. Give not thy Holy One to see corruption, Psal. xvi. 10. Give not my feet to slide, Psal. lxvi. 1. Give not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin, Eccles. v. 6. Give not thy strength to women, Prov. xxxi. 3. Give not sleep to thine eyes, Psal. cxxxii. 4. Prov. vi. 4. And when we say, such a one is given to wine and to women; i. e. he allows himself those liberties, or licentious practices.

[5] Ver. 12. Ὅστις γὰρ ἔχει· For whosoever hath, to him shall be given.] From the words, whosoever hath not, shall be taken away that which he hath, it is manifest, that not to have, is not to have profitably, and to improvement: for what a man absolutely hath not, cannot be taken from him. Whence it must follow, that τὸ ἔχειν here, must be so to have, as to improve it duly. So Phavorinus saith, That ἔχειν to have, is ἐπιμελεῖσθαι καὶ φυλάσσειν, to take care of and preserve. Casaubon observes, that ἔχειν, in the Greek, doth sometimes signify, to have a thing with increase: so Sophocles, in Ajace, πρὸς γὰρ τὸν ἔχοντα ὁ φθόνος ἕρπει, he that abounds, is envied; where the scholiast notes, that ἔχειν is put for εὖ ἔχειν· and in Democritus θαυμάζειν τοὺς ἔχοντας, is to admire the rich. So not to have, is not to use what we have, as in that of the Proverbs, xiii. 7. There are who are rich, μηδὲν ἔχοντες, and having nothing, as not having power to eat of their labours: thus Aristotle saith,§ that a man who hath knowledge and useth it not, as being drunk or mad, may be said ἔχειν πῶς, καὶ μὴ ἔχειν, to have it in a manner, and not to have it. (See Matt. xxv. 29.)

Καὶ ὃ ἔχει, ἀρθήσεται, From him that hath not shall be taken away what he hath.] Some think the reading should be here, and Mark iv. 25. as it is in Luke viii. 18. καὶ ὃ δοκεῖ ἔχειν, what he seems to have; because, say they, a man may seem to have what he hath not, but cannot truly have what he hath not; but how then can that be taken from him? Besides, our exposition, which renders the sense thus, what he unprofitably, or without improvement, hath, is fully confirmed from Christ's application of these words to the unprofitable servant, who improved not his talent, Matt. xxv. 29. and from the reason he assigns, why he spake to the Jews in parables; to wit, because they would not improve the light, which they had received already. Whence Jerome's note upon the place is this, That we might not suspect this grossness of heart, and heaviness of ears, was the effect of nature, and not of choice, "subjungit culpam arbitrii et dicit, et oculos suos clauserunt," he subjoins the fault of the will, saying, Their eyes have they shut.

[6] Ver. 14. Καὶ ἀναπληροῦται ἐπ' αὐτοῖς· And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah, &c.] The apostle Paul informs us, that what the law saith, it speaks to them of all times and ages that are under the law. (Rom. iii. 19.) So what the prophets of the Jews said, must in like cases belong to the Jews of all times; though ἐπ' αὐτοῖς, may be here rendered concerning them; and so the meaning may be only this, That what was said by Isaiah of the men of his times, was as truly fulfilled concerning the Jews of our Saviour's time; they being as indisposed to hearken to the words of this great Prophet, as were the former Jews to attend to the words of Isaiah.

[7] Ver. 17. Πόλλοι προφῆται καὶ δίκαιοι ἐπεθύμησαν ἰδεῖν ἃ βλέπετε, καὶ οὐκ εἶδον· Verily I say unto you, That many prophets and wise men have desired to see the things that ye see, and have not seen them.] i. e. Many prophets, who prophesied of the coming of the Messiah, and many righteous men, to whom God familiarly shewed himself, as he did to Abraham and the patriarchs; many kings, (Luke x. 24.) from whose seed he was to spring, and whose kingdoms and persons were types of the Messiah, desired to see before their eyes the things which ye thus see, and have not so seen them, they only seeing them afar off in the promises made to them concerning these days; (Heb. xi. 13.) and to them it was revealed, that not to themselves, but to our times, they ministered the things which are now revealed. (1 Pet. i. 11, 12.)

[8] Ver. 19. Παντὸς ἀκούοντος τὸν λόγον τῆς βασιλείας, καὶ μὴ συνιέντος· When any one heareth the word, and understandeth it not.] Christ cannot here intend to signify that his word ever becomes unprofitable to any, either through the natural weakness of their understanding, which renders them unable to discern his mind, or through the darkness or obscurity of the word preached: since this would lay the reason of the unprofitableness of it, not in the hearers, who cannot be supposed blameworthy, because the understanding God hath given them is weak; but in the preacher, who taught it so obscurely that they were not able to discern it. The Greek word συνίεναι, which we render understand, here signifies to ponder, to consider of, to lay to heart, and to observe, in order to action: so Prov. xxi. 12. συνιεῖ δίκαιος, the righteous man wisely considers the house of the wicked: Psal. xli. 1. Blessed is he that considereth the poor, (Gr. ὁ συνιῶν ἐπὶ πτωχὸν.) Psal. cvi. 7. Our fathers in Egypt, οὐ συνῆκαν, considered not thy wonders. And that thus it here signifies, appears, (1.) because the following degree of hearers are such as are affected something with the word preached, for they receive it with joy: (ver. 20.) the first degree must, therefore, comprehend such men as are not thus affected with it, it making no impression on their hearts. (2.) Because the devil is said to snatch away this word, lest they should believe it. Now faith being an act of the understanding, he could not fear they should believe what he knew they did not understand; and this industry of Satan to snatch the word out of our hearts, as it discovers his enmity against the progress of the gospel, so doth it highly commend the excellence and efficacy of it: for were it not of great importance to preserve it there, he would not be so industrious to snatch it thence; and were it not, when there, a powerful instrument to work within us, that faith which purifies the heart, why doth he do this lest we should believe? Why is it then that men do call this quick and powerful word, this word of life, a dead letter? And when they daily by experience see that the persuasions, both of themselves and others, are often prevalent, why do they think that God's can be of no effect without a miracle?

[9] Ver. 20. Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ τὸν λόγον ἀκούων, καὶ εὐθὺς μετὰ χαρᾶς λαμβάνων αὐτόν· This is he who hears the word, and anon with joy receives it.] Here he who is represented by the stony ground, (1.) hears the word, and doth πρὸς καιρὸν πιστεύειν, for a time believe it; (Luke viii. 13.) but then he only doth so for a time; and hence we learn, that it is not sufficient that we at present do believe, profess, and practise suitably to the truth delivered, unless we do continue so to do unto the end, and bring forth fruit with patience: (Luke viii. 15.) for by comparing the evangelists, we learn that it is in effect all one to be ἄκαρποι, unfruitful, (Matt. xiii. 22. Mark iv. 19.) and to bring no fruit to perfection, Luke viii. 15. (2.) He receives the word with joy, and is at present much affected with it, though afterward he is offended at it; whence also it appears, that it is not sufficient, to render us good Christians, that we at present are somewhat affected with the word, receive it with some joy, delight, and pleasure, unless it doth produce sincerity and constancy in our obedience to all its precepts, even those which are most grievous to flesh and blood.

[10] Ver. 22. Καὶ ἡ μέριμνα τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, καὶ ἡ ἀπάτη τοῦ πλούτου, and the care of this life, and the deceitfulness of riches, καὶ ἡδονῶν τοῦ βίου, and the pleasures of life, Luke viii. 14. καὶ αἱ περὶ τὰ λοιπὰ ἐπιθυμίαι, and our lustings after other things, Mark iv. 19. entering in, choke the word.] Here are enumerated all those things which choke the word of God, and render our profession of religion unprofitable to the welfare of our souls.

First, Ἡ μέριμνα τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, Such a concernment for this present life, as renders us distracted and tormented with the fears of losing it; so that we cannot think of parting with it without horror, which makes us falter in the practice, and even fall off from the profession of it; or αἱ μερίμναι those distracting worldly cares which fill our heads so full of contrivances, and so employ our time, that we are not at leisure seriously to think upon, and carefully pursue, the concernment of our souls.

Secondly, The love of the deceitful riches of the world; for when they so far enter into our hearts, as that we are βουλόμενοι πλουτεῖν, very desirous to be rich; this eagerness to have them tempts us to sin that we may gain them, and sin again that we may keep them, and will not suffer us to part with them as we ought, either for the relief of others or for the welfare of our own souls; whence, saith our Lord, ye cannot serve God and mammon; and he that loveth the world (saith St. John), the love of the Father is not in him; for the friendship of this world is enmity to God. (James iv. 4.)

Thirdly, The pleasures of life, i. e. either those which are the works of the flesh, and so exclude us from the kingdom of heaven, as fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, drunkenness, gluttony; or those which, though they be not sinful in their nature, or such as Christianity restrains us wholly from, as, v. g. the pleasures of the stage and theatre, of gaming, and of recreations of like kind; yet, when our desires are strongly carried out after them, when we spend that time in the pursuit of them, which makes us neglect our duty to our God, our neighbours, or our own calling and concerns; when they minister temptations to fraud, to covetousness, to contention, passion, swearing, fretfulness, or idleness; or often cast us into the company of loose, profane, debauched persons, by whose example and conversation we may be endangered; and notwithstanding we are so enslaved to, or so much under the power of them, that we cannot deny ourselves these liberties, then we are φιλήδονοι, lovers of pleasures more than God.

Fourthly, Αἱ περὶ τὰ λοιπὰ ἐπιθυμίαι, our lustings after other things; as (1.) the lusts of the eyes, or our desires of gay apparel, rich furniture, stately buildings, great attendance and equipage; or such as by St. John are styled the pride of life, desire of popular applause, or of high estimation in the world, of advancement to high posts and to great places above others; or, lastly, our excessive love unto our relatives, our parents, wives, our children, or our friends; for when these affections prove temptations to sin, as the excess of them still doth, they will be then obstructive of that influence the word of life should have upon us: St. John informs us, that all these are not of the Father, but of the world; that if we love or set our hearts upon them, the love of the Father is not in us: (1 John ii. 15, 16.) and, therefore, Christ requires us to deny ourselves in all these things, to hate, i. e. to love them less than him, that we may be his disciples.

[11] Ver. 23. Ὁ δὲ ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν τὴν καλὴν σπαρείς, but that which is sown upon good ground, is he who heareth the word, and considers of it.] And brings forth fruit. Luke viii. 15. οἵτινες ἐν καρδίᾳ καλῇ καὶ ἀγαθῇ κατέχουσι, καὶ καρποφοροῦσιν ἐν ὑπομονῇ, Who retain it in a good and honest heart, and bring forth fruit with patience. What this good and honest heart, or man that hath it, is, we may learn from heathen authors. Thus Aristotle* tells us, that this name, καλὸς καὶ ἀγαθὸς, was by them given ἐπὶ τοῦ τελείως σπουδαίου, to one that is entirely good, ᾧ τᾶ ἀγαθὰ πάντα ὄντα ἀγαθὰ ἐστι, who approved of all things that were truly good, and who was not corrupted by riches and dominion; and from the requisites in him, which were wanting in all the other grounds: for whereas he, who was represented by the seed sown by the way-side, did not συνιέναι consider of it, he that receives the word into a good heart is συνιὼν, one that considers duly of it, he lays before his eyes the benefits he may receive, and the afflictions he may suffer, by adhering to it; what he must do to enjoy these blessings, and what he must be ready to part with that he may secure them. (2.) Whereas in the stony ground the seed was only retained for a while, and then cast out, it soon rose up, and as soon withered; the seed sown in the good and honest heart, κατέχεται, is there retained, and brings forth fruit with patience: and (3.) whereas in the thorny ground it is so choked as to become unfruitful where it is, or οὐ τελεσφορεῖ, it brings forth no mature fruit; no fruit that can prevail, or get up above these thorns; in the good heart it brings forth fruit unto perfection, prevails and triumphs over all sensual and worldly appetites, over our love to life, and our most near relations, and becomes fruitful, abounding in all the works of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ unto the glory and praise of God. (Phil. i. 11.)

[12] Ver. 25. Ὁ ἐχθρὸς ἔσπειρε ζιζάνια ἀνὰ μέσον τοῦ σίτου, The enemy sowed tares in the midst of the wheat.] Hence some collect, that even these tares must be members of the church of Christ, as well as the good seed, which, if it only signify they by profession may be so, is in itself true; but if it be designed to prove that they are true members of that body, of which Jesus Christ is the head, that cannot follow from these words; for (1.) our Saviour saith expressly, the field is not the church, but the world; (2.) the seed sown in the field by Christ is good seed, the children of the kingdom, (ver. 38.) the just; (ver. 43.) they therefore only can belong to him because they only are sown by him; the tares were sown in it by the envious man, that is, the devil, (ver. 28.) the enemy of Christ and of his church; (ver. 25.) they are sown while the overseers of the church were asleep, and are expressly called the children of the devil, (ver. 38.) And is it reasonable to conceive that the devil, the great enemy of the church and of its head, should beget members to his church, since there is no communion betwixt Christ and Belial, (2 Cor. vi. 15.) or that the devil's children should be the members of Christ's body?

[13] Ver. 28, 29. Θέλεις οὖν ἀπελθόντες συλλέξωμεν αὐτά; ὁ δὲ ἔφη· οὔ· Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? And he said, Nay.] Vain hence is the collection of the Erastians, that the wicked, and those that cause offences, are not by excommunication to be excluded from the communion of the church, seeing the field in which these tares spring up is not the church, but the world; and Christ, in the reddition of the parable, takes no notice of this question, or of the answer to it. Nor doth this place prove, that the magistrate may not cut off evil-doers, seeing this was not spoken to them, but to the ministers of Christ's church.

[14] Ver. 32. Ὃ μικρότερον μέν ἐστι πάντων τῶν σπερμάτων, Which is the least of all seeds, but when it is grown it is the greatest among herbs.] The Jews give a wonderful account of the growth and increase of this seed; viz. There was a stalk of mustard-seed in Sichin, from which sprang out three boughs, of which one was broke off, and covered the tent of a potter, and produced three cabs of mustard. R. Simeon Ben Caliphat said, A stalk of mustard-seed was in my field, into which I was wont to climb as men do into a fig-tree. (Buxtorf. in voce chardal.)

[15] Ver. 33. The kingdom of heaven is like to leaven.] St. Jerome here by this kingdom understands the doctrine of the gospel, and saith it leavens the whole man, consisting of a rational faculty of irascible and concupiscible passions, by directing his reason to embrace and approve true wisdom, turning his anger into a hatred against sin, and his desires into a love of, and longing after, virtue; and these three faculties are, saith Theophylact, the three measures mentioned in the parable.

[16] Ver. 35. Ὅπως πληρωθῇ τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ τοῦ Προφήτου, That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables, Psal. lxxviii. 2.] Here Mr. Clerc notes from St. Jerome on this place, that he had read in some copies, "quod dictum est per prophetam Esaiam," which was spoken by the prophet Isaiah; and because no such thing was found in that prophet, I believe (saith he) it was taken away by some prudent man; but I am apt to think that it was first written per Asapham prophetam, the seventy-seventh Psalm being entitled, A Psalm of the prophet Asaph; and that the first transcriber not understanding what was meant by Asaph, thinking it a mistake in the writer, corrected it by putting in the word Isaiah; and in his notes on the seventy-eighth Psalm, he saith, This was objected by Porphyry against the evangelist St. Matthew, that he was so ignorant as to say, "quod scriptum est per Isaiam," which was written by Isaiah; but yet he is forced to confess, that in all the ancient copies there are no footsteps to be found of the reading which St. Jerome speaks of; neither Chrysostom, Theophylact, nor any of the ancient fathers, except Jerome, makes any mention of it; it is not extant in any of the ancient versions, nor saith St. Jerome any thing of Porphyry in his genuine work upon St. Matthew. And this I think sufficient to justify our reading against some single corrupt Latin copy, in which St. Jerome, if we may believe him, found it otherwise. The sense therefore may be this, Our Saviour spake in parables, that what David, filled with a prophetic spirit, said of himself, might be fulfilled also in that Son of David, of which he was a type. For he being our great lawgiver, might more truly say, Hear my law, O my people.

[17] Ver. 40. Ὥσπερ οὖν συλλέγεται τὰ ζιζάνια, καὶ πυρὶ κατακαίεται, οὕτως ἔσται ἐν τῇ συντελείᾳ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου· As therefore tares are gathered together, and burnt in the fire; so shall it be in the end of the world.] From this, as well as other places, it seems probable, that the wicked shall not be cast into everlasting fire till the end of the world, that being the time when Christ will place the goats on his left hand, and say unto them, Depart from me, ye wicked, into everlasting fire; (Matt. xxv. 41.) and when those whose names are not in the book of life, are to be cast into the lake of fire. (Rev. xx. 15. See the note on 2 Tim. iv. 8.)

[18] Ver. 44. To a treasure hid.] This treasure, saith St. Jerome, is either Jesus Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; or the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make us wise to salvation, and which contain the hidden wisdom of God. (1 Cor. ii. 7. See Examen Millii.)

[19] Ver. 47. The kingdom of heaven is like to a net, &c.] Because this net contains both good and bad fish: hence some conclude, that bad men are members of that church which is Christ's body as well as good. But (1.) it is neither the church visible nor invisible, διδασκαλία τῶν ἁλιέων ἀποστόλων, the doctrine of the apostles, made by Christ fishers of men, which is here compared to a net. So Theophylact. (2.) These bad fish are no sooner pulled unto the shore, but the fishermen sit down, and cast them away, and thereby shew they belonged not to this kingdom. Moreover, the scope of this parable is not to shew, who do at present belong to Christ's kingdom, but who hereafter shall be excluded from the kingdom of heaven.

[20] Ver. 55. Καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ αὐτοῦ, &c. And are not his brethren James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas?] It is now passed into a matter of faith among some that call themselves Christians, that the Virgin Mary was ἀεὶ παρθένος, ever a virgin, and hath by them been styled a heresy to hold the contrary; whereas I know not how it consists with good divinity, to make that an article of Divine faith, which is founded on no Divine revelation; or with our sixth article of religion, to make that necessary to be believed, which confessedly is not contained in Holy Scripture. St. Basil* plainly distinguishes it from things necessary to be believed, and leaves it among the things not curiously to be inquired into, as his words plainly intimate. And though Origen† saith, That they who say she after married, do not prove it, and that the Virgin had no other son but Jesus, κατὰ τοὺς ὑγιῶς περὶ αὐτῆς δοξάσοντας, according to those who thought soundly of her, yet he lays no brand upon the contrary opinion. However, it is certain that these words do not prove that Mary the mother of our Lord had any offspring; but, say all the ancients before St. Jerome, they were the children of Joseph, by a former wife, which died before his espousal to the blessed Virgin. St. Jerome attempts to prove, that James and Joses here mentioned were not the children of the Virgin-mother, but of her sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas; for John xix. 25. we read thus, There stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene. There were there, saith Matthew, xxvii. 50. and Mark, xv. 40. Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the less, and of Joses; whence he concludes, that James and Joses, styled here the brethren of our Lord, were not the sons of Mary his mother, but of her sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas; and hence infers, that they are only called his brethren, according to the language of the Jews, as Lot is called Abraham's brother, Gen. xiii. 8. as being the son of his brother, Gen. xii. 5. and as the word brother is used, Gen. xxix. 12. Lev. x. 4. i. e. because they were his cousin-germans. But this will not necessarily follow; for they might be the sons of Joseph by the wife of Cleophas, who, saith Theophylact, dying without issue, Joseph, according to the law, took her to himself, and of her begat James and Joses, Simon and Judas. But Antonius de Dominis, in a very accurate discourse upon this question, gives us a better answer to this argument of St. Jerome, by saying, The mother of Jesus in St. John, is the same person with the mother of James and Joses in St. Matthew and St. Mark; and that Mary the wife of Cleophas, called by St. Mark, Salome, and by St. John, the sister of the mother of our Lord, was the mother of the sons of Zebedee; for, saith he, it seems evident, that the three women named by the three evangelists, were in all of them the same persons; as therefore Mary Magdalene is the same, so Mary the mother of the sons of Zebedee, and Salome, so called by St. Mark from her family, and the sister of the mother of our Lord must be the same, and then Mary the mother of our Lord, and the mother, i. e. stepmother, of James and Joses, must be the same also. And this answer I like best, (1.) because it retains the proper signification of the word brethren, which is always retained both in the Old and the New Testament; when there is professedly an enumeration of brethren. (2.) Because it seems plain, that the Jews speak still of his brethren and sisters, even in the ordinary sense of the word, even as they esteemed him the carpenter's son, and Mary his mother. (So here, and xii. 46. Mark vi. 3. John vi. 42.) And James here mentioned, is by Josephus* expressly styled, ἀδελφὸς Ἰησοῦ, the brother of Jesus called Christ. (3.) They seem also to have lived with his mother; whence we find them so oft together, as when it is said, Thy mother and brethren seek thee, Matt. xii. 46. His mother and brethren, are they not here with us? i. e. do not they dwell at Capernaum? He went down to Capernaum, and his mother and his brethren, John ii. 12. (4.) This agrees best with antiquity; for Dr. Pearson confesseth, This was always the concurring judgment of antiquity till St. Jerome's time; that these were indeed the brethren of our Lord: and Spalatensis shews, That many of the fathers embraced the opinion, that the mother of our Lord in St. John, was the same person whom St. Matthew styles the mother of James. (De Repub. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. 2. p. 114—117.)

* Μέχρι γὰρ τῆς κατὰ τὴν οἰκονομίαν ὑπηρεσίας, ἀναγκαία ἡ παρθενία, τὸ δὲ ἐφεξῆς ἀπολυπραγμόνητον τῷ λόγῳ τοῦ μυστηρίου καταλείψαιμεν. Tom. i. Hom. de Nativ. p. 509.

CHAP. XIV.

1. AT that time (that Christ had sent out his disciples, to preach the gospel, to cast out devils, and to heal diseases, and they by virtue of his name had been successful in that work, and thereby spread his name abroad, Mark vi. 12—14. Luke ix. 6, 7.) Herod the tetrarch (of Galilee, Luke iii. 1.) [1] heard of the fame of Jesus.

2. And (after some hesitation and inquiry, Luke ix. 7, 8.) he said to his servants (I incline to their opinion, who say), [2] This is John the Baptist; [3] he is risen from the dead; and therefore (though before he did no miracle, John x. 41. now) mighty works do shew forth themselves in him (to clear his innocence, and confirm his mission.

3. And he had cause to be thus anxious, and perplexed at this matter); For Herod had laid hold on John, and bound him (with a chain), and put him in prison [4] for Herodias's sake, his brother Philip's wife, (who having agreed with Herod to divorce herself from her own husband, at Herod's return from Rome, was married to him, and cohabited with him as his wife, Mark vi. 17. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7. p. 626. C.)

4. For (she was thus incensed against him, because) John (had) said to him, It is not lawful for thee to have her (as thy wife).

5. [5] And when (at the instigation of Herodias) he would have put him to death, (he could not think fit to do so, for) he feared the multitude, because they counted him [6] as a prophet.

6. But when Herod's birthday was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them (that were present), and (her dancing) pleased Herod.

7. Whereupon he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she would ask, (even to the half of his kingdom, Mark vi. 23.)

8. And she, being [7] before (she asked any thing) instructed of her mother, said, Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger.

9. And the king was sorry (that she asked a thing so ungrateful to the people, so ungrateful to his birthday, and so dangerous to himself); nevertheless, for the oath's sake (which he had made), and (for the sake of) them which sat with him at meat, he commanded it to be given her (i. e. that it should be given to her).

10. And (accordingly) he sent (an executioner, Mark vi. 27. and he went) and beheaded John in the prison.

11. And [8] his head was brought in a charger, and given to the damsel: and she brought it to her mother.

12. And his disciples came, and took up the body (of the Baptist), and buried it, and went and told Jesus (what had happened to him).

13. When Jesus heard (of this, and the account which his apostles sent forth by him, x. 5. gave of all that they had done and taught, Mark vi. 30. Luke ix. 10.) [9] he departed (with them) thence by ship into a desert place apart (from the multitude, which came so continually to them, that they had not time to eat, Mark vi. 31.) and when the people had heard (thereof, or whither he was gone, viz. to the desert of Bethsaida, Luke ix. 10.) they (took a compass by land, and) followed him on foot out of the cities; (seeing the signs that he had done, John vi. 2. and they got before him to the place where he was to land, Mark vi. 33.)

14. And Jesus went forth (out of the ship unto a mountain, and there sat with his disciples, John vi. 3.) and saw a great multitude (come to the place), and he was moved with compassion towards them, (and spake unto them of the kingdom of God, Luke ix. 11.) and he healed their sick.

15. And when it was evening, (after that Christ had inquired of Philip making trial of his faith, for that was done when Jesus saw the multitude, John vi. 5.) his disciples came (together, Luke ix. 12.) to him, saying, This is a desert place (where no victuals are to be had), [10] and the time is now past (or, the day is spent); send the multitude away, that they may go into the villages, and buy themselves victuals.

16. But Jesus said unto them, They need not depart (to buy victuals); give ye them to eat, (having learnt of Andrew what meat was there, John vi. 9.)

17. And they say unto him, (Shall we go then and buy two hundred pennyworth (i. e. six pounds five shillings worth) of bread for them to eat? He saith unto them, How many loaves have you here? And they upon inquiry say,) We have here but five (barley) loaves, and two (small) fishes? (And what are they among so many? John vi. 9.)

18. And he said, Bring them hither to me.

19. And he commanded (his disciples, Mark vi. 39. to make) the multitude to sit down upon the grass, (by hundreds, and fifties in a company, Luke ix. 14. Mark vi. 39, 40.) and (when they were thus sat down, he) took the five loaves, and the two fishes, and, looking up to heaven, [11] he blessed (or, gave thanks to God for them), and brake (the loaves, Mark vi. 41.) and gave the loaves (thus broken) to his disciples, and the disciples (gave them) to the multitude (and the two fishes divided he among them all).

20. And they did all eat, and were filled; and (when

* Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8.

our Lord had said to his disciples, gather up the remaining fragments, that nothing be lost, John vi. 12.) they took up of the fragments that remained twelve baskets full.

21. And they that had eaten (of the five loaves, and two small fishes), were about five thousand men, besides women and children.

22. And straightway Jesus (knowing that the multitude designed to make him a king, John vi. 15. and that this might be pleasing to his disciples) constrained his disciples to get into a ship, and to go before him unto (Capernaum, on) the other side (Bethsaida), while he sent the multitudes away:

23. And when he had sent the multitudes away, he went up into a mountain apart to pray: and [12] when the evening was come, he was there alone.

24. But the ship was now in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves: for the wind was contrary.

25. [13] And in the fourth watch of the night Jesus (seeing them toiling in rowing, Mark vi. 48.) went unto them, walking on the sea (and seemed willing to have passed by them).

26. And when the disciples saw him walking on the sea (not perfectly discerning in the twilight who he was), they were troubled, saying, It is [14] a spirit (or an apparition); and they cried out for fear.

27. But straightway Jesus spake unto them, saying, Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid.

28. And Peter answered him, and said, Lord, if it be thou, bid me to come to thee upon the water (for having thy commission, I believe I may safely do it).

29. And he said (unto him), Come. And when Peter was come down out of the ship, he walked on the water, to go to Jesus.

30. But when (his mind diverting him from the consideration of Christ's power) he saw the winds boisterous, (attending to them) he was afraid; and, beginning to sink, he cried out (to Jesus), saying, Lord, save me.

31. And immediately Jesus stretched forth his hand, and caught him, and said unto him, [15] O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?

32. And when they (Christ and Peter) were come into the ship, the wind ceased, (and the ship was presently at the land whither they went, John vi. 21.)

33. Then they that were in the ship came and worshipped him, saying, [16] Of a truth thou art the Son of God.

34. And when they were gone over (the sea of Galilee, from Bethsaida back to Capernaum, John vi. 17.) they came into the land of Gennesaret. (See the note on ver. 22.)

35. And when the men of that place had knowledge of him, (he having been with them before, Luke v. 1.) they sent out into all that country round about, and brought unto him all that were diseased;

36. [17] And besought him that they might only touch the hem of his garment; and as many as touched (it) were made perfectly whole.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIV.

[1] Ver. 1. HEARD of the fame of Jesus.] Interpreters here inquire, why he heard not of the fame of Jesus sooner, and say, the reason might be this; Because he was at Rome at the beginning of our Saviour's preaching, and when he wrought his former miracles; but the true reason why Herod then began to take notice of the fame of Jesus, seems rather to be this, that now these miracles were wrought not only by himself in person, but by others in his name.

[2] Ver. 2. Οὗτός ἐστιν Ἰωάννης, This is John the Baptist.] So St. Matthew and St. Mark; but St. Luke saith, he was perplexed, διηπόρει, he doubted, he inquired, because it was said of some, that John was risen from the dead, and spake of that to his servants as the most probable opinion, desiring notwithstanding to see him, (Luke ix. 9.) that so he might more perfectly discern whether he was John or not.

[3] Ἠγέρθη, He is risen from the dead.] Hence it appears, that this was said by Herod, and some others, not from any belief of the Pythagorean metempsychosis, or transition of souls from one body to another, after the death of the first body; for this cannot be called, in any propriety of speech, a resurrection of the body; nor could the soul of John now dead enter into the body of Christ, which had for thirty years been informed with another soul: neither the Jews nor the philosophers ever maintained any such transition of souls: this therefore must be understood of the ἀναβίωσις, or reviviscence of the Baptist, whom all the Jews accounted as a prophet; (ver. 5.) it being the opinion of the Jews, that some of their prophets should arise at the coming of the Messiah; and it seemed less wonderful to them, that they who raised others whilst they lived, as did Elias and Elisha, and whose dead bones revived a dead corpse, (2 Kings xiii. 21.) should do so.

[4] Ver. 3. For Herodias' sake, his brother Philip's wife.] That Josephus here differs from the evangelists, making Herodias the wife not of his brother Philip, but of another brother named Herod, ought not to make us doubt the truth of what St. Matthew here, St. Mark, vi. 17. and St. Luke, iii. 19. unanimously assert, touching a matter so well known when they writ, that they could not be ignorant of it; especially if we consider, that the Jewish Chronicles* and Gorionides agree with the evangelists; for Gorionides saith, Herodias was first married to Philip, and then taken away from him by Herod Antipas. The old Hebrew Chronicle† saith, Uxorem fratris sui Philippi ipso vivente junxit sibi matrimonio, quæ liberos ex fratre ejus susceperat, et tamen is eam duxit uxorem: and an old Chronicle ‡ of the second temple saith, "Antipas Philippi fratris sui uxorem accepit, ex qua ille liberos ante genuerat;" i. e. Antipas married the wife of his brother Philip, he being yet living, and having had children by her. This Philip mentioned by Josephus§ died, saith he, in the twentieth year of Tiberius, and therefore must be living, at the least four years after this time. (See Orig. in Matt. p. 230. Euseb. H. Eccl. lib. i. cap. 11. Jerome in locum.) Which agrees with what Josephus saith of his other Herod, Ἡρωδίας δὲ ἐπὶ συγχύσει φρονήσασα τῶν πατρίων Ἡρώδῃ γαμεῖται, τοῦ ἀνδρὸς ὁμοπατρίῳ ἀδελφῷ, διαστᾶσα ζῶντος, Herodias, in contempt of the laws of her country, married again to Herod, the natural brother of her husband, separating herself from him whilst living, and having had a child by him; she therefore was guilty both of incest and adultery by the law of Moses, in thus agreeing μετοικίσασθαι πρὸς αὐτὸν, to divorce herself from her former husband, yet living, and to marry to Herod Antipas; and therefore the Baptist might well say to him; It is not lawful for thee to have her for thy wife.

[5] Ver. 5. Καὶ θέλων αὐτὸν ἀποκτεῖναι. And when he would have put him to death.] To reconcile this with Mark vi. 19. where it is said, that Herodias would have put him to death, but could not prevail with Herod so to do; it may be said, Herod was willing enough to do it, but was withheld from the action, partly out of fear of the people, and partly by the checks of his conscience, as knowing John to be a just and holy man, whose death might therefore be avenged on him by a righteous God, as the Jews, saith Josephus,* thought it was, by the destruction of his army.

[6] Ὡς προφήτην, i. e. for a prophet.] This being, as the ancients note, ὡς οὐκ ὁμοιώσεως, ἀλλὰ βεβαιώσεως, not of similitude, but of confirmation: so Neh. vii. 2. αὐτὸς ὡς ἀνὴρ ἀληθὴς, he was a true man, and one that feared the Lord. (See the note on Rom. ix. 32.)

[7] Ver. 8. Προβιβασθεῖσα, before admonished.] i. e. Before she asked any thing, but not before the offer made by Herod: for St. Mark, who relates this whole story more fully, in many other circumstances, says, that upon it she went out, and said to her mother, What shall I ask? and came in again by her instruction, to ask the head of the Baptist.

[8] Ver. 11. And his head was brought, &c.] Note here, that very remarkable seems the providence of God, in avenging the death of this holy man, upon Herod, Herodias, and her daughter. For,

First, As the war betwixt Herod and Aretas, king of Petrea, was caused by Herod's wicked contract with Herodias, to reject the daughter of Aretas his lawful wife, and to marry with Herodias his brother Philip's wife; so Josephus declares, that the Jews looked upon the putting John to death as the cause of the miscarriage of Herod's army, God being angry with him for the death of John the Baptist.†

Secondly, Herodias envying the glory of king Agrippa, who had that honour given him by Caius, prevailed with her husband to go to Rome, and accuse Agrippa: whereupon Caius deprived Herod of his government, and her of her money, and gave both to Agrippa, banishing Herod and Herodias to Lyons, in France; which, saith Josephus,‡ was done in punishment of her envy, and of his readiness to hearken to her solicitations. And,

Thirdly, Of her daughter it is related, that she going over the ice in winter, the ice brake, and she slipped in up to the head, which at last was severed from her body by the sharpness of the ice; Idque non sine Dei Numine, God requiring her head for that of the Baptist's she desired; which, if true, was a wonderful providence.

[9] Ver. 13. Ἀνεχώρησεν ἐκεῖθεν, &c. He departed thence into a desert place.] To avoid the fury of Herod, say interpreters; teaching us by this example, to avoid dangers by all lawful means. (See xii. 15.) But there seems no reason in the context why he should be afraid of Herod, who had done nothing to incense him; it therefore seems more probable, from the collation of these words with those in St. Mark, that he went to this desert to give some respite and refreshment to his wearied disciples.

[10] Ver. 15. Ἡ ὥρα ἤδη παρῆλθεν, The day is now spent.] Ὥρα, both in Greek and Latin, signifies a day; so the Greek word often signifies, especially among the physicians: so Galen, lib. vii. cap. 2. ψύχονται ὥραν μίαν, they are chill an hour, is presently interpreted ἐπὶ ἡμέραν μίαν, for one day; so in Virgil,* Nunquam te crastina fallet hora, i. e. dies postera. So hora ultima, hora mortis, is the day of death.

[11] Ver. 19. Εὐλόγησε, he blessed.] Here it is disputed, whether Jesus by this benediction, multiplied the loaves and fishes by a miraculous power; or whether he gave thanks to God for them: that Christ multiplied the bread and fishes by a miraculous power, all allow; but the question is, whether this be intended by the word εὐλόγησε, he blessed; or, whether the import of this word be this, he gave thanks to God for them: that it is the latter, will be evident from these considerations; (1.) that what is here εὐλόγησε, he blessed, is in St. John, εὐχαριστήσας δίεδωκε, giving thanks, he gave the bread: and what is in this chapter, εὐλόγησε, he blessed, is in the following chapter in the like case, taking the seven loaves and two fishes, εὐχαριστήσας, giving thanks, he brake and gave to his disciples; (ver. 36.) and so in like manner in St. Mark, viii. 6. (2.) That Christ blessed, looking up to heaven, which is an indication, that this action was directed not to the bread, but to his heavenly Father. (3.) In the institution of the Lord's supper, that which in St. Matthew and St. Mark is εὐλογήσας, he blessing, brake the bread, is in St. Luke and St. Paul, εὐχαριστήσας, giving thanks, he brake it. (See Matt. xxvi. 26. Mark xiv. 22. Luke xxii. 19. 1 Cor. xi. 24.) Yea, both St. Matthew (xxii. 27.) and St. Mark, (xiv. 23.) speaking of the cup, say, εὐχαριστήσας, that Christ giving thanks, gave it to them; which shews, that εὐλογεῖν and εὐχαριστεῖν, to bless, and to give thanks, are in sense the same thing. And whereas it is objected, that St. Luke plainly refers this benediction to the bread, by saying εὐλόγησεν αὐτοὺς, he blessed them, (Luke ix. 16.) it may be answered, that in some ancient MSS. the words run thus, εὐλόγησεν ἐπ' αὐτοὺς, he blessed over the loaves; which agrees well with the sense given of the words. (4.) That this is an elliptical form of speech to be supplied thus, εὐλόγησεν Θεὸν ἐπ' αὐτῶν, he blessed God over them; it being familiar both with the Greeks and Hebrews to put εὐλογεῖν τίνα for εὐλογεῖν Θεὸν ἐπὶ τινὸς, to bless a thing, for blessing God over it. So 1 Sam. ix. 13. εὐλογεῖν θυσίαν, to bless the sacrifice, is to give thanks to God for the peace-offering before they dined upon it. So 1 Cor. x. 16. the cup of blessing, ὃ εὐλογοῦμεν, which we bless, is the cup for which we give thanks, according to the custom of the Jews, with whom the beracoth, or the benediction of the bread, is conceived in these words, Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, the king of the world, who producest bread out of the earth: the benediction of the wine runs thus, Blessed art thou, O Lord, the king of the world, who createst the fruit of the vine; and so in the benediction of their table and of their fruits. (See Buxtorf. de cœna Domini. §. 46. 74. de Synag. Jud. 12. p. 254, 255.) Lastly, this is confirmed by these words of St. John, (vi. 23.) Other ships came by the place where they had eaten bread, εὐχαριστήσαντος τοῦ Κυρίου, the Lord having given thanks.

[12] Ver. 23. Ὀψίας δὲ γενομένης, the evening being come.] We learn from this and other places, that the word evening sometimes imports the time from the declining of the sun, sometimes the time in the beginning at sunsetting, or when it began to be dark; the one was called δείλη πρώϊα, or the first evening, say Eustathius* and Phavorinus, the other "sera vespera," or the latter evening, when the sun is setting. So thou shalt kill the passover between the two evenings, Exod. xii. 6. About the going down of the sun, Deut. xvi. 6. So Josh. x. 26. They hanged upon the trees until the evening; and ver. 27. at the time of the going down of the sun, they took them down: at the first of these evenings, the disciples desire Jesus to dismiss the multitude, for the day was declining, ἤρξατο κλίνειν, it began to decline, Luke ix. 12. or dinner-time was past; in the second of them Jesus is left alone, and his disciples were got to sea. How Christ's praying is consistent with his Deity, see John xi. 41, 42.

[13] Ver. 25. In the fourth watch of the night.] Which are thus numbered, at even, at midnight, at cock-crowing, and in the morning. (Mark xiii. 35.) So that it began to be morning before he came to them; hence he both saw them toiling from the land, and they him also walking on the sea. Note, that to walk upon the sea, is made the property of God, who alone spreadeth the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea. (Job ix. 8.)

[14] Ver. 26. A spirit.] That the Jews had then an opinion of hurtful spirits walking in the night, is evident from the LXX. who render from the pestilence walking in darkness, ἀπὸ ταράγματος πνεύματος διαπορευομένου ἐν σκότει, from the fear of the devils that walk in the night, καὶ ἀπὸ δαιμονίου μεσημβρινοῦ, and from the noon-day devil, that which is in the Hebrew, from the destruction at noon-day, Psal. xci. 6.

[15] Ver. 31. Ὀλιγόπιστε, O thou of little faith.] Of the indications of this little faith, see the note on Matt. vi. 30. Christ suffered Peter thus to doubt, say interpreters, that finding by experience the weakness of his faith, he might by prayer and industry endeavour to increase it, and ascribe the whole strength of it to God.

[16] Ver. 33. Ἀληθῶς Θεοῦ υἱὸς εἶ· Truly thou art the Son of God.] Episcopius here expounds this phrase, Truly thou art the Messias, or that king to whom God hath given Divine power to help us; for, saith he, it is probable the apostles then knew nothing of the eternal generation of the Son of God; and truly it may be, they had no accurate idea of such an eternal, necessary generation of the Son of God, as the schools mention; nor do I believe that any of the unbelieving Jews had such a notion of this phrase; and yet we find them accusing our Lord of blasphemy, and making himself equal with God, by saying that he was the Son of God. Seeing then our Saviour had given so many instances of his omnipotence and Divine power by multiplying loaves and fishes so wonderfully, as none could do but he who had power to create; (2.) by walking on the water, and causing the wind instantly to cease; why might not the apostles from all these evidences conclude that the Divinity resided in him? Even the Gergesenes seem to have had some such extraordinary opinion of him, when they believed their sick should be healed only by touching the hem of his garment. This, saith Woltzogenius, was an evidence of their belief of a Divine power residing in Christ. Now where the Divine power is, there must be the Divinity, and where the power of God is, there is God.

[17] Ver. 36. And besought him that they might only touch the hem, &c.] If these were the Gergesenes, who lay on the other side of the sea of Tiberias, and who formerly desired him to depart out of their coasts, (Matt. viii. 34.) their faith was thus increased with the fame of Christ's miracles.

CHAP. XV.

1. (WHEN Christ had miraculously fed five thousand, and was gone thence to Capernaum, John vi. 17.) Then came to Jesus scribes and pharisees, which were of Jerusalem, (who seeing some of Christ's disciples eat bread with unwashen hands found fault, Mark vii. 2.) saying,

2. [1] Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread; (whereas the pharisees and all the Jews, except they wash their hands oft, eat not, holding the tradition of the elders; and when they come from the market, except they wash they eat not; and many other things there be which they have received to hold, as the washing of cups, brazen vessels, and of tables, Mark vii. 3, 4.)

3. But he answered, and said unto them, (I have greater reason to ask) why do you also (Gr. even ye, who pretend to so much strictness in observing the commandments of men) transgress the commandments of God by your tradition? (as certainly ye do.)

4. For [2] God commanded, saying, Honour thy father and thy mother: and (also said, Exod. xxi. 17.) He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death (shewing that the violation of this law deserved death).

5. But [3] ye (following your own vain traditions) say, Whosoever shall say to his father or his mother, It is a gift (let it be no less forbidden to give it to thee, than to give of a thing devoted to God), by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me,

6. And (having said this) honoureth not his father and mother, (he doth only that which he ought to do, pronouncing him not only free from, but obliging him not to observe this precept, Mark vii. 12.) Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition.

7. Ye [4] hypocrites, [5] well did Esaias prophesy of you (by) saying, (that which, being spoken of the Jews, and agreeing as much to you of this, as to them of that age, respecteth as well you as them, viz.)

8. This people draweth nigh to me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips; but (yet) their heart is far from me.

9. But in vain they do (think to) worship me, (by) teaching for doctrines the [6] commandments of men (as doctrines necessary to be observed for acceptance with me).

10. And (hereupon) he [7] called the multitude, and said unto them, Hear (all ye), and understand:

11. Not that which [8] goeth into the mouth defileth a man; (for there is nothing from without a man, that (by) entering into him can defile him, Mark vii. 15.) but that which (being in the heart) cometh out of the mouth, this

(I say) defileth a man. (He that hath ears to hear, let him hear, Mark vii. 16.)

12. Then (he being entered into the house from the people, Mark vii. 17.) came his disciples, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the pharisees were [9] offended, after they heard this saying?

13. But he answered and said, [10] Every plant (Gr. nursery of plants) which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up (these blind guides, and usurpers of that authority over men's conscience, which they have not received from God, shall by him be rooted out).

14. [11] Let them (therefore) alone (to the Divine judgment, for) they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall (at last) fall into the ditch.

15. Then answered Peter, (and by him the disciples, Mark vii. 17.) and said unto him, Declare to us (the meaning of) this parable.

16. And Jesus said, [12] Are ye also yet without understanding?

17. Do not ye yet understand, that whatsoever entereth in at the mouth goeth into the belly, and is cast out into the draught? (and so cannot defile the man, because it entereth not into the heart, to raise up evil motions there, or it affects not the mind, Mark vii. 18, 19.)

18. But those things which [13] proceed out of the mouth come forth from the heart; and they defile the man (in the sight of that God, who loveth purity in the inward parts).

19. For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts (or reasonings), murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies, (covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, pride, foolishness, Mark vii. 22.)

20. These are the things which defile a man: but to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man.

21. Then Jesus went thence, and departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon; (and he entered into a house, and would have no man know it, but he could not be hid from them, Mark vii. 24.)

22. [14] And, behold, a woman of Canaan (whose young daughter had an unclean spirit, heard of him, and) came out of the same coasts, (and fell at his feet, Mark vii. 25.) and cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil (I beseech thee cast him forth).

23. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, (Grant her request, and so) send her away; for she (still) crieth after us.

24. But he answered and said (to them), [15] I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (to preach to, and work miracles first among them).

25. Then came she (the second time) and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me.

26. But he answered and said (to her, Let the children first be filled, Mark vii. 27. for) [16] it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs.

27. And she said, [17] Truth (Gr. I beseech thee), Lord: yet (καὶ γὰρ for even) the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table, (or of the children's crumbs, Mark vii. 28.)

28. Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, [18] great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt, (the devil is gone out of thy daughter; and when she was come to her house, she found it so, Mark vii. 29, 30.) And her daughter was made whole from that very hour.

29. And Jesus departed from thence, and came nigh to the sea of Galilee; and went up into a mountain, and sat down there.

30. And great multitudes came unto him, having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and cast them down at the feet of Jesus; and he healed them:

31. Insomuch that the multitude wondered, when they saw the dumb to speak, the maimed to be whole, the lame to walk, and the blind to see: and they glorified the God of Israel.

32. Then (the multitude being very great, and having nothing to eat, Mark viii. 1.) Jesus called his disciples to him, and said, I have compassion on the multitude, because they continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat: and I will not send them away fasting, lest they faint in the way, (for some of them came from far, Mark viii. 3.)

33. And his disciples say unto him, Whence should we have so much bread in the wilderness, as to fill so great a multitude?

34. And Jesus said unto them, How many loaves have you? and they said, Seven, and a few little fishes.

35. And he commanded the multitude to sit down on the ground.

36. And he took the seven loaves and the fishes, and gave thanks (to God for them), and brake them, and gave to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude.

37. And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left seven baskets full.

38. And they that did eat were four thousand men, beside women and children.

39. And he sent away the multitude, and took ship, and came into the [19] coasts of Magdala (or Dalmanutha, Mark viii. 10. which was within the bounds of Magdala).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XV.

[1] Ver. 2. ΔΙΑΤΙ' οἱ μαθηταί σου παραβαίνουσι τὴν παράδοσιν τῶν πρεσβυτέρων; Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders, for they wash not their hands when they eat bread.] Of this tradition of the elders, let it be noted,

First, That they held it a thing plainly unlawful, and highly criminal, to eat meat, or common bread, till they had washed their hands; hence do the pharisees find fault with Christ's disciples, and style their hands unclean, because they were not washed. (Mark vii. 2.) Hence doth the pharisee, who invited Christ to dinner, wonder that he washed not his hands before dinner. (Luke xi. 38.) For their canon saith, Whosoever despiseth the washing of hands, is worthy to be excommunicated, he comes to poverty, and will be extirpated out of the world. And Buxtorf* citeth from their Talmud this expression, that he that eats bread with unwashen hands, does as bad as if he lay with a whore. And they say, Rabbi Eliezar Ben Hazar was excommunicated by the Sanhedrin, because he contemned the washing of hands. And that R. Aquiba being in prison, and not having water enough to drink, and to wash his hands, chose to do the latter, saying, It was better to die with thirst, than transgress the tradition of the elders. Note,

Secondly, That this washing of hands before meat was not required by any written law of God, and so the neglect of it could not be unlawful by virtue of any Divine law, but only as being a transgression of the tradition of the elders; hence Christ ranks it among the traditions of men, ver. 9. And Maimonides* saith, that it depended on the words of the scribes; and it is by Christ speaking to the pharisees called, your tradition, ver. 3. 6. And yet they held it as a thing necessary, because, say they,† The words of the scribes are lovely above the words of the law, and more weighty than the words of the law or the prophets.

Thirdly, They placed a great piece of religion and sanctity in washing thus their hands, and looked upon them, who neglected this, as men of a defiled soul. Thus Maimonides saith, "The religious of old did eat their common food in cleanness, and took care to avoid all uncleanness all their days, and they were called pharisees; and this is a matter of the highest sanctity, and the way of the highest religion; namely, that a man separate himself, and go aside from the vulgar, and that he neither touch them, nor eat or drink with them; for such separation conduceth to the purity of the body from evil works; the purity of the body conduceth to the cleansing of the soul from evil affections, and the sanctity of the soul conduceth to the likeness of God." Hence they reckon this among the means to obtain eternal life, saying, Whosoever hath his seat in the land of Israel, and eateth his common food in cleanness, and speaks the holy language, and recites his philacteries morning and evening, let him be confident that he shall obtain the life of the world to come: and against this our Saviour teacheth, that to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man, because it defileth not the heart. Thus have you seen how the pharisees taught these commandments of men for doctrines, i. e. things necessary to be believed and done; and parts of God's worship; and so how free the ceremonies of the church of England must be from this guilt, they being reckoned not as necessary, but in themselves things indifferent; not used for sanctification, but only for order and decency; not reckoned as any parts, but only circumstances of worship. (See Bishop Sanderson's Serm. on Matt. xv. 9.)

[2] Ver. 4. Ὁ γὰρ Θεὸς ἐνετείλατο, λέγων, τίμα τὸν πατέρα σου καὶ τὴν μητέρα σου, καὶ ὁ κακολογῶν πατέρα, &c. For God commanded, saying, Honour thy father and thy mother; and he that curseth father or mother let him die the death.] Here observe,

First, That the commands of Moses are to be received as the commandments of God; for what is here God commanded, is Mark vii. 10. Moses commanded.

Secondly, That to honour parents is not only to reverence them, but to afford them all the necessaries of this present life, according to that of the Jerusalem Targum on Deut. xv. 4. "Honorare est viaticum providere," To honour is to make provisions for him. And, according to the Jewish canons, a son is bound to afford his father meat, drink, and clothes, to cover him, to lead him in and out, and to wash his hands, face, and feet. And, according to Hierocles,* he is to honour them σώματος ὑπηρεσίᾳ καὶ χρημάτων χορηγίᾳ, with the service of his body and his goods; and this, saith he, justice required him to do readily and bountifully. Philo† declares that παίδων ἴδιον οὐδὲν ὃ μὴ γονέων ἐστιν, children have nothing which is not their parents', as having either received it from them, or having received from them the faculties by which they procure it; that, therefore, they can never recompense them, and are both inhuman and ungodly if they neglect to succour them; and that the very heathens taught the same: and that this is the frequent import of the word τίμη, see note on 1 Tim. v. 3. 8.

Thirdly, That which we render curseth, is in the Greek κακολογεῖν, to slight, contemn, or set light by, father or mother. So Ezek. xxii. 7. Πατέρα καὶ μητέρα ἐκακολόγουν, they set light by father and mother; and that death should be the punishment of those who abused their parents, is suitable to the laws of heathens, τὸν ὑβρίζοντα τὸν αὐτοῦ πατέρα μὴ μετέχειν τῆς οὐσίας, that he who reviled his father should not live. (Sopater ad Hermogenem.)

[3] Ver. 5. Ὑμεῖς δὲ λέγετε· ὃς ἂν εἴπῃ τῷ πατρὶ ἢ τῇ μητρὶ, Δῶρον, ὃ ἐὰν ἐξ ἐμοῦ ὠφεληθῇς· But ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father or mother, It is a gift, by which thou mayest be profited by me, &c.] This phrase δῶρον, or corban, doth not import, that he who said this had consecrated his goods to sacred uses, or obliged himself to do so; but only that he had, according to the doctrine of the scribes, by vow, obliged himself not to give any thing to him, to whom he thus spake; for δῶρον ἔστω, is the same with קרבן among the Jews, which signifies a thing forbidden, and so imports, it is no less forbidden to give thee any thing of this, than if it were a corban, or any thing consecrated to God. So Maimonides‡ saith, "Sit mihi corban ista massa panis," i. e. Let it be as much forbidden as what is consecrated; let that mass of bread be to thee a sacred thing. So that whosoever said, Let it be corban, whereby I may be profitable to thee; they, by their theology, declared him bound by a vow not to relieve him, to whom he had said thus, though he was his father, unless they would absolve him from his vow: and by thus not suffering him to do any thing to his needy parents, by reason of this rash and wicked vow, they made the commandment of God void, and suffered them to slight and despise their parents, by their tradition. Note also that the following words running thus, Καὶ οὐ μὴ τιμήσῃ ἢ τὸν πατέρα αὐτοῦ, ἢ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ. Καὶ ἠκυρώσατε τὴν ἐντολὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ· the whole perhaps may be thus rendered, But ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father or mother, Let it be a gift by which thou mayest be profited by me, he shall not then honour his father and his mother; therefore you make void the commandment of God by your tradition, καὶ signifying both then and therefore. St. Mark adds, ver. 13. Καὶ παρόμοια πολλὰ τοιαῦτα ποιεῖτε, And many such-like things do ye. Thus Philo§ speaks of some, so κατὰ φύσιν ἄμικτοι καὶ ἀκοινώνητοι, unsociable and uncommunicable by nature, or so transported by anger, that ὅρκῳ τὴν ἀγριότητα πιστοῦνται τῶν ἠθῶν, they confirm their inhuman manners by an oath, saying, that they will not receive such a one to their table, or under their roof, ἢ πάλιν τῷ δεῖνι μὴ παρέξειν ὠφελείαν τίνα, or that they will afford no help to such a one. And Dr. Pocock‖ saith, they have a canon to this effect, "Vota cadere in res mandati," That vows reach even to things commanded, or take place as well in things required by the law, as things indifferent: and that a man may be so bound by them, as that he cannot without great sin do what God had by his law required to be done. So that if he made a vow, which laid upon him a necessity to violate God's law, that he might observe it, his vow must stand, and the law be abrogated.

[4] Ver. 7. Ὑποκριταὶ, Ye hypocrites.] Our Lord here, and elsewhere, calls the pharisees hypocrites, not only because they placed the worship of God, and great sanctity, and religion, in ceremonies of human invention, and, pretending to a regard to purity and religion, did nothing out of pure respect to God's glory, but did all their works to be seen of men, (Matt. xxiii. 5.) and to procure glory from them; (Matt. vi. 2.) but also because, being so superstitiously careful to avoid the outward pollution of the body, by abstaining from touching any thing that was unclean, and washing their hands when they thought they might have done it, and even their pots, and cups, and beds; they left that which was within, viz. their hearts, full of hypocrisy and iniquity, uncleanness, extortion, and excess. (Matt. xxiii. 25—27. Luke xi. 39.) Only here note, that we must not be forward, from Christ's example, to pronounce men hypocrites; because we have neither that authority, nor knowledge of the heart, which he had to authorize us so to do.

[5] Καλῶς προεφήτευσε, &c. Well prophesied Esaias of you.] See note on Mark vii. 6.

[6] Ver. 9. Μάτην δὲ σέβονταί με, διδάσκοντες διδασκαλίας, ἐντάλματα ἀνθρώπων· But in vain do they worship me, teaching for (or as) doctrines the commandments of men.] The commandments of men here are things enjoined by mere human authority, as is plain from these words of St. Paul, Col. ii. 21, 22. Touch not, taste not, handle not, which are all ἐντάλματα ἀνθρώπων, the commandments of men: though they come from their cochmim, or wise men, though they be the traditions of the elders or governors of the church, (ver. 2.) though they come from those scribes and pharisees which sat in the chair of Moses; (Matt. xxiii. 2.) yet, without a Divine institution, they are only the commandments of men. To teach these commandments of men as doctrines, is to enjoin them, or impose them on the consciences of others, as things necessary, or things to be observed for their goodness; as the pharisees did this washing of hands, counting those sinful and defiled who neglected so to do; and as parts of God's worship, for otherwise they could not strictly and properly be said to worship God in vain, by teaching and observing these things. Seeing then it is certain, that the Romanists have many ecclesiastical constitutions in which they place great sanctity, and which they judge necessary to be observed, and that as parts of religious worship, which yet are only the traditions of their elders, or of those who sit in St. Peter's chair, as did the scribes and pharisees in that of Moses, and which do also make void the commandments of God; as doth the doctrine of the worship of images, communion in one kind, and prayer in an unknown tongue; in vain must they also worship God, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.

[7] Ver. 10. Καὶ προσκαλεσάμενος τὸν ὄχλον· And calling the multitude, he said unto them all, Hear, and understand.] From these words, spoken to all the multitude, and the words, Mark vii. 16. spoken to the same persons, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear; it is evident, that in our Lord's judgment, the whole multitude was capable of understanding those things which the pharisees did not, and by which the traditions of the scribes, pharisees, and elders, were overthrown; and that for this, nothing more was requisite, than ears to hear, or good attention to Christ's sayings. Moreover, if these things, parabolically spoken, could and ought to be understood by the multitude; as, from this exhortation to the multitude, and the reproof of Christ's disciples for not apprehending this, is manifest; much more must those things which concern their duty, and are delivered plainly, be easy to be understood by them. And from those words, they are blind guides, and if the blind lead the blind, they will both fall into the ditch; it follows, that sometimes the multitude neither ought, nor can, without their utmost peril, follow the guidance of their ecclesiastical superiors.

[8] Ver. 11. Οὐ τὸ εἰσερχόμενον εἰς τὸ στόμα κοινοῖ τὸν ἄνθρωπον· That which goeth into the mouth polluteth not the man; i. e. by touching him.] i. e. The man is not unclean in God's sight, because such meat or drink hath touched him, and so he needed not to be washed from that defilement. If it defile at all, it doth it either from the quality, as being by God forbidden, and so the disobedience; or from the quantity, and so the excess defiles. Whence, by the rule of contraries, it follows, that nothing can sanctify by being touched, which confounds all worship of relics; and that nothing by entering into the mouth can make us holy, that is, more pure or acceptable in the sight of God; and so the sacramental elements do not sanctify the body, by the touch, but the soul only, by the due disposition of mind, with which we receive them, because they go not into the heart, they operate not upon the spirit of man. Christ himself, whilst he was upon earth, made many whole, as to their bodies, by touching them; and many, by virtue of their faith, were healed by touching him; but we read of none, whose minds or hearts were sanctified only by touching of his sacred body. Ceremonial and Judaical sanctity sometimes required freedom from touching a polluted body, ὁσιότης τῆς ἀληθείας, Christian holiness is the work only of the spirit, and consists wholly in the renewal of the mind, and of the bent and inclinations of the heart, and so ariseth not from the corporeal, but the spiritual manducation of the sacred elements; and were it otherwise, why would not the sacrament sanctify, as well by being received into the hand, or laid upon the breast, as by being put into the mouth? or, why should it more sanctify the heart it comes not to, than the draught through which even by the confession of the Romanists* it sometimes goes, as in case of a lientery? This doctrine is expressly taught by Origen† in these words, Τὸ ἁγιαζομένον διὰ λόγου Θεοῦ καὶ ἐντεύξεως οὐ τῷ ἰδίῳ λόγῳ ἁγάζει τὸν χρώμενον, That which is sanctified by the word of God and prayer, sanctifies not him that useth it on its own account, for then it would sanctify him that receives it unworthily; nor would any upon that account be sick, weak, or fall asleep, as St. Paul saith some did. (1 Cor. xi. 30.) Καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἄρτου τοίνυν τοῦ Κυρίου ἡ ὠφελεία τῷ χρωμένῳ ἐστὶν, ἐπὰν ἀμιαντῷ τῷ νῷ καὶ καθαρᾷ τῇ συνειδήσει μεταλαμβάνει τοῦ ἄρτου· and so in the receiving the Lord's body, the profit ariseth by receiving the bread with a mind undefiled, and a pure conscience; καὶ τὸ ἁγιαζόμενον βρῶμα διὰ λόγου Θεοῦ καὶ ἐντεύξεως, κατ' αὐτὸ μὲν τὸ ὑλικὸν εἰς τὴν κοιλίαν χωρεῖ, καὶ εἰς ἀφεδρῶνα ἐκβάλλεται, and so the meat santified by the word of God and prayer, according to its material part, goes into the belly, and is cast out into the draught. And here it is to be wondered, that the learned Huetius* should say, this is to be understood, "de solis speciebus sive accidentibus," only of the accidents inhering in the substance of the bread, for, if the substance of the bread remains after consecration, then transubstantiation is by him denied; if it be annihilated, how can the accidents inhere in that which is not? Moreover, can the mere accidents be truly βρῶμα, meat? Are they the bread consecrated by the word and prayer, or that which may be eaten unworthily? Are they ὕλη τοῦ ἄρτου, the substance of the bread, or σῶμα τυπικὸν καὶ συμβολικὸν, Christ's typical body? Let Huetius shew one instance from primitive antiquity, where mere accidents are so called, or confess he wrests these words to a sense of which Origen never thought.

[9] Ver. 12. Οἱ φαρισαῖοι ἀκούσαντες τὸν λόγον ἐσκανδαλίσθησαν· The pharisees hearing this word were scandalized.] i. e. They were induced by it, not to reject their own, but Christ's doctrine, and to deny him to be the true Messiah: and this scandal seems to have had its rise from a false opinion which obtained among them, that the meats forbidden them by the law of Moses were therefore forbidden, because, as Maimonides† saith, "alimentum habent vitiosum," they yield a vicious or corrupt nourishment; or, as Josephus‡ saith, because the things they were permitted to eat, were τὰ μὲν οἰκειωθησόμενα ἡμῶν ταῖς ψυχαῖς, accommodated to, or convenient for, their souls; but the things forbidden, were τὰ ἐναντιωθησόμενα, contrary to them; and they by eating them did μιαροφαγεῖν, eat that which defiled the soul: they therefore were scandalized at our Saviour's doctrine, because they judged it contrary to the law. (See the note on Matt. xviii. 6.)

[10] Ver. 13. But he answered and said, Πᾶσα φυτεία, Every (nursery of) plant (s) which my Father hath not planted, shall be rooted out.] That is, saith Theophylact, Τὰς τῶν πρεσβυτέρων παραδόσεις, καὶ τὰ Ἰουδάϊκα ἐντάλματα λέγει ἐκριζωθῆναι, He speaks of the extirpation of the traditions of the elders, and the judicial precepts; and this is certainly true of those commandments of men: but the context inclines us to interpret this of the hypocritical sect of the pharisees, for they are the persons scandalized, ver. 12. and the blind guides, ver. 14. and therefore are in likelihood the φυτεία, or plantation, mentioned in this verse. For though I find them in the chair of Moses, (Matt. xxiii. 2.) I find not that they had any Divine commission to be teachers of the people; though what they or any man truly taught from Moses was to be observed. Our Saviour seems rather to compare them to thieves or robbers, John x. 1. (See the note there.) And whatever might be their first institution, they were so degenerated from it into blind and pernicious guides, as not to be of God's planting; and therefore to be rooted out.

Every plant, which my Father hath not planted, shall be rooted out. Hence some infer, saith Jerome, that the plant which God hath planted cannot be rooted up: but let them hear, saith he, the words of the prophet, speaking thus in the name of God; (Jer. ii. 21.) I had planted thee a true vine: how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine? "Plantavit quidem Deus, et nemo potest eradicare plantationem ejus, sed quoniam ista plantatio, in voluntate proprii arbitrii est, nullus alius eam eradicare poterit, nisi ipsa præbuerit assensum:" God plants, and no other man can root up his plantation; but this plantation being in the free-will of man, he himself can do it.

Dr. Mills, in this chapter, rejects the text in four places, without just ground, and against plain evidence for the reading of the text; v. g. in those words, ver. 4. τίμα τὸν πατέρα σου, he saith, σου is wanting in many MSS. in Irenæus, and Chrysostom; but it is in Origen, on Matt. p. 244. and in Theophylact, in the Syriac, and Arabic: and though it be wanting in the Latin Irenæus, as being not in the Vulgar; yet Chrysostom saith expressly there, τίμα γὰρ, φήσι, τὸν πατέρα σου, and the words following, καὶ μὴ τιμήσῃ τὸν πατέρα αὐτοῦ, shew that σού is to be retained; nor can the words bind us to honour any other father save our own. 2. Whereas, ver. 8. the text saith, ἐγγίζει μοὶ ὁ λαὸς οὗτος τῷ στόματι αὐτῶν, καὶ τοῖς χείλεσί με τιμᾷ· the genuine reading, saith the doctor, both here and in Isaiah, Cod. Alex. and March. is this, ὁ λαὸς οὗτος χείλεσί με τιμᾷ! But Origen,* after all his labours about the Septuagint, knew of no such reading, either here or in Isaiah; for in his commentary on these words of St. Matthew, he teacheth, that our Lord being willing to destroy all the traditions of the pharisees, by a testimony from the prophets, λόγον παρέθετο ῥητὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἰσαίου ὅσπερ αὐταῖς λέξεσιν οὕτως ἔχει, καὶ εἶπε ὁ Κύριος, ἐγγίζει μοὶ ὁ λαὸς οὗτος ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτῶν, καὶ τὰ ἑξῆς· he produces a passage spoken by Isaiah which occurs there in these very words, ἐγγίζει μοὶ· &c. And indeed these words are found there both in the Hebrew and the Septuagint; and so our Saviour here producing them from thence thus, well said Isaiah prophesying of you, λέγων, saying, doubtless produced his words as he found them there. 3. On these words, ver. 26. οὐκ ἐστὶ καλὸν· Καλὸν, saith he, is added to the text; and yet it is found in Chrysostom, St. Jerome, Theophylact, the Vulgar, Syriac and Arabic. 4. Ver. 30. he rejects κωφοὺς, and ver. 31. κυλλοὺς ὑγιεῖς, as additions to the text, against the evidence of the words: for if κωφοὺς were not in the thirtieth verse, how comes κωφοὺς λαλοῦντας into ver. 31? and if κυλλοὺς be the true reading ver. 30. κυλλοὺς ὑγιεῖς must answer to it, ver. 31.

[11] Ver. 14. Ἄφετε αὐτοὺς, Let them alone.] Regard not what they say, or do, against me or my doctrine, seeing they say and do it out of the blindness of their minds. Hence observe,

First, That the scandal of wicked and perverse men is only to be avoided, as that we do not cease to do our duty, or as to refuse their pernicious doctrines and destructive courses.

Secondly, That sometimes the vulgar are obliged not to believe or comply with the rules of their ecclesiastical superiors; because it is their duty never to follow them into the ditch.

[12] Ver. 16. Ἀκμὴν καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀσύνετοί ἐστε; Are ye also still without understanding?] That therefore this parable was not understood by them, must be ascribed not to the obscurity of it, but to the prejudices and slowness of understanding that were in his disciples.

[13] Ver. 18. Τὰ δὲ ἐκπορευόμενα—ἐκ τῆς καρδίας κοινοῖ τὸν ἄνθρωπον· But the things that come—out of the heart, they defile the man.] See note on Mark vii. 20, 21.

[14] Ver. 22. Καὶ ἰδοὺ, γυνὴ Καναναία· And, behold, a woman of Canaan; Mark vii. 26. γυνὴ ἑλληνὶς καὶ Συροφοίνισσα, a gentile Syrophœnician.] The same person, who is called one of Canaan in the Hebrew, is in the Septuagint a Phœnician. So Exod. vi. 15. we read of Shaul the son of a Canaanitish woman; LXX. Σαοὺλ ὁ ἐκ τῆς Φοινίσσης· Gen. xlvi. 10. τῆς Κανανίτιδος· Exod. xvi. 35. they came unto the borders of the land of Canaan; LXX. εἰς μέρος τῆς Φοινίκης· Josh. v. 12. they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan, ἐκαρπίσαντο δὲ τὴν χώραν τῆς Φοινίκης. Now seeing Pliny * doth inform us, "Syriâ circumfundi Phœnicem," that Phœnicia is comprehended in Syria, the Phœnician woman must be a Syrophœnician woman; and Phœnicia being also Canaan, (Bochart. Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 34. 36.) she must be a Canaanitish woman. (See the note of Dr. Hammond here.)

[15] Ver. 24. Οὐκ ἀπεστάλην· I was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.] By the lost sheep of Israel, we are to understand the whole nation of the Jews, who being as sheep dispersed, having no shepherd, are therefore called lost sheep, Matt. ix. 36. x. 6. To them the Messias was first promised, to them he first came. (John i. 11.) He is styled a minister of the circumcision, Rom. xv. 8. and was first to be preached to the Jews. (Acts xiii. 46.)

[16] Ver. 26. It is not meet to take the children's bread, καὶ βαλεῖν τοῖς κυναρίοις, and to cast it to dogs.] He calls them dogs, saith Theophylact, διὰ τοὺς ἐθνικοὺς ἀκάθαρτον βίον ἔχειν, because the gentiles led an impure life, and were conversant about the blood of things offered to idols; or perhaps he doth so far comply with the language of the Jews, as to call this woman dog, because he is here representing of a Jew, or a pharisee: (1.) not vouchsafing her one word of answer; because they thought such persons wholly neglected by God, and unworthy to be regarded by them: and (2.) calling her dog, according to the common saying of the Jews, that the nations of the world were likened to dogs, whereas they were God's sons and daughters. (See the note on Luke xv. 1, 2. and on Phil. iii. 2.)

[17] Ver. 27. Ἡ δὲ εἶπε, ναὶ Κύριε· But she said, I beseech thee, Lord.] The word ναὶ, as the Hebrew נָא, imports beseeching; as they say, nay, is not put, but in the way of petition: so Gen. xviii. 30. 32. I pray thee, let not my Lord be angry; Gen. xix. 7. אַל נָא I pray you, brethren, do not so wickedly; Numb. xii. 13. יִרְפָּאנָא לָהּ, I pray thee, heal her; Philem. 20. ναὶ ἄδελφε, I pray thee, brother: so also is it used in profane authors: so Aristophanes,† ναὶ πρὸς τῶν θεῶν· I pray thee, by the gods; so Euripides,‡ ναὶ πρὸς σῆς τῆς δεξίας εὐωλένου, I pray thee, by that fair right hand.

[18] Ver. 28. Μεγάλη σου ἡ πίστις· Great is thy faith.] That having no promise to rely upon, and suffering so many repulses with such seeming contempt, thou still retainest a good hope of my kindness and mercy, great is thy faith. The faith of those who firmly rely upon God's promise, and are not by great temptations and afflictions moved from their confidence, is praiseworthy; but highly excellent is their faith, who, depending only on his goodness, do place an humble confidence in God: whence we may learn, that the faith of gentiles is not only pleasing to God, but sometimes more excellent than that of those to whom the promises belong; viz. when upon a lesser motive it brings forth equal fruits.

[19] Ver. 39. Καὶ ἦλθεν εἰς τὰ ὅρια Μαγδαλὰ. He came into the coasts of Magdala.] Mark viii. 10. into the parts of Dalmanutha, which was, saith Dr. Lightfoot, a particular place within the bounds of Magdala. (Choregraph. Decad. on Mark v.)

CHAP. XVI.

1. THE pharisees also with the sadducees came (Gr. and the pharisees and sadducees coming), and [1] tempting (him) desired him that (Gr. they tempting him, desired that) he would shew them a sign from heaven.

2. He answered and (Gr. but he answering) said unto them, When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather; for the sky is red (and bright without clouds):

3. And in the morning (ye say), It will be foul weather to-day: for the sky is red and lowering; (the clouds obstructing the brightness of the sun). O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky (have skill enough to discern what kind of weather it is like to be, by what at present ye observe in the colour of the sky); but can ye not discern (can ye not then discern) [2] the signs of the times? (Can you not discern from the heavenly doctrine which I preach, and the mighty miracles by which I confirm it, the sign of the Son of man coming among you? it is a sure sign of your hypocrisy, that after all this, you are still doubting of it, and requiring farther signs to confirm this. I therefore say to you, not without grief of spirit for your unbelief, Mark viii. 12. that)

4. A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no (farther) sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas (for as his being preserved three days in the whale's belly, and then cast out safe on the dry land, was a sign of his being a true prophet, sent to preach to Nineveh, and call them to repentance; so my being buried three days in the earth, and then rising up thence, shall be to you a sign that I am also a prophet, sent from God to call you to repentance). And (having said this) he left them, and (going in a ship to the other side of the sea, Mark viii. 13. he) departed (from them).

5. And when his disciples were come (to him) to the other side, they had forgotten to take bread, (having but one loaf with them in the ship, Mark viii. 14.)

6. Then Jesus said unto them, Take heed, and [3] beware of the leaven of the pharisees and of the sadducees (i. e. of their doctrines and manners, which swell and sour its disciples, as leaven doth the bread with which it is mixed).

7. And they reasoned among themselves, saying, (He speaks thus to us) because we have taken no bread with us.

* Lib. v. cap. 12.
† Num. act. 2. §. 1. p. 167.
‡ Hip. V. 605.

8. Which when Jesus perceived, he said unto them, O ye of little faith, why reason ye (thus) among yourselves, (as if ye were like to famish) because ye have brought no bread (and are bid to beware of the leaven of the pharisees)?

9. Do ye not understand (nor consider), neither remember the five loaves (which fed the number) of five thousand, and how many baskets ye took up (even twelve)?

10. Neither the seven loaves (which fed the number) of four thousand, and how many baskets ye took up? (even seven: have you your hearts yet hardened? having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? Mark viii. 17, 18. If it be otherwise,)

11. How is it that ye do not understand that I spake not (this) to you concerning bread, that ye should beware of the leaven of the pharisees and of the sadducees? (as knowing by these instances, I cannot be unable to provide bread for myself and you, and therefore could not upon that account speak of bread.)

12. Then understood they how that he bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the pharisees and of the sadducees.

13. When Jesus came (with his disciples, Mark viii. 27.) into the coasts of Cæsarea Philippi, he asked his disciples, (being alone with them, Luke ix. 18.) saying, [4] Whom do men say that I the Son of man am?

14. And they said, Some say that thou art [5] John the Baptist (risen from the dead); some, (that thou art) Elias (the forerunner of the Messiah); and others, (that thou art) Jeremias, or one of the prophets (they thinking none alive holy enough to be a prophet sent from God).

15. He saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am?

16. And Simon Peter answered and said, [6] Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.

17. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar (Heb. the son of) Jona: for [7] flesh and blood hath not revealed it (this) unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven (this faith thou couldest not learn from the testimony of man, but only from Divine testimony, that of my doctrine, and my miracles, which the Father that is in me enables me to teach and do).

18. And (as a suitable return to this confession), I say also unto thee, That thou art (by name) [8] Peter (that is, a rock), and upon (thee who art) this rock I will build my church; (laying the first foundation of it upon thy preaching to the Jews, Acts ii. 41. 47. and to the gentiles, Acts x. 5. 44. 48. xv. 7.) and the [9] gates of hell (i. e. death itself) shall not prevail against it, (so as to hinder that resurrection to eternal life, which I have promised to those that believe in my name, John vi. 39, 40. 44. 54.)

19. [10] And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven (the power of making laws to govern my church): and whatsoever thou (assisted by my Spirit) shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven (i. e. thy doctrine taught by that Spirit concerning things required, forbidden, or allowed to Christians, shall be confirmed there).

20. [11] Then charged he his disciples that they should tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ, (till after his resurrection, chap. xvii.)

21. [12] From that time forth (that they might not be shaken in this faith, by what should afterward befal him), began Jesus to shew to his disciples, how that he (the Son of man) must go to Jerusalem, and suffer many things (and be rejected) of the elders, and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and (notwithstanding that, he should by God) be raised again the third day; (and this he said to them openly, Mark viii. 32.)

22. Then Peter took him, and began to rebuke him, saying, [13] Be it far from thee, Lord: this shall not be unto thee.

23. But he turned, and (looking on his disciples, Mark viii. 33.) said to Peter, [14] Get thee behind me, Satan (thou who art to me a tempter, and to the good of men an adversary): thou art an offence to me (as being a solicitor to me to disobey the will of my Father): for thou (in this) savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men (regarding more what is pleasing to men than God).

24. Then said Jesus to his disciples, (and to the multitude, Mark viii. 34.) [15] If any man will come after me, let him (resolve upon it that it will be necessary for him to) deny himself, and take up his cross (daily, Luke ix. 23.) and (so only will be prepared to) follow me.

25. [16] For whosoever will (choose rather to) save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will (be ready to) lose his life for my sake (and the gospel's, Mark viii. 35.) shall find it, (either graciously preserved here, or improved into life eternal.

26. And this it behoveth all to do,) For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul (or life)? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

27. [17] For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his (holy) angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works (being ashamed of, or not owning them who are ashamed of him, or of his words, in this wicked and adulterous generation, Mark viii. 38. but rewarding them who profess him, and adhere to his doctrine).

28. [18] Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here who shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom (or, the kingdom of God coming with power, Mark viii. 39. and the Son of man giving a plain experiment of his intended future judgment, by the severe punishment he will execute upon the unbelieving and disobedient Jews of this age).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XVI.

[1] Ver. 1. Πειράζοντες αὐτὸν, Tempting him.] i. e. Making trial whether he was able to do this, or not; or doubting whether he could shew such a sign as the Son of man, according to Daniel, was to do. (See the note on Matt. iv. 7. xii. 38.) And because they came to him with an appearance of their willingness to be convinced that he was the Messiah, could they see proofs sufficient of it; whereas they had already resisted the clearest evidence that he was the Christ, and so indeed came not to be convinced that he was so, but hoping he would fail in the attempt, and so appear not to be so, therefore Christ calls them both hypocrites.

[2] Ver. 3. Σημεῖα τῶν καιρῶν· The signs of the times.]

That is, say Grotius and the Syriac, the signs of these times; but this seems needless, οἱ καιροὶ, the times or seasons, both in the Old and New Testament, signifying set times and seasons, appointed by God; and those were either ordinary and stated times, as when the luminaries of heaven are said to be appointed εἰς σημεῖα καὶ καιροὺς, for signs and for seasons, (Gen. i. 14. Psal. civ. 19.) and God is said to have given to the heathens, προτεταγμένους καιροὺς, the seasons appointed from the beginning of the world; (Acts xvii. 26.) or extraordinary seasons, in which God had determined to visit his people, either in mercy or in judgment; so καιρὸς and καιροῦ πέρας, time and the period of time, are often used in Daniel, vii. 22. viii. 19. xi. 27. 29. In the New Testament, Christ is thus said to come in the fulness of time, and in the dispensation τοῦ πληρώματος τῶν καιρῶν, of the fulness of times; (Eph. i. 10.) and at his advent the phrase runs thus, πεπλήρωται ὁ καιρὸς, the time is fulfilled: (Mark i. 15.) so when Christ's apostles ask, Wilt thou now restore the kingdom to Israel? Christ answers, It is not for you to know χρόνους ἢ καιροὺς, the times or seasons. (Acts i. 17.) In this sense the apostle saith to the Thessalonians, It is not needful to write to you περὶ τῶν χρόνων καὶ καιρῶν, of the times and seasons: (1 Thess. v. 1.) in this sense it is said of Christ's signal coming to destroy Jerusalem, ὁ καιρὸς, the time is near. (Luke xxi. 8. 24.) Now all such seasons had their prognostics, which are here styled the signs of the times.

Ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times? Here Jerome again saith, Hoc in plerisque codicibus non habetur; whereas, though the word hypocrites be wanting in Chrysostom and the Vulgar, and some versions, yet the sentence is in all the Greek scholiasts, and in all the versions; so little reason have we to depend upon his testimony here. Moreover, the word hypocrites is in Theophylact, the Syriac, and Arabic, and in the parallel place, Luke xii. 56. and so was certainly the word used by Christ, since otherwise St. Luke must have added to his words.

[3] Ver. 6. Προσέχετε ἀπὸ τῆς ζύμης τῶν φαρισαίων καὶ σαδδουκαίων· Beware of the leaven of the pharisees and of the sadducees.] Mark viii. 15. And of Herod. (See the note there.) This leaven is ver. 12. interpreted to be the doctrine of those sects, as διδαχὴ imports both doctrines to be believed, and traditions or ordinances to be received from them; and so it is a caution to avoid the precepts of those men, who place the sum of their religion and worship in outward performances, which avail nothing to the sanctification of the soul: and such were the traditions of the scribes and pharisees; and also such doctrines as tended to subvert religion, by cutting off all hopes of future blessings after this life, and turning the kingdom of God into an earthly and a worldly kingdom, as did the doctrines of the sadducees. Dr. Lightfoot saith, that leaven in the notion of the Jews did seldom signify doctrines, but generally affections, and pravity of heart, which signification also it generally bears in Scripture; sometimes relating to hypocrisy, as in a like place, Luke xii. 1. Beware of the leaven of the pharisees, which is hypocrisy; and sometimes to the leaven of malice and wickedness, opposed to sincerity and truth. (1 Cor. v. 8.) This being fitly compared to leaven, because it puffeth up our spirits, and sours our tempers. (See note on 1 Cor. v. 8.)

[4] Ver. 13. Τίνα με λέγουσιν οἱ ἄνθρωποι εἶναι τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου; Whom do men say that I the Son of man am?] Some look upon these words, τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, the Son of man, as a gloss crept into the text, but it is read by Irenæus, lib. iii. 20. by Epiphanius, by Chrysostom, St. Jerome, Theophylact, and all the versions, and therefore it is unreasonably questioned; others look upon these words as of no special signification, because not mentioned by St. Mark or Luke, the first saying only, Whom do men say? (viii. 27.) the other, Whom do the people say that I am? (ix. 18.) As if I should say, the words given, Luke xiv. 19. or broken, 1 Cor. xi. 23, 24. were of no special signification, because they are not mentioned by the evangelists St. Matthew and St. Mark. (Matt. xxvi. 26. Mark xiv. 22.) Dr. Lightfoot's conjecture is, that Christ here inquires not barely whether the people thought him the Christ, but what kind of person they thought him to be, the Jews then doubting of his original, who was to be the Messiah, and whether he was to come from the living or the dead. And evident it is, that the word τίνα often relates to the quality. So John viii. 53. τίνα, whom makest thou thyself? 1 Sam. xvii. 55. כֶּן מִי the son of what kind of person is this youth? and thus it may retain its usual import.

[5] Ver. 14. Οἱ μὲν Ἰωάννην τὸν Βαπτίστην, ἄλλοι δὲ Ἠλίαν, ἕτεροι δὲ Ἰερεμίαν, &c. Some John the Baptist; others, Elias; others, Jeremias, or one of the prophets.] Perhaps they who held Christ to be Elias, did not think him the promised Messiah, but only his forerunner; this being the received opinion of the whole nation, that Elias was to come before the Messiah, and to anoint him when he came. They who thought he was John the Baptist risen from the dead, speak suitably to the opinion of the pharisees, who, saith Josephus,* held there was for good men, ῥαστώνη τοῦ ἀναβιοῦν, an easy return to life again: that he was Jeremias, or one of the prophets, was the consequent of an opinion that prevailed in that nation, that the Messias was to come not from the living, but from the dead, they thinking none of that age of piety sufficient to bear him, and thinking that the resurrection was to begin with his kingdom, might easily be induced to think, he should be one that should rise from the dead. And then God having said peculiarly of Jeremiah, Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee, and before thou camest out of the womb I sanctified, and ordained thee a prophet to the nations, i. 5. and ver. 10. See, I have set thee over the nations, and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to plant, and to build; and this being, in their opinion, the great business of the king Messiah, to pull down all the nations that ruled over them, and make them tributaries and servants to the Jews; for this cause might they pitch on him as the fittest person to be their Messiah. And then in these words, I see no footsteps of a metempsychosis, but only of a resurrection, according to those words of St. Luke, (ix. 19.) Others say, that one of the old prophets was risen again.

[6] Ver. 16. Σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστὸς, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ ζῶντος, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.] Here let it be noted,

First, That what Peter here professeth, was before the faith, and the acknowledgment of all Christ's disciples; for they coming out of the ship, said, ἀληθῶς Θεοῦ υἱὸς εἶ, Truly

* Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2.

thou art the Son of God. (Matt. xiv. 33.) And therefore Peter himself saith of them, as well as of himself, We know and have believed that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God. (John vi. 69.)

Secondly, But whereas some conclude, that these words, the Son of the living God, signify nothing more than the Messiah; because St. Mark relates the answer of Peter thus, Thou art the Christ of God; and what in St. Matthew (xxvi. 63.) runs thus, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the living God? is in St. Luke, (xxii. 67.) Art thou the Christ? I own that hence it may be gathered, that he that was the Christ, was also the Son of God; but yet I think there is this difference betwixt the two phrases, that the one respects his office, the other his original; though perhaps neither Nathanael, (John i. 50.) nor the other Jews, nor the apostles, used it in that sublime sense in which the Christians did afterward take it.

[7] Ver. 17. Σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα οὐκ ἀπεκάλυψέ σοι. Flesh and blood hath not revealed this to thee, but my Father which is in heaven.] That flesh and blood, both in the Scripture and the Jewish writers, constantly signifies man, as being compounded of flesh and blood, see the note on Gal. i. 16. So that the import of the words is this, What others say of me, thou hast learnt from men, but this faith thou hast professed concerning me, though it required in thee an attention, or a due consideration of, and an assent to the proofs given of it, yet these proofs being the doctrine taught from God, and the miracles wrought in confirmation of it, being wrought by the finger of God, the faith itself must be acknowledged to be the result, not of human industry or wisdom, but of Divine revelation; and in learning of it thou must be said to be θεοδίδακτος, taught of God; the doctrine believed being the words of God, and the miracles which confirm it being wrought by the power of God. They who carry this higher, and say that Peter had a peculiar revelation of this matter, not vouchsafed to any others, and that without this he could not have owned and embraced Christ, as the Son of God, must not only suppose the like special revelation given to Nathanael, contrary to our Lord's own words, (John i. 50.) Because I said, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? and to the centurion, who, seeing the earthquake, and the things which were done when Jesus gave up the ghost, said, Truly this was the Son of God, (Matt. xxvii. 54.) and to all others who had the same faith; but must excuse all those Jews who did not believe this, it being not in their power to do so, for want of this peculiar revelation; whereas our Saviour still appeals to the works that he had done among them, as to sufficient testimonies that he was the Christ, the Son of God; (John v. 36, 37. viii. 18. x. 25. 38. xiv. 11.) and also saith, Except ye believe that I am he, ye shall die in your sins. (John viii. 24.)

[8] Ver. 18. Κἀγὼ δὲ σοὶ λέγω, ὅτι σὺ εἶ Πέτρος· And I say unto thee, Thou art Peter.] Here note,

That in these words, our Lord doth speak not in the general to his apostles, but in particular to Peter; and that that promise was made particularly to him, seems evident from these considerations;

First, That the text informs, that Simon Peter, Simon the son of Jona, made that confession, which gave occasion to these words, and that our Lord εἶπεν αὐτῷ, did answer him as followeth: as if he should have said, As thou Peter hast said of me, that I am Christ, so say I now of thee, that thou art Peter; if therefore of the rest of the apostles it cannot properly be said, thou art Peter, much less that they were sons of Jona, our Lord must speak only to him who properly was so: and if the text saith expressly, that our Lord spake to him, and doth not mention any others that were spoken to, it is a plain addition to the text to say, that our Lord equally did speak to others. Moreover, when our Lord put the question to them all, Whom do men say that I am? and they in general replied, Some thought that he was John the Baptist, some said he was Elias, some Jeremias, or one of the prophets; our Lord inquires farther, ὑμεῖς δὲ, Whom do you apostles say I am? Now to this question, had they continued all to answer, as some imagine they in the person of St. Peter did; why is it not said as before, οἱ δὲ εἶπον, they said, but only St. Peter answered? Why doth not Christ continue, as before, to speak to them in the plural number, but so peculiarly direct his speech to the son of Jona?

Secondly, Moreover, that Christ here promised to build his church upon St. Peter, seems farther evident; because these words contain a manifest allusion to the name of Peter, and to that Syriac name of Cephas, which our Lord had given him, both which do signify a rock or stone; as if our Lord had said, Thou art by name a rock, and suitable to that name shall be thy work and office; for upon thee, i. e. upon thy preaching, as upon a rock, shall the foundation of my church be laid: now the whole grace of this allusion is entirely lost, unless we do expound this passage of St. Peter's person, and not of his confession, or the object of it. As therefore when God said to Abraham, Thy name shall be called Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee: (Gen. xvii. 5.) and to Jacob, Thy name shall be called Israel; for as a prince thou hast prevailed with God and men: (Gen. xxxii. 28.) the following words are still the reason of the name: so may it rationally be conceived, that when Christ said to the son of Jona, Thou art Peter, the following words, which are joined to them with a conjunction copulative, and on this rock will I build my church, contain the reason of that appellation.

Thirdly, The demonstrative article this, contained in the words this rock, doth plainly intimate, that our Lord promised to build his church upon that rock he had now mentioned; now of what rock did he make mention in any other words than the foregoing? Thou art Peter; i. e. thy name doth signify a rock.

Fourthly, It cannot rationally be doubted but that our Lord intended to say something singular to Peter, as the reward of his so singular confession, if we consider either the words preceding, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee; or the immediate preface of them, κἀγώ δε σοι λέγω, And I do also say to thee, That thou art Peter; but had Christ spoken not of St. Peter, whom he had formerly called Cephas, when he made mention of the rock on which he did intend to build his church, but either of himself or the confession of St. Peter, he had said nothing singular concerning this apostle; Christ's building of his church upon himself, or on this truth, that he was the Messiah, or the Son of God, being no singular reward of Peter.

Lastly, When our Lord adds in the ensuing words, And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; i. e. I will cause thee first to open the kingdom of heaven by preaching to the Jews and gentiles, and laying the foundation of a church among them; it is evident by the connexion of the words he speaks to Peter. When therefore he had said in the foregoing words, upon this rock I will build my church, why should we not conceive he speaks of the same person? But then also let it be noted, that by this explication of the words which I contend for, all the pretences of the pope of Rome, to be successor of St. Peter, are not established, but most effectually overthrown; as will be evident, if we consider the promise, that our Lord would build his church upon him, and how that promise was fulfilled.

First, Then, observe that our Lord speaks here of his church, not as a thing in present being, or as a building now erected, but as hereafter to be raised, and therefore doth not say, οἰκοδομῶ, I build at present, but οἰκοδομήσω, upon this rock I will hereafter build my church, the Christian church commencing after our Saviour's resurrection and ascension; of such a church to be hereafter founded by St. Peter's preaching to the Jew and gentile, and the baptizing of men converted by his preaching, our Lord here plainly speaketh in this text. If then the pope would be St. Peter's successor in this affair, he must not sit at Rome lording it over God's heritage, but must in person go to the unbelieving Jews and heathen world, as Peter did, and labour by his preaching to convert the Turk, the Jew, the infidel; and when he had so done, and settled Christian churches there among them, he may then have a better title to be St. Peter's successor than now he hath.

Secondly, Observe this promise punctually was fulfilled, by our Lord's using St. Peter's ministry, in laying the foundation of a Christian church among the Jews and gentiles, and in his being the first preacher to them of that faith which he doth here confess, and making the first proselytes to it; we therefore, suitably to this promise, find that Peter laid the first foundations of a church among the Jews, by the conversion of three thousand souls, (Acts ii. 41.) who, when they gladly had embraced St. Peter's doctrine, were all baptized, and then we first find mention of a Christian church in these words, And the Lord added daily to the church such as should be saved, (ver. 47.) And the same apostle laid the first foundation of a church among the gentiles, by the conversion of Cornelius and his friends. (Acts x.) For though we read before of persons in Samaria converted and baptized by Philip the evangelist, he being one of them who were dispersed through the regions of Judea and Samaria, upon the persecution that arose concerning Stephen, yet doth the Holy Ghost inform us, that they who were thus scattered preached the word to none, but only to the Jews; (Acts xi. 19.) nor could they, suitably to their avowed principles, do otherwise, seeing they deemed it a thing unlawful to go in to, or to converse with, the uncircumcised, (Acts xi. 3.) and had no apprehensions that God would grant repentance unto life to the gentiles, (ver. 18.) Wherefore, to qualify St. Peter for this work, the Lord doth by a vision convince him of the lawfulness of preaching the glad tidings of salvation to the heathen world, and of conversing with them for that end; and in pursuance of this promise made to Peter, he commands Cornelius to send not to Jerusalem to James and John, not to Damascus for St. Paul, but to Joppa for St. Peter, whom Christ had by this promise appointed for that work, that from him he might hear those words by which he and his whole household should be saved. And in relation to this promise of our Lord, as well as the completion of it by the conversion of Cornelius, it seems to be that this apostle doth, in the synod met at Jerusalem, speak thus, Men and brethren, you know how that a good while ago, ἀφ' ἡμερῶν ἀρχαίων, God chose me out among you, that by my mouth the gentiles should hear the word. (Acts xv. 7.) He therefore was assuredly the person who first preached the gospel to the gentiles, and by doing so opened the kingdom of heaven to them: he was the person chosen by Christ to perform this work; he was chosen by him ἀφ' ἡμερῶν ἀρχαίων, from the beginning of Christ's preaching, when he was called Cephas, with relation to it. Nor is this exposition any new fancy of my own, it is as ancient as Tertullian,* who saith, that Christ did personally confer this honour on St. Peter, saying, Upon thee will I build my church; "sic enim exitus docuit, in ipso ecclesia exstructa est, i. e. per ipsum, ipse clavem imbuit," so the event doth teach, the church was built on him, that is, by him, he hanselled first the key: he preached that sermon by which three thousand Jews were brought into the faith, he laid the first foundation of a church among the gentiles, he first by baptism gave them entrance into the kingdom of heaven. He was, saith Ambrose, styled the rock, because he laid the first foundations of faith among the nations. I conclude, therefore, that the plain import of these words is this, That the apostle Peter, by preaching first to the Jew and gentile, and by baptizing those to whom he preached, should lay the first foundations of the Christian church, and that against the church thus planted by him, the gates of hell should not prevail. This being so, it is evident that in this matter St. Peter neither hath nor can have a successor, and that it is absurd to claim a title of succession to this prerogative of St. Peter; this being in effect to say, that the foundations of the church of Christ are not yet laid, and to pretend to a commission to perform at present what was fully done above a thousand six hundred years ago.

[9] Καὶ πύλαι ᾅδου οὐ κατισχύσουσιν αὐτῆς, And the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.] Here, by the gates of hades, some understand the prevalence of schism and heresy, of wickedness and vice; so Jerome, Ego portas inferi reor esse vitia et peccata, vel certe hereticorum doctrinas: others do understand the subtilty of Satan, the power of his temptations and assaults: but if we do examine the import of this phrase, the gates of hades, as it is used by all the ancient Greeks, the Jewish writers, the Old Testament, and the translation of the Seventy interpreters, we shall be satisfied that it is never used by them to signify the power of heresy or schism, sin or Satan, and therefore cannot be rationally supposed here to bear that sense: but it constantly is used by them to signify the state of death, the place or receptacle of the dead, into which souls departed enter, or else the entrance into that place. To make this evident, consider,

First, That the Hebrew sheol, and the Greek ᾅδης, which answers to it in the translation of the LXX. doth signify both in the Scripture, the Jewish writers, and the ancient fathers, and more ancient heathens, the place and receptacle of the dead; ἀΐδην νεκρῶν χωρίον, exponunt Græci, saith the learned Windate; the Greeks call the place of the dead hades: ἀΐδης ὁ τάφος, hades is the sepulchre, saith Hesychius: by sheol is not meant the place of the damned spirits, saith Mr. Ainsworth, but of all that go out of the world: whence in the Chaldee paraphrase it is styled the house of the grave, or the place of burial. Accordingly the ancient Greeks assigned one hades to all that died, whence they so often say, πάντας ὁμῶς θνητοὺς ἀΐδης δέχεται, all that die are in hades, all men shall go to hades; ἐν ᾅδου συνέχονται ψυχαὶ δικαίων τε καὶ ἀδίκων· both just and unjust go to hades, saith Caius, a Roman presbyter.

Thirdly, This place of hades is generally represented as a great house, or receptacle, which hath doors, and bars, and keys, and gates, by which the dead are said to enter; hence in the poets we find frequent mention of the house of hades, and the gates of hades: hence Job cries out, sheol bethi, hades is my house; and they who die are said, κατέλθειν εἰς ᾅδου δόμους, in Euripides, εἰς δῶμ' ἀΐδαο, in Homer, i. e. to go to the house of hades.

Thirdly, The place or receptacle of the dead being thus represented by the ancients, as a house that hath its doors and gates; death in their language is represented as the gate or entrance into hades; to die or to descend into the grave, is, in their language, to go down, to be brought down to, and to pass through, the gates of hades, as in those words of Homer, ἔχθρος γάρ μοι κεῖνος ὅμως ἀΐδαο πυλῇσιν, I hate him to the gates of hades, which does not speak as he thinks; where the scholiast informs us, that this is περίφρασις θανάτου, a periphrasis of death, τὴν ἀϊδάο πύλαν ἀράξει, he shall knock at the gates of hades, that is, he shall die, saith Theocritus; and thus Theognis, bewailing the miseries of human life, concludes, it is best of all not to be born, or being born, ὤκιστα πύλας ἀΐδαο περῆσαι, to die as soon as may be. Accordingly to live again is in their language to leave, or open the gates of death, or hades: thus in Euripides the chorus sings, That if Æsculapius were there, Alcestis might then leave ἄϊδου πύλας, the gates of hades, and return to life, for he can raise the dead: and when Menippus came from the grave he speaks thus, That he came from the gates of hades. And suitably to this old notion of the gates of hades, is the constant usage of the phrase in the Old Testament and Jewish writers. The writing of Hezekiah after his recovery begins thus, I said, in the cutting off of my days, πορεύσομαι ἐν πύλοις ᾅδου, I shall go to the gates of hades; I am deprived of the residue of my years, I shall no longer be in the land of the living. (Isa. xxxviii. 10, 11.) And what is in the Hebrew, שערי מות, the gates of death, is by the LXX. translated πυλωροὶ ᾅδου· for so God puts the question to Job, Will the gates of death open to thee? i. e. canst thou command the dead to live? or, hast thou seen the gates of hades? (Job xxxviii. 17.) Thus they who are even at death's door are in the language of the Psalmist said, ἐγγίζειν ἕως τῶν πυλῶν θανάτου, to draw nigh to the gates of death. (Psal. cvii. 18.) And when Ptolemæus Philopator threatened καταπέμψειν πρὸς ᾅδην Ἰουδαίους, to kill all the Jews, and the elephants were ready to fall in upon them; they cried to the Lord to have mercy upon them, ἤδη πρὸς πύλας ᾅδου καθεστῶτες, being just at the point of death. (Mac. iii. ult.) And when God shews his power in restoring men from such a state, he is then said to lift them from the gates of hades; as in those words, Thou hast the power of life and death, κατάγεις εἰς πύλας ᾅδου καὶ ἀνάγεις, thou bringest down to the gates of hades, and raisest up again. (Wisd. xvi. 13.) Accordingly, when Theodosius had pardoned some, whom justice had condemned to die, Themistius tells him, he raised them to life, ἐκ τῶν πυλῶν ἀχέροντος, from the gates of hell. Nor did Eusebius* doubt the truth of this exposition of the words; for he declares, That God had hereby promised that the church should not be overcome by death, and that by virtue of this one voice, Upon this rock —and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it: the church continues not subdued by her enemies, nor yielding to the gates of death. St. Cyril,† of Jerusalem, gives the same import of the words, saying, That Christ called Lazarus ἐξ ᾅδου πυλῶν, from the gates of hades, or death's door: and Photius, That when the dead are drawn τῶν πυλῶν ᾅδου, from the gates of death to life again; this is a demonstration of Divine virtue. Theodoret‡ saith, He was cast into so great peril by the heretics, as to be brought, εἰς αὐτὰς τοῦ ᾅδου πύλας, even to the gates of hades. So that in all languages with which I am acquainted, this seems to be the plain and constant import of the phrase; and therefore in these words it seemeth reasonable to conceive it is a promise, That even death itself should not prevail against the genuine members of Christ's church, or that they should enjoy a happy resurrection. Now from this exposition we may learn how vainly these words are produced, to prove that any church or council is infallible, or that the church of Rome hath a just title to that privilege; for if the gates of hades do never signify, in any ancient writer or any eastern language, heresy or error; to interpret these words of a security from error promised to the church, must be to wrest them from their plain and constant sense, to such an import as they never had in any language then in use.

[10] Ver. 19. Καὶ δώσω σοι τὰς κλεῖς τῆς βασιλείας τῶν οὐρανῶν, And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven.] Here note,

First, That our Lord, by giving these keys to St. Peter, cannot be reasonably supposed to give him a supremacy over the rest of the apostles, or over the whole church of Christ, because the text informs us that these keys were given to St. Peter, that with them he might bind and loose; now, whatsoever binding and loosing may import, it is sure doth equally belong to all the rest of the apostles; Christ having said to them in general as fully as he did to Peter, Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven, Matt. xviii. 18. (See the words expounded there.) Note, Secondly, That the use of a key being to open a door or gate, Christ here promises to Peter, that he should be the person who should first open the gate of the kingdom of heaven both to Jew and gentile, by making the first converts among both, and letting some of both into the church; but then it is evident that both James and John exercised this office independently of Peter, in converting those of the circumcision as well as he; and that St. Paul was by way of excellency, and by virtue of his mission, the apostle of the gentiles, (Rom. xi. 13. xv. 16. Gal. i. 16. ii. 8. 1 Tim. ii. 7. 2 Tim. i. 11.) and opened the kingdom of heaven to far more gentiles than ever Peter did, (Rom. xv. 18—22.) and therefore had this key of the kingdom of heaven given to him as much as to St. Peter.

And what thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven.] Here St. Jerome notes, That hence some bishops and presbyters did assume to themselves somewhat of the haughtiness of the pharisees; "Ut vel damnent innocentes, vel solvere se noxios arbitrentur, cum apud Deum non sententia sacerdotis, sed reorum vita quæratur." And he observes from Lev. xiv. 7. 11. that as the priest is said to make him clean, or unclean, whom he pronounceth, upon ocular inspection, so to be; so the bishop or priest is here said to bind or loose.

[11] Ver. 20. Then charged he his disciples, ἵνα μηδενὶ εἴπωσιν ὅτι αὐτός ἐστιν Ἰησοῦς ὁ Χριστός, that they should tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ.] i. e. Till after his resurrection, when they were by office to be his witnesses, and to declare to others that he was the Christ, because then they could do it, not only without suspicion of confederacy, but with greater advantage and better success, after that Christ had taken possession of his kingdom, and had testified this, by his sitting down at the right hand of Power, and by sending down upon them the Holy Ghost, to enable them to confirm this testimony; and when he was no longer to be subject to those humble circumstances, and to that death, which might divert them from receiving him under the character of the Son of God; whereas, had his own disciples publicly declared him to be the King of the Jews, and the Son of God, whilst he was on earth, as this would have looked like a confederacy between them and their Master, so might it have encouraged the attempt of the Jews to come and make him a king, (John vi. 15.) especially when he was shortly to go up to Jerusalem in royal triumph, (xxi. 8, 9.)

[12] Ver. 21. Ἀπὸ τότε ἤρξατο ὁ Ἰησοῦς δεικνύειν τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, ὅτι δεῖ αὐτὸν ἀπελθεῖν εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα, &c. From that time began Jesus to shew to his disciples, that he was to go up to Jerusalem, and to suffer many things of the elders.] To what hath been hinted in the paraphrase, that he was to go up to Jerusalem; because a prophet could not suffer out of that city, (Luke xiii. 33.) he being to be tried by the Sanhedrin which sat there; add also, that he was to be condemned by the rulers, and those who had the authority of life and death, that so, being condemned and put to death by them, who bore the title of God's vicegerents, he might more properly be said to be smitten of God, and afflicted, (Isa. liii. 4.) though also, in a higher sense, it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief, by laying on him the iniquity of us all, (ver. 6.)

[13] Ver. 22. Ἵλεώς σοι, Κύριε, Far be it from thee, Lord.] This is a phrase very frequent in the Old Testament, and always used by way of abomination and abhorrence, answering to חלילהלך in the Hebrew; and it is always rendered either μηδαμῶς σοι, as Gen. xviii. 25. 1 Sam. iii. 30. xii. 23. xx. 9. xxii. 15. xxiv. 6. or μὴ γένοιτο, Gen. xliv. 7. 17. Josh. xxii. 29. xxiv. 16. 1 Kings xxi. 3. i. e. absit, or nequaquam, and so is well rendered by us, far be it from thee. A like phrase חלילה־לו is thrice rendered by the Septuagint, Ἵλεως μοὶ, 2 Sam. xx. 20. xxiii. 17. where it is rendered, far be it from me; (see 1 Macc. ii. 21.) and when Jehovah is added to it, and it is Ἵλεώς μοι ὁ Θεὸς or μὴ γένοιτό μοι παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, 1 Kings xxi. 3. it is rendered, my God forbid it, 1 Chron. xi. 19. and this, some think, is the full import of the words here, ὁ Θεὸς being understood, and therefore render them, God be merciful to thee, Sir.

[14] Ver. 23. Ὕπαγε ὀπίσω μοῦ Σατανᾶ, Get thee behind me, Satan.] It is somewhat strange, that Origen, Hilary, Jerome, and St. Austin, should conceive, that Christ should only mean, "Sequere meam sententiam," follow my opinion rather than thine own. These words being doubtless a reprehension of St. Peter, with some vehemence and indignation, as, under a pretence of charity, shewing himself an adversary to Christ, as the word Satan signifies, Numb. xxii. 32. 2 Sam. xix. 23. 1 Kings v. 4. xi. 14. Psal. cix. 6. and doing the work of Satan by tempting him to disobey his Father's will and command, (John x. 18.) and to decline a work so necessary for the salvation of souls; and being more concerned for the advancement of that temporal kingdom the Jews expected from their Messiah, than for the glory of God and the good of souls.

[15] Ver. 24. Εἴ τις θέλει ὀπίσω μοῦ ἐλθεῖν, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, &c.] See note on Mark viii. 34. and on Luke xiv. 27.

[16] Ver. 25, 26. Ὃς γὰρ ἂν θέλῃ τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ σῶσαι, ἀπολέσει αὐτὴν, For whosoever will save his life shall lose it.] That the word ψυχὴ should be here rendered life, rather than soul, in the sublimer acceptation of the word, seems highly probable from these considerations: (1.) because Christ, who came to save men's souls, could not require of any persons, that they should lose their souls in the worst sense, but only that they should lay down their lives for his sake. (2.) Because in the Old Testament this phrase continually occurreth in this sense, where τηρεῖν τὴν ψυχὴν, Prov. xiii. 3. xvi. 17. xix. 16. xxiii. 14. σῶσαι τὴν ψυχὴν, Amos ii. 14, 15. is to preserve life; λύσαι τὴν ψυχὴν, Psal. vi. 4. vii. 1, 2. is to deliver us from death; ἀπολέσαι τὴν ψυχὴν, Psal. xxvi. 9. to lose life, or die. (3.) Because it frequently occurs in profane authors in this sense, as when we read in Agathias, * What if we gain all Persia, τὰς δὲ ψυχὰς ἐζημιωμένοι; but lose our lives? And Achilles in Homer † says, οὐ γὰρ ἐμοὶ ψυχῆς ἀντάξιον ἄλλο. Nothing is comparable to my life. Lastly, The benefit which will accrue to us by losing of this life, follows in the reward such persons shall receive at Christ's coming: and I humbly conceive our Saviour's argument may be to this effect; It is natural for all men to have the greatest regard for the preservation of their lives, whence they so frequently declare τιμιώτερον οὐδὲν, οὐ φίλτερον ἄλλο, ‡ that nothing is more precious or desirable, nothing is fit to be given in exchange for it; he therefore will act most suitably to this natural principle, who continues steadfast in the Christian faith and doctrine, for his life will be prolonged happily for ever; whereas, he that forsakes it, will lose his interest in this promise of eternal life. For the Son of man will come to render to every man according to his works, to them who have been faithful to him to the death, eternal life; whereas the unbelievers and apostates shall not see this life, but shall be certainly obnoxious to the second death.

[17] Ver. 27. Μέλλει γὰρ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἔρχεσθαι ἐν τῇ δόξῃ τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ, μετὰ τῶν ἀγγέλων αὐτοῦ, For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, &c.] I do not think that there is any necessity of interpreting these words of the destruction of Jerusalem, to make them comport with the verse following: they seem more plainly to relate to the day of judgment. For (1.) the expressions are parallel to those which are elsewhere unquestionably meant of that great day, as Matt. xxv. 31. The Son of man shall come in his glory, and all his holy angels with him, and shall place the goats on his left hand, &c. 2 Thess. i. 7. In the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven, with his host of angels, the wicked shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the glory of his power. See Matt. xiii. 41. 49. Jude 14. (2.) The words, then shall he render to every man according to his works, cannot relate to the Jews only; those words, in all other places, plainly relating to the day of judgment: as Rom. ii. 6. 16. Rev. xxii. 12. whereas, at the destruction of the Jewish nation, he only rendered to them according to their works. The words may therefore be thus paraphrased; There is no cause why any man should fear to lose his life for my sake, or think himself wise in preserving it, by denying me: for the Son of man will come in the glory of his Father, who hath made him judge both of the quick and the dead; and then he will render a reward of eternal life to them who have suffered for his sake, and subject them to eternal death who have been ashamed of him and of his words; nor have you cause to doubt of his power, thus to judge and inflict punishments on men, since he will shortly give a signal experiment of it, in inflicting the severest punishments on the unbelieving Jews. For,

[18] Ver. 28. Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, εἰσί τινες τῶν ὧδε ἑστηκότων, &c. Verily I say unto you, There are some of them who are standing here, who shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.] It seems wonderful, that some, both ancient and modern interpreters, should conceive this passage relates to our Lord's transfiguration on the mount, mentioned in the following chapter; since (1.) the seeing that, could not be the seeing Christ's coming in his kingdom; his kingdom being not begun till after his resurrection, when all power in heaven and earth was given to him, Matt. xxviii. 18. (2.) It was as true of all the apostles, as of Peter, James, and John, that they should not taste of death till after that vision, which happened but six days after these words were spoken: (xvii. 1.) nor did Christ at his transfiguration, render to any one according to his works. Nor (3.) can these words be understood of the great day of judgment; there being none standing there who did not die long before that time; and to taste of death, in the Jewish phrase, signifies no more: thus, when Christ said, He that believeth in me, shall never die; the Jews repeat his words thus, He shall never taste of death: (John viii. 52.) and to be sure, it can import no more, when it is said of Christ, He tasted death for every man. (Heb. ii. 9.) Accordingly the Jews say, The first Adam was worthy not to taste of death. Nor (4.) can we understand this of Christ's resurrection and exaltation to the right hand of God, and the mission of the Holy Ghost; for this being said not long before his passion, it is not reasonable to conceive, Christ should with an asseveration say, Some standing here shall not taste of death till they see that which was to happen in less time than half a year. It is therefore more probable, that this is spoken of Christ's coming after forty years, to the destruction of the Jewish church and nation, and to render to them according to their works; for this was to happen in that generation, (Matt. xxiv. 34.) and St. John, and many standing there, might see it; that also is represented as the παρουσία, or coming of the Son of man, Matt. xxiv. 3. 27. 39. 44. then was the Son of man to come, John xxi. 22. Heb. x. 37. with power, Matt. xxiv. 30. and great glory, Mark xiii. 26. and with his angels, Matt. xvi. 27. and to come in the clouds, Rev. i. 7. and then was the kingdom of God near, Luke xxi. 31. Well therefore might this glorious advent of the Son of God, in so great majesty, and such resemblance of his second coming at the day of judgment, be introduced as a just ground to believe, and to expect that day; viz. a time when Christ should punish with destruction from his presence all that did not believe and obey his gospel, as he had then punished the unbelieving Jews; and that he should afterward say to all his enemies, as he then signally did to the Jews, Bring these mine enemies that would not I should reign over them, and slay them before me. (Luke xix. 27.) And this interpretation fully agrees with those words of Christ, Matt. xxiv. 30. Then shall they (the Jews) see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with great power and glory; and, Matt. xxvi. 64. After a while ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of the power of God, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

CHAP. XVII.

1. [1] AND after six days (from the discourse had with his disciples, till the day of his ascent; see note on Mark ix. 2.) [2] Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart, (which he ascended, to pray there, Luke ix. 28.)

2. And (whilst he was praying, Luke ix. 29. he) was transfigured before them, and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white (and shining, Luke ix. 29.) as the light.

3. [3] And, behold, there appeared to them Moses and Elias talking with him, (of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem, Luke ix. 31.)

4. Then answered (i. e. spake) Peter, and said unto Jesus, Lord, it is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.

5. While he yet spake, behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them: and behold a voice (came) out of the cloud, which said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him (according to the prediction of Moses, Deut. xviii. 15. him shall ye hear).

6. And when his disciples heard it, they fell on their faces, and were sore afraid.

7. And Jesus came and touched them, and said, Arise, and be not afraid.

8. And when they had lifted up their eyes, (which were heavy with sleep, Luke ix. 32.) they saw no man, save Jesus only.

9. And as they came down from the mountain, Jesus charged them, saying, [4] Tell the vision to no man (no, not to your fellow-disciples), until the Son of man be risen again from the dead.

10. And (upon this charge) his disciples asked him, saying, (If the appearance of Elias must be so great a secret, even till thy departure), [5] Why then say the scribes that Elias must first come (to anoint the Messias, and make him manifest to Israel)?

11. And Jesus answered, and said unto them, Elias truly shall come first, and restore all things; (i. e. he indeed is to come first for this end, according to the words of the prophet Malachi, iv. 6.)

12. But (then) I (also) say unto you, That (the) Elias (of whom he spake) is come already, and they knew (i. e. acknowledged) him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed; (the pharisees rejecting his baptism, and blaspheming him as one that had a devil, Luke vii. 30. 33.) Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them.

13. Then the disciples understood that he spake to them of John the Baptist (as of that Elias which was for to come).

14. And (the day following, Luke ix. 37.) when they were come to the multitude, (he saw them about his disciples, and the scribes questioning with them, and asked them, What they inquired about? Mark ix. 14. 16. and) there came unto him a certain man, kneeling down to him, and saying,

15. Lord, have mercy on my son, (my only son, Luke ix. 38.) for he is lunatic, and sore vexed, (with a dumb spirit, Mark ix. 16.) for (this spirit taketh him and suddenly he cries out, and he shakes him; so that he foameth again, and bruising him, hardly departeth from him, Luke ix. 39. yea) ofttimes he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water.

16. And (in thy absence) I brought him to thy disciples, and they could not cure him (and this raised the question betwixt the pharisees and lawyers and thy disciples).

17. Then Jesus answered and said (unto these pharisees and scribes), [6] O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? bring him hither to me. (Luke ix. 42. And as he was yet coming, the devil threw him down—and he fell on the ground and wallowed foaming, Mark ix. 20. And Jesus asked his father, How long is it ago since this came to him? And he said, Of a child, ver. 21. But if thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us, and help us, ver. 22. And Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth, ver. 23. And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief, ver. 24.)

18. And (when) Jesus (saw that the people came running together, Mark ix. 25. he) rebuked the devil; and (saying to him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee come out of him, and enter no more into him; the spirit cried, and rent him sore, and) he departed out of him, (but so as to leave him as one dead, insomuch that many said, He is dead; but Jesus took him by the hand, and lifted him up, and he arose, Mark ix. 24—26.) and the child was cured from that very hour.

19. Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, (when he was come into the house, Mark iv. 28.) and said, Why could not we cast him out?

20. And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, [7] If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed (a small degree of active growing faith), you shall say to this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing (relating to your office) shall be impossible to you, (i. e. you shall through faith be enabled to do very extraordinary things for the promotion of the gospel, and to remove the greatest obstructions to the progress of it, 2 Cor. x. 4, 5.)

21. [8] Howbeit this kind (of devils) goeth not out but by (faith, acquired by) prayer and fasting.

22. And while they abode in Galilee, (as they were privately going through it, Mark ix. 29.) Jesus said unto them, The Son of man shall be betrayed into the hands of men:

23. And they shall kill him, and the third day he shall be raised again. And they (not understanding what he meant by the death and resurrection of the Messiah, Mark ix. 32. Luke ix. 45. or how to reconcile it with their received notion, that the Messiah should not die, John xii. 34.) were exceeding sorry.

24. And when they were come to Capernaum, (where Christ and Peter dwelt, Matt. viii. 14.) they that received the tribute-money (that every Jew yearly paid to the temple) came to Peter, and said (to him), Doth not your master pay tribute?

25. He saith, Yes. And when he was come into the house (of Peter), Jesus prevented him, saying, What thinkest thou, Simon? [9] of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children, or of strangers (i. e. of others only, who are not of their sons, or of their own family)?

26. Peter saith unto him, Of strangers. Jesus saith unto him, Then are the children free (i. e. then this tribute, which is paid to God for his temple, belongs not to me to pay, who am his Son).

27. [10] Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them (i. e. seem to them who know nothing of this reason of my exemption, to contemn the temple, and the service of it, for which this tribute is designed), go thou to the sea, and cast a hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money (worth two shillings and sixpence, or two half shekels): that take, and give unto them (as the two half shekels due) from me and thee who dwell at Capernaum).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XVII.

[1] Ver. 1. Καὶ μεθ' ἡμέρας ἓξ. And after six days.] See note on Mark ix. 2.

[2] Παραλαμβάνει ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὸν Πέτρον, &c. Jesus taketh with him Peter, James, and John.] These being afterward to be great pillars of the church, especially of the circumcision, (Gal. ii. 9.) Christ changes their names, admits them here to this vision in the mount, he takes them with him when he raises the ruler of the synagogue's daughter to life, (Mark v. 37.) and in his agony. (Matt. xxvi. 37.)

[3] Ver. 3. Καὶ ἰδοὺ, ὤφθησαν αὐτοῖς Μωσῆς καὶ Ἠλίας μετ' αὐτοῦ συλλαλοῦντες· And, behold, there appeared to them Moses and Elias talking with him.] Because Christ commands his disciples to tell no man, τὸ ὅραμα, the vision, (ver. 9.) hence some conjecture, that Moses and Elias were not truly there, or seen by them, but only that they had in their fancy or imagination an appearance of them: but this is very improbable: for St. Luke saith expressly, That these two talked with him, and spake of his exit, which he was to accomplish at Jerusalem; and that all this was done whilst these disciples were asleep, and had seen nothing; adding, that after they were awake, they saw two men standing with him, Luke ix. 30—32. (See also Mark ix. 4.) And therefore this by St. Luke is styled, not ὅραμα, a vision; which, when it is represented to the fancy, happeneth rather to men in a sleep, than after they awake, but ὀπτασία, a representation of the thing to their eyes: it is therefore probable, that God might preserve both their bodies to this end; for the body of Elias was carried up into heaven, (2 Kings ii. 11.) the body of Moses was not found: it disappeared, saith Josephus:* he ascended (say the Jews), and ministered to God in the heavens: but the text saying expressly, that he was buried in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-Peor; or, as the Hebrew, He, i. e. God, buried him, ἀπὸ τῶν ἁγίων ἀγγέλων, by his holy angels; saith Epiphanius,† his body must be raised, or miraculously appear; and to this burial by angels, perhaps refers that altercation mentioned by St. Jude, betwixt Michael and the devil touching the body of Moses; the coming of these two great prophets, one the deliverer, the other the restorer, of the law of Moses; when God said of Christ, This is my beloved Son, hear him; shewed, that the law was henceforth to give place to the gospel preached by him. Moreover, that these were two men, as St. Luke speaks, their eyes informed them; that they were Moses and Elias, their talk together might declare; for how else Peter should learn who they were, but either from their discourse with Christ, or Christ's discourse with him and his associates, as he went up into the mount, that he was going to meet with them, I am not able to imagine.

[4] Ver. 9. Μηδενὶ εἴπητε τὸ ὅραμα, Tell no man the vision.] The thing that ye have seen; not the residue of the disciples, that they be not troubled that they were not admitted to see it; not those believers that now follow me, that they be not scandalized at my sufferings after so glorious a transfiguration.

[5] Ver. 10—12. Why say the scribes, &c.] See note on Mark ix. 11—13.

[6] Ver. 17. Ὦ γενεὰ ἄπιστος καὶ διεστραμμένη· &c. O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you? &c.] That Christ said not this to his apostles, appears (1.) from those words, Bring ye him to me, they being spoken not to them but to the multitude, (Mark ix. 19.) among whom were the scribes, ver. 16. (2.) Because if Christ had spoken thus to them, they could not have been ignorant of the reason why they could not cast out this devil, and so they could not have put the question to Christ, Why could not we cast him out? (ver. 28.) the reason of it, if these words were spoken to them, being clearly given here, viz. their want of faith. Nor (3.) doth Christ speak this to the father of the lunatic; for (1.) he was not faithless, but only ὀλιγόπιστος, one of little faith. (2.) It seems not proper to say to one man, O faithless generation! (3.) There seemeth to be nothing in the father which deserved this sharp rebuke, he coming very humbly on his knees to Christ, to beg this mercy for his son, (ver. 15.) and saying to him with such ardour, Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief: (Mark ix. 24.) upon which saying his son was straightway cured.

It is therefore to be noted from St. Mark, ix. 14. 16. that the scribes were then disputing with Christ's disciples, and perhaps insulting over them, as having found out a distemper, which could not be cured by his name and power; whence Christ asks them, What it was about which they disputed? (ver. 15.) It therefore seems most probable that Christ spake this to them, to whom at other times he used the same language, styling them a wicked and adulterous generation. (Matt. xii. 39. xvi. 4. Luke xi. 29.)

[7] Ver. 20. Ἐὰν ἔχητε πίστιν ὡς κόκκον σινάπεως, ἐρεῖτε τῷ ὄρει τούτῳ· If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye may say to this mountain—and nothing shall be impossible to you.] By faith as a grain of mustard-seed, some understand a faith that groweth and increaseth as a grain of mustard-seed, (Matt. xiii. 31, 32.) or faith as strong and active in the heart as mustard-seed is on the palate; and that because Christ elsewhere, for the removing of a mountain, i. e. to perform things most difficult, (see note on Matt. xxi. 21.) requires πίστιν Θεοῦ, faith in God, which seems to signify an excelling faith, (Mark xi. 22, 23.) faith without doubting, Matt. xxi. 21. (2.) Because St. Paul reckons faith able to remove mountains, as an indication of the strongest faith. (1 Cor. xiii. 2.)

Now according to this exposition the sense runs thus, Did your faith increase according to the examples of God's power you have had before your eyes; as a grain of mustard-seed grows up to be the greatest of all herbs, so would your faith transmount and grow superior to all difficulties.

But Buxtorf, in the word chardal, doth inform us, that a grain of mustard-seed was proverbially used among the Jews, "pro re minima," for the least thing, as he there shews by many examples; and therefore it is probable that Christ, speaking to them who were accustomed to this phrase, used it in their sense for the least sincere faith in God, which they who fear (Mark iv. 40.) or doubt (James i. 6.) seem not to have. So that the import of these words seems to be this, If you, who are commissionated by me, and by the Father which sent me, to work all kinds of miracles needful to confirm my doctrine in my name, had the least measure of that faith which casts out fear and doubting of success in the discharge of your office, you might perform things most difficult, and even this faith in its effect would be most mighty.

Ἐρεῖτε τῷ ὄρει τούτῳ, Ye shall say to this mountain, Be thou removed, &c.] That is, saith Origen, to this lunatic devil, περὶ οὗ ἐζητήσατε, of whom you have propounded this question. For confirmation of this exposition, let it be observed from Buxtorf, and the note on 1 Cor. xiii. 2. that in the Hebrew idiom, to be a remover of mountains, seems only to import to be a doer of those things which are exceeding difficult, and beyond the power of nature to perform; when therefore Christ saith here, and Mark xi. 13. Whosoever shall say to this mountain, Be thou removed, &c. there being no particular mountain mentioned or pointed to in these words, it seemeth reasonable to interpret them as I have done in the paraphrase, viz. Whosoever shall, with a strong faith in God, attempt the most difficult things for the promotion of the gospel, shall, whilst the gift of miracles remains, be successful in so doing.

Ver. 21. That this verse belongs to St. Matthew, and that καὶ ἐλυπήθησαν σφόδρα belong to the text, ver. 23. see proved against Dr. Mills, Exam. Millii. ibid.)

ing.] i. e. But by the faith which is to be acquired by prayer and fasting. And this is not said to express the pertinacy of this kind of devils, or the power which the great sins of the possessed had given them over him; this person being thus possessed παιδίοθεν, from his youth, or childhood: but to inform his disciples that this miraculous faith, being the special gift of God, was to be sought for by flagrant devotion, that it might never be wanting to them.

[9] Ver. 25. Οἱ βασιλεῖς τῆς γῆς ἀπὸ τίνων λαμβάνουσι τέλη; &c. Of whom do the kings of the earth receive tribute or custom, of their own children, or of strangers?] That our Lord speaks here of the half shekels paid every year by all Jews above twenty years old, to the temple, for the buying the daily sacrifice, and other things necessary to the worship of God, appears (1.) from the word δίδραχμα, used ver. 24. for the Jews, saith Josephus,* δυὸ δραχμὰς ἀνὰ πᾶν ἔτος εἰς τὸν ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις νεὼν συνετέλουν, paid yearly two Attic drachms for the use of the temple at Jerusalem; and this they did according to the precept requiring of them the half shekel, called by the Septuagint τὸ δίδραχμον ἅλιον, Exod. xxx. 13. Neh. x. 32. (2.) Because our Saviour's argument why he should not pay this tribute, as being the Son of that King to whom it was paid, holds not with reference to the other tribute paid to Cæsar, he being not the son of Cæsar, but of God.

[10] Ver. 27. Ἵνα δὲ μὴ σκανδαλίζωμεν αὐτούς· Lest we should offend them.] i. e. Give them occasion to say that I despise the temple and its service, and teach my disciples so to do, pay a στατὴρ, or a piece of money of the value of two drachms, saith Phavorinus, for me, being here at Capernaum, and for thee, having thy house there; (Matt. viii. 14.) by which example Christ teaches us to avoid the scandal and sinister suspicions of men, though they be groundless, with some detriment to ourselves; especially when they have not means sufficient clearly to convince them, that as the Son of God, he had his freedom: the scandal of the pharisees proceeding not from ignorance, but pure malice, he is not thus concerned to avoid, (xv. 12.)

CHAP. XVIII.

1. [1] AT the same time (that Jesus spake of his death and resurrection, xvii. 22, 23.) came the disciples to Jesus, saying (among themselves), Who is (to be) the greatest in the kingdom of heaven? (i. e. who shall have the chief place of dignity and advantage in the kingdom of the Messiah?)

2. And Jesus (being willing by this emblem to satisfy this dispute, as far as it was useful to them), called a little child unto him, and (taking him up in his arms, Mark ix. 35. he) set him in the midst of them,

3. And said, Verily I say unto you, [2] Except ye be converted (from these ambitious and covetous desires), and become as (free from them, as are) little children, ye shall not (be fit to) enter into the kingdom of heaven (which chiefly requires of its members humility, and a contempt of the world).

4. Whosoever therefore shall humble himself (and be) as (free from all thirst after worldly dignities and honours as is) this little child, the same is greatest (and most useful) in the kingdom of heaven (for this frame will render him willing to minister even to the meanest of my members).

5. And (that you may not be unwilling thus to minister to those my little ones, know that) whosoever shall receive one such little child in my name (though in this respect also he be a little child, as being lately born anew, and yet tender in the faith, shall be respected as one that) receiveth me.

6. [3] But whoso shall offend (and drive from the faith) one of these little ones that believe in me, [4] it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea (i. e. that he suffered the surest temporal destruction).

7. Woe (therefore) to the world because of offences! (i. e. of scandals which obstruct the receiving of, or cause weak persons to desert the faith:) [5] for it must needs be (through the unrestrained iniquity of men) that offences (of this kind should) come; but woe to that man by whom the offence (which procures this ruin either to himself or others) comes!

8. Wherefore, if thy hand or thy foot offend (or be means of scandal to) thee (or others, so as to bring this woe upon thee), cut them off, and cast them from thee: (i. e. quit whatsoever causeth this scandal, how dear and useful soever it may seem to be, for) it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire.

9. And (likewise) if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into hell-fire.

10. Take heed (therefore) that ye despise not one of these little ones (as not regarding whether ye offend them or not); [6] for I say to you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven; (i. e. the angels of heaven, which are ministering spirits to them, stand always in the presence of God ready to receive his commands concerning them, so highly are they valued by them; I say, despise them not,)

11. For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost, (and so by scandalizing them to their ruin, you will act in contradiction to the design of his advent, and of him that sent him; for,)

12. How think ye? If a man have a hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth into the mountains, and seeketh that which is gone astray?

13. And if so be that he find it, verily I say to you, He rejoiceth more (at the finding) of that sheep, than (at the seeing) of the ninety and nine which went not astray.

14. Even so (is the joy of God for the recovery of a lost sinner,) it is not (therefore) the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish (by any scandal put before them).

15. (And in this concern to save others, it becomes you to imitate him); [7] Moreover if (then) thy brother shall trespass against thee, go (first) and tell him his fault (friendly) between thee and him alone: if he shall (so) hear thee (as to confess and amend it), thou hast gained thy brother.

16. But if he will not (thus) hear thee, (do not presently give him over, but) then take with thee one or two more, (it being said, Deut. xix. 15. One witness shall not rise up against any man for iniquity, but) that in (at) the mouth of two or three witnesses, every word (or matter relating to his condemnation) may be established.

17. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it the church (i. e. make it a matter of public cognizance): but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be to thee as a heathen man and a publican (among the Jews, one wholly neglected by thee, and not thought fit to be conversed with).

18. [8] Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever (things) ye shall (thus) bind on earth (declaring them actions rendering men obnoxious to God's displeasure) shall be bound in heaven (i. e. shall make them guilty before God); and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth (or by this means shall exempt from guilt) shall be loosed in heaven.

19. (And if he, being thus convinced of his sins, desires you to join in prayers with him, your prayers shall be accepted; for) [9] again I say unto you, That if two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven.

20. For where two or three are gathered together in my name (requesting a blessing for my sake), there am I in the midst of them (i. e. with them, to speed their petitions).

21. [10] Then came Peter to him, and said, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? (shall it be) till seven times? (as some of our doctors gather from these words, For three transgressions, and for four, Amos i. 3.)

22. Jesus saith unto him, I say not to thee (as they do), Until seven times; but, Until seventy times seven.

23. [11] Therefore (in this) is the kingdom of heaven likened to a certain king, who would take account of his servants.

24. And when he had begun to reckon (with them), one was brought to him, who owed him ten thousand talents, (i. e. 875,000l.)

25. But (and) forasmuch as he had not (wherewithal) to pay, his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife, and children, and all that he had, (as the eastern manner was, Lev. xxv. 39. 41. Isa. l. 1. Neh. v. 5. 8.) and payment to be made (by the sale of them).

26. The servant therefore fell down (at his feet), and worshipped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.

27. Then the lord of that servant was moved with compassion (towards him), and loosed him, and (frankly) forgave him the debt.

28. But the same servant (who had thus kindly been dealt with by his master) went out, and found one of his fellow-servants, who owed him a hundred pence (i. e. 3l. 2s. 6d. a Roman penny being sevenpence halfpenny): and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat, saying, Pay me that thou owest (me).

29. And his fellow-servant fell down at his feet (likewise), and besought him, saying (as he had done to his master), Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.

30. And (but) he would not (bear with him): but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay the debt.

31. So when his fellow-servants saw what was done, they were very sorry (for both him that thus suffered, and the unkindness of this servant to him), and (they) came and told their lord all that was done.

32. Then his lord, after that he had called him, said to him, O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that (great) debt (which thou owedst me, merely) because thou desiredst me (so to do).

33. Shouldest not (then) thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee?

34. And his lord was wroth (with him), and delivered him to the tormentors (gaolers), till he should pay all that was due to him.

35. So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also to you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XVIII.

[1] Ver. 1. Ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ προσῆλθον οἱ μαθηταὶ τῷ Ἰησοῦ, &c. At that time came the disciples of Jesus to him, saying, Who is greatest in the kingdom of heaven?] St. Mark saith, Christ puts this question to them, and they held their peace; (ix. 33.) St. Luke, that they had been a disputing this point among themselves, and Christ knowing the reasoning of their hearts, took a child, (ix. 46, 47.) Now these seeming differences are to be reconciled thus; that Jesus, going to Capernaum, the disciples followed him, λέγοντες πρὸς ἑαυτούς, discoursing among themselves, (Mark ix. 33.) who of them was to be the greatest in the kingdom of heaven; and when they came to him into the house, Jesus, knowing what was still upon their hearts, and they were still pondering among themselves, (Luke ix. 47.) asks them, What was it you discoursed of in the way? which they being ashamed to tell him, kept silence: (Mark ix. 33, 34.) then Christ, who understood well what it was, endeavours by his example of a little child, to cure this distemper. That the participle λέγοντες relates not here to Christ, as if they put the question, but to themselves, as I have here expounded it, is evident; (1.) from their silence, when asked touching this matter; and St. Luke's note, that Jesus, perceiving the thoughts of their hearts, did this: for had they put that question to Christ, how could they, or why should they, hold their peace; or what need was there of saying, Jesus, knowing their hearts, did this, in a matter which they had uttered to him with their mouths? (2.) To a question it is usually said, Jesus answered, or answering did so or so, which is not here said; thus, when he rebuked the winds, the apostles wonder, λέγοντες saying among themselves, What manner of person is this? (Matt. viii. 27.) the multitude wondered, λέγοντες saying among themselves, We never saw it thus before, (ix. 33.) So xiv. 26. xvi. 7. 19. 25. xxi. 9, 10. and ver. 25. οἱ δὲ διελογίζοντο παρ' ἑαυτοῖς λέγοντες, and they reasoned, saying among themselves: xxii. 23. then came to him the sadducees, οἱ λέγοντες, those who say there is no resurrection. (So xxiii. 16. xxvi. 8. xxvii. 54.)

[2] Ver. 3. Ἐὰν μὴ στραφῆτε καὶ γένησθε ὡς τὰ παιδία, &c. Except ye be converted, and become as little children, you cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven.] In that temporal kingdom of the Messiah, which the Jews expected, they thought they should have rule over all nations, having them for their servants, and all their wealth flowing in to them; and then the twelve must naturally think, that they should have the preference above other Jews, and be advanced to higher posts of honour and grandeur, and have a greater affluence of outward blessings, than other Jews; and seeing the king Messiah must have some officers of highest rank, they conclude it must be some of them, though they could not agree who of them were the fittest for, or best deserved, these high posts of honour: now our Saviour's kingdom being not of this world, and therefore nothing of this nature being to be expected from him; but rather that his followers, and the apostles more especially, should suffer the loss of all things, and lie under the utmost infamy, Christ plainly tells them, that these inclinations, desires, and expectations, were inconsistent with their being members of that spiritual kingdom which he was to erect; since they who followed him chiefly on these accounts, when they saw no such thing could be expected from him, but rather the quite contrary, must desert him; and therefore he requires them to fit them for this kingdom, to become as to these things like little children, who are absolutely free from all contrivances and designs of this nature, never concerned in the least for empire and dominion over others, or for increase in wealth or great possessions, and know not what a post of honour, or what wealth, means; this, saith our Lord, being that which will remove all that obstructs your entrance into my kingdom, and make you the most eminent subjects of it, (ver. 4.) and so shall be regarded by me; for to encourage all men to shew the greatest kindness to them, I let them know I will accept, and will reward, all kindness done to them, as if it were done to my own self, and will severely punish all that shall offend them, (ver. 5, 6.)

[3] Ver. 6. Ὃς δὲ ἂν σκανδαλίσῃ ἕνα τῶν μικρῶν τούτων τῶν πιστευόντων εἰς ἐμέ· But whoso shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me.] It seemeth needless to note that Christ here speaketh not of little ones by age (they being both incapable of faith and free from scandal), but by quality and temper of spirit; to scandalize one of these little ones, is to occasion his ruin, and falling off from the faith, by our sinful actions; as is apparent (1.) from these words, ver. 14. It is not the will of their heavenly Father, that one of those little ones shall perish. (2.) From the severity of the woe and punishment here threatened to him that scandalizeth; it were better that a millstone were hanged about his neck, &c. even so much better, saith St. Jerome, as it is to suffer a short than an eternal punishment, the offending eye and hand causing us to be cast into hell-fire: (ver. 8, 9.) and this sense the word usually beareth in the gospel, as when Christ saith, Matt. xi. 6. Blessed is he that shall not be offended in me; and xiii. 21. that the stony ground when persecution comes is presently offended, i. e. falls off from the faith; that when tribulation ariseth, many shall be offended; (Matt. xxiv. 10.) i. e. their charity shall wax cold, nor will they persevere to the end; (ver. 12, 13.) that the hand and eye do scandalize, when they cause the whole body to be cast into hell-fire. (Matt. v. 29, 30.) So the Jews were scandalized at Christ's mean rise and parentage, (Matt. xiii. 57. Mark vi. 3. Luke vii. 23.) and at his words, (ver. 12.) the pharisees, (Matt. xv. 12.) the multitude, and many of his disciples. (John vi. 61, 62. 66.) So Christ's disciples were scandalized for a season at his passion, their faith then failing, (Matt. xxvi. 31. 33. Luke xxiv. 21.) and Christ forewarns them of what they were to suffer, that they should not be scandalized. (John xvi. 1.) And that this is the constant import of this phrase in the New Testament, see note on Rom. xiv. 21. False therefore is it, that they who truly do believe in Christ, and are of the number of those whom God would not to perish, (ver. 14.) cannot be so offended, as to fall from the faith and perish. And were this so, wherein lies the force of this pathetical discourse, and why are such dreadful woes and punishments denounced to deter men from doing what not only is in itself impossible, but which they also who are thus threatened must believe to be so?

[4] It were better Ἵνα κρεμασθῇ μύλος ὀνικὸς ἐπὶ τὸν τράχηλον αὐτοῦ, &c. that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the depth of the sea.] Grotius here thinks, that this refers to a custom of drowning among the Syrians; but for this, he cites only from Eusebius instances of men drowned in the sea, and of a stone hung at the feet of the martyr Agypius, but not of any persons who had a millstone hung about their necks. Jerome, upon the place, saith, that he speaks according to the custom of the province; the punishment of greater criminals among the ancients being this, that they should be drowned in the deep, with a stone bound about them. Now of this custom, saith Dr. Lightfoot, there is no mention either in the law or in the rabbins: but Dr. Alix saith, it was customary for them, ἀναθέματα, "in mare Sodomæ dejicere lapide annexo," to cast execrable men into the dead sea with a stone tied to them; and that there be divers places in the Mischna which prove this. And certain it is from Diodorus Siculus,* and others, that this was the ancient punishment of sacrilegious persons, to be cast into the sea. That this custom obtained in Greece, we learn from the scholiast in Aristophanes,† who saith, that when they drowned any one, they hanged a weight about his neck. To which custom the poet alludes,‡ by saying, he would hang a litigious man about his neck. And Suetonius saith of the tutor and servants of Caius, that Augustus, "superbè et avarè in provincia grassantes oneratis gravi pondere cervicibus præcipitavit in flumen," (in Oct. Aug. cap. 67.) for the pride and covetousness by which they infested the province, cast them into the river with a great weight about their necks.

[5] Ver. 7. Ἀνάγκη γάρ ἐστιν ἐλθεῖν τὰ σκάνδαλα, &c. It is necessary that offences should come, but woe to the man by whom the offence cometh.] The necessity here mentioned is not a necessity arising from any act of God ordaining or procuring that scandals should come, or withdrawing or not affording that grace which is absolutely necessary to prevent their coming, since otherwise it could be no offence to scandalize, i. e. to do what it was not in my power to help; nor could it deserve such severe woes and dreadful punishments, since no man deserves punishment for doing what he could not help, and God himself made necessary for him to do; nor could there be any force in, or ground for, the following exhortation, see that ye despise not one of these little ones; for to admonish any one not to do what is necessary that he should do, and what I who admonish him declare to be so, seems palpably absurd. The necessity here mentioned is therefore only conditional, on supposition of the wickedness of men not hindered, the subtilty and malignity of Satan, and the self-denial required of all who would embrace the gospel; whence nothing could be expected but that many should be scandalized at, and be unwilling to embrace, the gospel upon these terms, and many who had once embraced it should flee off from it. And this seems to be hinted in those words, woe to him by whom the scandal comes; which represents him as the proper cause of it; and from the words thus varied by St. Luke, xvii. 1. ἀνένδεκτόν ἐστι, it is not to be expected, that offences should not come; which word makes this sense preferable to that of Grotius, that this is necessary ratione finis, to the ends of Divine providence; for though it be necessary that God should permit men to do that which he hath foretold shall happen, as in the crucifixion of our Lord; yet otherwise, as saith the son of Sirach, God hath no need of the sinful man, (Ecclus. xv. 12.) to accomplish the designs of his providence, but rather, foreseeing that he will be so, he makes him his instrument to fulfil them. Note also, that from the descants of the fathers and commentators on these words, we learn how far they were from thinking that the liberty of a viator, or of persons in a state of trial, was well consistent with a necessity of doing good or evil; for Chrysostom and Theophylact here observe, that Christ saith this, οὐ τὸ αὐθαίρετον τῆς ἐξουσίας ἀναιρῶν, οὐδὲ τὴν ἐλευθερίαν τῆς προαιρέσεως, οὐδὲ ἀνάγκῃ τινὶ πραγμάτων ὑποβάλλων τὸν βίον, not to take away the freedom of our faculties, or the liberty of our election, or to subject the actions of our life to any necessity. St. Jerome here saith, that if it were necessary for a man to scandalize, "sine culpa esset," he would be without blame in so doing. He also well observes the necessity of this caution to the apostles, contending then for dignity; for, saith he, "Si in hoc vitio permansissent, poterant eos quos ad fidem vocabant per suum scandalum perdere, dum apostolos viderent inter se de honore pugnare:" Had they continued in this vice, they might have given scandal to those whom they called to the faith, by contending among themselves for honour.

[6] Ver. 10. For I say unto you, ὅτι οἱ ἄγγελοι αὐτῶν ἐν οὐρανοῖς, &c. That their angels in heaven do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven.] Here St. Jerome's note is this, Great is the dignity of these little ones, seeing every one of them, from his birth, hath an angel delegated to preserve him. This many of the fathers did assert, as Jerome,* of all souls; but others said, this was the privilege only of the just, as you may see in Petavius; and yet I think that neither of these opinions concerning one particular angel having the custody of one soul, as his continual charge, hath any good foundation in the Holy Scriptures; certain it is, that in this place Christ saith not, their angel, but their angels behold the face of God; nor says he that these angels belong to all, but only to these little ones; nor that they always do attend upon their persons; but that they stand before the face of God, ready to receive his commands, either to help them in their exigencies, or punish them who injure them: hence then it follows, not that they have always an angel present with them, but only that the angels, in general, are ministering spirits to them. (Psal. xxxiv. 8. Heb. i. 14. see the note on Acts xii. 15.) And whereas these angels are said to behold the face of God continually, that only seems to signify their intimacy in the court of heaven, expressed by Raphael, by going in and out before the glory of the Holy One, (Tob. xii. 15.) and their attendance on him as his retinue, servants, or as messengers of his, that do his pleasure. (Psal. ciii. 21.) Thus speaks the angel Gabriel of himself, I am Gabriel, ὁ παρεστηκὼς ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, who stand before God; (Luke i. 19.) and so the queen of Sheba, of Solomon's servants, Blessed are thy servants, οἱ παρεστηκότες ἐνώπιον σοῦ δι' ὅλου, who stand always before thee. (1 Kings x. 8.)

Ver. 11. The Son of man is come to save, &c.] Hence it seems plainly to follow, that they may be lost, through their own neglect to cut off their offending members, or through the offence which others minister, whom Christ came to save: as also from ver. 14. that they may perish through the offence of others, whom God would not have to perish; and therefore hath not, by his own decree of preterition, designed for destruction, or left inevitably to perish.

[7] Ver. 15. Ἐὰν δὲ ἁμαρτήσῃ εἰς σὲ ὁ ἀδελφός σου· &c. If then thy brother shall trespass against thee, go, and tell him his fault betwixt thee and him alone.——17. Let him be to thee as a heathen man, or a publican.] i. e. The Son of man being come to save that which was lost; (ver. 11.) and God being unwilling that one of these little ones should perish: when thou seest any one in danger to be lost, or perish by his sins committed against thee, use this method to reclaim him; and if it fail, let him be to thee as a heathen or publican is to the Jews. So I interpret these words, because Christ neither neglected publicans or heathens, but freely conversed with both, in order to their conversion, never ceasing to attempt the cure of any till they became incorrigible, as, in this case, the brother admonished so oft in vain is supposed to be, and therefore to be one of whose salvation we have as little hope, as the Jews had of heathens and publicans.

"The papists hence argue for the infallibility and final decisions of all doctrines by the church catholic; concluding thus, If he who will not hear the church is in the judgment of God himself to be held as a publican or heathen, merely because he doth not hear her; and if God will ratify in heaven her judgment here on earth, as is asserted in the following verse; then cannot the church err in any matter belonging unto faith, because it is impossible, that God should approve her error in any matter of faith, or require us under this penalty to hear her."

But the command to tell the offence of our private brother, is not a command to tell it to the church catholic met in council; for then this precept could not have been obeyed for the first three centuries, no such council ever meeting till the time of Constantine. Then (2.) the church must always be assembled in such a council, because doubtless there are, and will be always, persons thus offending against their Christian brethren. And (3.) then every private person must be obliged at what distance soever he be from it, and how unable soever he may be to do so, to travel to this council, and lay his private grievance before them: all which are palpable absurdities. Christ therefore only commands the offended person to tell this to the church, or particular community of which he is a member, as will be evident from the like rule prescribed

* "Magna dignitas animarum, ut unaquæque habeat ab ortu nativitatis in custodiam sui Angelum delegatum." Vide Petav. de Angelis lib. ii. cap. 6.

among the Jews, and practised by the primitive Christians. Thus in the book Mischar Happenenim* the wise man saith, If thy brother offend against thee, reprove him between him and thee alone, and if he hear thee, thou hast gained him; if he hear thee not, take with thee one or two brethren, who may hear it; if then he hear thee not, count him a vile person. And in the book Musar, He that reproves his brother, must do it first without witnesses, betwixt his brother and himself alone; if he amend, it is well; if not, take some companions, that thou mayest shame him before them; if neither this way succeed, he ought to shame him, and lay open his fault before many; nor is any thing more common among Jewish writers, than to excommunicate the obstinate person, "publico præconio," with proclamation made in the synagogue. And therefore this telling it to the church, is, in Justin Martyr,† admonishing him, when his obstinacy needs it, κατὰ κοινὸν, publicly; and the consequent excluding him from the society, being done according to St. Paul's direction to his Corinthians, συναχθέντων ὑμῶν, when they were gathered together, (1 Cor. v. 4.) is therefore styled by him, ἐπιτιμία ὑπὸ τῶν πλείονων, the punishment inflicted by many. (2 Cor. ii. 6.)

[8] Ver. 18. Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever things ye shall bind on earth, ἐσται δεδεμένα ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever things ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.] For explication of these words, let it be noted,

First, That Christ saith not, what persons ye shall bind on earth; but what things; which seems to intimate, that our Lord speaks primarily of things, and only consequentially of persons to be bound and loosed, as having contracted guilt by, or as being absolved from the guilt of, those things. Note, Secondly, That λύειν, to loose in Scripture, and the Jewish writers, hath relation to sin, and the pardon of it: so Job xlii. 9. Job prayed for his three friends, and God accepted the face of Job, καὶ ἔλυσεν ἁμαρτίαν αὐτοῖς, and forgave their sin: so Ecclus. xxviii. 2. Forgive the injury of thy brother; and so when thou prayest, ἁμαρτίαι σοῦ λυθήσονται, thy sins shall be forgiven: and then, by the rule of contraries, τὸ δῆσαι, to bind, must be to retain their sins, or leave them under the guilt, and obnoxious to the punishment of them. Thus, because a vow or oath renders us obnoxious to punishment upon a transgression of it, the person thus vowing or swearing is said to bind his soul by a bond, Numb. xxx. 4. 11. And in the Jewish phrase, to bind, is to forbid, under the penalty of God's displeasure; so Numb. xi. 28. Moses, master forbid them; "osarnun," bind them, saith the Chaldee; and to loose, is to permit the doing this or that, and to pronounce them free from sin and punishment, or God's displeasure, though they do it. So in this very chapter: The lord of that servant had compassion on him; and ἀπέλυσεν, he loosed him, and forgave him the debt: and the woman that had a spirit of infirmity, is said to be loosed from it, (Luke xiii. 12.) by the remission of the temporal punishment inflicted on her for her sin. This being premised, these words may have a threefold interpretation.

First, The first is, that of the fathers, That whosoever doth thus admonish his brother as our Lord commands, if he refuse to hearken to his admonition, and therefore be esteemed by him as a heathen, he is bound by him, and shall be bound in heaven; and being moved by his admonition to that repentance which obliges his brother to remit his sin, shall be loosed in heaven. So Origen.* He speaks not thus (say Chrysostom and Theophylact†) to the ruler of the church, but to the injured person: for not he whom the priest alone, but those whom the offended persons bind or loose, are bound and loosed. And when thou (saith St. Austin‡) holdest thy brother a heathen, or a publican, thou hast bound him upon earth; when thou hast procured his amendment, "solvisti eum in terra," thou hast loosed him upon earth. Now this solution and ligation, which, saith Origen, agree best with the context, being the work of any Christian who doth thus thrice admonish and reprove his brother, and who, being the person injured, is the most proper to loose or pardon the offence, can be no evidence of any infallible authority annexed to it, unless we do suppose all private Christians to be infallible; and so, according to this import of them, these words cannot be fitly used to plead for an infallible authority in the governors of the church.

Secondly, Others say with St. Jerome here, These words are spoken to the apostles, to whom our Lord directeth his discourse in this whole chapter; and this may be confirmed from St. Luke, who tells us, that when our Lord had warned them against giving scandal to his little ones, and bid them, when their brother sinned against them, to rebuke him, (xvii. 5.) that the apostles said unto him, Lord, increase our faith; when therefore he saith here, λέγω ὑμῖν, I say unto you, he must speak to the apostles.

Moreover, our Lord had spoken these very words to St. Peter, xvi. 19. where they can have no relation to this matter of reproof, and therefore may be well supposed here to give the like authority to his apostles in the general. Let it be then remembered, that to bind, is to declare a thing forbidden; i. e. not to be done, under pain of the Divine displeasure; to loose, is to absolve from obligation to do, or to abstain from such an action, or to say, God will not hold us guilty for the doing or omitting of it. In which sense Isis in Diodorus Siculus§ seems to say, Ὅσα ἐγὼ δήσω οὐδεὶς δύναται λῦσαι, I am the queen of this country, and whatsoever things I bind (require or forbid, under pain of my displeasure) no man can loose (or exempt you from punishment upon disobedience): and then the sense of these words will run thus; Nor shall you only in these cases have power as Christians to loose your repenting and bind your obstinately offending brother; but, as you are my apostles, to whom I have promised my Spirit, to teach you all things, and lead you into all truth, (John xvi. 13. xiv. 26.) whatsoever things ye shall bind on earth, or shall declare to be forbidden under pain of my displeasure, shall render them indeed obnoxious to my wrath; and whatsoever things ye shall loose on earth (though once required by Divine authority of those who owned the law of Moses) shall be loosed in heaven, and men shall be allowed to do them without incurring my displeasure. And in this sense, this promise is the foundation of our obligation to believe and obey all the commands and doctrines of the apostles, and of the cessation of the ritual precepts of the law of Moses.

Thirdly, Others conceive these words were spoken to the apostles and their successors, and that they give them power to excommunicate the stubborn criminal, and to absolve the penitent: but then (1.) it is confessed, on all hands, That this power of excommunication and absolution belongs severally to every priest; according to those words of Lombard,* omnes et soli sacerdotes recipiunt potestatem clavium, all priests, and they alone, have the power of the keys; and then, surely it makes nothing for infallibility. (2.) The text plainly speaks of matters criminal, which are the only object of the church's censure, and not of articles of faith: now even Romanists themselves acknowledge, that the church may err in passing judgment of these things, because, in cases of this nature, she depends on human testimony; and therefore it is certain that nothing can be hence concluded concerning the infallibility of councils, or any articles of faith defined by them.

[9]Ver. 19, 20. Πάλιν λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι ἐὰν δύο ὑμῶν συμφωνήσωσιν, &c. Again I say unto you, That if two of you shall agree upon earth, as touching any thing that they shall ask, &c. For where two or three are gathered together in my name, &c.] Here again,

First, One ancient exposition of these words refers them to the offended person, and the injurious person repenting of his sin, of whom it may be reasonably supposed, that he will not only ask God pardon for his sin, but will entreat his offended brother to assist him in so doing; and then these words assure him that the prayer of faith put up in the name of Christ shall obtain his pardon; the prayer of faith being effectual, not only for the recovery of the sick, but also for the remission of his sins. (James v. 14, 15.) This exposition of the words we find twice in St. Basil,† and in other fathers; but it is liable to this objection, that it restrains these words to one particular, viz. the pardon of the penitent; whereas it is, περὶ παντὸς πράγματος, concerning any thing that they shall ask. And, therefore,

Secondly, Others restrain these words to the apostles, looking on them as a promise peculiarly made to them; as those words, I say to you, seem to insinuate; so Chrysostom,‡ Euthymius, and Theophylact: and then the coherence will run thus; viz. And you may be assured of this assistance of the Spirit, in any matter respecting the discharge of your apostolical function, if you unanimously consent to ask it in my name; i. e. by interceding to the Father in my name; according to those words of Christ, Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask, and ye shall receive, John xvi. 24. and ver. 26. In that day shall ye ask the Father in my name: thus do they pray for signs and miracles to be done in the name of Jesus; and doing this, they were all filled with the Holy Ghost. (Acts iv. 29—31.) Now, according to either of these interpretations, it is evident, that these words can afford no argument for the infallibility of councils in their decisions.

[10] Ver. 21. Then came Peter to him, and said, Lord, Ποσάκις ἁμαρτήσει εἰς ἐμὲ ὁ ἀδελφός μου, καὶ ἀφήσω αὐτῷ; ἕως ἑπτάκις; how oft shall my brother offend against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?] The determination of the rabbins in this case runs thus, That three offences are to be remitted, but not the fourth; and this they gathered from those words, For three transgressions, and for four, I will not turn away my wrath. (Amos i. 3.) St. Peter puts the three and four together, as perhaps others of their doctors did, and asks, Whether he must forgive till seven times? Of this forgiveness, see note on Matt. vi. 14, 15.

[11] Ver. 23. Διὰ τοῦτο ὡμοιώθη ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν, The kingdom of heaven may be likened to a certain king, &c.] i. e. So will God deal with Christian professors under the gospel, as this king did with his servants: from this parable some inferences may be practically, some doctrinally made. The practical inferences are these; (1.) from ver. 33. οὐκ ἐδεῖ καί σε, since I forgave thee ten thousand talents, oughtest not thou to have forgiven thy fellow-servant his hundred pence? We learn the equity of this unlimited forgiveness of our brother here required, because our God and Saviour have forgiven us more numerous and heinous sins, than our brother is capable of committing against us. (2.) The lord forgiving here his servant, because he had not wherewith to pay, (ver. 25. 27.) and being angry with him because he would not have compassion on his fellow-servant, but went and cast him into prison, not having patience with him till he should pay the debt; this seemeth to bear hard on those unmerciful and unchristian creditors, who cast poor men, who they know have nothing to pay, into prison for their debt; augmenting thus their debt by the gaoler's fees, and rendering them less able to pay than they were before; and so rendering their brother's state more miserable, and their debt from him as desperate as ever. For sure, he that bids us lend, hoping for nothing again, will not allow us to imprison, where nothing can be hoped for; and it is to be feared, that men so unmerciful may find but little mercy at that day: for if it be a crime that will be then objected to our condemnation, that we did not visit Christians when in prison, what will it be to cast them into prison?

The doctrinal observation, which truly seems to be inferible from this text, is this, That sins, once forgiven, may, by our forfeiture of that pardon by our misdemeanours, be again charged upon us; for after this lord had forgiven his servant the whole debt, (ver. 27.) he being angry with him for his unmerciful deportment towards his fellow-servant, delivers him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due to him; (ver. 34.) and then it follows, so likewise will my heavenly Father do to you, (ver. 35.) The conclusion from this place, saith Dr. Hammond, is this, That God's pardons in this life are not absolute; but, according to the petition of the Lord's prayer, answerable to our dealings with others, and so conditional, and are no longer likely to be continued to us, than we perform the condition.

Obj. It remains only, that I answer the objection of Crellius from this place, against the satisfaction of our Lord, viz. "That in this parable, God is compared to a king, remitting a great debt to his servant, without satisfaction or payment made, only because he desired him, and requiring others to imitate his compassion towards their fellow-servants; whereas, if God remits no sin without requiring satisfaction, he is not duly represented by a king that remits a debt merely because his servant begged him so to do; nor can we by this example be induced to a free forgiveness of our brother's sins, without a satisfaction made to us: for how can we be moved to such forgiveness by his example, who will not forgive our sins without satisfaction made to his justice?"

First, That all a governor can inflict on the account of sin, is punishment; all that the sinner can undergo by reason of it, is some penal evil; and therefore, all that forgiveness of the sinner can imply, is the exempting him from punishment, or from the evil to which he was obnoxious by sin.

Secondly, That by admitting another to suffer in my stead, I am as much forgiven as I could be, did he not suffer in my stead, because I am as much freed from suffering any punishment on the account of my offence; and, how can I be more forgiven, than I am by such an act, as removes from me the whole punishment, as much as if I never had offended? That God requires such conditions as faith and repentance, in order to our freedom from the guilt of sin, is by the Socinians themselves allowed to be no bar to the freedom of God's grace and mercy in the pardon of it: the reason is, because there is nothing of suffering contained in these conditions, and so nothing by way of satisfaction or punishment for sin required. Hence then it is evident, that the example of this forgiveness may reasonably induce us to require no satisfaction of him who hath offended us, because God required none of us when we had offended. And the parable here may well press us to a free forgiveness of our brother, by the example of that God, who hath required no suffering at all from us in order to the pardon of our sins.

CHAP. XIX.

1. AND it came to pass, that when Jesus had finished these sayings, he departed from Galilee, and came into the coasts of Judea, beyond Jordan; (to the place where John was baptizing at the first, John x. 40.)

2. And great multitudes followed him; and (he taught them as he was wont, Mark x. 1. and) he healed them there.

3. [1] The pharisees also came unto him, tempting him, and saying unto him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife (as some of our doctors say) for every cause?

4. [2] And (but) he answered and said unto them, Have ye not read, that he who made them at the beginning (of the creation, Mark x. 6.) made them male and female;

5. And said (also), For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh?

6. Wherefore (by virtue of this institution) they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined (thus) together, let no man (by divorcing) put asunder.

7. [3] They say unto him, (If this be so) why did Moses then command to give (to the woman) a writing of divorcement, and (so) to put her away? (He answering (to this) saith unto them, What did Moses command you? Mark x. 3. Then they said, Moses permitted (us) to write a bill of divorcement, and so send her away, ver. 4. Then)

8. He saith unto them, Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts (writ that commandment unto you, Mark x. 5. by which he) suffered you to put away your wives; but from the beginning it was not so (no divorce being allowed or practised before).

9. [4] And (therefore) I (who came to reduce things to their primitive perfection) say unto you, (That under the gospel dispensation) whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery (with that other); and whoso marrieth her that is put away committeth adultery (with her).

10. His disciples say unto him, [5] If the case of the man be so with his wife (that he must be still bound to her), it is not good to marry.

11. But he said unto them, [6] All men cannot receive this (that) saying, save (but) they (only) to whom it is given (i. e. they only can lead a pure single life, who by a special gift of God are enabled so to do; some indeed must do it).

12. For there are some eunuchs, which were so born from their mother's womb; and there are some eunuchs, which were made eunuchs of men; and (some resolve upon it, that they may be fitter to serve God without distraction; for) there be eunuchs that have made themselves (as) eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. (And here the rule is this,) He that is able to receive it, let him receive it. (He that by this special gift of God is enabled to retain his virgin, may do well to do so.)

13. [7] Then were there brought to him little children, that he should (touch them, and) put his hands on them, and pray (over them): and (but) his disciples rebuked them (that brought them).

14. But Jesus (being much displeased at this action of his disciples, Mark x. 14.) said (unto them), Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come to me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven; (nor shall any man enter into it, who becomes not like unto them, Mark x. 15.)

15. And he laid his hands on them, and (blessing them) departed thence.

16. And, behold, one came, and said to him, Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?

17. And he said to him, [8] Why callest thou me good? (i. e. Why givest thou me a title not ascribed to your renowned rabbins, nor due to any mere man? Thinkest thou, there is in me any thing more than human, or that the Father dwelleth in me? This thou oughtest to believe, if thou conceivest that this title truly doth belong to me, seeing) there is none good but one, that is, God: but (to thy question, I say) [9] if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.

18. He saith unto him, Which? Jesus said, (Thou knowest the commandments to be these, Mark x. 19.) Thou shalt do no murder; Thou shalt not commit adultery; Thou shalt not steal; Thou shalt not bear false witness;

19. Honour thy father and thy mother: and, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

20. The young man saith to him, (Master) All these things have I kept from my youth up: what lack I yet?

21. Jesus (then beholding him, loved him, Mark x. 21. and) said to him, (One thing is yet lacking to thee,) [10] If thou wilt be perfect (fully instructed in the highest duties of my doctrine, they are these), go and (now I require it)

sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me, (taking up thy cross, Mark x. 21.)

22. But when the young man heard that saying, he went away (from Christ) sorrowful: for he had great possessions (on earth, which he could not part with for treasures in heaven).

23. Then said Jesus to his disciples, Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.

24. And again I say unto you, [11] It is easier for a camel (or a cable-rope) to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man (who trusteth in his riches, Mark x. 24.) to enter into the kingdom of God.

25. When his disciples heard it (this), they were exceedingly amazed, saying, Who then can be saved?

26. But Jesus beheld them, and said unto them, With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible (i. e. human persuasion can hardly thus take off men's hearts from the world, but the power of God can do it).

27. Then answered Peter and said unto him, Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?

28. And Jesus said to them, Verily I say unto you, That ye who have (thus) followed me (now) [12] in the regeneration (or this new state of things), when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel; (i. e. you shall be the chief ministers in my kingdom, to preach that doctrine to the Jews, by which they shall be judged, Luke xxii. 29. see the note.)

29. And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, [13] shall receive a hundredfold (now in this life with persecution, Mark x. 30. i. e. they shall have more and greater blessings than they part with here), and shall inherit everlasting life (hereafter).

30. [14] But many that are (now) first shall be last; and (they that are now) the last shall be first (i. e. the Jews, to whom the blessings of this kingdom are first to be offered, shall be the last that shall partake of them; and the gentile, to whom they are to be offered after them, shall first enjoy them).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XIX.

[1] Ver. 3. AND the pharisees came unto him, tempting him, and saying, Εἰ ἔξεστιν ἀνθρώπῳ ἀπολῦσαι τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν; Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?] The school of Hillel taught, that a man might put away his wife for any cause; because this divorce was permitted, if she found not grace in his eyes, (Deut. xxiv. 1.) and this was suitable to the current practice and exposition of these words. For that which we render, The Lord saith he hateth putting away, Mal. ii. 16. is by the Chaldee and the Septuagint rendered thus, The Lord saith, ἐὰν μισήσας, ἐξαποστείλῃς, if thou hatest thou shouldest put her away. And the son of Sirach saith, xxv. 26. If she go not as thou wouldest have her, cut her off from thy flesh, give her a bill of divorce, and let her go. And Josephus saith,* the law runs thus, He that would be dis- joined from his wife, καθ' ἃς δηποτοῦν αἰτίας, πολλαὶ δ' ἂν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις τοιαυταὶ γίνονται, for any cause whatsoever, as many such causes there are, let him give her a bill of divorce. And he confesseth,* that he himself put away his wife after she had borne him three children, μὴ ἀρεσκόμενος αὐτῆς τοῖς ἤθεσι, because he was not pleased with her behaviour. The school of Sammah determined on the contrary, that the wife was only to be put away for adultery; because it is said, Because he hath found some uncleanness in her. The pharisees seek the resolution of this question from Christ, tempting him, i. e. to induce him, to decide this question, either against the law of Moses, or else, as he must do, against the determination of one of these two famous schools, and so to render him offensive to them.

[2] Ver. 4. But he answering, said unto them, Have ye not read, that he who made them at the beginning made them ἄρσεν καὶ θῆλυ, *male and female;—*καὶ ἔσονται οἱ δύο εἰς σάρκα μίαν, and they two shall be one flesh?] i. e. God, by making them at first male and female, made them so, that they might cleave together so as to become one flesh; and when they have, after a mutual consent to enter into that relation, done so, they are no more two, but one flesh; and therefore are not to be separated, unless, by cleaving so unto another, they have made themselves one flesh with that other. That this is the effect of this conjunction with one another, seems evident (1.) from those words of the apostle, 1 Cor. vi. 16. Know ye not, that he that is joined to a harlot, is one body with her? for two (saith he, i. e. God) shall be one flesh: and (2.) from the inference ὥστε, so that they, after this conjunction, are no more two, but one flesh; and those whom God from the beginning hath thus framed, and of whom he hath thus spoken, let no man put asunder. God himself, who binds, may see cause to permit in some cases the solution of this obligation, to prevent cruelty and other mischiefs, as he did to the Jews, by reason of the hardness of their hearts, allowing a divorce; but, without such permission, no man ought to do it. There seems to be something like this in that of Hierocles,† that ἐπὶ γάμον ἐξοτρύνουσα ἡ φύσις, nature prompts us to marriage, in that she hath made us συνδυαστικοῦς, so that two should live together, and have one common work to beget children. And that tale of Plato,‡ in his Convivium, that man at first was made male and female, and that Jupiter cleft them asunder, and so there was a natural love one to the other, ἐπιχειρῶν ποιῆσαι ἓν ἐκ δυοῖν καὶ ἰάσασθαι τὴν φύσιν τὴν ἀνθρωπίνην, endeavouring to make one again of two, and to heal human nature, seems to be only a corruption of the story in Genesis, that Eve was made out of Adam's rib.

Ver. 5. Καὶ εἶπεν, And he said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, &c.] Here also, say the Greek scholiasts, it was not God, but Adam, who said this; other interpreters conceit that Moses said this by Divine inspiration, and so God said it by him; hence the Jews, saith Mr. Selden,§ represent this as a law against incestuous marriages. Or else these may be the words of Christ, who, ver. 4. εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, said to them, He that made them in the beginning made them male and female, καὶ εἶπεν; and he said also, For this cause, &c. citing the words recorded, Gen. ii.

24. and this seems probable from Mark x. 6, 7. where the whole words are plainly ascribed to Christ.

[3] Ver. 7. They say unto him, Τί οὖν Μωσῆς ἐνετείλατο δοῦναι βιβλίον ἀποστασίου, καὶ ἀπολῦσαι αὐτήν? Why then did Moses command to give her a bill of divorcement, and put her away?] Here it is to be noted, that Moses commanded no man to divorce his wife, but only ἐπέτρεψεν, he permitted in some cases the doing of it; but then he acting in this as God's minister, it must be a Divine permission. Note, (2.) That it was a limited permission, viz. only to do it after such a manner, viz. by writing a bill of divorcement, and putting it into her hand: for, if this might have been done by word of mouth, or otherwise, it might have occasioned a great evil on both sides; for the woman might have pretended, when she liked another better than her husband, that she had been divorced, and so might marry him; and the man might rashly have divorced his wife upon any little quarrel, and never be in a condition of having her any longer as his wife: to prevent which divorces upon such a sudden pet, it was the custom to ask the person who came for a bill of divorce, before they delivered it to him, Whether his yea was yea? i. e. whether he continued in a settled resolution to put away his wife. (See note on 2 Cor. i. 17.) But the great question is, Whether this permission excused this divorce from sin, or only from punishment? That it could not excuse him that divorced his wife from sin, is argued, (1.) because our Saviour decides this question negatively, and that by reason of God's own institution founded upon nature, (ver. 4, 5.) and represents the permission mentioned by Moses as contrary to it, (ver. 8.) Now all transgression of Divine law is sin; (2.) because Christ saith, this permission was only granted to them for the hardness of their hearts: now whatsoever is done upon that principle, is sinful: (3.) and, especially, since otherwise it follows, That divorces are only evil because forbidden, and so are only sins against a positive command; and not forbidden, because evil, or because contrary to the law of nature; and then, either adultery can be no sin against the law of nature, or else Christ could not truly say, that he that putteth away his wife, and marries another, committeth adultery against her.

But on the other hand, That this permission excused those Jews, who made these divorces according to the law, not only from punishment by man, but also from fault before God, and more especially from being guilty of adultery, is evident, (1.) from the permission given to the woman thus divorced, to marry with another, Deut. xxiv. 2. which plainly shews, the bond of matrimony must by it be dissolved, since otherwise this must be a permission to be an adulteress. (2.) From the prohibition of the person thus divorcing her, to receive her again as his wife; which yet he was bound to do, if the bond of matrimony still continued, and she was still in truth his wife. And (3.) because, otherwise, the whole commonwealth of Judea, by a Divine permission, must be filled with adulteries, and with a spurious offspring. To answer therefore to the former arguments:

First, It is granted, That, as our Saviour says, these divorces were indeed contrary to the equity and genuine intention of God's primitive institution of matrimony; but then it must be added, that God by Moses dispensed with his own institution; and that Christ only says, that under his new law, this dispensation should not obtain, but that he would have his disciples to act according to the primitive institution.

Secondly, In answer to the second argument, it may be said, That what was permitted to the Jews, by reason of the hardness of their hearts, was no less permitted than what they were allowed to do, by reason of the indifference of the thing: whatsoever therefore was the cause of this permission, it is certain, that which was permitted could not at the same time be forbidden, and therefore could not be a fault, or that which God would punish in them.

Thirdly, To the third argument, it may be answered, That a thing may be said to be according to the law of nature two ways: (1.) because nature doth direct us to it by the provisions it hath made for such an end; in which sense, it is natural for women to give suck to their children: or, by the relation in which it hath placed us; in which sense the apostle saith, that even nature teacheth the woman to be covered in the church assemblies, and to wear long hair: (see the note on 1 Cor. xi. 13.) or, by the frame and constitution of things; in which sense man and wife are one flesh, and therefore ought not to separate from one another: and Christians ought, where greater reason doth not intervene, to act according to that which is thus suitable to the law of nature. Or, (2.) because the law of nature doth require it as necessary in reason to be done, or doth forbid it by reason of some moral turpitude, which always of necessity adhereth to the action; in which sense it may be said, that divorces and polygamy are not against a law of nature, but only against a positive command. And whereas it is objected, That then adultery will be no sin against the law of nature; I answer, That as adultery imports the lying of a husband with another, who is confessedly not his wife, or of a wife with another, whom she knows to be not her husband, it is unquestionably a sin against the law of nature, as being contrary to the faith plighted by them; contrary to justice, as being giving that to others, which is not your own; and contrary to the good of families and commonwealths, as filling them with a spurious offspring, and loosing the bonds of consanguinity and affinity. But then, if the polygamist then used only those to whom by matrimony he was contracted, there was not the like injury or injustice done: nor can I think that Abraham, Jacob, David, and other pious men, would have had more wives, or wives and concubines, had this been a plain violation of the law of nature; nor would God have so highly approved of them, had they lived in adultery. And, if divorce untied the bond of matrimony, it gives that liberty to each party, which cannot be allowed of whilst that bond continues; and so there could not be the same cause of blame or guilt in their cohabiting with another: it therefore may be granted, that these were rather sins against a positive or natural directive, than a moral precept or law of nature.

Ver. 9. And I say unto you, Ὃς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, εἰ μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ καὶ γαμήσῃ ἄλλην, μοιχᾶται, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery.] Here it seems evident, that Christ prescribes a new law, which had not before obtained among the Jews; divorce being permitted to them for other causes: for though it be said, Deut. xxiv. 1. he must find some matter of uncleanness in her; yet that cannot signify fornication or adultery, seeing for these things she was by the law to die by stoning, if she committed fornication before her marriage was completed, Deut. xxii. 24. by strangling, say the Jews, in case of adultery, ver. 22. (2.) Because this divorce was permitted to all, except the person, who falsely pretended he found her not a maid; for that law so peculiar to him, he may not put her away all his days, Deut. xxii. 19. shews that others were permitted so to do: now adultery being a sin against the law of nature, could be permitted upon no account. And (3.) any other, excepting only the high-priest, (Lev. xxi. 7.) might marry her who was thus put away; (Deut. xxiv. 2.) whereas it could be lawful for no man to commit adultery with her. (See also the note on Mark x. 10, 11.)

Moreover, whereas all commentators I have met with, by fornication here do understand adultery, or the defiling of the marriage-bed; I incline ratherto take the word in its proper sense, for fornication committed before matrimony, and found after cohabitation. (1.) Because Christ, speaking of this divorce here and elsewhere, doth never use the word μοιχεία, which signifies adultery, but always πορνεία, (Matt. v. 32.) which word, both among Jews and gentiles, doth properly import the sin of unmarried persons lying one with another, and so being made one body: (1 Cor. vi. 16.) it is not therefore likely, that Christ receded from the known and common acceptation of the word. (2.) The punishment of adultery after marriage was strangling; after sponsalia, stoning; divorce not being mentioned in either case; but simple fornication was not thus punished by the Jews. And (3.) by this interpretation, the law of marriage is by Christ reduced to its primitive institution; that conjunction with another makes them both one flesh; and so the woman who had thus transgressed was to be dismissed, because she before was one flesh with another, and therefore could not be so with the man to whom she afterward did marry. Note also hence, that, according to either interpretation, where it is lawful to put away the wife, it is so to marry again: for (1.) such were the divorces of the Jews, of which Christ speaks; and (2.) Christ, by pronouncing such divorces as were not, for this cause, adulterous in him that married another, doth plainly insinuate, there was no such crime committed in this case; and then the marriage must be dissolved by that act.

Εἰ μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ, except for fornication.] St. Jerome here saith, that if the woman hath committed adultery, "non debet teneri," she ought not to be kept by her husband, lest he fall under condemnation, he being pronounced a fool and a wicked person, "qui adulteram tenet," who retains an adulteress, as the Septuagint reads, Prov. xviii. 27. The Greek fathers say, almost generally, it is καλὸν ἐκβάλλειν, an honourable thing to cast her out: and St. Austin* having said it was permitted, but not commanded so to do, retracts that saying, as being contrary to the words of Solomon. He that retains her, say the Apostolical Constitutions, is φύσεως θεσμοῦ παρανόμος, a transgressor of the law of nature. (Lib. vi. cap. 14.)

[5] Ver. 10. If the case of a man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry.] If under the prohibition of divorce, that of polygamy had not been contained, there would have been no cause for this inference of Christ's disciples; seeing they might have had a remedy, by taking one or more other wives, whom they loved better; nor would there have been any ground for Christ's discourse, of making themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of God.

Εἰ οὕτως ἔστιν ἡ αἰτία.] Grotius, Casaubon, and Bois, render αἰτία here the condition, in which sense it is frequently among the Latins; but seeing αἰτία is in Hesychius, τὰ κατ' ἀρχὴν πράγματα; and in Phavorinus, ἀρχὴ ἡ πήγη, the beginning or original of the thing; and Christ is here speaking of the original of matrimony, or of what it was, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, and reducing things to that state; why may not the apostles be conceived to speak thus?—If this be indeed the original of matrimony, and thou intendest to take from us the liberty of divorces, which Moses granted, and to reduce marriage to its first original, it will not be good to marry.

[6] Ver. 11. Οὐ πάντες χωροῦσι τὸν λόγον τοῦτον, All men cannot receive this saying.] i. e. All men cannot live single, and abstain from matrimony. Whence it follows, that men and women are not by monastical vows to be obliged so to do; because none ought to be by vow obliged to do that which they cannot perform without sin. (2.) By adding, that they only can do this, to whom it is given; he shews, this is a special gift; according to these words of St. Paul, I would have all men to be as I am: but every man hath his proper gift. (1 Cor. vii. 7.) Now that which all men may obtain by prayer, temperance, and fasting, and such-like ordinary means, cannot be called a special gift, or a gift proper to some. And (3.) some, saith Christ, have made themselves eunuchs; i. e. abstained from matrimony for the kingdom of heaven; i. e. to be more expedite in preaching the gospel, or more fit to regard only the things of the Lord: (1 Cor. vii. 34.) He that can receive it, let him receive it; which last words sufficiently intimate, all men cannot do so.

[7] Ver. 13, 14. They brought unto him little children, that he should put his hands upon them, and pray.] This being the gospel used by our church at the celebration of infants' baptism, it will be necessary to shew the fitness of it for that purpose. Note, therefore,

First, That these little children being styled τὰ βρέφη, infants, (Luke xviii. 15.) and taken up in Christ's arms, (Mark x. 16.) it is plain that they were children not yet come to the age of discretion; for βρέφος, according to Eustathius and Phavorinus, is τὸ ἄρτι γεγονὸς παιδίον καὶ τρεφόμενον ἀπὸ τήθης, a new-born child nourished from the teat, from his birth, till he be four years old: (so 1 Pet. ii. 2.) whence they do not come to Christ, but are brought to him.

Secondly, They seem to be brought to Christ by those who believed he was a prophet sent from God, not by those who had other thoughts of him; for why should they desire for their children his prayers, or the imposition of his hands?

Thirdly, These children were not brought to be healed of any bodily distemper, for then the disciples would not have hindered them, but that he should bless them, and pray over them; which shews that they were capable of spiritual blessings, and may receive advantage by prayers; and that he might lay his hands upon them. Now this imposition of hands could not be to prepare them for any office, nor seems it designed to procure to them any remission of sin, of which the Jews conceived infants not guilty (though this would prove them capable of some means by which their sins might be pardoned); but to obtain for them some spiritual blessing appertaining to the kingdom of God; or, as Dr. Lightfoot saith, by this rite to admit them into the number of his disciples, or to own them as belonging to his kingdom. And,

Fourthly, From the reason why Christ would have them suffered to come to him, viz. for of such is the kingdom of God, it appears there is something in little children, why they should not be hindered from coming to him, besides their being emblems of humility; for this they are as much when they come not, as when they come: now what can that be, but the fitness of them to be early dedicated to the service of God, and to enter into covenant with him by rites appointed by him for that end? And hence the ancients looked upon this as a sufficient ground for infants' baptism,* as appears even from Tertullian,† whilst he shews his dislike of the custom.

Obj. But, say the antipedobaptists, Christ neither did baptize them, nor command the apostles to do it.

Ans. That is not to be wondered at, if we consider that they already had entered into covenant with God by circumcision, and Christian baptism was not yet instituted; and (2.) that the baptism thus used by John and Christ's disciples, was only the baptism of repentance, and faith in the Messiah, which was for to come; (Acts xix. 4.) of both which infants were incapable, but not of being consecrated to God from their infancy, as Samson, Judg. xi. 7. and Samuel, 1 Sam. i. 11. or of entering into covenant with God, Deut. xxix. 11. 15. as all the male infants of the Jews did by circumcision. (3.) Christ here speaks not of those children only, but of children in general, suffer little children to come to me; he adds a reason common to them all, for of such is the kingdom of heaven; which if it import, they are fit to be admitted into Christ's church and kingdom as they were into the Jewish church, they must be fit to receive Christian baptism, that being the only means of entering into Christ's kingdom. If he means only that they are fit emblems of humility, what reason can be hence given why they should on this account be brought to Christ, that he might lay his hands upon them? Or, why should he be so displeased that they should be forbidden to come to him?

Then they brought unto him little children.] To the argument here used for the baptizing of young children, it may be answered, that they were brought to him, that he might put his hands upon them and heal them; for Mark x. 13. Luke x. 15. they were brought, ἵνα ἅψηται αὐτῶν, that he might touch them: now as the prophets under the Old Testament healed by laying their hands on the diseased, and praying over them; (2 Kings v. 10.) so more certainly were persons healed by the touch of this great Prophet; for as many as touched him were made whole; (Mark vi. 56.) and upon that account, as many as had diseases sought to touch him. (Mark iii. 10. see Mark v. 23. 39. 42.)

But to this I reply, that when any came thus to Christ to touch him, or to desire him to lay his hands upon them, in order to a cure, we find either express declaration, or sufficient intimation, that they accordingly were healed; whereas there is not the least intimation of any bodily cure wrought upon these infants, but rather an intimation of some spiritual benediction; it being not here said, ἐθεράπευσεν, he healed, but εὐλόγησεν, he blessed them. (2.) Christ doth not say, Suffer little children that are diseased, or sick, to come unto me, but, without limitation or distinction, Suffer them to come. Nor (3.) doth he say, Suffer them to come, for they need to be healed as much as those of riper years, but for a reason which equally belongs to all children born of parents who are in covenant with God, viz. for of such is the kingdom of God.

It may be farther said, that they brought them to Christ, as the Jews do now their children to their famous doctors; or, as we do ours to the bishop, to receive his blessing. But to this I answer, that had that custom then obtained among the Jews, neither could the disciples reasonably have forbidden them; neither would our Lord have assigned this as a reason why they should not be forbidden, for of such was the kingdom of God.

[8] Ver. 17. Τί με λέγεις ἀγαθόν; οὐδεὶς ἀγαθὸς, εἰ μὴ εἷς, ὁ Θεὸς, Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God.] Here it is acknowledged, that many of the most ancient fathers * read, God, my Father. That other reading of some fathers,† Why askest thou me concerning good? is neither in the Syriac, nor in any of the evangelists, and so it seemeth to be only of a later date. Now from this place the Socinians argue thus against the Deity of Christ; He to whom the title of good doth not belong, cannot be God most high; by our Lord's own words this title belongs not to him, but only to God the Father: and therefore God the Father must be God alone. And whereas some of the Post-Nicene fathers answer, that this young man said Good Master, out of flattery or ignorance, looking upon Christ as a mere man, and so Christ answers, Why callest thou me good, whom thou dost not acknowledge to be God? this, say they, is an addition to the text, without any ground from Christ's words, yea, in opposition to them, he saying, that one thing only was lacking to him; viz. that he should sell all, &c. whereas the knowledge that Christ was God must also be lacking to him, and so two things, according to the Trinitarian hypothesis. To this it might be answered, that when our Lord saith, one thing is lacking to thee, he respects not his knowledge, but his practice, intending not to say what was lacking in him, as to the knowledge of himself; for it appears not this young man owned him as the promised Messiah; but to instruct him what was yet lacking to perfect his obedience to the commandments of God. Or (2.) that the Deity of Christ, being not revealed so fully as afterward it was, might not then be necessary to be believed to salvation. But not to insist farther on this answer, I reply,

Secondly, That Christ may be supposed to speak to this young man thus: Thou givest me a title, which is never given to your most renowned rabbins, and which agrees to God alone; dost thou therefore think there is any thing in me more than human, or that the Father dwelleth in me? This thou oughtest to believe, if thou conceivest this title truly doth belong to me, seeing there is but one that is good, that is, God. To confirm this interpretation let it be considered, that Christ in preaching to the Jews asserted two things of himself; (1.) that he was a prophet sent from God, even that prophet that should come into the world. (2.) That he had given them clear evidence of his commission from his Father, by the works done by the power of God, which manifestly shewed that God dwelt in him, and that he was in the Father, and the Father in him, so that he and the Father were one; for so he speaks, I and the Father am one; And if I do not the works of my Father, believe me not; but if I do, though you believe not me, believe the works, that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in the Father: (John x. 30. 37, 38. xiv. 8—10.)which words the Jews so apprehended, that they pronounced him guilty of blasphemy; for that being a man he made himself God. (John x. 31. 33.) He therefore might well say to this young man, Why callest thou me good Master? unless thou believest I am a teacher sent from God, seeing he who falsely pretends this cannot be a good master or a teacher of truth; nor canst thou own me as a prophet sent from God, but from my works; from which I have proved, that I am in the Father, and the Father in me; yea, that I am one with the Father, and so partake with him of the title of good.

Thirdly, Maresius well answers, that the Father being the fountain of the whole Deity, must in some sense be the fountain of the goodness and wisdom of the Son. The Son, saith Dr. Bull, is rightly styled, the perfect and adequate image of his Father's goodness, as he derives that goodness, as he doth all his other attributes with the Divine nature, from the Father; and thus to be the fountain of good may belong only to the Father. Hence even the heathens have declared, that of all the perfections of the Deity, that of ἀγαθὸς, good, was the most proper, he being only styled by them good, who was * ὁ πάντα διδοὺς καὶ μηδὲν λαμβάνων, he who gave all to others, but derived nothing from them; and thence they placed goodness, ἐν μόνῳ ἀγενήτῳ, in him only who was unbegotten. And in this sense many of the Ante-Nicene fathers owned that the word did signally, and most excellently, agree to the Father, and to Christ only by reason of the goodness derived with the Divine nature to him, as being God of God; or ἐκ τῆς πρὸς ἀλλήλους σχέσεως, from the essential relation they had to each other: as Clemens Alexandrinus † well explains the matter, thrice saying, that the Father alone is good and just, and yet that the Son, καθὸ δὲ ὁ λόγος ὢν αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ πατρὶ ἔστι, as being the Logos, as he is in the Father is just, τὸ δὲ δίκαιον ἀγαθὸν, and what is just is good; and concluding, Θεὸν ἕνα μόνον εἶναι ἀγαθὸν, δίκαιον, δημιουργὸν, υἱὸν ἐν πατρὶ, that there is one only God, good, just, the maker of all things, the Son in the Father. Novatian‡ answers to them who objected to the orthodox that they owned two Gods, that if Christ being Lord hinders not that of the apostle, there is one Lord; so neither did Christ's being good, and God, hinder there being one God, and one that is good.

Εἰ δὲ θέλεις εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν ζωὴν, τήρησον τὰς ἐντολὰς, But if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.] This being Christ's answer to the young man's question, What good thing shall I do, that I may inherit eternal life? I cannot think, as many seem to do, that Christ here directs him to that way to obtain that life, which neither was nor could be sufficient for that end; it being certain Christ elsewhere saith the same thing. For to the lawyer inquiring, What shall I do to inherit eternal life? Christ answers, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself; this do and thou shalt live. (Luke x. 25. 28.) Now when men came seriously to inquire of him the way to life eternal, who can imagine he would deceive them by directing them to a way which he well knew was not sufficient to obtain that end? Moreover, it is very evident that God in the Old Testament promiseth life to them who observe his commandments, and pronounces them such as he that did them should live by them, (Lev. xviii. 5. Ezek. xx. 11.) promising to those who observe them, that they shall surely live, and not die; (Ezek xviii. 21. xxxiii. 15.) i. e. not die eternally, seeing he cannot be supposed to promise that they should not die a natural death; it is also as certain that they who walked before God, as Zacharias and Elisabeth, in all the commandments of God blameless, were righteous in his sight, (Luke i. 6.) and were said to walk before him with an upright and perfect heart, (Psal. xviii. 21. 24.) and to love him with all their heart and all their soul. (See note on xxii. 37.) It is therefore certain that all pious persons under the Old Testament obtained a right to life eternal, by this observance of the moral precepts of the law.

Obj. 1. But against this it is objected; that when the young man had said, all these have I kept from my youth, Christ yet requires him to sell all that he had, that he might be perfect, and have treasure in heaven.

Ans. True; but then this one thing was contained in the precept of loving, honouring, and obeying God with all his heart; for sure he loves not God above all things, who will not, when he doth require him, part with all things to enjoy God in heaven; nor doth he obey him sincerely, and with a perfect heart, who, when he is required by his ambassador to forsake them and follow him, refuseth so to do.

Obj. 2. It is farther objected, that the law required perfect obedience, and could not absolve the sinner from the guilt of sin.

Ans. To this I answer, That to require perfect obedience to his laws, is a thing absolutely necessary on the part of God, both under the old and the new covenant; for sin being the transgression of the law, and perfect and unsinning obedience being the same, if God require under the new covenant that I should not transgress any of his laws, as he most certainly must do, he must require me not to sin against them, and so he must require perfect, that is, unsinning obedience; and as sincere obedience, which is the condition of our acceptance with God under the new covenant, doth not procure the pardon of our sins committed under that covenant, but the blood of Christ cleanseth us from all sin upon our repentance; so, though the obedience to the moral law, required under the old covenant, could not absolve the sinner from the guilt contracted by the violations of that law; yet doth God there also promise expressly the like pardon to the penitent, that when the wicked man turneth away from his iniquity, he shall not die, but live; (Ezek. xviii.) that when he ceaseth to do evil, and learneth to do well, though his sins were as crimson, he shall be white as wool; (Isa. i. 17, 18.) and that their offerings, which before were vain oblations, should become sacrifices of sweet savour, and procure an atonement for their sins, if not by virtue of his institution, yet certainly by virtue of the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world. And that God required no obedience to his law as necessary to salvation, but that which pious Jews, by virtue of that grace which he was ready to afford them, might be able to perform, is hence apparent, that he not only promises life to them who did obey this law, but by the sacred penmen doth pronounce them blessed, saying, Blessed is the man who meditates in this law day and night; (Psal. i. 6.) Blessed are they who always keep judgment, and do righteousness; (Psal. cxix. 1, 2.) that he that keepeth the law is blessed; (Prov. xxix. 18.) and that in keeping of it there is great reward. (Psal. xix. 12. see Psal. cxix. 1, 2. Prov. viii. 32. 34.) This blessing, therefore, and reward, all pious persons did, and had just reason to expect; and yet it is certain they could not expect it on the performance of what it was not possible for them do: though therefore God said to them cursed, i. e. obnoxious to a curse, is every one that continueth not in all things written in this law to do them; they might be certain from the expiation and atonement he had appointed to be made for sin, and from the gracious promises made by him to the penitent, that they should be exempted from the guilt, and consequently from the curse, due to those transgressions, though they might not expressly know that this redemption was to be procured by the death of their Messiah.

Obj. 3. But doth not the apostle intimate that the law could not give life, by saying, If there had been a law which could have given life, verily justification should have been by the law; (Gal. iii. 21.) that the law worketh wrath; (Rom. iv. 15.) and that as many as are under the law, are under a curse? (Gal. iii. 10.)

Ans. All these things prove, that the transgressions of this law did render them obnoxious to punishment for the guilt of it, and that the law itself, only requiring obedience, could not absolve the sinner from the guilt of his disobedience to it; and therefore could not procure justification to life for the sinner, without an act of grace, temperating the rigour of the law: but yet this proves not there was no pardon to be obtained for the sinner, upon his repentance and faith in God, allowing an atonement for his sin; for then there could have been no place for repentance, or a propitiatory sacrifice under the law, and so no justification not only by the law, which is all St. Paul asserts, but no justification, that is, no freedom from the penalty denounced by it. As therefore under the gospel our justification, or absolution from the guilt of sin, ariseth not from works, but grace through faith; and yet good works and sincere obedience are the conditions requisite to salvation, and the means necessary to obtain it; and therefore of our love to God and to our neighbour as ourselves, it may still be said, Do this and live: so under the law, obedience to the moral precepts of it was the condition of, and the means requisite to obtain, the same life; and therefore of sincere obedience to it, it might well be said, Do this and live, especially seeing under the law faith and repentance were required for the remission of the violations of it.

And as it is necessary, from the perfection of the Divine nature, and his relation to us as a governor, to require that we should not sin, i. e. transgress any of his laws; so it is also necessary, through the imperfection of human nature, that if he will enter into covenant with lapsed sinful man, that that covenant should be a covenant of grace, or should admit of favour upon his repentance; seeing all other covenants would depend, on man's part, on an impossible condition, which is apparently equivalent to none at all; it being in effect the same to promise or engage for nothing, as only to promise something upon a condition I cannot perform.

[10] Ver. 21. Εἰ θέλεις τέλειος εἶναι, &c. If thou wilt be perfect, sell that thou hast, and give unto the poor.] That to be perfect is to be fully instructed in our duty, is proved in the note on 1 Cor. ii. 6. We speak wisdom among those that are perfect, i. e. saith Theodoret, παρὰ τοὺς εἰλικρινῆ καὶ τελείαν δεξαμένους πίστιν, among those whose faith is sincere and entire: hence to know in part is opposed to τὸ τέλειον perfect knowledge. (1 Cor. xiii. 9, 10.) In this sense the word גמר is used by the rabbins, as when they say, they constitute a judge who was not gomar, i. e. fully instructed in the knowledge of the traditions of the fathers; and tell us that one came to Hillel to be made a proselyte, and he said, Do not that to another, which is odious to thyself; that is, the whole law, go thy perfect way; i. e. fully instructed in thy duty. (Cod. Talm. Shabbath. f. 31.) Now (1.) hence then we may discern the vanity of the popish gloss upon this text; viz. If thou wilt be perfect, that is, if thou wilt obtain a higher degree of eternal life, I give thee this counsel, not simply necessary to salvation, but to attain a higher measure of it. For sure the young man needeth not have went away so sorrowful, if, without obeying this counsel, as they are pleased to call it, he might have obtained that eternal life he inquired after, and which contained the whole of his desire. Note, Secondly, That seeing Christ here requires him not only to withdraw his heart from an inordinate love of his possessions, but actually to sell all, and give the money to the poor, we may be sure that this was only a particular command to this young man, to convince him of the insincerity of his pretended love to life eternal, and not a precept common to all Christians. For that there were rich men in the church, we learn from 1 Tim. vi. 17. James i. 10. ii. 2. the apostle John had his own house; Peter permits the Christian to retain his own; (Acts v. 4.) nor doth the apostle bid the Corinthians sell all and give alms, but only request them to give of their abundance: (2 Cor. viii. 13.) so that if riches fall into the hands of one who knoweth how to use them to God's glory, and the relief of indigent Christians, as well as to the supply of his own needs, it seems a contradiction to conceive that God doth require him to part with them, and thereby divest himself of any farther opportunity of promoting his glory, or doing good to his needy members. We are therefore only to do this upon the like occasions, viz. an express command from God; or when we find them an impediment to the securing our eternal interests: for then we must part with our right eye, or hand.

[11] Ver. 24. Εὐκοπώτερόν ἐστι κάμηλον διὰ τρυπήματος ῥαφίδος διελθεῖν· It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, &c.] There is no necessity of reading κάμιλος for κάμηλος, for that both signify a cable, or thick rope used by the mariners in casting anchors, Euthymius, Theophylact, and Phavorinus* testify; and that a camel is not here to be understood, Bochartus argues, (1.) because the Hebrew proverb speaks only of an elephant, not of a camel. (2.) Because the Syriac and Arabic versions here mention not a camel but a cable. (3.) Because the Jews, as Buxtorf† notes, use the same proverb of a cable rope; and (4.) because there is some analogy betwixt drawing a thread and a rope through the eye of a needle, but none at all between a camel and a thread. (Bochart. Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 5. p. 91, 92.)

[12] Ver. 28. Ἐν τῇ παλιγγενεσίᾳ, &c. In the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, ye shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.] I know that Justin Martyr and Irenæus speak of a παλιγγενεσία, regeneration, or renovation, which relates to their supposed millennium, and others would refer this to the stoical renovation of the world after its conflagration; but it is evident that neither of these opinions can here take place; not the supposed renovation of the world after the conflagration of it, since that must burn up all that remain of the twelve tribes of Israel, and so leave none of them remaining to be judged by Christ's apostles. Dr. Lightfoot, finding that this judgment of the twelve tribes is promised to begin when the Son of man sits upon the throne of his glory, which he began to do soon after his ascension, exercising his authority in heaven by sending down the Holy Ghost on his disciples, thinks they then sat on these twelve tribes, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, when they preached that gospel to them in Jerusalem, Judea, and throughout their dispersions, by which they were to be judged, and for contempt and disbelief of which they were rejected, condemned, and exposed to the severest punishment. Christ being mentioned throughout the book of the Revelation, as sitting on his throne from the time of his conquest over death, and his ascension into heaven, the doctrine of the apostles preached to the twelve tribes by the apostles, and sent to them in their epistles, may be said to judge and to condemn them, as the law of Moses is said to do so, John v. 45. and the word of Christ, John xii. 47, 48. 1 John iii. 17, 18. And this seems to be confirmed by Christ's words to them, I appoint to you a kingdom, and ye shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. But,

Secondly, I grant the παλιγγενεσία here mentioned, may be referred to the consummation of the world, and to the new heavens and earth, of which the prophets speak; but then I add, this παλιγγενεσία, or new birth, is only that of the church of Christ, that ζωοποίησις, or new life, that ζωὴ ἐκ νεκρῶν, life from the dead, she shall receive when all Israel shall be saved, and the fulness of the gentiles shall flow in to them. For,

First, The persons here to be judged are only the twelve tribes of Israel, which makes it more than probable, that the whole promise made to the apostles respects their government over these tribes, coming in at the close of the world, after the fall of antichrist; and that not by a resurrection of their persons, but by a reviviscence of that spirit which resided in them, and of that purity and knowledge which they delivered to the world, and chiefly by admission of their gospel to be the standard of their faith, and the direction of their lives.

Secondly, It is observable, that the delivery of the Jews from their former captivities and miseries is always represented as a ζωοποίησις, a giving of life, and a resurrection to the Jews. Seeing then their return from their captivity is in the style of the prophets usually represented as a παλιγγενεσία, a reviving, or new life; why may not the time of their most glorious conversion, and collection from all the corners of the earth, be by our Saviour here represented under that known metaphor? moreover, the Greek interpreters here generally say, παλιγγενεσία τὴν ἀνάστασιν νοεῖ, regeneration here signifies the resurrection. But (1.) we read of no assessors with Christ then, but rather that all shall stand before the judgment-seat. (2.) The apostles here are only said to judge the twelve tribes of Israel; whereas, as they preached the gospel both to Jew and gentile, so by their doctrine shall they then judge both Jew and gentile. (Rom. ii. 16.) Some of the Latin fathers put a stigma after regeneration, and interpret the words thus: You that have followed me in the regeneration, that is, in faith and holiness; but this interpretation is confuted by the parallel place, Luke xxii. 20. which makes this the reward of their abiding with him in his temptation, not of their new birth, in which they could not follow Christ at all.

[13] Ver. 29, 30. Shall receive a hundred-fold, &c.] i. e. They shall have more and greater blessings than they part with, viz. a full content of mind; the comforts of an upright conscience; the joys of the Holy Ghost; increase of grace; and hopes of glory; and shall have God for their Father; and be rich towards God; and have Christ for their spouse, and all good Christians bearing that warm affection to them, which will render them more closely united to, and more affectionately concerned for them, than those who were allied to them by the strictest bonds of nature. And that these words cannot reasonably be interpreted of blessings to be conferred upon them after their resurrection, will be evident from this, that they that are thought worthy to be the sons of the resurrection (saith our Lord) neither marry, nor are given in marriage. (Luke xx. 35.) Whence therefore should they have these mothers, and these children, not to add wives, a hundred-fold? they are made like to the angels at their resurrection; and what should such angelical persons do with, what advantage will they reap from, a hundred houses, or a like increase of land on earth?

If you reply, That these words of our Saviour relate not to the first resurrection, of which this text, which speaks of wives and children, is to be interpreted, but only to the second and general resurrection; I answer, That the words are general, and therefore must include all that are sons of the resurrection. Moreover, by admitting this double resurrection, the first, in which they that are raised might marry, or have wives and children, and the second, in which they could not; the objection, or inquiry of the sadducees, is partly left unanswered: for this distinction doth suppose a resurrection, in which the ground of their inquiry might take place.

xviii. 30. in opposition to what they shall receive in the age to come. Now the millennium is still placed by Dr. B. in the age to come, after the conflagration of the world; this promise therefore cannot refer to his millennium, nor yet to any other which begins after the resurrection of these persons; for that time can with no propriety of speech be said to be now, nor can the blessings then received be said to be received in this life. Moreover, these blessings are to be received, μετὰ διωγμῶν, with persecutions, it being the known observation of critics and grammarians, that μετὰ with a genitive case signifies with, and denotes τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν, the same time, and only with an accusative case signifies after, and denotes ὑστεροχρονίαν, a following time; so that these persecutions must be contemporary with the enjoyment of these blessings; whereas a general peace, and freedom from all persecutions, is made a necessary character of the millennial state.

Lastly, These words afford an argument against the doctrine of the millennium; because, according to them, the only blessing to be received ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τῷ ἐρχομένῳ, in the age to come, is life everlasting; which blessing is confined to heaven, and not to be enjoyed on earth, our house eternal being in the heavens, (2 Cor. v. 1.) and our inheritance eternal reserved in the heavens for us: and therefore they to whom the promise is here made, are not in the world to come to live a thousand years on earth, or to enjoy the temporal blessings promised here; because they are not to be enjoyed in the world to come, but now, in this present life; and because the only blessing promised in the world to come, is not to be enjoyed on earth, but is reserved in the heavens for us. (1 Pet. i. 4.)

[14] Ver. 30. But many that are first shall be last.] Christ speaking here of the blessings which belong to his kingdom, and saying, that as to the participation of them, the Jews shall be the last, seems to confirm the doctrine of St. Paul, that the Jewish nation should be converted at the close of the world, or the last age, when the millennium shall begin.

CHAP. XX.

1. FOR (this, that the first shall be last, may be confirmed to you by this parable,) [1] the kingdom of heaven is like to a man that is a householder, who went out early in the morning to hire labourers into his vineyard (as Christ went first to call the Jews to come into it).

2. And when he had agreed with the labourers for a penny a day (i. e. had told them what should be their wages), he sent them into his vineyard.

3. And he went out about the third hour (by his apostles, sent first to preach in their cities and villages, Matt. x.) and saw others standing idle in the market-place,

4. And said unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard; and whatsoever is right, I will give you. And they went their way.

5. Again he went out about the sixth and ninth hour, and did likewise (preaching by his apostles, assisted by the Holy Ghost, first to the Jews in Judea, and then in the dispersions).

6. And about the eleventh hour he went out, and found others (i. e. the gentiles) standing idle, and saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle?

7. They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us (i. e. the gospel hath not yet been preached to us). He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard; and whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive.

8. So when even was come, the lord of the vineyard saith to his steward, Call the labourers, and give them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first.

9. And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny (i. e. the gentiles had equal privileges and advantages with the Jews).

10. But when the first (the Jews) came, they supposed that they should have received more; and (but) they likewise received every man a penny.

11. And when they had received it, they murmured against the good man of the house (that he had no more regard to them than to other believers),

12. Saying, These last have wrought but one hour (i. e. these gentiles were only called at the last), and thou hast made them equal to us (Jews), who have borne the burden and heat of the day (i. e. have been so long the sons of God, and the children of Abraham).

13. But he answered one of them, and said, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny?

14. Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will give to this last, even as to thee (who dost not less partake of the blessings promised by the Messiah, because the gentiles also do it).

15. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with my own? (to confer the blessings I have purchased, as well upon the gentiles as on thee? or) is thine eye evil, because I am good (towards them)?

16. So the last shall be first, and the first last (i. e. so the gentiles believing in, and thankfully receiving Christ, shall become his church and people, whilst the Jews, murmuring and falling off from Christ, because of this his kindness to the gentiles, shall be excluded, and cast out from this kingdom till the last): for (though) many (of them) be called (by the preaching of the gospel), but few (of them will be) chosen, (or prevailed upon by believing to become the elect of God, Rom. xi. 5. 7.)

17. And Jesus going up to Jerusalem took the twelve disciples (who followed him, fearing what might befal him and them there, Mark x. 32.) apart in their way, and said to them,

18. Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be betrayed to the chief priests and to the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death;

19. And shall deliver him to the gentiles to mock, and to scourge, and to crucify him: and the third day he shall rise again; (for all these things being written of him must be fulfilled, Luke xviii. 31.)

20. [2] Then came to him the mother of Zebedee's children, with her sons, worshipping him, and desiring a certain thing of him.

21. And he said to her (speaking for them as they desired), What wilt thou? she saith unto him, Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on the left, in thy kingdom.

22. But Jesus answered, and said (to them), Ye know not what ye ask (as being ignorant of the state of my kingdom, which will rather call you to sufferings, after the ex- ample of your Lord, than to temporal advantages). [3] Are ye (then) able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? They say unto him, We are able.

23. And he saith unto them, Ye shall drink indeed of my cup, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with (i. e. shall suffer as I must do): [4] but to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them (Gr. save to them) for whom it is prepared of my Father (i. e. the highest gifts, and greatest ministries in my kingdom must be dispensed by me, according to the good pleasure of my Father).

24. And when the ten heard it (i. e. what these had asked), they were moved with indignation against the two brethren (for thus attempting to get that which they thought themselves as worthy of as they).

25. But Jesus (perceiving this) called them unto him, and said, [5] Ye know that the princes of the gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them (at their pleasure, and so you expect it will be in my kingdom, especially as to the gentiles, that you Jews shall be lords over them, and they shall be your servants).

26. But (let me tell you) it shall not be so among you (in the administration of my kingdom): but whosoever will be great among you (in my kingdom), let him be your minister;

27. And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant (for the chiefest officers in my kingdom are only the doing the greatest services to, and ministers for the good of others):

28. (It therefore must be with them) even as (it is with) the Son of man (who) came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, [6] and to give his life a ransom for many.

29. And as they departed from Jericho, a great multitude followed him.

30. And, behold, two blind men sitting by the way-side, when they heard that Jesus passed by, cried out, saying, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou son of David.

31. And the multitude rebuked them, because (that) they should hold their peace; but they cried the more, saying, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou son of David.

32. And (then) Jesus stood still, and called them, and said, What will ye that I should do unto you?

33. They said unto him, Lord, (our request is) that our eyes may be opened.

34. So Jesus had compassion on them, and touched their eyes: and immediately their eyes received their sight, and they followed him.

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XX.

[1] Ver. 1. THE kingdom of heaven is like to a man that is a householder.] Something like this parable being to be found in the Jerusalem Talmud, as are many other of these parables in some of their ancient books, Mr. Clerc thinks it fitter to say, they afterward used them in imitation of Christ, than that Christ, who was an inspired teacher, should take them from the Jews. But (1.) whoever considers the hatred they bore to Christ, will scarce believe they would be concerned to imitate his sayings; and seeing this inspired teacher made frequent use of their proverbs, and, as some learned men aver, took almost the whole Lord's prayer from the prayers used by the Jews; why might not he, who used their parabolical way of teaching, by his Divine wisdom apply such of their parables as he saw proper for that purpose, to resemble the spiritual matter of his kingdom, they being such as would be less offensive, and better be remembered because used by them, and familiar to them? To proceed then to the critical remarks upon this parable, and so on to the import of it: note,

First, That these words, these last, μίαν ὥραν ἐποίησαν, are well rendered, have wrought one hour, for so ποιεῖν signifies, as Dr. Hammond notes in these words of the book of Ruth, ποῦ ἐποίησας, where hast thou wrought? (Ruth ii. 19.) and she shewed her mother ποῦ ἐποίησε where she wrought, and the name of the man μεθ' οὗ ἐποίησε, with whom she wrought; and in the book Ecclesiastes ποίημα is still a work, and ποιεῖν to work; so τὸ ποίημα τὸ πεποιημένον ὑπὸ τὸν ἥλιον is, the work wrought under the sun, Eccles. ii. 17. iv. 3. viii. 9. and iii. 9. so profit is τοῦ ποιοῦντος, to him that worketh in that which he laboureth. Note,

Secondly, That ὀφθαλμὸς ἀγαθὸς, ver. 15. is a liberal or bounteous eye. So Ecclus. xxxv. 8. glorify God ἐν ὀφθαλμῷ ἀγαθῷ, by thy bounty. So עין טוב is benignus oculus, (see Buxt. in voce עין see Dr. Hammond, note b.) and ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρὸς is the envious eye. (See note on Matt. vi. 22.)

Thirdly, That the κλητοὶ here, are those who were called by Christ and his apostles to the marriage-feast or supper of the gospel, offered to them with all its benefits, and yet slighted and refused by them, Luke xiv. 18. The ἐκλεκτοὶ those among the Jews who embraced this call, and so are called by St. Paul ἐκλογὴ the election, and a remnant, κατ' ἐκλογὴν, according to the election of grace; (Rom. xi. 6, 7.) and by St. Peter, the elect. (1 Pet. i. 1. ii. 9.) For the import of this parable seems to be this,—that the Jews, who were first called to be God's people, and to whom the gospel was first preached, and the blessings of the Messiah first offered, shall be, for their unbelief, rejected from being God's people, and so shall be the last in God's esteem, and shall be only made partakers of these blessings at the last; but the gentiles, who therefore came not in before, because they were not called before, shall accept the gracious offer, and so become God's church and people, and be preferred before the Jews, and first partake of the blessings of the gospel: so that they who gloried in the title of being the first-born of God, and those who had served him so long, and therefore murmured that the gentiles should be admitted to the same privileges and favour with them, and that without circumcision or obedience to the law of Moses, and did on that account reject the gospel, shall themselves be rejected, and put last; for, though many of them are called both in Judea, and throughout their dispersions, yet few of them do or will accept that call, or embrace the Christian faith. That this is the true import of this parable, we learn (1.) from the connective particle γὰρ for, which begins this chapter, and thereby shews this parable is designed to prove what was said in the last verse of the former chapter, and is repeated in the close of this parable, ver. 16. viz. That many which were first shall be last, and the last shall be first. And that this relates to the calling in of the gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews, is evident from these words, Luke xiii. 28—30.

So there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves cast out. And they shall come from the east and the west, from the north and south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God. And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and first which shall be last. For in these words Christ plainly shews that the gospel should be received by the gentiles dispersed through all parts of the earth, and they should become the seed of Abraham by faith, whilst the Jews should be excluded from that kingdom, and by this, the last shall be made first, and the first last; and the reason of this, added ver. 16. for many are called, but few chosen, must respect the same Jews. Moreover, that this parable cannot relate to the rewards of another world, is evident from this, that amongst them who receive those rewards, there can be no murmuring as here against God, ver. 11. no evil eye, or envy at the felicity of, or kindness shewed to, others, as here, ver. 15. But the very preaching of the gospel to the gentiles was a great mystery; (Rom. xvi. 25, 26. Eph. iii. 4—6. 1 Tim. iii. 16.) for even the first believers preached only to the Jews; (Acts xi. 19.) St. Peter durst not do it till God by a vision told him that he should; (Acts x.) and when he had done it, those of the circumcision condemn him for it. (Acts xi. 2, 3.) The unbelieving Jews could not hear it from St. Paul, without crying out, Away with such a fellow, it is not fit that he should live: (Acts xxii. 21, 22.) and therefore they forbade the apostles to preach to the gentiles that they might be saved. (1 Thess. ii. 16.) Yea, even the believing Jews murmured at their admission to the like privileges with them, without circumcision, and the observance of the law of Moses, and made great schisms in all the churches of the gentiles upon that account; and the unbelieving Jews were enemies to the gospel for their sakes. (Rom. xi. 28.) This therefore seems to be the cause of the murmuring, and evil eye, mentioned in this parable, which, saith Christ, was wholly without cause, since they had not the less share of the blessings of Abraham, and of the Messiah, because the gentiles also, through God's free grace and favour to them, were made partakers of them. Note also, that the words, I will give to these last as unto thee, do not signify that God would give the blessings of the gospel to these murmuring Jews, the kingdom of God to be taken from them, and they being to be cast out into outer darkness; but only that they should be offered to both equally, and conferred upon them on the same terms of faith, there being no distinction betwixt Jew and gentile in the gospel dispensation, as under the law there was.

The kingdom of heaven is like, &c.] The two expositions of the fathers, viz. (1.) that they who were called at the first hour, were Adam and Eve, or Enoch and Noah; they at the second, were Abraham and the patriarchs; they at the sixth, were Moses and the Jews; they at the ninth, the prophets: or (2.) that this relates to the several ages of man; to those who are called in their infancy, as Samuel and the Baptist; or in their youth, manhood, middle age, old age,—cannot be true. Not the first, though it be as ancient as Origen, if not as Irenæus;* because this is a parable of the kingdom of heaven, and therefore can only respect those times when the kingdom of heaven was come among them: (2.) because of those many that were called, few were chosen; which is not true of those said by this exposition to be called at the first, third, and the ninth hour: not the second; because this plainly is a parable relating to the Jewish nation, (ver. 16.) and therefore not to all persons called in all ages and places of the world.

Ver. 15. Ἐν τοῖς ἐμοῖς.] This, saith Dr. Mills from his Vulgate, is "commentarius non textus," a commentary added to the text; but these words are found in Origen on Matt. p. 407. in Chrysostom, Theophylact, and in all the other versions.

[2] Ver. 20. Then came to him the mother of Zebedee's children, desiring, Ver. 21. that her two sons might sit one on his right hand, the other on his left in his kingdom.] How this is to be reconciled with Mark x. 35. see there. To sit on his right hand and on his left, is to have the most eminent places of dignity and honour after him; thus Solomon placed his mother on his right hand when he sat upon the throne, 1 Kings ii. 19. to which alludes that of Psal. xlv. 9. upon his right hand stands the queen in gold of Ophir; and that among the Persians was μεθ' αὐτὸν ἕξειν προσεδρίαν, to have the first seat after the king, (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 4.) δεύτερον καθίζεσθαι Δαρίου, to sit next Darius, or ἐχόμενος αὐτοῦ, to sit by him. (Esd. iii. 7. iv. 42.) This the mother might be encouraged to ask, because of their alliance to Christ, and because she was a continual follower of him, and served him so diligently; and she might expect they should be eminent in his kingdom, because Christ had called them sons of thunder, (Mark iii. 17.) and had admitted them and Peter at his transfiguration, (Matt. xvii. 1.) and at other times, (Mark v. 37.) when the rest of the disciples were excluded: however, the rest hearing of this ambitious request of the two brethren, and being as desirous, and, in their own opinion, as worthy of the same honour, as their frequent contentions about it testified, they had indignation against them, (ver. 24.) Now from this whole matter it appears, that none of Christ's disciples imagined he had promised the supremacy to Peter, by those words, Thou art Peter? for then neither would these two persons have desired it, nor would the rest have contended for it afterward. (Luke xxii. 24.)

[3] Ver. 22. Δύνασθε πιεῖν τὸ ποτήριον, ὃ ἐγὼ μέλλω πίνειν, καὶ τὸ βάπτισμα, &c. Can you drink of the cup that I am about to drink of, and be baptized with the baptism with which I shall be baptized?] The word cup, among sacred and profane authors, signifies the portion whether of good or evil which befals men in this world; expressed by Homer and others by two cups in the hands of Jupiter, of which

> Δοιοὶ γάρ τε πιθοὶ κατακείαται ἐν Διὸς οὔδει
> Δώρων, οἷα δίδωσι κακῶν· ἕτερος δὲ ἑάων.
> Il. ω. 525.

(See Plutarch περὶ φυγῆς, p. 600. C.) Accordingly the Psalmist saith, In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red, and he poureth out the same; ἔκλινεν ἐκ τούτου εἰς τοῦτο, he poureth out from one into the other, saith the Septuagint; but the dregs thereof shall the wicked drink. (Psal. lxxv. 8.) Fire and brimstone, storm and tempest, being the portion of their cup. To drink of this cup, is to have a measure of afflictions; and to drink of the same cup, is to have the same measure of afflictions: as in these words of Plautus,* "Ut senex hoc eodem poculo, quo ego bibo, liberet," That the old man might drink of the same cup with me. (See the use of this phrase, Isa. li. 17. 22. Jer. xxv. 15. 17. 28. Lam. iv. 21. Ezek. xxiii. 31—33. Matt. xxvi. 39. 42. John xviii. 11. Rev. xiv. 10. xvi. 19. xviii. 6. and Taubman on Plautus, Rudent. iii. 6.)

This phrase among the Jews, from whom we have reason to conceive our Lord received it, signifies, "lethale poculum bibere," or to taste of death; as when Christ saith, Father, if it be thy pleasure, let this cup pass from me. Thus R. Caiia comforts R. Lakis, concerning the death of his child, by saying, of this cup, "multi biberunt, multi bibent," many have drank, and many shall drink. It follows, καὶ τὸ βάπτισμα ὃ ἐγὼ βαπτίζομαι, βαπτισθῆναι; which words, saith Dr. Mills, belong not to St. Matthew, but St. Mark; they being wanting in the Vulgar, St. Jerome, and, saith he, in Origen, who, after he had cited these words, δύνασθε πιεῖν τὸ ποτήριον ὃ ἐγὼ μέλλω πιεῖν, adds, ἢ ὡς ὁ Μάρκος ἀνέγραψε, ὃ ἐγὼ πίνω, καὶ τὸ βάπτισμα καὶ τὰ ἑξῆς; though there it be uncertain, whether Origen cites Mark for the omission of the latter clause, or only for the change of μέλλω πιεῖν into πίνω. However, these words are found both in the twenty-second and twenty-third verses in Chrysostom and Theophylact, and in Basilius Seleucensis, hom. 24. p. 134. And again in Chrysostom, ed. Mor. tom. i. p. 381, 382. and in the Syriac and Arabic versions. And seeing they are introduced by St. Mark thus, But Jesus said unto them, Can ye drink, &c. and can ye be baptized, &c. they were certainly spoken to them by our Lord; and why then should not St. Matthew relate them as our Saviour spake them?

The metaphor of baptism, or immersion in waters, or being put under floods, is also familiar in Scripture, to signify a person overwhelmed with calamities; as when the Psalmist complains, that the waves had gone over him, Psal. xlii. 7. that he was come into deep waters, Psal. lxix. 2. see Psal. lxxxviii. 7. Cant. viii. 7. Jer. xlvii. 2. Ezek. xxvi. 19. Dan. ix. 26. Jonah ii. 3. And in this sense Christ saith of his death, I have a baptism to be baptized with. (Luke xii. 50.) Of this cup the apostle James drank when he was killed by the sword of Herod; (Acts xii. 2.) and St. John, when he was put into a furnace of hot oil, exiled to Patmos, and suffered many other things for the name of Jesus.

[4] Ver. 23. But to sit on my right hand and on my left, is not mine to give; οὐκ ἐστιν ἐμὸν δοῦναι, ἀλλ' οἷς ἡτοίμασται ὑπὸ τοῦ πατρός μου, but to them for whom it is prepared of my Father.] The Arians of old, and the Socinians at present, hence note, that Christ here signifies that there is some power which the Father hath reserved to himself, and hath not committed to him; whence, say they, it follows, that he cannot be the same God which the Father is; because he hath not the same power which the Father hath. But to this it is answered, that Christ cannot be here supposed to deny this power to himself, for then he must contradict himself when he says, (Luke xxii. 29, 30.) I dispose to you a kingdom,—that you may sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel; and, (Rev. iii. 21.) To him that overcometh will I give to sit upon my throne, as I have overcome, and sit with my Father on his throne; and surely he to whom all power in heaven and earth is given, must have power to appoint the ministers of his kingdom; whence the apostle saith, there be divers administrations, but the same Lord of them; (1 Cor. xii. 5.) Christ therefore only saith, he could give this to them only for whom it was appointed of his Father; and this he says not to signify a defect of power, but a perfect conformity to his Father's will; and that he could not do this without the motion and energy of the Divine nature, which he calls the Father, abiding in him, saying, The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he sees the Father do, (John v. 19, 20.) and can speak only what he hath heard from the Father; (John viii. 38.) which rather shews that the Divine essence abideth in him, than that there is any want of power in him.

[5] Ver. 25. Ye know that οἱ ἄρχοντες τῶν ἐθνῶν κατακυριεύουσιν αὐτῶν, καὶ οἱ μεγάλοι κατεξουσιάζουσιν αὐτῶν, the rulers of the gentiles have dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority over them: but it shall not be so among you.] Here, saith Woltzogenius, we may clearly perceive that Christ, in the person of his apostles, understands all his faithful people, and forbids them, who will be his subjects, the exercise of all civil dominion; which is certainly false, since then he had forbid the dominion of parents over their children, and of masters over their servants; the contrary to which is evident from Eph. vi. 1. 5. Colos. iii. 22. 1 Tim. vi. 1. where the power of parents over their children, and of masters over their servants, is confirmed.

Secondly, If by these words the civil magistracy should be forbidden in a Christian commonwealth, all order, all defence of good men, and punishment of evil-doers, would be taken away. For what must be done in this case; must the civil government of Christians be put into the hands of heathens? "I see no cause (saith Schlictingius) why a Christian should not rather exercise it than any other man; for who is better than a Christian? Who, in the use of this authority, will be more just and moderate? Who more diligent in defending the good, and especially those Christians who are God's peculiar people? Who is fitter to promote Christian truth and piety? When the whole realm is Christian, can it be better to commit the government to an adversary, than to an abettor of Christianity? Since God would have kings themselves to come to the knowledge of the truth, would he require them at the same time to lay aside their government? What could render them more alien from the Christian faith, or be a greater reproach to Christianity, than to say it forbade them that government which is instituted by the law of nature, and is so necessary for all people? And how contrary is this to that prediction, that kings should be their nursing fathers? Moreover, it is certain that the exercise of this civil power can be no evil thing; since he who doth it is God's vicegerent, the ordinance of God, the minister of God for good; who then would have all Christians discharged from what is lawful in itself, and highly beneficial to them, and not rather wish that all kings were Christians, or that only Christians might be kings?" And whereas Woltzogenius adds, that this empire consists not with Christian humility, which calls us to minister to others; now to command and minister is inconsistent; I answer, that government is so far from being inconsistent with ministry, that all government, whose end is not our private, but the good of others, is, in respect of them, a ministry; hence is the highest power styled the minister of God for good to them, and said λειτουργεῖν to serve, or officiate, for that very end. (Rom. xiii. 6.)

But why then, saith he, did not Christ, the head and king of the church, exercise this office? I answer, who knows not that he is King of kings, and Lord of lords, and is now in the actual exercise of his kingly office? He did not indeed exercise this dominion upon earth, because his kingdom was not of this world, and he would give no umbrage to Cæsar or the Jews, that he affected such a thing; and partly because he was to exercise his prophetic office upon earth, and go from his sufferings to the glory of his kingdom, and leave us an example of patience and humility, and of contempt of worldly grandeur.

Secondly, It is certain that this text cannot condemn all ecclesiastical government, that being as necessary to an ecclesiastical society or community, as civil government to a civil society; hence among gifts distributed for the use of the church, we read of governments, 1 Cor. xii. 28. we find the apostles had their rod, 1 Cor. iv. 21. and power given of the Lord, 2 Cor. x. 8. xiii. 10. to deliver to Satan, 1 Cor. v. 5. 2 Tim. i. 20. and to revenge all unrighteousness, 2 Cor. x. 6. And we have mention of those who are over us in the Lord, 1 Thess. v. 12. and who are ἡγούμενοι governors, to whom we must yield obedience, and submit ourselves, Heb. xiii. 7. 17. and without this, that Christian discipline, on which the welfare of the church depends, could not be exercised. Nor,

Thirdly, Do I think Christ only here forbiddeth such dominion as is attended with tyranny, oppression, and contempt of their subjects, as some collect from the words κατακυριεύειν and κατεξουσιάζειν, which, say they, bear that sense, Neh. v. 14, 15. ix. 37. Ezra vii. 24. Psal. x. 5. 10. Ecclus. xx. 8. (1.) Because St. Luke, xxii. 25. uses only the words κυριεύειν and ἐξουσιάζειν, which bear no such ill sense. (2.) Because kings and governors among the gentiles, and much less among the Jews, were not always guilty of this maleadministration. And (3.) because Christ does not oppose unto their government a just dominion, but a ministry only. (4.) Observe, that ἐξουσιάζειν, Neh. ix. 37. doth plainly signify, to govern them according to their will; and this was plainly the government which obtained in the eastern nations, the will of those kings was their law; and for this reason were they styled αὐτοκράτορες. Whereas your office being only to make known my will, you, saith Christ, shall have no such government, no dominion over the faith of others, (2 Cor. i. 24.) shall command nothing for mere will and pleasure, but your whole office shall consist in being ministers for the good of others. Whence, saith the apostle, What is Paul, what is Apollos, but διάκονοι, ministers by whom ye believed? (1 Cor. iii. 5.) And we ourselves are your servants (saith he) for Jesus' sake. (2 Cor. iv. 5.) Hence are they so often styled ministers, and their work a ministry to the saints, to the gentiles, to the church. And therefore, saith Christ, all the office any man can have in my kingdom, can be only a larger ministry to others; and in this he truly will resemble me, who came not to be ministered to, but to minister.

[6] Ver. 28. Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister; καὶ δοῦναι τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, and to give his life a ransom for many.] Here note,

First, That whereas it is said here, that Christ gave his life a ransom for many; and, xxvi. 28. that his blood was shed for many: and, Heb. ix. 28. that Christ was once offered to take away the sins of many: it doth not hence follow, that Christ died not for all; the word πολλοὶ, many, being in other places used where all are certainly included. Thus when it is said, Dan. xii. 2. That many who sleep in the dust shall arise, some to everlasting life, and some to everlasting shame. This is certainly equivalent to that of Christ, John v. 28, 29. The hour cometh, that all that sleep in the grave shall hear the voice of the Son of man, and shall come forth; they that have done good, to the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of condemnation. When it is said, Rom. v. 15. that through the offence of one, many died; this is equivalent to that of the same apostle, that in Adam all men died, 1 Cor. xv. 22. And when it is said, ver. 19. that by the disobedience of one, many were made sinners; this is certainly equivalent to what is said, ver. 12. Death passed upon all men, through that one man in whom all have sinned. Note,

Secondly, That from these words, he gave his life, λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, a ransom for many, it is evident, that Christ suffered in our stead, and gave his life instead of our lives, obnoxious to death, the wages of sin, as is largely proved, note on those words, 1 Tim. ii. 6. he gave himself, ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων, a ransom for all; and will be farther evident from the like expressions in Scripture, in Jewish and in heathen authors. Thus, Josh. ii. 14. the agreement betwixt Rahab and the spies runs thus, ἡ ψυχὴ ἡμῶν εἰς θάνατον, Let our lives die instead of yours, if ye utter not our business. So when Eleazar died, he is introduced by Josephus * speaking thus, Καθάρσιον αὐτῶν ποιῆσαι τὸ ἡμῶν αἷμα, καὶ ἀντὶ ψυχῶν αὐτῶν λάβειν τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχήν· That God would accept his blood as a propitiatory sacrifice for the Jews, and take his life instead of their lives. So Alcestis † saith to Admetus, In honour of thee I die, that thou, ἀντὶ τῆς ἐμῆς ψυχῆς, mightest live instead of me. And Porphyry,‡ from Asclepiades, says, That the first sacrifices were offered, ὑπὸ τίνας καιροὺς ψυχὴν ἀντὶ ψυχῆς αἰτουμένους, on some occasions requiring life for life. (See more of this, Outram de Sacr. lib. i. cap. 22. and Pears. Vindiciæ Ignat. par. ii. cap. 15. p. 206—208.) This being then the constant opinion both of Jews and gentiles, that their piacular victims were λύτρα and ἀντίλυτρα, ransoms for the life of the sinner; and that he who gave his life for another, suffered in his stead, and to preserve him from death; they could not otherwise judge, but that our Lord intended by this expression, to signify that he gave his life instead of the lives of those for whom he suffered. Vain here are the Socinians, when they say, this price was to be paid to Satan, who detained us captive; for the price is only to be paid to him that retains the captive, when he doth this for gain, to make money of him, as the Turks now do at Tripoli and Algiers, not when a man is detained in custody or prison, for violation of a law; for then it is not the gaoler, but the legislator, to whom the price of his redemption must be paid, or satisfaction made. And Crellius in vain denies, that this price was paid to God, for Christ became our ransom, as he offered up his life and blood for us; now he gave him- self a sacrifice and oblation to God; (Eph. v. 2.) he offered himself without spot to God; (Heb. ix. 14.) he therefore paid the price of our redemption to God.

CHAP. XXI.

1. AND when they drew nigh to Jerusalem, and were come (through Bethany) to Bethphage, to the mount of Olives, then sent Jesus two (of his) disciples, (Mark x. 1. Luke xix. 29.)

2. Saying to them, Go into the [1] village over against you, and straightway entering (into it) ye shall find [2] an ass tied, and a colt (tied) with her, (on which never man sat, Mark xi. 2.) loose them, and bring them unto me.

3. And if any man say aught to you (asking, why you do this, Mark xi. 3.) ye shall say, The Lord hath need of them; and straightway (hearing that) he will send them.

4. All this was done (by Christ), that it might be [3] fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet (Zachary, ix. 9.) saying,

5. Tell ye the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy King cometh to thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, and (that is) a colt the foal of an ass.

6. And the disciples went, and did as Jesus commanded them; (and they found the colt tied by the door without, in a place where two ways met, and they loosed him, Mark xi. 4. And the owners of the colt standing by, said, Why do ye loose the colt? ver. 5. And the disciples answered, We do as Jesus, who hath need of them, commanded us; and then they suffered them, ver. 6. Luke xix. 31. 34.)

7. And (so they) brought the ass, and the colt, and put on (one of) [4] them (to wit, the colt) their clothes, and they set him thereon.

8. And a very great multitude [5] spread their garments in the way; others cut down branches from the trees, and strewed them in the way: (as before a king. And as he was going down to the mount of Olives, the whole multitude of his disciples began to praise God with a loud voice, for all the wonderful things that they had seen, Luke xix. 37.)

9. And the multitudes that went before, and that followed (after), cried, saying, (as they did usually at the feast of tabernacles,) Hosanna to the Son of David: Blessed is (be) he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest (wishing prosperity to him, and his kingdom, from him that dwells in the highest heaven).

10. And when he was come into Jerusalem, all the city was moved, saying, Who is this?

11. And the multitude said, This is Jesus the prophet of Nazareth, (a city) of Galilee.

12. And Jesus went (the next day, Mark xi. 12.) into the temple of God, and [6] cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves,

13. And said to them, It is written, [7] My house shall be called the house of prayer, (for all nations, Isa. lvi. 7.) but ye (by these practices) have made it a den of thieves (i. e. by turning it into a place of unjust gain, you have verified the complaint of the prophet Jeremy, vii. 11. that it was become a den of robbers).

14. And the blind and the lame came to him in the temple; and he healed them.

15. And when the chief priests and scribes saw the wonderful things that he did, and the children crying in the temple, and saying, Hosanna to the Son of David; they were sore displeased,

16. And said to him, Hearest thou what these say? (Rebuke them for it, Luke xix. 39.) And Jesus saith unto them, Yea, (I hear them fulfilling the prophecy of the Psalmist; for) [8] have ye never read (the words, Psal. viii. 2.) Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise? (They therefore are excited by him to do that which your malice will not suffer you to do for the glory of God.)

17. And (having said this) he left them, and went out of the city into Bethany; and he lodged there, (with his disciples, Mark xi. 11.)

18. Now in the morning as he returned into the city, he hungered.

19. And when he saw a fig-tree in the way, he came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only, and (he) said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. And presently the fig-tree withered away; (by this example shewing, that the Jewish nation, which, being watered with the gospel, brought forth no answerable fruit, was nigh unto cursing, and would suddenly be rejected by God, Heb. vi. 8.)

20. And when (Peter, Mark xi. 21. and) the disciples saw it, they marvelled, saying, How soon is the fig-tree withered away!

21. Jesus answered and said unto them, Verily I say unto you, [9] If ye have faith, and doubt not, ye shall not only (be able to) do this which is done to the fig-tree, but also if ye shall say to this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; it shall be (so) done.

22. And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive.

23. And when he was come into the temple, the chief priests and the elders of the people came to him as he was teaching, and said, [10] By what authority doest thou these things? and who gave thee this authority? (thus to control us, and reprove our practices, to whom the government of the temple and of the people is committed.)

24. And Jesus answered and said to them, I also will ask you one thing, which if ye tell me, I in like wise will tell you by what authority I do these things; (or, you may discern this without my telling you, for John bore witness to me, John v. 33.)

25. The [11] baptism of John, whence was it? from (the God of) heaven, or of men (only)? And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say to us, Why did ye not then believe him?

26. But if we shall say, Of men; we fear (lest we should be stoned by) the people; for all hold John as a prophet.

27. And they answered Jesus, and said, We cannot tell. And he said to them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.

28. But what think you (of the parable, which fitly represents your stubbornness in rejecting the doctrine of John)? [12] A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said (to him), Son, go work to-day in my vineyard.

29. He answered and said (to his father), I will not: but afterward he repented (of his undutiful denial), and went.

30. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and (but he) went not.

31. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They said unto him, The first (only). Jesus saith to them, (You fitly resemble the second son; and the publicans, whom ye so much despise, are liker to the first; for) verily I say unto you, That the publicans and harlots (hearing John, saying, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; and repenting) go into the kingdom of God before you (who are so far from going before them in obedience to this command of God by John, that you despise it).

32. For [13] John came to you (to instruct you) in the way of righteousness, and ye believed him not; but the publicans and the harlots believed him: and ye, when ye had seen (them do) it, repented not afterward that ye (also) might believe him.

33. Hear another parable (resembling God's kind dealings with you, and your evil returns to him): [14] There was a certain householder, which planted a vineyard, and hedged it round about, and digged a wine-press in it, and built a tower (in it), and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country.

34. And when the time of the fruit drew near, he sent (successively) his servants to the husbandmen, that they might receive the fruits of it.

35. And the husbandmen took his servants, and beat one, and killed another, and stoned another, (as you have dealt with the prophets, Matt. v. 12.)

36. Again, he sent other servants more than the first: and they did to them likewise; (in this also resembling you; for which of the prophets did not your fathers persecute? Acts vii. 52.)

37. But last of all he sent to them his (only) son, saying, (Perhaps) they will reverence my son.

38. But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance.

39. And (accordingly) they caught him, and cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him, (as you will do, xx. 18.)

40. When the lord therefore of the vineyard cometh, what (think you) will he do to those husbandmen?

41. [15] They say to him, He will miserably destroy those wicked men, and will let out his vineyard to other husbandmen, who shall render him the fruits (of it) in their seasons.

42. Jesus saith to them, Did you never read in the Scriptures (those words recorded, Psal. cxviii. 22.) The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner: this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes? (Now you are those builders, and I, whom you reject, am that chief corner-stone.)

43. [16] Therefore say I to you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof.

44. And whoever shall [17] fall on (or stumble at) this stone (or through ignorance, or the prejudices he hath received from you, shall continue in his unbelief) shall be broken (by it): but on whomsoever it shall fall (in vengeance, as it will heavily upon you), it will grind him to powder.

45. And when the chief priests and pharisees had heard his parables, they perceived (at the last) that he spake of (what should befal) them.

46. But when they sought to lay hands on him, they feared the multitude, because they took him for a prophet (and this at present restrained them from so doing).

ANNOTATIONS ON CHAP. XXI.

[1] Ver. 2. ΠΟΡΕΥΘΗΤΕ εἰς τὴν κώμην, τὴν ἀπέναντι ὑμῶν· Go to the village over against you.] This could not be Jerusalem that was against Christ and his apostles, as some gloss the words; that being not a village, but a city; but, as the Arabian geographer * informs us, it was a little village two miles distant from the mount of Olives towards the south. (See Bochart. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 17. col. 210.)

[2] Εὑρήσετε ὄνον δεδεμένην, καὶ πῶλον μετ' αὐτῆς, Ye shall find an ass bound.] Seeing all the other evangelists testify, that the colt was bound, the words of St. Matthew must be filled up thus, And a colt bound with her.

Note also, that the other evangelists make mention only of the colt, because our Saviour sat upon him only. (See note on ver. 7.) Note also, here, a wonderful instance of Christ's prescience in the minutest matters, viz. 1. You shall find a colt; 2. on which no man ever sat; 3. bound with his mother; 4. in bivio; 5. as you enter into the village; 6. the owners of which shall at first seem unwilling that you shall unbind him; 7. but when they hear the Lord hath need of him, they will let him go.

[3] Ver. 4. All this was done, ἵνα πληρωθῇ τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ τοῦ προφήτου, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet,—meek, and sitting, ἐπὶ ὄνον, καὶ πῶλον, upon an ass, and upon a colt, the foal of an ass.] John xii. 15. Sitting ἐπὶ πῶλον ὄνου, upon the foal of an ass, which makes it reasonable to conceive that καὶ here signifies, id est, as vau oft does. (See note on Coloss. i. 2.) Moreover, here note, (1.) that the ancient Jews refer this place of Zachary ix. 9. to the Messias. So Midras Coheleth, in Eccles. i. 9. Such as our first redeemer was (i. e. Moses), such shall be the last (the Messiah); the first set his wife and children upon an ass, (Exod. iv. 20.) and so it shall be with the last; of whom it is said, (Zech. ix. 9.) He is poor, and sitting upon an ass. Nachmonides in Midras, upon Gen. xlix. saith, The Messias is he of whom it is said, He is poor, and sitting upon an ass. This was a thing so well known, that they in the Talmud† introduce Sapores, king of the Persians, speaking thus to the Jews, You say, That your Messias shall come upon an ass, I will send him a horse. See more to this purpose in Bochart. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 17. col. 213, 214. Note also hence from St. Chrysostom,‡ an argument, that our Jesus was their true Messiah; they being not able to shew any other that came thus to them. (See Examen Millii here.)

[4] Ver. 6, 7. They brought the ass and the colt, καὶ ἐπέθηκαν ἐπάνω αὐτῶν, and set him upon them.] Ἐπ' αὐτῷ, upon him, Mark xi. 7. ἐπὶ τὸν πῶλον, upon the colt, Luke xxix. 35. it seeming not probable to most interpreters, that in so short a journey Christ should ride upon them both; and three evangelists mentioning only one, it seems necessary here, to admit of the figure called enallage numeri, frequent in other places; so the ark rested upon the mountains of Ararat, Gen. viii. 3. i. e. upon one of them; the cities in which Lot dwelt, Gen. xix. 29. i. e. in one of which. (See Gen. xxiii. 6. Josh. vii. 1. Matt. xxvii. 44. Luke xxiii. 39. John xii. 14.) St. Matthew seems to add both, either in compliance with the words of the prophet, or because he sat upon the colt, the ass going along with him, though Theophylact saith they sat him ἐπάνω τῶν ἱματίων, upon the garments.

[5] Ver. 8. And a very great multitude, ἔστρωσαν ἑαυτῶν τὰ ἱμάτια ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ, strewed their garments in the way; others cut down branches.] Here observe, that this strewing of clothes, flowers, and branches in the way, were ceremonies used towards great men, and especially to kings and emperors: thus, saith Herodotus,* they went before Xerxes, passing over the Hellespont, μυρσίνησι στορνύντες τὴν ὁδὸν, strewing the way with myrtle-branches: thus when Cato left his soldiers to return to Rome, ὑποστόρνυσι τὰ ἱμάτια τοῖς πόσιν ᾗ βαδίζοι, they laid their garments in the way; which, saith Plutarch,† was an honour then done only τῶν αὐτοκρατορῶν ὀλίγοις, to few emperors. And when the captains proclaimed Jehu king, they put their garments under him. (2 Kings ix. 13.) This therefore the people do now to Jesus, as being to proclaim him the king Messiah. (2.) Observe, that at the feast of tabernacles, it was the custom of the Jews, not only to sing hosannas with the greatest joy, but also to carry branches in their hands, desiring, as the Jews still wish to do at this feast, that they may thus rejoice at the coming of their Messiah; whence, owning Jesus for the person, they use the hosannas and the rites observed at that feast, wishing prosperity to him and his kingdom, from him that dwelleth ἐν τοῖς ὑψιστοῖς, in the highest heavens. (Luke xix. 38.)

[6] Ver. 12. And Jesus went into the temple of God, καὶ ἐξέβαλε πάντας τοὺς πωλοῦντας καὶ ἀγοράζοντας ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, and cast out all those that bought and sold in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, &c.] Christ seems not here absolutely to forbid this permutation; it being almost necessary for them, who lived far from Jerusalem, to bring up money to purchase sacrifices and oblations there, rather than to bring them so long a journey; and suitable in equity to the law concerning tithes. (Deut. xiv. 24—26.) But he condemns the avarice of the priests; who, when these things were bought before in the shambles and markets of Jerusalem, had, for their sordid gain, now brought this merchandise into the house of God; and that this was done in honour of that sacred place, is evident from the words following, Mark xi. 16. (See the note there.) The money-changers sat there not only about the payment of the half-shekel to the sanctuary, but chiefly for the return of money from remote places (this payment being made even by the Jews in their several dispersions); that so they, who came to Jerusalem to worship, paying it to merchants at home, might have it safe from thieves, and from the trouble of carriage, at Jerusalem.

[7] Ver. 13. And saith unto them, It is written, My house shall be called, οἶκος προσευχῆς, a house of prayer, (to all nations, Mark xi. 17.) and ye have made it a den of thieves.] God said by the prophet, My house shall be called a house of prayer for all people, Isa. lvi. 7. so Isa. lx. 7. i. e. a house dedicated to my worship; of which prayer was esteemed an eminent part, as is evident from Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple; which supposes God's people should continually pray in or towards that house; and that they did so at the time of offering incense, we read Luke i. 10. Thither also went the pharisee and the publican to pray, Luke xviii. 10. Thither also went the heathen proselytes of the gate, and therefore had a court styled, The court of the gentiles; and this made it a house of prayer for all nations. But you, saith Christ, by turning it into a place of unjust gain, i. e. of gain got by exactions tending to the loss and damage of the people, have given just occasion to apply to you those words of Jeremy, vii. 11. My house is become a den of robbers in my eyes; you making a gain of that service, which you ought freely to attend upon, having your tithes from them, and a share of their offerings for that very end.

Ye have made it a den of thieves.] To the note here add, Origen here saith, that besides the reward they expected for the change of money, they gave ἀργύριον ἀδόκιμον, base money instead of good, in Matt. p. 442. and in Joh. tom. ii. p. 178.

[8] Ver. 15, 16. Have you never read, that out of the mouths of babes and sucklings I have ordained praise?] I do not see reason to say Christ cites these words as a prediction of the things here done to him; but only to say, what was there said might well be accommodated to this action: For if, when that young stripling David, whose son, according to the flesh, I am, and who was an eminent type of me, conquered Goliath, that great enemy of God's people; all the women, probably attended with their children, came out of their cities, dancing and singing praise to God: (1 Sam. xviii. 6.) is it not reasonable, that the multitudes should sing hosanna to the Son of David, coming to vanquish the devil, that great enemy of his church? and now that God hath raised up a horn of salvation for them in the house of his servant David, to deliver them from their enemies, and from the hands of all that hate them, (Luke i. 68. 74.) that they should sing glory to God in the highest, and wish prosperity to the kingdom he is now erecting?

[9] Ver. 21. Ἐὰν ἔχητε πίστιν, καὶ μὴ διακριθῆτε, If ye have faith, and doubt not,—κἂν τῷ ὄρει τούτῳ εἴπητε, if ye shall say to this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, it shall be done.] That μὴ διακριθῆναι, signifies not to discriminate, or put a difference, see note on Rom. xiv. 23. And so here it may import, If you have such a faith, as puts no difference between things you can, and things you cannot do, but makes you fully persuaded you can do any thing, which tends to the glory of God, and is requisite for the promotion of the Christian faith, you shall be able to perform the most difficult things; for that is the meaning of that phrase, to root up mountains: it being said by the Jews of their doctors, which were able to solve the most difficult questions, Such a one is a rooter up of mountains. (See note on 1 Cor. xiii. 2.) Though, therefore, Nyssen saith, that Gregory, of Neocæsaria; and Jerome, that Hilarion, removed mountains; yet I prefer the allegorical exposition, especially considering, that what is here a mountain, is Luke xvii. 6. a sycamore-tree.

Note also, That these words must be restrained to the age of miracles, and to the persons to whom they were spoken, the apostles, and first propagators of the gospel; it being certain from experience, that this is no ordinary and perpetual gift of Christians. And that the thing here promised was extraordinary, appears from the faith required to it, called by St. Mark, the faith of God; i. e. either the greatest and most excellent faith, as πόλις μεγάλη τῷ Θεῷ, is a very great city, John iii. 3. and ἀστεῖος τῷ Θεῷ, a very comely person, Acts vii. 20. So wrestlings of God, Gen. xxx. 8. mountains of God, Psal. xxxix. 7. cedars of God, Psal. lxxx. 11. Or else faith, that doth certainly persuade us of God's extraordinary assistance: and that this respects the apostles, is evident; because Christ elsewhere speaks this to them, on the account of that defect of faith, which made them fail in casting out a devil. (Matt. xvii. 19, 20.)

[10] Ver. 23. Ἐν ποίᾳ ἐξουσίᾳ ταῦτα ποιεῖς; By what authority doest thou these things and who gave thee that authority?] This the chief priests and rulers ask; because the ordinary authority of teaching in the temple was to be derived from them, of teaching elsewhere from their doctors. But yet it was a vain question, after they had seen his miracles, and knew he claimed a commission from God, and had told them that the works he had done in his Father's name bore witness of him. (John v. 36.)
